The leaders of the whig party, on the other hand, aſſerted, that if there was any danger in the precedent, that danger would reſult as ſtrongly from eſtabliſhing a regent, as from dethroning one king and appointing a ſucceſſor. Nor would the one expedient, if wantonly embraced by the people, be leſs the reſource of public convulſions than the other: that if the laws gave no expreſs permiſſion to depoſe the ſovereign, neither did they authorize the reſiſting his authority, or ſeparating the power from the title: that a regent was unknown, except where the prince, by reaſon of his tender age, or his infirmities, was incapable of a will: that then, indeed, his will was involved in that of the regent: that it would be the height of abſurdity to try any perſon for acting by virtue of a commiſſion received from a prince whom we ourſelves acknowledged to be the lawful ſovereign; nor would any jury be ſo abſurd as to act ſo contrary both to law and common ſenſe as to condemn ſuch a criminal: that even the proſpect of being delivered from this alarming inconvenience was, in the preſent ſituation of things, more diſtant than that of putting an end to a diſputed ſucceſſion: that allowing the young prince to be the legitimate heir, he had been carried abroad; would be educated in principles deſtructive to the conſtitution and eſtabliſhed religion; and he would probably leave a ſon liable to the ſame inſuperable objections: that if the whole line were cut off by law, the people would in time forget or neglect their claim; an advantage which could not be hoped for while the adminiſtration was ſtill conducted in their name, and while they were ſtill acknowledged to poſſeſs the legal title: and that a nation, thus governed by regents or protectors, approached much nearer to republicaniſm than one ſubject to monarchs, whoſe regular hereditary ſucceſſion, as well as preſent authority, was fixed and appointed by the people.

Subſequent to a long and violent debate, th queſtion was carried by two voices only, fifty-on againſt forty-nine. All the prelates except two, th biſhops of London and Briſtol, voted for a regent the primate, a diſintereſted but puſillanimous man kept at a diſtance both from the prince's court an from parliament.

A queſtion of ſuch importance being thus ended the houſe of lords proceeded to examine the differen parts of the vote ſent up to them by the common They debated whether there was an original compa between the king and people; and the affirmative w carried by fifty-three againſt forty-ſix; a proof th between the combined intereſts of the whigs, the tories were already loſing ground. The next queſtion was whether James had broke that original compact; which was carried in the affirmative. The lords then proceeded to conſider the word "abdicated;" and it was carried that "deſerted" was more proper. The concluding queſtion was, "whether king James, " having broken the original agreement and deſerted " the government, the throne was thereby vacant?" This queſtion was debated with more heat and contention than any of the former; and, upon a diviſion, the tories prevailed by eleven voices. In conſequence of this it was carried to omit the laſt article; and the vote, with theſe amendments, was ſent back to the commons. The great majority of voices in the laſt queſtion was occaſioned by the earl of Danby, who had embraced the project of beſtowing the crown ſolely on the princeſs of Orange, and of admitting her, as the hereditary, legal, ſucceſſor to king James; paſſing by the infant prince, as illegitimate, or ſuppoſitious.

The vote, however, was ſtill inſiſted on by the lower houſe, and the commons ſent up reaſons why the lords ſhould depart from their amendment. But the peers, not thinking them ſufficiently concluſive, it was thought neceſſary to have a free conference, in order to ſettle this controverſy. Certainly no national debate was ever of more importance, or managed by more able ſpeakers: yet it is ſurpriſing to find topics ſo very frivolous inſiſted upon by both parties. In public tranſactions, indeed, the true motives which produce any meaſure are ſeldom avowed. The whigs, now the ruling party, having united with the tories, in order to bring about the revolution, paid ſo much deference to their new allies, that they did not inſiſt upon a declaration, that the crown was foſeited on account of the king's mal-adminiſtration. Such a declaration, they thought, would cenſure the old tory principles, and appear too favourable to their own. They therefore agreed to blend together the king's abuſing his power, and his withdrawing from the kingdom, calling the whole an abdication; as if he had given a virtual, though not a verbal conſent to his dethronement. The tories took advantage of this notorious impropriety, which had been occaſioned merely by the complaiſance or imprudence of the whigs; and they inſiſted on the word "deſertion," as much more ſignificant and intelligible. It was retorted on them, that, however that expreſſion might be juſtly applied to the king's withdrawing himſelf, it could not, with any propriety, be applied to his violation of the fundamental laws. And thus both parties, while they, for prudential reaſons, concealed their real motives from their antagoniſts, loſt the praiſe of conſiſtence and uniformity.

The next particular urged by the managers for the lords was, that even allowing the king's abuſe of power to be equivalent to an abdication, or, in other words, to a civil death, it could operate no otherwiſe than his voluntary reſignation, or his natural death: and therefore could only make way for his ſucceſſor. It is a maxim in the Engliſh law, "that the throne is never vacant;" but inſtantly on the deceaſe of one king was filled with his legal heir, who was entitled to all the authority of his predeceſſor; and, however young or unfit for government the ſucceſſor might be, however unfortunate in his ſituation; though he were even a captive in the hands of a public enemy; yet they thought no juſt reaſon could be aſſigned why, without any default of his own, he ſhould loſe a crown to which he was, by birth, fully entitled.

This mode of reaſoning might have been oppoſed, by the managers for the commons, with many ſpecious, and even ſolid arguments. But they were contented with maintaining the vote of the commons by ſophiſtical reaſonings and evaſions; ſo that this conference ended without any determination.

It was impoſſible, however, for the public affairs to remain long in their preſent ſituation: and, therefore, by the determined perſeverance of the lower-houſe, the lords were obliged to comply; and by the deſertion of ſome peers to the whig party, the vote of the commons paſſed in the upper houſe without any alteration, by a ſmall majority; and received the ſanction of every part of the legiſlature, which then ſubſiſted.

The behaviour of the prince of Orange, during theſe tranctions, was highly meritorious, and diſcovered great moderation and magnanimity. He entered into no intrigues with the leaders of parties, but kept a profound and unconcerned ſilence. At length, however, he thought proper to open his mind, and to expreſs, though in a private manner, his ſentiments on the preſent ſituation of affairs. He ſummoned together ſeveral of the peers, and told them, that having been invited over to reſtore their liberty, he had engaged in this enterprize, and, at laſt, effected his purpoſe: that it belonged to the parliament, now choſen with freedom, to concert meaſures for the public ſettlement; and he pretended not to interpoſe in their determinations; that he heard of ſeveral ſchemes propoſed for eſtabliſhing the government: ſome inſiſted on a regent; others on beſtowing the crown on the princeſs. It was their concern alone to chuſe that plan of adminiſtration which was moſt advantageous to them: that if they choſe to ſettle a regent he had no objection; he only thought it incumbent on him to inform them, that he was determined not to be that regent; nor even engage in any ſcheme which he well knew would be attended with ſuch inſuperable difficulties: that no man could have a juſter ſenſe of the merits of the princeſs, than himſelf; but he would rather remain a private perſon than enjoy a crown which muſt depend on the will or the life of another: and that they muſt themſelves conſider, if they were inclined to purſue either of theſe two plans of ſettlement, that it would be totally out of his power to aſſiſt them in carrying it into execution: that his affairs abroad were too important to be abandoned for ſo precarious a dignity, or even to allow him ſo much leiſure as would be requiſite to introduce order into their disjointed government.

The princeſs Mary, devoted to her huſband, entered into his views, as did alſo the princeſs Anne, her ſiſter. The former declared, that, being the prince's wife, ſhe would never accept of any honour, but in conjunction with her huſband; and ſhould take it very unkind in any one who ſhould endeavour to ſeparate their intereſts.

Theſe reſolutions put an end to all debates in the convention, and the two houſes agreed, that the prince and princeſs of Orange ſhould reign jointly as king and queen of England; but that the adminiſtration ſhould be veſted in the king alone; and that the princeſs Anne ſhould ſucceed after their deaths.

In conſequence of this determination, on the 13th of February, the prince and princeſs of Orange being ſeated on two large chairs in the banqueting-houſe at Whitehall, both houſes of the convention waited upon them in a body, when the clerk of the crown read, in the names of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and the commons aſſembled at Weſtminſter, the following "declaration of their rights," which they ſaid had been violated by king James.

"1. That the pretended power of diſpenſing laws, " or the execution of laws by regal authority, with" out conſent of parliament, is illegal.

"2. That the pretended power of diſpenſing with " laws, or the execution of laws, by legal authority,

" as it hath been aſſumed and exerciſed of late, is " illegal.

" 3. That the commiſſion for erecting the court " of commiſſioners for eccleſiaſtical cauſes, and all " other commiſſions and courts of like natures, are " illegal and pernicious.

" 4. That the levying of money for the uſe of the " crown, by pretence of prerogative, without grant " of parliament for longer time, or in any other " manner than the ſame is, or ſhall be granted, is " illegal.

" 5. That it is the right of the ſubjects to petition " the king, and all commitments and proſecutions " for ſuch petitioning is illegal.

" 6. That the raiſing or keeping a ſtanding army " within the kingdom in time of peace, unleſs it be " with the conſent of the parliament, is againſt " law.

" 7. That the ſubjects, being proteſtants, may " have arms for their defence, ſuitable to their con" dition, and as allowed by law.

" 8. That the elections of members of parliament " ought to be free.

" 9. That the freedom of ſpeech, or debates and " proceedings in parliament ought not to be impeach" ed or queſtioned in any court or place, out of par" liament.

" 10. That exceſſive bail ought not to be required, " nor exceſſive fines impoſed, nor cruel nor unuſual " puniſhments inflicted.

" 11. That jurors ought to be duly impaneled and " returned; and jurors which paſs verdicts on men " for high-treaſon ought to be freeholders.

" 12. That all grants and promiſes of fines and " forfeitures of particular perſons before conviction, " are illegal and void.

" 13. And that, for redreſs of all grievances, and " for the amending, ſtrengthening, and preſerving of " the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently.

" And they do claim, demand, and inſiſt upon, all " and ſingular the premiſes, as their undoubted rights " and liberties; and no declarations, judgments, " doings, or proceedings, to the prejudice of the " people, in any of the ſaid premiſes, ought in any" wiſe to be drawn hereafter into conſequence or ex" ample."

Such were the rights and liberties demanded by the convention; and the declaration in which they were contained concluded in the following manner:

" Having therefore an entire confidence that his " highneſs the prince of Orange will perfect the de" liverance ſo far advanced by him, and will ſtill pre" ſerve them from the violation of their rights which " they have here aſſerted, and from all other attempts " upon their religion, rights, and liberties, the lords " ſpiritual and temporal, and commons aſſembled at " Weſtminſter, do reſolve, That William and Mary, " prince and princeſs of Orange, be, and be de" clared, king and queen of England, France and " Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, to " hold the crown and royal dignity of the ſaid king" doms and dominions to them the ſaid prince and " princeſs during their lives and the life of the ſur" vivor of them, and that the ſole and full exerciſe of " the royal power be only in, and executed by, the " ſaid prince of Orange, in the names of the ſaid " prince and princeſs, during their joint lives; and " after their deceaſe, the ſaid crown and royal dig" nity of the ſaid kingdom and dominions to belong " to the heirs of the body of the ſaid princeſs; and, " in default of ſuch iſſue, to the princeſs Anne of " Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and in de" fault of ſuch iſſue to the heirs of the ſaid prince of " Orange."

As ſoon as the reading of this declaration was finiſhed, the marquis of Halifax, as ſpeaker of the upper-houſe, made a ſolemn tender of the crown to their highneſſes, in the name of the peers and commons of England. The offer was accepted in the moſt obliging manner by their highneſſes; and the ſame day they were proclaimed, with the uſual ceremonies, by the names of William and Mary, king and queen of England.*

King William began his reign by a proclamation, confirming all proteſtants in the offices which they enjoyed on the 1ſt day of December. His next ſtep was, to ſettle his privy-council; after which, on the 23d of February, he gave the royal aſſent to a bill " to remove and prevent all queſtions and diſputes concerning the aſſembling and ſitting of this preſent parliament;" by which act the convention, which had ſettled the crown on the prince and princeſs of Orange, was changed into a parliament.

The king, a few days after, opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he thanked them for the great confidence they had repoſed in him, by chuſing him to be their ſovereign, aſſuring them it ſhould be his ſtudy to preſerve the good opinion they had conceived of his integrity. He laid before them the critical ſituation of affairs in Europe, and particularly in theſe kingdoms; and concluded with earneſtly requeſting them to concur in the moſt ſpeedy and effectual meaſures for the welfare of the nation.

Soon after the king ſent a meſſage to the houſe, informing them that he had received certain advice of the late king having ſailed from Breſt, with a powerful armament, to invade Ireland. Upon receiving this intelligence both houſes came to a reſolution to aſſiſt his majeſty with their lives and fortunes; they voted a temporary aid of 420,000l. to be levied by monthly aſſeſſments; and both houſes waited on the king to ſignify this reſolution. This vote was, however, far from being carried unanimouſly in the parliament: for ſeveral of the lords, both ſpiritual and temporal, abſented themſelves from the aſſembly, rather than take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy required.

The friends of James began now to form plots for diſturbing the new government, and ſeveral gentlemen of the Scottiſh nation, at this time in England, were apprehended for treaſonable practices, and ſent to the Tower. Informed of theſe commotions, and that the Scottiſh regiment of Dumbarton had mutinied and declared for James, the commons enabled the king to ſuſpend the habeas corpus act, till the 17th of April following. This was done in order to ſecure the more effectually all diſturbers of the public peace; but was certainly a ſignal inſtance of confidence, as it gave the prince ſuch a power, as few princes ought to be truſted with. They alſo brought in a bill for puniſhing

* On this occaſion the former oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy were abrogated, and the following ordered to be taken by all perſons inſtead of them:

" I. A. B. do ſolemnly promiſe and ſwear, That I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to their majeſties king William and queen Mary. So help me God."

" I. A. B. do ſwear, That I do from my heart abhor, deteſt, and abjure, as impious and heretical, the damnable doctrine and poſition, that princes excommunicated by the pope, or any authority of the ſee of Rome, may be depoſed or murdered by their ſubjects, or any other whatſoever. And I do declare, that no foreign prince, perſon, prelate, potentate, or ſtate, hath, or ought to have any juriſdiction, power, ſuperiority, or authority, eccleſiaſtical or ſpiritual, within this realm. So help me God."

puniſhing mutiny and deſertion in the army, which ſoon paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent.

On the 11th of April the king and queen were ſolemnly crowned by the biſhop of London, who officiated, at the king's deſire, in the room of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, a member of the diſcontented party. This ceremony being over, the king made a thorough change about the court.. Several who had been driven from their poſts, by the late adminiſtration, were reſtored with ſignal marks of honour and favour. The papiſts, who had ſo lately carried all before them, were now forced to ſubmit to their more ſucceſsful adverſaries: the laws againſt the former were renewed and ſtrengthened; while all ſuch as had been, in a manner, inſtrumental in effecting the revolution, were rewarded in proportion to their ſervices. At the ſame time, that the meaneſt of his ſubjects might receive ſome benefit from his acceſſion, and be thereby more firmly attached to his perſon and government, the king, about this time, recommended to the parliament (who readily acquieſced in his deſire) the abolition of the tax of hearth-money, which he underſtood was a grievous impoſition upon the people. This was certainly a very politic meaſure, and contributed greatly to gain the affections of the populace to their new ſovereign.

William, who was equal to moſt princes in political abilities, and was well acquainted with the genius of the people he was called to govern, well knew that the moſt effectual way of preſerving peace at home, was to find his ſubjects employment abroad. The great ſcheme he had formed, when only ſtadtholder, of a confederacy againſt France, began about this time to take effect. The princes of the empire aſſembled at the diet of Ratiſbon, earneſtly importuned the emperor Leopold to declare war againſt the French king, who had, in numberleſs inſtances, broke the ſeveral treaties he had concluded with the German potentates; and, without the leaſt provocation, had invaded their country, and indicated a deſign of making himſelf the maſter, or rather the tyrant of all Europe. The ſtates-general iſſued a declaration againſt Lewis, as the common enemy; and were followed by the elector of Brandenburg, while the marquis de Caſtanaga, governor of the Spaniſh Netherlands, in anſwer to Lewis, who declared war againſt his maſter, entered into an alliance offenſive and defenſive with the ſtates-general; binding the contracting parties, to co-operate with their whole powers, againſt France and her allies. William, who was ſtrongly importuned to join this confederacy, as king of England, and who heartily wiſhed for the opportunity, found no great difficulty in perſuading the Engliſh to draw the ſword againſt their old enemies and rivals. And after the proper ſteps for that purpoſe were taken, both houſes joined in a dutiful addreſs to his majeſty, deſiring him to take ſuch meaſures as would be ſufficient to reduce the French king to ſuch a condition, as to render him incapable of diſturbing the peace of Europe, or prejudicing the trade and proſperity of England, aſſuring his majeſty that he might depend on his parliament for the neceſſary aſſiſtance.

In conſequence of theſe aſſurances from his parliament, William declared war againſt the French monarch on the 7th of May. This declaration was drawn up by the maſterly hand of Somers, afterwards lord-chancellor. Lewis was charged "with having "unjuſtly invaded the territories of the emperor, "and denounced war againſt the allies of England, "in open violation of the treaties concluded under "the guarantee of the Engliſh crown: of having "encroached on the fiſhery of Newfoundland: invaded the Caribbee iſlands: forcibly ſeized the "provinces of New York and Hudſon's-bay: countenanced the ſeizure of Engliſh ſhips by French "privateers: prohibited the importation of Engliſh "manufactures: diſputed the right of the flag: and "perſecuted many Engliſh ſubjects on pretence of "religion, contrary to expreſs treaties and the law of "nations."

Ireland was far from imitating the examples of England and Scotland, in acknowledging William's title to the crown; and it was more than two years before that kingdom was entirely reduced. The earl of Tyrconnel, inviolably attached, both by gratitude and a ſimilarity of principles to a prince, to whom he was indebted for his dignity and fortune, exerted himſelf in the moſt indefatigable manner in his ſervice. On the firſt news of James's retreat from England, he ſecured the moſt important places in Ireland, of which he was governor; and joining his natural hatred of the proteſtants to what he thought motives of policy and prudence, he treated them in ſo rigorous a manner, that they were forced to retire to their brethren in the north, who ſeizing on Kilmore, Coleraine, Iniſkilling, and Londonderry, declared for William and Mary.

Such was the ſtate of affairs in Ireland, when Lewis XIV. undertook to ſupport his old friend and ally in the recovery of one part at leaſt of his dominions. Perhaps there was hardly ever a more ſtriking contraſt than between theſe two princes. The one acted the part of a generous monarch, the other that of a mere devotee, always ſurrounded by Jeſuits, and neglecting his own buſineſs and ſituation, that he might attend to their eccleſiaſtical controverſies and metaphyſical diſtinctions. Little ſucceſs could be expected from the attempts of a prince of ſo bigotted a diſpoſition. Lewis, however, furniſhed him with 5,000 forces under the command of M. de Lauſun. Theſe troops were embarked at Breſt on board a fleet conſiſting of fourteen ſhips of the line, ſix frigates, three fire-ſhips, and a ſufficient number of tranſports. Lewis alſo furniſhed him with arms for 40,000 men, a large ſum of money and ſuperb equipages. At their parting, the French monarch embraced him, and ſaid, "I cannot wiſh you better than that I may never ſee you more."

James ſailed from Breſt on the 14th of March, attended by the count d'Avaux, in quality of ambaſſador, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction; and on the 22d he arrived ſafe at Kingſale in Ireland. From hence he repaired in a few days to Cork, where he was received by the earl of Tyrconnel, who had collected an army of 30,000 foot, and 8,000 horſe, for his ſervice. But adverſity had not yet taught James wiſdom and precaution: he acted with as little prudence, as he could have done, had he no oppoſition to encounter; and was ſo far from endeavouring to conciliate the affections of the proteſtants, which in common reaſon and common policy he ought to have done, that he gave repeated proofs of his thorough hatred to their ſect, and frequently puniſhed them with death on the moſt trifling occaſions. One of the magiſtrates of Cork was executed by his orders for having declared for the prince of Orange. In ſhort, inſtead of endeavouring to win over his adverſaries by mildneſs and popularity, he only exaſperated them the more by his cruelty and arrogance.

James, after refreſhing his forces, marched for Dublin, and entered the city in triumph. He was met at the Caſtle-gate by a proceſſion of popiſh biſhops and prieſts in their pontificals, bearing the hoſt, before which he kneeled down in public. He immediately diſmiſſed all the proteſtant members of the council, and filled their ſeats with papiſts. He publiſhed, indeed, ſeveral proclamations, promiſing protection to all his proteſtant ſubjects who ſhould preſerve their conſtancy; but ſo little regard was paid to his promiſes, that they all reſolved to imitate the example of their friends, and ſtand in their own defence.

James ſoon made himſelf maſter of Coleraine and Kilmore, and exerciſed the moſt brutal cruelty on all the proteſtants who fell into his hands. Terrified at theſe inhuman proceedings, and alarmed by the report of a general maſſacre intended to be perpetrated on all who adhered to the reformed religion, they fled from all parts of the country, and ſhut themſelves up in Londonderry, fully determined to ſuffer all the horrors of famine rather than ſubmit to ſo brutal an enemy. An expreſs was diſpatched to England, imploring immediate aſſiſtance. Some arms and ammunition were accordingly ſent them; but no conſiderable reinforcements till the middle of April, when two regiments arrived at Loughfoyle, under the command of the colonels Cunningham and Richards.

By this time James's army had reached the neighbourhood of Londonderry; and advice of the enemy's approach was ſent to Lundy, the governor, by Mr. Walker, a proteſtant clergyman of Donaghmore, who had raiſed a regiment for the defence of himſelf and his brethren. Lundy immediately ſummoned a council of war, at which both Richards and Cunningham aſſiſted. Whether the members were affected with cowardice, or treachery, is uncertain; but they came to a reſolution that the town was untenable, and that it would therefore be imprudent to land the regiments. Walker was of a very different opinion, and uſed every argument in his power to prevail upon the governor to take the field immediately, and bring on a general engagement with the enemy; promiſing that the proteſtant inhabitants would do their duty, and fall nobly in the conteſt, rather than ſubmit to an enemy whoſe very religion rendered them inhumanly cruel. But all his endeavours were in vain; Lundy liſtened only to his own puſillanimous apprehenſions, and which were greatly heightened when he found that James was advancing, at the head of his troops, to the walls of the town. The inhabitants and ſoldiers were ſo exaſperated at the cowardice of their governor and the two colonels, that they flew to arms, and would have made their lives pay the forfeit of their perfidy, had not the former kept himſelf concealed in his chamber, and the other two found means to eſcape on board their ſhips.

In the mean time major Baker, their deputy-governor, fired ſo warmly from the walls upon James's troops, that they were obliged to retreat to St. John's town in ſome diſorder. Walker and Baker made uſe of this reſpite to preſs Lundy to exert himſelf as became a loyal ſubject and a good ſoldier; and to undertake the defence of the place; but ſuch was the governor's cowardice or treachery, that he abſolutely refuſed to have any thing to do with the government, and ſoon after made his eſcape in diſguiſe.

It was now unanimouſly agreed by the inhabitants to beſtow the government of the place on Mr. Walker and major Baker; in conſequence of this they immediately prepared for a vigorous defence; fully reſolved to defend their religion and liberties to the laſt extremity, and bury themſelves under the ruins of the town, rather than ſubmit to the enemy. They immediately formed the inhabitants, amounting to ſeven thouſand men, into different regiments; taught them the manner of uſing their arms, the firing of cannon, and other particulars neceſſary to be known at this alarming criſis. Their religious ſentiments inſpired them with a noble contempt of death, and they determined to conquer or periſh.

On the 20th of April James's army opened the trenches, and their batteries began to play on the town, which was but poorly fortified, having only twenty pieces of cannon on the walls, and thoſe wretchedly mounted. The beſieged, however, animated by the example and ſpirited harangues of Mr. Walker, held out with aſtoniſhing reſolution, and bravely repelled all the attacks of the enemy.

James was with his army at the opening of the trenches, but he ſoon returned to Dublin in order to open the ſeſſion of parliament, which he had appointed to aſſemble on the 7th of May. He left the command of the army to the marquis de Roſane, one of the French generals, a man of more than ſavage haughtineſs and cruelty of diſpoſition. Incenſed at the oppoſition he met with from what he called an handful of half-ſtarved peaſants, he determined to vent his rage in the moſt inhuman manner. He informed the beſieged, that, unleſs they inſtantly ſubmitted to their lawful ſovereign, he would not leave one ſtone upon another in the town, nor a ſingle perſon alive to carry the news of their deſtruction. It is a mark of true courage to look upon the threatenings of arrogance and vanity with contempt. The governors and garriſon anſwered his threats only by doubling their reſiſtance, though their proviſions were now all expended, and they were reduced to the dreadful neceſſity of ſupporting life by eating the fleſh of horſes, dogs, cats, and every other kind of loathſome food. They, however, ſupported their courage, and a proclamation was publiſhed, prohibiting, under pain of death, any perſon to talk of ſurrendering.

The French general, finding that menaces had no effect, formed a deſign for forcing them to comply, which ſeemed to be rather the dictates of a fiend than of a human being. He ſent detachments of his ſoldiers through the adjacent country, with orders to ſeize all the proteſtants they could find, without diſtinction of age or ſex, ſtrip them naked, and drive them, in that condition, under the walls of Londonderry. This order was executed with a brutality equal to that of the giver of it. Upwards of four thouſand of theſe miſerable objects were thus expoſed to the view of the beſieged; who, from their ramparts, beheld, with an horror not to be deſcribed, the forlorn condition of their fellow proteſtants, many of whom were every moment expiring with fatigue, cold, hunger, and the cruel uſage they had received from their bloody perſecutors.

This ſight, however, had a very different effect upon the garriſon from what Roſane expected. They felt the deepeſt compaſſion for the diſtreſſes of their brethren; but their compaſſion was mingled with ſuch indignation againſt the author of that infernal action, and ſuch apprehenſions of what would be their own fate, if they ſhould fall into his power, that they unanimouſly determined to periſh rather than ſubmit to ſuch a barbarian.

Walker cauſed gibbets to be erected on the walls, and informed the French general, that, unleſs he ſuffered theſe wretched people to retire, he would immediately hang up every catholic in the town, together with all the priſoners they had taken in their ſallies. Convinced, by their whole behaviour, that they would certainly carry their threats into execution, Roſane ordered the proteſtants to be releaſed, after they had been detained three days, without taſting any kind of food. Numbers of them periſhed by famine and fatigue in their return to their houſes, and many of thoſe who ſurvived had the additional misfortune to find their habitations and effects deſtroyed, by the roving parties about the country; ſo that the greater part of theſe unfortunate people fell victims to the infernal malice of a popiſh foe.

The intrepid garriſon of Londonderry was now reduced from 7,000 to 5,700: and theſe were driven to ſuch extremity of diſtreſs, that they were on the point of coming to the dreadful reſolution of feeding upon their priſoners, when major-general Kirk, who had rendered himſelf ſo infamous for his cruelties after Monmouth's rebellion, arrived in the Lough with a reinforcement of nine thouſand men. He had received orders to relieve the town at all events; and accordingly ſent three ſhips, laden with proviſions, up the river, under the protection of the Dartmouth frigate. The enemy well knew that it would be impoſſible to conquer the town by famine, unleſs all communication with the ſea, by means of the river, was cut off. They had, accordingly, erected ſeveral ſtrong batteries on both ſides of the ſtream, and drawn a ſtrong boom acroſs the channel. Theſe precautions were thought ſufficient to render every attempt made by ſea, for the relief of the place, abortive. But here the enemy was miſtaken. One of the ſhips, taking the advantage of the tide and a ſtrong gale of wind, advanced through the fire of the batteries, with full ſail, againſt the boom. The ſhock was too violent to be reſiſted; the boom gave way, and the other veſſels following her, they all anchored in ſafety before the town.

It is impoſſible to deſcribe the univerſal joy of the inhabitants at this happy event; while the diſcouragement of James's army was equally remarkable; they now deſpaired of ſucceeding in their enterprize, raiſed the ſiege that very night, and retired with the utmoſt precipitation, after loſing near 8,000 men in this fruitleſs attempt. Kirk now landed at the town, and Walker, at the earneſt requeſt of the inhabitants, paſſed over to England, to return their grateful thanks to their majeſties for their generous ſuccour. He was received by the king and queen with that honour and reſpect ſo juſtly due to his diſtinguiſhed valour.

This was not the only inſtance of defence made in ſupport of the proteſtant cauſe. The inhabitants of Inniſkilling, on receiving intelligence that Londonderry had denied entrance to the troops in James's ſervice, reſolved not to admit any garriſon of his party: and having raiſed a regiment of twelve companies, the inhabitants ſhut their gates, and appointed Guſtavus Hamilton their governor. He was a zealous proteſtant, and an officer of known courage and conduct. Having thus determined to oppoſe the popiſh army of James, they proclaimed king William and queen Mary. The lord Gilmoy, who had declared for James, appeared before their walls, and ſummoned them to ſurrender; but was, by the noble reſiſtance they made, obliged to raiſe the ſiege, which, on their refuſal to capitulate, he had undertaken. Nor was this the whole; for the day before Londonderry was relieved, the brave Inniſkillingers advanced, with their handful of men, againſt ſix thouſand Iriſh, and totally defeated them at a place called Newton-butler; killing near three thouſand of the enemy, with the loſs of only twenty killed and fifty wounded.

During theſe tranſactions the Iriſh parliament met at Dublin, purſuant to James's proclamation; and was opened by that prince with a ſpeech from the throne. He firſt thanked them for their zeal and loyalty; laviſhed the higheſt encomiums on the humanity and generoſity of his good brother and ally, the king of France, diſplayed towards himſelf, his queen and his ſon, in affording them an aſylum, after being expelled their lawful dominions; and in having now enabled him to viſit one part of his realm in perſon. He then declared his fixed reſolution to grant to all his ſubjects full liberty of conſcience, which he conſidered as the only certain method of ſecuring their happineſs as well as his own, looking upon himſelf as the common parent of all his people. He concluded with aſſuring both houſes of his hearty concurrence with them in enacting ſuch laws, as might tend to the tranquillity and ſettlement of his dominions.

No ſooner had James left the houſe, than the commons (who were almoſt to a man papiſts) came to a reſolution of preſenting an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty, and of deſiring the count d'Avaux to offer their moſt grateful acknowledgements to the French king for the friendly aſſiſtance he had given to their ſovereign. They next ordered a bill to be brought into the houſe for recognizing James's title, and to expreſs their abhorrence of the prince of Orange's uſurpation, as well as of the diſloyalty and treaſonable conduct of the Engliſh.

James now publiſhed a declaration, in which he complained of the many falſe and invidious reports that had been ſpread againſt his perſon and government; inſiſted upon his own impartiality in preferring his proteſtant ſubjects to places of truſt and profit; his care in protecting them from their enemies; redreſſing their grievances, and indulging them with liberty of conſcience: promiſing that he would, for the future, take no ſtep without the concurrence and conſent of his parliament; offering a free pardon to all who ſhould abandon his enemies, and join him in twenty-four days after this declaration was publiſhed; and charged all the blood that might be ſpilt in this conteſt upon thoſe who ſhould perſevere in rebellion.

The conduct of James, however, ſoon evinced that he meant not to keep his promiſes any longer than they anſwered his convenience; for two days after a bill was brought into the houſe of commons, by Nugent, lord chief juſtice of the king's-bench in Ireland, for repealing the act of ſettlement, which paſſed without the leaſt oppoſition. By this repeal, two thirds of the proteſtants in the kingdom, who held their fortunes by virtue of the above act, were diſpoſſeſſed of their eſtates, and expoſed to miſery and want; while papiſts ſeized on all their acquiſitions. Some of the members of the upper houſe oppoſed this bill, eſpecially the biſhop of Meath, who, in a moſt pathetic and eloquent ſpeech, expoſed both the injuſtice and abſurdity of it; and endeavoured to prove that it had no tendency to promote either the good of the king, or the happineſs of the public. That, on the contrary, it tended not only to ruin the king, and deſtroy the public; but was at once impolitic and inconvenient in point of time. This reaſoning, though founded on the moſt acknowledged principles, had no effect on the houſe: the parliament was determined to ruin the proteſtants in the moſt effectual manner, and accordingly the bill paſſed into a law, by receiving the royal aſſent.

Two days after the ſigning of the above act, a bill of attainder was paſſed againſt all thoſe who were abſent from the kingdom, and refuſed to acknowledge the authority of king James, or held any correſpondence with the rebels; or who had any ways aſſiſted the prince of Orange ſince the firſt of Auguſt laſt. By this act no leſs than three thouſand proteſtants were attainted by name, among whom were two archbiſhops, one duke, ſeventeen earls, ſeven counteſſes, as many biſhops, eighteen barons, thirty-three baronets, fifty-one knights, and eighty-three clergymen, all of whom were declared puniſhable by death and forfeiture. A bloody proſcription, which has not its parallel in the records of the moſt tyrannical government; eſpecially when it is remembered that all the proſcribed were excluded from all hopes of pardon, and all benefit of appeal, unleſs enrolled by the king's order, before the firſt day of the enſuing month of December.

In the mean time William was not idle in his preparations for the relief of his proteſtant ſubjects. He was informed that another ſtrong fleet, as a convoy to ſome tranſports laden with arms, ammunition, &c. was ſoon to ſail from France to Ireland; and therefore the king detached admiral Herbert from Spithead, with twelve ſhips of the line, one fireſhip, and four tenders, in order to intercept the enemy. The Engliſh admiral having, for ſome time, been blown about by contrary winds, reached at length the Iriſh coaſt, and on the firſt of May diſcovered the French fleet, conſiſting of no leſs than twenty-eight ſhips of the line, moſt of them from ſixty to ſeventy guns, and five fireſhips, lying at anchor at Bantry-bay. The French admiral no ſooner ſaw the Engliſh fleet, than he immediately gave orders for getting under ſail, and giving the enemy battle. Herbert, having for ſome time endeavoured to gain the weather gage of the French, and finding it impoſſible to ſucceed, thought it highly imprudent to fight the enemy ſo ſuperior in force, while he laboured under ſo particular a diſadvantage. He therefore ſtood off to ſea, and maintained a running fight; till the evening began to approach, when the enemy tacked about, and returned to Bantry-bay. This trifling ſkirmiſh was by the French repreſented as a ſignal victory, though, with all their ſuperiority of ſtrength, they neither took nor ſunk a ſingle veſſel. William, however, was ſo ſatisfied with the behaviour of his admiral on this occaſion, that when the latter returned to Portſmouth, his majeſty, in an excurſion he made thither, to haſten the naval preparations then carrying on at that port, dined on board Herbert's ſhip, and declared his intention of creating him an earl in conſideration of his ſervices: at the ſame time he conferred the honour of knighthood on captain Cloudeſly Shovel, another ſea officer, who had ſerved in this expedition, and beſtowed a gratuity of ten ſhillings on every private ſailor.

Notwithſtanding all the aſſiduity of William in haſtening the naval and military preparations, James had been ſix months in Ireland before an Engliſh army was ready to embark for that kingdom. At laſt eighteen regiments of foot, five of dragoons, and a ſuitable train of artillery, being ready, the duke of Schomberg was appointed general, and the forces landed in the neighbourhood of Carrickfergus on the 13th of Auguſt. About 10,000 foot and dragoons were detached to take poſſeſſion of Belfaſt, which was abandoned by the enemy at their approach. They, however, retired no farther than Carrickfergus, where they propoſed to make a ſtand againſt the Engliſh; but the latter attacked the place with ſo much intrepidity, that they were maſters of it in four days. Newry, Dundalk, and other places opened their gates at the firſt ſummons; and had not ſo many delays have been made in ſending the general the train of artillery he had left behind him in England, Schomberg would have made a much greater progreſs; but in conſequence of this ſtrange conduct he was obliged to continue inactive during the remainder of the campaign. On the approach of winter, both the Engliſh and Iriſh retired into quarters.

The ſame delays that had prevented Schomberg from purſuing his conqueſt, alſo rendered the deſigns of the naval armaments abortive. Admiral Herbert, now earl of Torrington, did not ſail again for Ireland till the ſeaſon was far advanced. His intention was to ſurprize the city of Cork, but he was diverted from his purpoſe by falſe intelligence, that James with his whole army was encamped in the neighbourhood. It was therefore thought imprudent to attack the city, and the whole fleet, after a ſhort ſtay on the Iriſh coaſt, returned to England, and came to an anchor in Torbay.

The Engliſh parliament met on the 19th of October, when the king explained the neceſſity of a preſent ſupply to carry on the war; deſired they would be ſpeedy in their determinations on that ſubject, as they would have the greateſt influence on the princes and ſtates concerned in the alliance againſt France, as a general meeting was appointed to be held at the Hague in the month of November. The houſes were then prorogued for four days, when they again aſſembled; and the commons taking the king's ſpeech into conſideration, unanimouſly reſolved to aſſiſt his majeſty in reducing Ireland, and joining his allies abroad, for a vigorous proſecution of the war againſt France. They accordingly voted a ſupply of two millions, to be raiſed by a land-tax of three ſhillings in the pound, and additional duties upon coffee, tea and chocolate.

Party diſputes between the Whigs and the Tories were now carried to the greateſt height. William was not calculated for joining in theſe conteſts; he ſaw them with regret and concern. Cold, reſerved, ſilent, generally ſhut up in his cloſet, without a taſt for any thing but the chace, moſt commonly a Hampton-court, becauſe the air of London did no agree with his conſtitution, he was by no means popular, and began to loſe the affections of the Engliſh He ſaw his error, and policy for once prevailed ove nature. He ſuddenly adopted the old popular cuſtom was preſent at horſe races, and ſhewed himſelf affabl and complaiſant. He dined with the lord-mayor o London, accepted the title of citizen, and ſubmitte to be appointed maſter of the Grocers company, condeſcenſion which would have been too great, ha he known, at the ſame time, how to ſupport his dignity.

The church of England, which hated popery, wa far from being fond of Calviniſm in the prince; an William, who was ſufficiently aware of the danger attending religious diſputes, made another effort fo uniting the church and preſbyterians. But his endeavours were ſoon rendered abortive. The lower hou oppoſed the attempt with the utmoſt firmneſs. O this occaſion they had recourſe to the phraſe uſed b the antient barons: "We will not have the laws England changed." This increaſed the animoſit already ſufficiently alarming, between the two partie The Tories, perſuaded they ſhould gain the aſcen ant by making their court to the king, made him t moſt pompous promiſes of ſupplies, provided h would paſs an act of oblivion and diſſolve the preſe parliament. The Whigs ſoon diſcovered the deſi of their antagoniſts, and in order to render the a tempt abortive, they introduced a bill for reſtori corporations to their antient rights and privilege to which a clauſe was added, denouncing the ſevere penalties againſt thoſe who had been any way co cerned in delivering up the charters. The Tori oppoſed this clauſe with their utmoſt force, and it w at length rejected. The bill, however, paſſed bo houſes; but the lords were ſo equally divided on t occaſion, that the majority conſiſted of a ſingle voi only. Both parties now made the ſtrongeſt applic tions to the king to bring him over to their reſpecti intereſts. William was under the greateſt perplex how to determine: the behaviour of the Whigs h given him ſufficient reaſon to think that they we tinctured with republican principles, and conſequen enemies to the regal power. He was therefore p ſuaded, that by giving the royal aſſent to the bill, muſt in a manner be dependent wholly on them, therefore retain nothing more than the ſhadow o king. On the other hand, he was no ſtranger to t attachment of the Tories to the divine indefeaſi right of kings, and therefore it would be the high imprudence to place in them an unlimited confiden

A.

A. D. 1690. At this juncture William formed the reſolution of going over to Ireland in perſon to finiſh the war. In conſequence of which, on the 17th of January, he went to the houſe of lords, and after declaring his intentions, prorogued the parliament till the 22d of April; but on the 6th of February he diſſolved it, and iſſued writs for calling a new one to meet on the 20th of March. By this means the bill was rendered abortive, after it had paſſed both houſes.

The election was ſo favourable to the Tories, that they had a conſiderable majority in the lower houſe, and the aſſembly was agitated with the moſt violent debates. Two bills in particular were violently oppoſed and as violently defended. The one for ratifying the acts of the preceding parliament; the other for requiring all perſons in office, on pain of impriſonment, to take an oath, abjuring king James. The firſt paſſed, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the moſt violent amongſt the Tories. The houſe was apprehenſive of the conſequences, if that parliament, by virtue of which the preſent government was eſtabliſhed, ſhould be declared illegal. The ſecond, which the Whigs ſupported in conſort with the miniſtry, with all their power, was more obſtinately oppoſed. The king, apprehenſive that an open rupture between the two parties would be the conſequence, deſired the miniſtry to give up the point. This interpoſition of the king ſo highly diſguſted the earl of Shrewſbury, then ſecretary of ſtate, that he immediately reſigned his poſt; nor could all the remonſtrances of the king, who was no ſtranger to his great abilities, prevail upon him to keep the ſeals, till his return from Ireland. The Whigs had alſo the mortification to ſee an act of oblivion paſſed in favour of their antagoniſts.

In the mean time the parliament, being ſenſible how deſirous the king was to ſet out for Ireland, diſpatched the buſineſs before them with the greateſt facility; and the royal aſſent being given to ſeveral money bills, the act of indemnity, and ſome other acts of a ſimilar nature, together with a bill for inveſting the queen with the adminiſtration of the government during the king's abſence, his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſhort ſpeech from the throne.

During theſe tranſactions in England, James had very little reaſon to expect he ſhould long govern Ireland. Lewis had indeed ſent him a reinforcement of 5000 men, under the command of count de Lauſun, beſides thoſe he carried over with him, ſo that James's forces at preſent amounted to 7000 French and 14 Iriſh, moſt of them veteran troops; the reſt, which formed another body of 10 or 12,000 men, were new raiſed, undiſciplined, and not to be depended upon. William, on the other hand, had increaſed his army to near 40,000 men, all regular forces well diſciplined, and commanded by brave and experienced officers. A ſuperiority which aſſured him of ſucceſs; and he determined to drive the enemy out of Ireland.

After conſtituting the queen regent during his abſence, William embarked for Ireland on the 4th of June, and landed on the 14th at Carrickfergus, attended by prince George of Denmark, the duke of Ormond, the earls of Oxford, Scarborough and Mancheſter, and many other perſons of diſtinction. He repaired immediately to Belfaſt, where he was met by the duke of Schomberg, the prince of Wirtemberg, major general Kirke, and other principal officers.

The whole face of affairs was immediately changed on the king's arrival. The military operations had been for ſome time ſuſpended by the addreſs of the duke of Schomberg, who carefully avoided coming to an engagement with the enemy, before his majeſty's arrival to head his troops in perſon. James, wearied with a perpetual ſtate of uncertainty, ſeemed deſirous to determine his fate by one deciſive action. William was equally willing to put a final period to all conteſt for the crown of England. Thus determined, the two rivals, with their whole forces, moved towards each other, to decide at once the quarrel, that had long divided the kingdom, and deſtroyed ſo many of the innocent inhabitants.

William, after refreſhing his troops at Belfaſt, marched to Liſburne, where the duke of Schomberg had fixed his head quarters, and thence to Hilſborough, ordering the whole army to encamp at Loughbrillen. Here he reviewed his forces, and found they amounted to 36,000 effective men, well armed, and equipped with every particular.

In the mean time, James committed the care of guarding Dublin to a body of militia, under the command of Lutteral, and joined his army, now nearly equal to the Engliſh in number, excluſive of about 15000 men, left in different garriſons. After advancing to the banks of the river Boyne, he pitched his camp in a very advantageous ſituation, having his front defended by that deep and rapid river, a riſing ground and deep moraſs; ſo that the Engliſh could not attack him without expoſing themſelves to the moſt imminent danger. The jacobite officers therefore were very preſſing with James, not to venture an engagement; but rather reinforce his garriſons, withdraw to the Shannon, and wait the event of the naval preparations, then making in France for attacking the Engliſh, and ſending ſuccours to Ireland. But James, determining to decide the conteſt by a general battle, refuſed theſe ſalutary counſels, and made the neceſſary preparations for a deciſive engagement.

William was equally prepared to receive him; but thought proper, before the battle began, to reconnoitre the ſituation of the enemy. Accordingly he advanced to the oppoſite ſide of the river, where, being ſingled out by the enemy, they brought down two field pieces by a hollow way, and planted them againſt his perſon. The firſt ſhot killed a man and two horſes cloſe by his ſide; and the ſecond rebounding from the ground, grazed his right ſhoulder, and produced a conſiderable contuſion. William did not betray the leaſt emotion on this occaſion; but after cauſing his wound to be bound up, he remounted his horſe, and kept on his former pace, only ſaying, "there was no neceſſity for the bullet to come nearer." This accident, however, though of no great moment in itſelf, occaſioned ſome confuſion among his majeſty's attendants; which being obſerved by the enemy, and they not ſeeing the king on horſeback, concluded that their balls had effected the intended purpoſe, and that William was killed. They therefore gave a general ſhout, which was echoed through the camp. The news was even ſpread to Dublin, whence it was ſent to Paris, where, contrary to the cuſtom of the French court, the people were ſuffered to expreſs their joy by bonfires and illuminations.

William, to prevent any confuſion in his own army, rode through the ranks, and by that means effectually removed the impreſſions which this falſe rumour might otherwiſe have produced on the ſpirits of his troops. About nine o'clock in the evening he called a council of war, and declared his intention of croſſing the river, and giving battle to the enemy. Schomberg ſtrongly oppoſed this meaſure; but the king being abſolutely determined, his plan was adopted by the majority of the council. Schomberg therefore acquieſced, and propoſed that part of the army, horſe and foot, ſhould be ſent that night to Slanebridge, in order to paſs the Boyne, and poſt themſelves between the enemy and the paſs at Duleck.

This advice, which if purſued muſt have aſſured the Engliſh of ſucceſs, was objected to, and over-ruled by the Dutch officers; at which the duke was ſo diſguſted that he retired to his tent, whither the order of battle, after being ſettled in the council, was ſent to him. This he conſidered as an additional affront: but the reſpect he owed his ſovereign kept him from complaining. He only ſaid, with ſome marks of diſcontent, that it was the firſt order of that kind he had ever received.

It was alſo agreed in council, that early next morning lieutenant general Douglas, with the right wing of the infantry, and Munhardt, count Schomberg, the duke's ſon, ſhould paſs the river at Slane-bridge; in order to poſt themſelves between the enemy's camp and Drogheda, while a body of foot were to force a paſſage over the ford at Old-bridge.

James likewiſe called a council of war, when it was propoſed, by lieutenant-general Hamilton, to ſend a ſtrong party of dragoons to take poſſeſſion of a ford, a little below the town of Drogheda, the ſecuring of which was of the greateſt importance. James, however, by an obſtinate perverſeneſs, would have only ſixty dragoons on that ſervice. The cannonade, which had continued pretty warmly ever ſince the two armies had come in ſight of each other, ceaſed towards the cloſe of the evening. William rode through the whole army by torch-light, and retired to his tent, after having given the neceſſary orders for the proper diſpoſitions, and directed his ſoldiers to wear green boughs in their hats during the enſuing action, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe of the enemy, who wore in theirs pieces of white paper.

Early the next morning (July 1, 1690) general Douglas, with young Schomberg, the earl of Portland, and Overkirk, marched to Slane-bridge, and paſſed the river with very little oppoſition. On their gaining the oppoſite bank, they perceived a conſiderable body of the enemy, formed into two lines behind a deep moraſs, which ſecured their front. Douglas, on reconnoitering their diſpoſition, thought it adviſeable to halt for the coming up of a freſh reinforcement, which he knew were on their march to join him; and on their arrival, he ordered the infantry to move towards the moraſs between them and the enemy, while count Schomberg with his cavalry, who could not poſſibly march that way, was ſent round it in order to attack the Iriſh in flank. The enemy no ſooner perceived the motion made by the Engliſh, than they wheeled about, and retreated towards the paſs of Duleck: but being cloſely purſued by the cavalry under young Schomberg, numbers of them were cut to pieces in their retreat, or rather flight. In the mean time William, who was ignorant of what had paſſed betwen this part of the army and the enemy, but ſuppoſed that his men had, by this time, effected their paſſage over the river, ordered his main body, compoſed of the Dutch guards, the French proteſtant regiment, the Inniſkilling foot, and four battalions of Engliſh, to paſs the river at the Old-bridge ford, and attack the enemy. They accordingly forded the river though the waters were breaſt-high, and having gained the oppoſite bank, notwithſtanding a body of muſqueteers ſent to oppoſe them, they drew up into files, and attacked the Iriſh with ſuch fury, that, unable to ſupport the charge, they abandoned their intrenchments and retreated. James had imprudently removed his artillery from the bank of the river, which greatly facilitated the landing of the Engliſh; but before all the battalions could form, they were charged with great impetuoſity by general Hamilton, at the head of a conſiderable body of horſe and foot, and the diſpute was, for ſome time, very obſtinate. At laſt the Iriſh foot, who that day behaved very ill, gave way, leaving their horſe to ſuſtain the whole fury of the combat. In the firſt attack, la Caillemont, the friend and inſeparable companion of the intrepid duke Schomberg, received a mortal wound, at the head of the French proteſtants; and, as he was carrying back by four ſoldiers to the Engliſh camp, he encouraged his countrymen, who were ſtill croſſing the river, by calling out to them, "to glory my good lads, to glory."

Schomberg, informed of the furious attack made upon the regiments that had forded the river, and that the French refugees were without a leader, paſſed the ſtream immediately to head them. He had no ſooner reached the oppoſite bank, than he rode full ſpeed to the French proteſtants, and putting himſelf at their head, he cried out, "Behold your perſecutors." Animated by his example, the refugees attacked the enemy with the utmoſt fury; but a party of James's guards, returning towards the main body of their army, ſurrounded Schomberg. Exaſperated at the attempt, and deſirous of revenging the inſult, the refugees fired upon them with too little caution, for one of the balls ſtriking the general put an end to his life. Thus fell the famous Schomberg in the eighty-third year of his age, after a long life replete with military glory.

This misfortune had like to have been fatal to the whole army. The forces that had hitherto fought with ſuch remarkable intrepidity ſeemed to have loſt their courage with their general: their arms remained inactive in their hands; they gazed at each other with ſilent aſtoniſhment, and gave ground apace. The enemy perceived it, and animated with ſo fortunate an incident, returned to the charge with ſuch ardour and intrepidity, as ſeemed to command ſucceſs.

William, who might be ſaid to be every where during the whole action, perceived the advantage of the enemy, and brought up the left wing at the very moment when they were going to fall upon the center. Intimidated at his approach they halted, faced about, and retreated to a ſmall village, called Dunmore, about half a mile from the paſs, where they made ſo vigorous a ſtand, that the Dutch and Daniſh horſe, though headed by the king in perſon, unable to ſuſtain their terrible fire, gave way; and even the Inniſkillingers themſelves ſhewed a backwardneſs to advance. Shocked at this timidity, William rode up to the latter, and aſked, in a ſharp tone, if this was the behaviour he ought to expect from them. Stung by this reproach, and being acquainted that it was his majeſty that now headed them, they inſtantly reſumed their wonted courage, and returned to the charge with redoubled vigour. At the ſame time, the Dutch horſe rallying their ſeparated men, returned to the charge; and the enemy, after an hour's bloody conflict, were beaten back with conſiderable loſs. In this action lieutenant-general Hamilton, who had been the principal ſupport of the Iriſh during the whole engagement, was taken priſoner. This action ſo diſpirited them, that they abandone the field with great precipitation; but the French and Swiſs guards retreated in good order, William no thinking it prudent to puſh the purſuit beyond the field of battle.

In the mean time young Schomberg, being in formed of his father's death, was inſpired with much ardour to revenge his fate, that nothing coul oppoſe the fury of his arm. Animated at once wi a juſt reſentment, and a noble thirſt for honour, h drove the enemy ſeveral times beyond the village Duleck, ſtrewing the ground with their dead bodie Nor could any thing reſtrain his fury, till he receiv poſitive orders from the king to put a ſtop to th ſlaughter, and return to the ſpot where the foot ha halte halted, and where they continued under arms during the night.

Thus ended the famous battle of the Boyne, in which the loſs of James amounted to about 1500 men, among whom were the lords Dongan, and Carlingford, Sir Neal O'Neal, the marquis of d'Hocquincourt, beſides ſeveral priſoners, the chief of whom was lieutenant-general Hamilton. The Engliſh loſt about five hundred men; an inconſiderable number for the acquiſition of ſo important a battle, had not the famous duke Schomberg, the moſt conſummate general in Europe, been one of the number. William himſelf had nearly ſuffered the ſame fate; for a cannon ball carried away part of his boot.

All hiſtorians unite in giving William the higheſt praiſe for the admirable conduct, courage, reſolution, and preſence of mind, he diſplayed during the whole courſe of this memorable action. Even the Iriſh themſelves are ſaid to have declared, that if the Engliſh would change kings with them, they would fight the battle over again.

James, indeed, continued an inactive ſpectator of an action, on the ſucceſs of which every thing dear to him, as a king, or a man of honour, abſolutely depended. During the whole engagement he remained, with a few ſquadrons of horſe, on the hill of Dunmore, till the count de Lauſun, after the retreat of the French and Swiſs guards, came up to him, and repreſenting that he was in the moſt imminent danger of being ſurrounded, deſired him to think of a retreat. This advice was readily followed, and being attended by the regiment of Sarsfield, he marched to Duleck, and from thence to Dublin, where he immediately ſummoned the magiſtrates and council, and in a ſhort ſpeech reſigned all his authority in that city. He complained of the cowardice of the Iriſh, by whom he ſaid he had been betrayed; and declared his reſolution of immediately quitting the kingdom.

Accordingly, the next morning James ſet out for Waterford, attended by the duke of Berwick, his natural ſon, the earl of Tyrconnel, and the marquis of Powis. At that port he embarked on board a veſſel, which he had ordered Sir Patrick Trant, commiſſioner of the Iriſh revenue, to keep in readineſs for him, in caſe of a defeat; and arriving ſafely in France, fixed his reſidence at St. Germains.

Immediately after James left Dublin, that city was abandoned by all the papiſts of any conſideration: the government of the city was aſſumed by the proteſtants, who ſent an account of theſe tranſactions, accompanied with a petition, to William, intreating him to honour the capital with his preſence. This requeſt was readily complied with; and after detaching Mr. de la Melionere, with a ſufficient force to reduce Drogheda, his majeſty marched at the head of his army for Dublin: he entered the city in triumph; repaired immediately to the cathedral, and returned thanks to heaven for his late victory.

The next day William publiſhed a declaration of pardon to all the common people who had either remained at home, or been engaged in the army abroad, provided they returned to their reſpective dwellings by the firſt of Auguſt, and delivered up their arms to ſuch juſtices of the peace as ſhould be appointed for that purpoſe by his majeſty. But with regard to thoſe deſperate leaders of the rebellion, who had violated the laws of the kingdom, called in the French, authorized the brutiſh cruelties that had been exerciſed on the proteſtants, and rejected the offers made them in the king's proclamation, publiſhed on the 6th of February, 1689, his majeſty being now in a condition to make them ſenſible of their error, he left them entirely to the event of war; unleſs by giving evident proofs of their repentance they ſhould deſerve his mercy, which in that caſe ſhould never be refuſed them.

While William was employed in the reduction of Ireland, his queen held the Engliſh reins of government with a ſteadineſs and reſolution that gained her the admiration of the whole kingdom. On receiving advice that a powerful fleet was fitted out at Breſt, in order to make a deſcent on the weſt of England, ſhe ordered the earl of Torrington, who then lay with his fleet in the Downs, to ſail immediately to Portſmouth, and collect a number of ſhips ſufficient to enable him to render the deſign of the enemy abortive. While the admiral lay at St. Helen's, advice arrived from Weymouth that the French fleet, conſiſting of ſeventy-eight ſhips of the line and two fireſhips, had entered the channel. The admiral had been lately joined by a ſquadron of Dutch men of war, but ſeveral ſhips expected from Plymouth had hitherto been prevented by contrary winds, from joining him. A council of war was immediately called, and it ſeemed to be the general opinion that it would be imprudent to meet the enemy, as the whole combined fleet did not exceed fifty-ſix ſail; but before any reſolution was taken, an expreſs arrived from the queen, with poſitive orders to hazard an engagement at all events, rather than ſuffer the enemy to ſail up the channel, and inſult the Engliſh coaſts and harbours.

In conformity to theſe orders, Torrington immediately ſtood out to ſea, with the combined fleets of England and Holland. The enemy ſoon appeared in ſight, and on the 30th of June the engagement began off Beachy-head about nine in the morning. The blue ſquadron engaged the French with the utmoſt bravery, but Torrington kept his diviſion in a line, and fought at too great a diſtance. The Dutch, deſirous of bringing on a cloſer engagement, advanced towards the enemy, and by that means were ſeparated from the Engliſh. Tourville, the French admiral, perceived the imprudent valour of the Dutch had carried them too far, and determined to take advantage of their error. He accordingly collected all his ſhips that were now engaged with the Engliſh, and ſurrounded the Dutch ſquadron. All retreat was now cut off, and the whole ſquadron muſt have been taken, had not Calembourgh the Dutch admiral fortunately ordered his ſhips to drop their anchors with all their ſails ſtanding. This ſaved his ſquadron. The tide ſet ſtrongly up the channel, and there being very little wind, the French, who were ignorant of the ſtratagem, were ſoon hurried away by the tide, while the Dutch continued ſafe at anchor beyond the reach of their cannon. They had, however, received conſiderable damage; their two vice-admirals were killed, and ſeveral of their ſhips ſo greatly ſhattered, that they were obliged to ſink them, in order to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. The Engliſh loſt two ſhips, two of their captains, and about 400 men. The next day the Engliſh admiral called a council of war, in which it was reſolved to retreat without hazarding another engagement, and to deſtroy all the diſabled ſhips ſhould the enemy attempt a purſuit. Torrington, accordingly, retreated without much interruption to the mouth of the Thames, while Tourville, after continuing about five days in the channel, returned to Breſt. The nation was at once exaſperated and alarmed at this incident. It was the common opinion, that if Torrington had followed the example of the blue ſquadron, and brought on a cloſe engagement, the enemy muſt have been defeated; the conſequence of which would, in all probability, have been fatal to the French, as it was almoſt impoſſible for them to have returned to Breſt, a very conſiderable ſquadron then lying in Plymouth-ſound. Torrington's conduct was cenſured by his own admirals, and on his arrival in London he was ſent to the Tower.

Though this defeat was attended with no very conſiderable inconveniences, yet it furniſhed the Jacobites with matter ſufficient for an ungenerous triumph. The people, who ſee only the ſurface of things, were ſeized with the moſt gloomy apprehenſions; a deſcent on the coaſt was every day expected; and a general panic was ſpread over the kingdom. The queen alone ſeemed unaffected with this unmanly fear; ſhe behaved with admirable ſpirit and diſcretion. She made uſe of every precaution to render any attempts of the enemy abortive. The principal ſea-ports were put into a good ſtate of defence: proper orders were iſſued for refitting the ſhips and augmenting the navy: the militia of the weſtern counties was embodied; and to ſtrike a greater terror into the domeſtic enemies of the government, a proclamation was iſſued for apprehending ſeveral diſaffected perſons, who were either ſuſpected or accuſed of holding a correſpondence with James and his party, for diſturbing the internal peace of the kingdom.

In conſequence of this prudent and magnanimous conduct, the queen received addreſſes from the city of London, and moſt of the principal counties and corporations in the kingdom, who all declared their reſolution of ſupporting her, her royal conſort, and the preſent government, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes. Theſe addreſſes were very grateful to the queen, who purſued her meaſures with ſuch prudence and ſucceſs, that the clamour gradually ſubſided, and the tongue of envy was huſhed to peace.

In the mean time William, having received ſatiſfactory letters from the queen and council, determined to continue in Ireland ſome time longer. He therefore undertook the ſiege of Limerick, a town ſtrongly fortified, and defended by the principal part of king James's army, who had eſcaped at the battle of the Boyne. But the enemy having found means to intercept and deſtroy his train of artillery, and the trenches being half filled with water by the wet ſeaſon coming on, William thought proper to raiſe the ſiege, and put his army into winter quarters. This being effected, the king embarked at Waterford, with prince George of Denmark, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, on the fifth of September, and the next day landed at Pill near Briſtol. He immediately ſet out for Windſor, where he was received by the queen with the higheſt expreſſions of joy.

Soon after William had left Ireland, the celebrated earl of Marlborough landed, at the head of 5,000 men, in the neighbourhood of Corke; and being joined by nearly the ſame number, under the command of the duke of Wirtemberg and general Scrivenmore, he undertook to reduce ſeveral of the principal places in Ireland. Succeſs attended all his meaſures. He took the towns of Corke and Kinſale, which were of the laſt importance to James, on account of their maratime ſituation; and the count de Lauſun, who commanded the French troops in Ireland, deſpairing of James's cauſe, evacuated the kingdom.

By this time the grand alliance which William had formed againſt France was farther ſtrengthened by the acceſſion of the duke of Savoy, who, renouncing the neutrality he had hitherto obſerved, concluded a league with the emperor and the king of Spain, and openly engaged in the general confederacy. But Lewis XIV. was no ſooner informed of the engagements the duke had entered into, than he ſent 12,000 men into Piedmont, under the command of that brave officer, M. Catinat, afterwards a marſhal of France, with orders to demand from the duke, as a pledge of his fidelity, the delivery of his forces, together with Verrue, and the citadel of Turin, the capital of his dominions. Confounded at this unexpected demand, the duke endeavoured to amuſe the French with ſubmiſſions and offers, till he could procure aſſiance from the emperor and Spain; but finding theſe two powers returned him only empty promiſes, he had recourſe to William and the ſtates-general for ſupport.

Pleaſed with the acquiſition of ſo valuable an ally, William received his ambaſſador with the higheſt marks of reſpect, and promiſed to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to procure him every thing he deſired. Lewis, who was not to be deceived by ſpecious promiſes, ordered Catinat to begin hoſtilities in Savoy and Piedmont; while the duke exerted all his power to oppoſe the torrent which threatened to overwhelm his dominions with ruin and deſtruction. Though the duke was a great general, yet he committed a fatal miſtake in drawing up his army in preſence of the French general, near Saluzzo. He was totally defeated by Catinat, who, purſuing his advantage, made himſelf maſter of the greater part of Piedmont.

Lewis had another army in Flanders, under the command of the duke of Luxemburg: and the allies, dreading the power of France, which was daily increaſing, both by ſea and land, reſolved that the army of the ſtates-general, under the prince of Waldeck, ſhould oppoſe Luxemburg; while the elector of Brandenburg ſhould obſerve the motions of M. Bouflers, who commanded a third French army on the banks of the Moſelle, in Germany. Part of this ſcheme was, however, rendered abortive; for before the troops of Brandenburg could be aſſembled, Bouflers found means to encamp his forces between the Sambre and the Meuſe, and by that means opened a free communication between his own army and that of Luxemburg. Waldeck, ſenſible of the advantages of keeping the French on the other ſide of the Sambre, detached the count de Berlo, with fifteen hundred horſe, to diſcover whether the French were making any preparations for paſſing that river. The count, having advanced to the village of Flerus, found that a conſiderable part of the French army had already paſſed the Sambre, and ſent immediate notice of it to prince Waldeck; but it was too late; for being ſurrounded by the enemy, his detachment was defeated, and himſelf ſlain. The next day the duke of Luxemburg attacked the main body under prince Waldeck, who, after a very obſtinate engagement, was obliged to retreat, leaving about 4,600 men dead on the field of battle. The enemy took about 4,000 priſoners, but they bought their victory very dear; their loſs being equal if not greater than that of the Dutch. It is ſaid that the loſs of this battle was wholly owing to the cowardice of the Dutch cavalry, who abandoned their infantry at the firſt charge; but the retreat of the foot was perhaps never exceeded: for notwithſtanding the battle was fought in a plain country, deſtitute of woods and other reſources, and the troops charged both in front and flank by the enemy, they made ſuch impreſſion on the French by their regular, undaunted, and uniform fire, that the latter did not dare to follow them; they ſuffered the Dutch to march off with the utmoſt compoſure. This was the only action which happened in Flanders during the whole campaign. Th allies, however, ſuffered an irreparable loſs in th death of the duke of Wirtemberg, who expired afte a few hours illneſs, not without ſtrong ſuſpicions o his having been poiſoned by the baſe ſchemes of th French court.—He was ſucceeded by his brother.

The Engliſh parliament met on the ſecond o

October, when William opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he informed the commons that he had uſed his beſt endeavours for the reduction of Ireland, and had the ſupplies been granted early in the laſt ſeſſion, he did not doubt but he ſhould have ſucceeded effectually. He alſo deſired them to remember, that he had aſked no revenue for himſelf, but what had been charged to the uſes of the war: he therefore recommended to them the clearing of his revenue, ſo as to enable him to ſubſiſt and ſupport the charges of the civil government. Then addreſſing himſelf to both houſes, told them, that he hoped they would proceed in their deliberations with ſpirit and unanimity; and that whoever tried to attempt diverting them from the important ſubject he had recommended to their conſideration, could neither be his friends, nor friends to their country.

Both houſes of parliament addreſſed him ſeparately on this ſpeech, in which they congratulated him on his ſucceſs in Ireland, and on the queen's happy adminiſtration during his abſence. The commons particularly told him, "That he too freely expoſed his invaluable life, on which the whole proteſtant intereſt of Europe depended;" and concluded with aſſuring him, "that they ſhould be always ready to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power: and as the beſt and trueſt way of expreſſing their gratitude, they would endeavour effectually to ſupport his government againſt all his enemies."

They were not long before they carried their aſſurances into execution: for the very day their addreſs was preſented, they voted a ſupply of 4,000,000 for the ſervice of the enſuing year: a larger ſum than had ever before been granted by an Engliſh parliament to their prince. Among other taxes for raiſing this prodigious ſum, a land-tax of three ſhillings in the pound was impoſed; the exciſe upon beer and ale was doubled; a duty was laid on all India goods, foreign wrought ſilks, and ſeveral other commodities imported, and a duty was impoſed upon new wines and ſpirits of the firſt extraction. They alſo voted that 1,000,000 ſhould be raiſed by the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, and that a bill ſhould be prepared for confiſcating theſe eſtates, with a clauſe empowering his majeſty to grant one third of them to thoſe who had ſerved in the war. This clauſe was afterwards rejected, and many petitions were preſented againſt the bill by creditors and heirs, who had continued faithful. Theſe petitions were, however, laid aſide by the commons, who, on this occaſion, ſuffered their zeal for the king to get the better of that attention they owed to the lawful and juſt remonſtrances of their fellow-ſubjects, and unanimouſly paſſed the bill; but on being read in the houſe of lords, that auguſt body thought it incumbent on them to examine the merit of thoſe petitions; and this took up ſo much time, that the bill was dropped for the preſent ſeſſions.

A. D. 1691. On the 5th of January the king went to the houſe of peers, and after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, he put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; wherein he aſſured both houſes, that he entertained the moſt grateful ſenſe of their liberality and diſpatch; that the ſupplies they had granted ſhould be faithfully employed in the ſervices for which they were allotted: that he would make no grant of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, till that affair ſhould be fully ſettled in parliament, to the ſatisfaction of all parties. That he hoped they would take care to propagate in their ſeveral counties the ſame principles of zeal and attachment to his government, which they had ſo eminently diſplayed in parliament: and that he truſted the good underſtanding between him and his ſubjects would be more than ſufficient to defeat the deſigns of their ſecret foes, and the attempts of their open and avowed enemies.

The buſineſs of the nation being thus ſettled, William, on the 16th of January, embarked for Holland, in order to aſſiſt at a congreſs of the confederate princes and ſtates, appointed to be held at the Hague, to concert meaſures for the defence of the liberties of Europe againſt the encroachments of France. On his arrival in the capital of the United Provinces, the ſtates-general, the ſtates of Holland, the council of ſtate, and other colleges, waited on the king with congratulations on his ſafe arrival. On the 26th of January he made a public entry, and was received with great pomp, and the ſincereſt expreſſions of joy. Triumphal arches were erected in the principal ſtreets through which he paſſed, filled with inſcriptions expreſſing his great and generous actions in defence of public liberty.

The congreſs was opened ſoon after his arrival; it conſiſted of the imperial miniſters, thoſe from Spain, Denmark, Sweden, Poland, Brandenburg, Saxony, Trieves, Mentz, Cologne, the Palatine, Savoy, Zell, Munſter, Heſſe-Caſſel, Wolfenbuttle, Hanover, Holſtein Gottorp, Liege, and thoſe from king William. The whole forming one of the moſt glorious aſſemblies mentioned in the annals of hiſtory, and convened for the nobleſt purpoſe, that of oppoſing the ambitious encroachments of an arbitrary prince, and ſecuring the peace, tranquillity, and liberties of a whole continent.

William opened the congreſs with a pathetic ſpeech, in which he diſplayed, in the moſt forcible colours, "the imminent danger to which they were at preſent expoſed; plainly demonſtrated the impropriety of their former conduct, and the abſolute neceſſity of an immediate change of meaſures: that this was not the time to deliberate, but to act: that the enemy was already maſter of the principal fortreſſes which formed the barrier of the common liberty; and would ſoon be able to poſſeſs himſelf of all the inferior fortifications, if a ſpirit of diviſion, ſelfiſhneſs and irreſolution, continued to influence them: that every one ought to conſider his own intereſt as involved in the good of the whole: that the forces of the enemy were numerous and powerful; and if not prevented, would ſweep every thing before them like a torrent: that it was in vain to oppoſe the pretenſions of injuſtice by unavailing complaints, unprofitable clamour, or fruitleſs proteſtations: that not the reſolutions of a peaceable diet, nor the hopes of ſome men of fortune built on a ſandy foundation, would be ſufficient; but that of powerful armies, bold enterprizes, and a prompt and vigorous execution to accompliſh the glorious work: that all theſe muſt be inſtantly employed againſt the common enemy, if they meant to check his progreſs, and to ſnatch from his hands the liberties of Europe, which he was now ſubjecting to a cruel and heavy yoke." He concluded with aſſuring them, "That, for his own part, he would neither ſpare his forces, his credit, nor his own perſon, to effect ſo noble a deſign; but would appear in the ſpring at the head of his troops, to fulfil faithfully his royal promiſes."

This ſpeech was received with great applauſe by the whole aſſembly, and produced the moſt happy effect. A reſolution was immediately taken to employ 205,000 men againſt France, of which the ſeveral princes and ſtates were to furniſh the following proportions: the king of England, 20,000; the emperor, 20,000; the king of Spain in Flanders, 20,000; the ſtates-general, 25,000; the duke of Savoy, and the troops of Milan, 20,000; the elector of Bavaria, 18,000; the elector of Saxony, 12,000; the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, 8,000; the circles of Suabia and Franconia, 10,000; the duke of Wirtemberg, 6,000;

6,000; the elector of Brandenburg, 20,000; the elector Palatine, 4,000; the prince of Liege, 6,000; and the prince of Lunenburg, 16,000. Had theſe engagements been punctually fulfilled, a final ſtop would ſoon have been put to the conqueſts of France; but this was far from being the caſe. Few of the princes took any care to ſend their full quota of troops to the general rendezvous; ſo that England and Holland were obliged to bear almoſt the whole expence and burden of the war.

The congreſs broke up about the beginning of March, and king William was preparing to return to England, when his departure was retarded by advice that the French had collected all their forces, in order to take the field before the confederates could be ready to oppoſe them; and that Lewis in perſon had inveſted the city of Mons, accompanied by the dauphin, the dukes of Orleans and Chartres, and an army of 80,000 men. William upon this diſpatched prince Waldeck to Halle, near Bruſſels, which was appointed for the general rendezvous of what forces could be drawn together: the king himſelf followed on the 27th of March, where he found an army of 50,000 men; but, through the neglect of the Spaniards, ſo miſerably deficient in all kind of neceſſaries for a march, before the troops could be put in motion, news arrived of the reduction of the place: the governor being reduced to the laſt extremity, after having in vain waited for relief, was obliged to capitulate on the 1ſt of April, and ſurrendered the town on very honourable terms. After this diſappointment, there remained nothing to require the immediate preſence of king William on the continent, who therefore returned to the Hague, and embarking for England, on the 13th of April, arrived ſafe in London.

The firſt information he received was, that during his abſence the Jacobites had reſumed their favourite ſcheme, in conſort with France, of reſtoring James to the throne. The perſons chiefly concerned in this conſpiracy were ſaid to be the earl of Clarendon, the biſhop of Ely, the lord viſcount Preſton (a Scottiſh peer) and his brother Mr. Graham: and William Penn the famous quaker, the lord Preſton, Mr. Aſhton a ſervant of king James's queen, and Mr. Elliot, were pitched upon to go over to France, and concert meaſures at the court of St. Germains. With this view they hired a veſſel of one Mr. Prat of Barking in Eſſex, who, ſuſpecting ſomething from the eagerneſs the conſpirators ſhewed to get under ſail, and the high price they offered for their paſſage, communicated the matter to the earl of Caermarthen, who reported the ſame to the queen and council; whereupon proper perſons were diſpatched to board the veſſel, which lay off Gaveſend, when the three conſpirators were found concealed in the hold. The lord Preſton, who had letters about him from the chiefs of the conſpiracy to king James, endeavoured to ſecrete them, but was diſcovered, and the papers taken from him. Upon examination they were found to contain ſeveral circumſtances of intelligence, and other matters of a very treaſonable and dangerous tendency. Hereupon a bill of high-treaſon was preferred, and found againſt the offenders by the grand jury. The lord Preſton and Mr. Aſhton were brought to their trials on the 16th, 17th and 19th of January. Their deſign of going to France, and the treaſonable papers found upon them, ſome written in the lord Preſton's hand, and ſome in Mr. Aſhton's, were fully proved; and for theſe practices they were found guilty and condemned. Aſhton was executed, but lord Preſton lay a long time under conviction by a reprieve, and his ſentence was at laſt remitted. Elliot was not tried, there appearing no evidence againſt him. The earl of Clarendon was ſent to the Tower, where he remained ſome months, and was afterwards confined to his own houſe in the country; an indulgence which he owed to his near relationſhip to the queen, who was his firſt couſin. The biſhop of Ely, Graham, and Penn, abſconded, and a proclamation was iſſued for apprehending them as traitors.

His majeſty having ſettled affairs at home as well as the ſhort ſpace of time would admit, reſolved to ſet out for Holland, in order to command in perſon the confederate army in Flanders, agreeable to the promiſe he had made the allies at the congreſs; but firſt he gave the neceſſary orders for the total reduction of Ireland, that he might have nothing to call off his attention from the war on the continent: and having appointed general Ginckle commander in chief of the army in that kingdom, his majeſty embarked at Harwich on the 2d of May, ſet ſail with a fair wind for Holland, attended by a ſquadron of men of war under rear-admiral Rooke, landed the next day near Maeſland-ſluyce, and arrived the ſame evening at the Hague, where we ſhall leave him to take a view of the operations in Ireland.

Lewis XIV. who ſtill perſevered in ſupporting James's deſperate fortune, had ſent his friends in that kingdom a large ſupply of proviſions, cloaths, and ammunition, together with 3000 regular troops, under the command of M. St. Ruth, a brave and experienced general, who had greatly diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Germany. On the other hand, general Ginckle, who in conduct and courage yielded to few commanders of his time, having been lately reinforced by a body of troops under major-general Mackay, took the field and inveſted the town of Ballymore, which was defended by 1000 men, under colonel Bourke. The batteries being raiſed quickly made ſuch a breach in a place of no great ſtrength, that nothing remained in a few days but to give a general aſſault; however, the enemy ſaved our troops that trouble, by ſubmitting at diſcretion, after a ſix days ſiege only. There were taken 780 men, beſides four field officers, and near 300 Iriſh free-booters, who had mixed themſelves with king James's forces to wait the fortune of war.

After putting the place in a poſture of defence, Ginckle marched to Ballymore-paſs, where he was joined by the prince of Wirtemberg. Thus reinforced, it was determined to advance towards Athlone, a town ſituated on the other ſide of the Shannon, and defended by the French and Iriſh army, encamped in its neighbourhood. The Engliſh town ſituated on this ſide of the river was taken in two days; many of the Iriſh were ſlain in the attack, and many of them periſhed by falling into the river, in their haſty retreat over the bridge.

Ginckle, elated at this ſucceſs, erected batteries againſt the Iriſh town, which did ſuch execution, that the caſtle and other ſtrong places were ſoon reduced to heaps of ruins. The garriſon, however, made ſo ſtout a reſiſtance, that the Engliſh general thought proper to call a council of war, to conſider whether it was adviſeable to continue the attack, or abandon the ſiege. The duke of Wirtemberg, the generals Mackay, Talmarſh, Ravigny, and Tettreau, declared themſelves ſtrongly for continuing the ſiege; and propoſed to paſs the Shannon in order to attack the enemy; offering to conduct the attempt in perſon. Their opinions prevailed, and a detachment was ſent to paſs the ſtream, at a ford a little below the town. The river was deep and rapid, the bottom ſlippery and full of large ſtones, and the paſs defended by a battery erected for that purpoſe: but notwithſtanding all theſe difficulties, the Engliſh troops, whoſe courage and intrepidity always increaſe with dangers and difficulties, regardleſs of every thing but glory, threw themſelves into the Shannon, and paſſed the river through the thickeſt of the enemy's fire. Having reached the oppoſite bank, they threw in their hand grenades, and then diſcharged ſuch a volley of ſmall ſhot, that the enemy, unable to ſuſtain the charge, abandoned their works. In the mean time, a reinforcement was ſent to this brave detachment, and the Engliſh, in leſs than an hour, made themſelves maſters of the town.

The French general, from a propenſity to that vanity and preſumption, ſo common to his countrymen, treated the attempt of the Engliſh to force the paſſage of the Shannon, with a contempt that did little credit to that prudence and circumſpection for which he had been hitherto diſtinguiſhed. In vain did Sarsfield, the Iriſh general, preſs him to ſend ſuccours to the town; he laughed at that officer's apprehenſions; nor was he convinced, till too late, that Engliſh courage was equal to the moſt arduous enterprize. When they had taken poſſeſſion of the town, St. Ruth ordered ſome detachments to march, and drive the Engliſh from their conqueſt; but the thunder of the cannon from the ramparts, which was now turned againſt the French, ſoon convinced him of his error, and that his own ſafety depended upon a precipitate retreat.

The Engliſh general, having repaired the fortifications of Athlone, marched in purſuit of the French and Iriſh army, which made a ſtand near Aghrim, a ſmall town about ten miles from Athlone. Here the French general encamped in a very advantageous ſituation; and having, by draughts from different garriſons, increaſed his army to 25,000 men, reſolved to hazard a general engagement.

Though Ginckle's army was very inferior in numbers (not amounting to more than 18,000) he determined to fight the enemy. The morning appointed for making the attack proved ſo foggy, that it was obliged to be poſtponed till noon, when the Engliſh croſſed the river Suc, oppoſite the enemy's camp. The center of the French and Iriſh was poſted on a riſing ground, uneven in many places, and interſected with banks and ditches, lined with infantry, and ſecured in front by a large bog, almoſt impaſſable: their right was defended by entrenchments, and two Daniſh forts; and their left by the caſtle of Aghrim.

As ſoon as the Engliſh had effected their landing, they marched up to the edge of the great bog, and endeavoured to force the only two places by which it was paſſable, in order to gain the ground on the other ſide. The enemy made a very furious reſiſtance and repulſed the Engliſh horſe ſeveral times; but, at laſt, the troops on the right ſucceeded in their attempt by means of ſome field-pieces properly placed, and excellently ſerved. So much time, however, was unavoidably ſpent in their manœuvers, that the general was deſirous of deferring the battle till the next morning; but the confuſion he obſerved in the enemy's camp convinced him that ſomething extraordinary was in agitation, and made him apprehenſive, that they intended to retreat during the night. He therefore changed his opinion, and ordered his troops to prepare for the charge.

About five o'clock in the evening the Engliſh attacked the right wing of the Iriſh, from whom they met with ſo warm a reception, that it required the utmoſt efforts of their courage and reſolution to make them give ground. The Iriſh infrantry that lined the ditches, were well ſupported by the horſe, poſted behind them, and maintained their poſt with the moſt intrepid obſtinacy; nor would they ſtir from one ſide of the ditch, till the Engliſh preſented the muzzles of their pieces on the other; and even then, by their lines of communication, they immediately took poſt in the next ditch, where they continued to make the ſame reſolute defence. St. Ruth perceiving that his men were in danger of being overpowered, immediately reinforced them from his center and left wing. Mackey, perceiving this motion, inſtantly ordered two regiments to march round the bog, and fall on the enemy's left wing, weakened by the late detachments; and, at the ſame time, for the center to advance through the middle of the bog, though up to the waſte in mud and water. After gaining, with unſpeakable difficulty, the other ſide, they found themſelves obliged to aſcend a rugged hill, interſected with ditches and hedges, lined with muſqueteers, ſuſtained at proper diſtances with ſquadrons of horſe: there the enemy made ſuch a reſolute ſtand, and fought with ſuch perſeverance, that they puſhed the aſſailants into the middle of the bog, which St. Ruth perceiving, cried out, in a bravado, "That he now had the " Engliſh at his mercy, and would drive them back " to the very gates of Dublin."

The Engliſh were now thrown into the greateſt confuſion, which might have been attended with fatal conſequences, had not general Talmaſh haſtened, at this critical moment, to their relief, with a freſh body of forces, and given orders for the broken regiments to halt, and face about, which orders were immediately obeyed with unparalleled alacrity and reſolution. The Engliſh now attacked in their turn the Iriſh, (who had advanced upon them into the middle of the bog) with ſuch fury, that 300 of them were killed before they could gain the firm land; and marching forward obtained the old ſpot, from whence they had been precipitately driven.

While the infantry was thus engaged, Ravigny's regiment of French proteſtant horſe, and Sir John Lanier's being poſted on the right, moved to the left and did the utmoſt ſervice. In the mean time the Engliſh cavalry was expoſed to a dreadful fire from the enemy's dragoons poſted under a cover, and obliged to preſs through a very dangerous paſs. After ſurmounting this difficulty, they at laſt lodged themſelves in a dry ditch, where they reſolutely ſtood the fire of the enemy from Aghrim-caſtle.

For ſome time it appeared doubtful on which ſide victory would determine; but major-general Mackey, having timely reinforced the left wing with a body of horſe and dragoons, at laſt turned the balance in favour of the Engliſh. Ravigny, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his diligence, courage, and activity, during the whole action, putting himſelf at the head of his own regiment of horſe, ſcoured the ſide of the bog, bearing down all before him. St. Ruth perceiving the execution of this body of horſe, determined to attack Ravigny in a hollow way, through which he knew he muſt paſs in his return to ſuſtain the center. Accordingly, he ordered a brigade of his own horſe from the right wing to march to the left; and putting himſelf at their head, began to deſcend the hill towards the place, which he ſaw the Engliſh endeavouring to paſs. But when he came near the ſpot, where the hotteſt part of the battle was fought, he was killed by a cannon ball.

This misfortune decided the fate of the day. The French and Iriſh were ſo much diſcouraged by the death of their general, that Sarsfield, who was ſecond in command, endeavoured, in vain, to recover them from their diſorder. Ravigny, obſerving their confuſion, preſſed boldly forward, and falling upon them ſword in hand, drove them, with very little reſiſtance, to the top of the hill, where they had at firſt pitched their camp: but their whole line giving way at once, they threw down their arms, and betook themſelves to flight. The Engliſh purſued them cloſely for three miles, and made a moſt dreadful ſlaughter: but night coming on, attended with a thick miſty rain, prevented the Engliſh from cutting off the fugitives from taking ſhelter in an advantageous poſt between them and Loughbreak. It was, however, computed that no leſs than 7000 of the Iriſh fell in the action; while the Engliſh loſt no more than 600 killed, and 960 wounded.

The Iriſh now reſolved to make a final ſtand at Limerick, hoping to receive ſuch ſuccours from France as would enable them to maintain that poſt, or obtain good terms from William; but they ſoon found that their hopes were built on a ſandy foundation. General Ginckle, having allowed a few days for the refreſhment of his troops, marched to Galway, one of the moſt conſiderable places left in the hands of the Iriſh; and immediately ſummoned the lord Dillon, the governor, to ſurrender the place. He, at firſt, refuſed to comply; but ſeeing part of the Engliſh army paſs the river, and ſeize a fort the Iriſh were rebuilding, he changed his reſolution and ſurrendered the place, on advantageous terms; the garriſon being ſafely conducted to Limerick.

This was the laſt reſource of the deſpairing Iriſh, and which was inveſted by general Ginckle on the 25th of Auguſt. The next day the Engliſh made themſelves maſters of Ireton's and Cromwell's forts, now called Mackey's and Naſſau's, from their being taken by theſe commanders. Two days after Caſtle Connel, and Caſtle Garrick, two ſmall forts ſtanding on the Shannon a few miles below the town, were taken, and the garriſons of both made priſoners of war. Theſe forts being taken, the batteries againſt the town were opened, and the attack carried on with the utmoſt vigour till the 17th of September. But the reſiſtance of the enemy was ſo obſtinate, and the place ſo well fortified, that a council of war was held in the Engliſh camp, to conſider whether it would not be more elegible to paſs the river, and cut off the enemy's forage and proviſions, and turn the ſiege into a blockade, than to hazard the lives of ſo many brave men, in fruitleſs attacks. The former expedient was preferred, and ſome ſteps taken for putting it in practice. This inſpired the Iriſh with the moſt flattering hopes, taking it for granted, from perceiving theſe motions in the Engliſh camp, that they were preparing to raiſe the ſiege. But theſe flattering appearances were of ſhort duration; for on a ſecond conſultation of the Engliſh, it was reſolved to preſs the ſiege, and, at all events, make themſelves maſters of the town. Accordingly the Engliſh, on the night of the 18th, threw a bridge over the river, about a mile above the camp, and a ſtrong party of horſe and foot were ſent over it.

The enemy, who guarded the oppoſite ſide of the river, were ſtruck with ſuch a panic at this incident, that they threw down their arms, and ſought their ſafety in flight. On the 22d, general Ginckle himſelf paſſed the Shannon, at the head of a ſtrong party of horſe and dragoons, ten battalions of foot, and fourteen pieces of cannon; leaving Wirtemberg, Mackey, and Talmaſh, to command the troops on the hither ſide of the Shannon. Theſe meaſures being taken, the ſiege was preſſed with redoubled vigour, and the batteries played againſt the town with great fury. In a few days, the Engliſh made themſelves maſters of ſeveral out forts, and made a lodgement at the foot of Thomond-bridge; the Iriſh finding themſelves cut off from all hopes of relief, determined to capitulate, which they did on the 29th of September; and on the firſt of October the lords juſtices of Ireland arrived in the Engliſh camp, where they ſettled all the articles of the capitulation, which were finally concluded on the 3d of the ſame month.

By theſe articles the Iriſh were all indemnified and reſtored to the enjoyment of the exerciſe of their religion, which they poſſeſſed in the reign of Charles II. They were admitted to all the privileges of ſubjects on their taking the oaths of allegiance, without being obliged to take the oath of ſupremacy; and not only the French, but as many of the Iriſh as choſe to go over to France, had free liberty to follow their inclinations. On the other hand, Limerick, and all other towns, forts, and caſtles, which yet remained in the hands of the catholics, were to be delivered up within a limited time. Accordingly, the place was put into the hands of the Engliſh on the 5th, the French and many of the Iriſh were ſent away in tranſport veſſels, while the remainder of the army in the field ſubmitted to be included in the amneſty.

Ireland was now entirely ſubjected to the crown of England, and a ſolid peace eſtabliſhed between the two kingdoms, which has ſubſiſted to the preſent time without the leaſt interruption. On Ginckle's return to England, he was received with the higheſt applauſe, and, together with all his general officers, elegantly entertained by the city of London. The commons alſo, at the meeting of parliament, preſented to the general, as a token of the important ſervices he had performed for the ſtate, the thanks of their houſe. Soon after his majeſty created him earl of Athlone, and baron of Aghrim, that he might convey to his poſterity the honour of his glorious atchievements. At the ſame time, to enable him to ſupport his new dignities, he was preſented with lands in Ireland to a very conſiderable amount.

It is now time to return to king William, whom we left at the Hague. The French army took the field ſome time before the allies, and Luxemburg, with an army of 40,000 men, was advancing to beſiege Bruſſels, while the marſhal de Bouflers, with another army, ſat down before Liege. As ſoon as advice of theſe motions arrived at the Hague, William put himſelf at the head of his troops, and arrived time enough to cover the ſiege of the former, and raiſe that of the latter. The allied army was now ſuperior to that of the French, and the king did every thing in his power to bring Luxemburg to an engagement. But that able commander, who was thoroughly acquainted with all the arts of war, took ſufficient care to baffle all the king's attempts, who, perceiving it impoſſible to ſucceed in his intention, cauſed the fortifications of Beaumont, a place he had taken, to be demoliſhed, and marched his army towards Aeth, and afterwards paſſed to Loo, leaving the forces under the command of prince Waldeck. In his abſence the French became ſomewhat more daring; but not till they found the confederate army was poſted in a diſadvantageous ſituation. For after remaining ſome time in the neighbourhood of Aeth, to cover and ſecure the adjacent country from the inroads of the enemy's parties; and having, as the general thought, made ſufficient preparations for tha purpoſe, he marched towards Benaim; when Luxemburg, taking advantage of this motion, marche with great expedition with ſeveral ſquadrons of hi beſt horſe, and fell upon the rear of the confederat army, as it was paſſing a little river and defile nea Caſoire. The charge was ſo furious, that the fir line of the confederates gave way and fell behind th ſecond; which alſo, after ſtanding ſeveral charges, retreated. But the officers, exerting themſelves wit unparalleled bravery, ſo animated the men that the ſoon returned to the charge; while the French horſ dreading the conſequence of being ſurrounded by th allied infantry, retired, and left the confederates t purſue their march without farther moleſtation. I this ſkirmiſh the loſs was nearly equal; for notwithſtanding the diſadvantageous ſituation of the allie the French loſt near 500 of their beſt men, who wer ſlain on the ſpot, and many more who died of the wounds. The ſeaſon being now far advanced nothing farther was attempted during this campaign, bo armies retiring into winter-quarters.

William, after leaving the army, continued ſome time at the Hague, in order to regulate the meaſures of the next campaign; which having effected, he embarked for England, attended by a ſquadron of men of war under the command of Sir Cloudeſly Shovel. He landed at Margate on the 19th of October, and the ſame evening arrived ſafe in London.

A few days after the king's arrival both houſes of parliament met for the diſpatch of buſineſs. The ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, wherein his majeſty told the two houſes, that he hoped the ſucceſs his forces had met with in Ireland would be a great encouragement to them to aſſiſt him with freſh ſupplies: he recommended to them the neceſſity of keeping a ſtrong fleet at ſea, and an army of 65,000 land forces, that they might annoy the enemy in the moſt ſenſible part; adding, that they had now an opportunity of eſtabliſhing the future quiet and proſperity of the nation; and which, if now loſt, might never more be recovered.

Both houſes preſented addreſſes of congratulation to the king on his happy return, and alſo on the ſucceſs of his arms in Ireland; promiſing to aſſiſt him in carrying on a vigorous war againſt France, in order to procure an honourable peace for his own dominions; and ſecure his friends from the ambitious deſigns of the common oppreſſor. A proclamation was alſo publiſhed for a public thankſgiving on the 26th of November. Addreſſes were alſo preſented to the queen, acknowledging her prudent care in the adminiſtration of affairs during the king's abſence.

Notwithſtanding, however, all theſe expreſſions of gratitude, it ſoon appeared, that a ſtrong party was formed by the tories, againſt the government, who could not approve of the maxims or conduct of the king. They inveighed, both in public and private, againſt the folly and extravagance of keeping on foot a ſtanding army; they inſiſted that England ought only to aſſiſt the allies with a certain quota of auxiliary troops; and that the management of affairs at ſea were chiefly to be regarded. To this the advocates of the court replied, that without the interpoſition of England, the grand alliance would never have taken place; nor could a ſtop have been put to the ſpreading conqueſts of Lewis, who would ſoon have reduced both Flanders and Holland; and conſequently have deſtroyed the commerce, and even the liberties of England. The arguments againſt continental connections were ſo well adapted to the taſte of the public, that the preſent government was, in general, greatly cenſured.

Another principal cauſe of diſcontent was the evident partiality the king ſhewed to the Dutch over the Engliſh; and it was alſo univerſally aſſerted, that the former were the only perſons favoured and truſted, while the Engliſh were wholly overlooked. It muſt, indeed, be confeſſed, that William took too little pains to remove the general diſguſt, which ſpread itſelf among both the Engliſh officers and nobility; or to gain the affections of his Britiſh ſubjects. He continued in his cloſet the greater part of the day with one or two of his particular friends, who were his own countrymen: and the ſullen ſilence he generally obſerved, when any of the Engliſh nobility were admitted to an audience, was nearly as diſguſting as an abſolute denial.

The diſcontent of the people, however, had very little effect on the commons; for, on the 9th of November, they voted upwards of a million and a half for the ſervice of the navy and ordnance, and above two millions for the ſervice of the land forces.

On the 24th of December the king went to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral acts; after which his majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, thanking them for their reſolution of ſupporting him; but preſſed them to haſten the remainder of the ſupplies, that the enemy might not take the field before him, as they had done the laſt campaign. But this diſpatch, ſo greatly deſired by the king, was retarded by ſeveral incidental affairs which engaged the attention of the houſe.

A. D. 1692. The funds for the enſuing year being at length ſettled, the king went to the houſe of peers on the 24th of February; and, after giving the royal aſſent to the bills that were ready, cloſed the ſeſſion[*] with a ſhort ſpeech, in which he thanked his parliament for the zeal and attachment they had ſhewn for his government, and the liberality and diſpatch with which they had provided for the neceſſities of the ſtate; adding, that he intended ſpeedily to paſs over to the continent, in order to head the allied army in perſon.

As ſoon as Lewis XIV. was informed that William had embarked for Holland, he engaged with the Jacobites in England to make another effort for reſtoring James to his throne. An invaſion was immediately projected, and it was agreed that the troops ſhould be landed on the coaſt of Suſſex. So much precaution had been taken in France in carrying on the neceſſary preparations, that every thing was ready for executing the deſign before it was ſo much as ſuſpected in England. The land forces conſiſted of four battalions of Engliſh and Iriſh troops, and about 9000 French, commanded by the marſhal de Belfondes; ſo that the whole amounted to 20,000 men. A fleet of 300 tranſports was collected, and provided with every thing neceſſary for the invaſion. The troops were ready to embark, and waited only the arrival of the count d'Etrees with a ſquadron of twelve men of war, appointed to eſcort the tranſports; while admiral Tourville cruized in the channel with the grand fleet.

Previous to theſe preparations, James ſent over colonel Parker to England, to give his friends intelligence of his deſign. Parker, not content with executing his commiſſion, formed a plot, with one Johnſon, for aſſaſſinating William; but before an opportunity offered for executing their deſign, the king embarked for Holland; by which means the horrid ſcheme was rendered totally abortive.

A ſhort time after Parker's arrival in England, James ſent over a printed declaration, dated at St. Germain's; in which he openly avowed his intentions of uſing all the means in his power to recover the throne of his anceſtors; and boaſted of having obtained aſſiſtance from France ſufficient, he hoped, to render the attempt ſucceſsful. At the ſame time he exhorted all his faithful ſubjects to continue in their fidelity. He offered pardon and rewards to all the prince of Orange's ſoldiers, and others who ſhould think proper to join him; and even proceeded ſo far as to except by name from this indemnity no leſs than thirteen noblemen, two biſhops, ſeven barons, and a great number of the clergy and gentry. This declaration was ordered to be publiſhed as ſoon as the troops were ready to be embarked.

[*] The moſt remarkable tranſaction that happened during this ſeſſion, was the diſgrace of the earl of Marlborough, whom the king cauſed to be informed, by the ſecretary of ſtate, that having no farther occaſion for his ſervices, he muſt reſign all his commiſſions. His counteſs was alſo forbid the court; and the princeſs of Denmark was deſired to diſmiſs her from her family, which ſhe refuſing to comply with, it occaſioned a quarrel between her and the queen, ſoon after which her royal highneſs removed from court to Sion-houſe, which ſhe borrowed of the duke of Somerſet.

In the mean time Parker and his agents were buſily employed in enliſting men privately in the northern counties; while Fountaine, as lieutenant-colonel to lord Montgomery, and colonel Holman, employed themſelves in forming two regiments of horſe in London, ready to join James on his landing. But their zeal for the ſervice of their maſter carried them too far. Perſuaded that every perſon in the kingdom, who was not a zealous friend to the eſtabliſhed government, would readily join in an attempt to overturn it, they made no difficulty of applying to all who had ſhewn the leaſt diſſatisfaction at the public meaſures. Rear admiral Carter was known to have ſtrenuouſly defended the rights of the people, and on this foundation only they made application to him as a friend to the dethroned monarch. Their bigotted prejudices prevented them from reflecting, that he who was a true friend to liberty muſt be an enemy to James, and every other prince who laboured to eſtabliſh his throne on the ruins of Engliſh freedom. Carter immediately informed the queen and council of the offers that had been made him by Fountaine and Holman. Alarmed at this diſcovery, and deſirous of procuring the neceſſary information, Carter was deſired to continue his correſpondence with the conſpirators, and pretend an inclination of joining them. He fully performed the requeſt of the council; and the conſpirators, who exulted in having gained over to their intereſt ſo able an officer, made him acquainted with all their ſecrets. They immediately diſpatched an expreſs to lord Melfort, James's ſecretary, informing him of their ſucceſs in corrupting Carter, who would take care to bring over all the officers of his ſquadron. At the ſame time they deſired he would preſs the king of France to ſend peremptory orders to Tourville to ſail directly, without waiting for d'Etrees. This proved the deſtruction of the whole ſcheme. James repaired to La Hogue, on the coaſt of Normandy, where the troops were ready to embark, and Tourville was ordered to ſail immediately.

The manifeſto of James was now publiſhed; in which the ſeverities of the prince of Orange's government, the enormous expences to which he had put the nation, were enumerated, and the people invited to return to the allegiance of their native prince. He promiſed to protect the church of England, to eſtabliſh an entire liberty of conſcience, to make trade and navigation flouriſh, to redreſs all the grievances, and to confirm the happineſs of the nation. Theſe fine promiſes were not, however, ſufficient to efface the remembrance of the many grievances which had forced the people to drive him from the throne. Whatever diſcontents might prevail in England, the animoſity againſt James was much ſtronger than the murmurs againſt his rival.

As ſoon as queen Mary received intelligence of the proceedings of James and the French king, ſhe publiſhed a proclamation, requiring all papiſts to quit the cities of London and Weſtminer; a ſecond for aſſembling both houſes of parliament, and a third for apprehending the earls of Scarſdale, Litchfield, Newburgh, Middleton, and Dunmore; the lords Griffin and Forbes; Sir John Fenwicke, Sir Theophilus Oglethorpe, Sir Andrew Forreſter, and ſeveral others, who were ſuppoſed to be in James's intereſt; and on the 6th of May the earls of Huntingdon and Marlborough, with the lords Brudenell and Fanſhaw, were ſent to the Tower; and Mr. Edward Ridley, Mr. Knevitt, Mr. Haſtings, and Mr. Robert Ferguſon, to Newgate, on violent ſuſpicion of high-treaſon in abetting and adhering to their majeſties enemies. Orders were ſent to admiral Ruſſel, then lying at St. Helen's, to haſten to ſea; and the queen in perſon reviewed the trained bands of London and Weſtminſter, amounting to about 10,000 men.

William, on his arrival in Holland, immediately haſtened the naval preparations there with unuſual diligence, ſo that the Dutch fleet was ſoon ready to put to ſea; and, about the middle of May, 36 ſail, under the command of admiral Allemonde, joined the fleet at St. Helen's, which was ſoon after further reinforced by the ſquadron under Sir Ralph Delaval from the Mediterranean, and admiral Carter from the channel.

On the 18th of May admiral Ruſſel left St. Helen's, and ſtood over towards the coaſt of France. About three the next morning, the ſcouts, to the weſtward of the fleet, made the ſignal for diſcovering the enemy, and orders were immediately given for forming the line of battle. This was ſoon effected, and the whole fleet ſtood towards the enemy in the following order: The Dutch ſquadron formed the van; the red ſquadron the center; and the blue ſquadron the rear. The French admiral was aſtoniſhed when he ſaw the combined fleets of England and Holland. He had received no advice of this junction, and flattered himſelf with being able to defeat the Engliſh, unaſſiſted by their ally. He might, however, have declined an engagement; but having received poſitive orders to fight the enemy, he reſolved to obey, and exert all his endeavours to execute the commands of his maſter, in the manner becoming a good officer and an intrepid ſeaman.

The combined fleet conſiſted of ninety-nine ſhips of the line, and the French only ſixty-three. About half an hour after eleven, Tourville, in the Royal Sun, a ſhip of 110 guns, brought to, began the fight with admiral Ruſſel, and continued the engagement about an hour and a half, when he began to tow o in great diſorder, his rigging, ſails and top-ſail-yards being very much damaged.

The wind had hitherto been weſterly, but it now ſhifted to the north-weſt; and ſoon after, five ſhips of the enemy poſted themſelves, three a-head, and two a-ſtern of their admiral, and continued firing very ſmartly till about three o'clock; ſo that Ruſſel and his two ſeconds, Churchill and Aylmer, had ſi or ſeven ſhips upon them at once. About four a thick fog came up, and the firing on both ſides ceaſed; but it clearing up in a little time, the Frenc admiral was diſcovered towing away to the northward and Ruſſel ordered all the ſhips of his diviſion to d the like. A ſmall breeze from the eaſtward now ſprung up, and the ſignal was immediately mad for chacing. About this time a continued firing wa heard to the weſtward; and it ſoon appeared that Si Cloudeſley Shovel, rear-admiral of the red, havin got to the windward of Tourville's ſquadron, ha attacked their admiral of the blue. After the engage ment had continued for ſome time, the ſhips of bot ſquadrons came to an anchor. In the mean time admiral Ruſſel ordered all the ſhips of his diviſion t ſtand to the weſtward during the night, from a per ſuaſion that the French would do all in their powe to eſcape to Breſt. He was not miſtaken; for in th morning he found himſelf much nearer to the enem than thoſe who had come to an anchor. About eig at night a firing was heard to the weſtward, and con tinued about half an hour; part of the Engliſh blu ſquadron having fallen in with ſome ſhips of the ene my during the fog; and in that diſpute rear-admir Carter was ſlain. Finding his laſt moments were a hand, he begged his captain to fight his ſhip as lon as ſhe would ſwim; a ſufficient proof that there wa not the leaſt reaſon to ſuſpect his zeal for the ſervic of his country.

The fog continued during the whole night, wi very little wind; and in the morning it was ſo haz that few of the enemy's ſhips could be ſeen; but the weather clearing up about eight, the Dutch, who were at ſome diſtance to the ſouthward, made the ſignal for ſeeing the French fleet, and ſoon after thirty-four ſail were diſcovered about two or three leagues to the ſouth-weſt, the wind being then at north-eaſt. The Engliſh now crouded all the ſail poſſible; and between eleven and twelve the wind came about to the ſouth-weſt, when the French ſtood away to the weſtward, and the Engliſh after them. About eleven the next day the Royal Sun ran aſhore, while two other large ſhips of the enemy ſtood as near her as poſſible. Sir Ralph Delaval, vice-admiral of the red, was now ordered to deſtroy the Royal Sun, while the reſt of the fleet continued their purſuit of the enemy. This ſervice he effectually performed, and the fineſt ſhip in the French navy was reduced to aſhes.

About four in the afternoon eighteen of the French ſhips, which had reached Cape Barfleur, haled in for La Hogue, and came to an anchor cloſe under the ſhore. The next day Ruſſel ordered Mr. Rooke, vice-admiral of the blue, with his ſquadron, the fire-ſhips, and all the boats of the fleet, to ſtand in and deſtroy thoſe ſhips. He obeyed his orders, and burnt thirteen men of war, ſeveral tranſports, and ſome ſmall veſſels loaded with ammunition.

In this famous engagement two ſhips of 104 guns, one of 90, two of 80, four of 76, four of 60, and two of fifty-ſix guns, belonging to the enemy, were deſtroyed.

James was ſo ſenſibly affected at this misfortune, that, in a letter he wrote to the king of France on the occaſion, he begged he would leave him to his fate. "I have hitherto (ſaid he) ſupported, with ſome conſtancy and reſolution, the weight of my misfortunes, while I myſelf was the only ſufferer; but this diſaſter has overwelmed me with grief, and left me no room for comfort. I know too well that my own unlucky ſtar has drawn this misfortune upon your forces, always victorious but when they fought for my intereſt, and therefore I no longer merit the ſupport of ſo great a monarch. Let me, therefore, intreat your majeſty to concern yourſelf no longer for a prince ſo dreadfully unfortunate; but permit me to retire, with my family, to ſome corner of the world, where I may ceaſe to obſtruct the courſe of your majeſty's ſucceſſes and conqueſts, and where it will be the greateſt of my conſolations to hear of the quick return of your majeſty's wonted triumphs, both by ſea and land, over both your enemies and mine. This, I doubt not, will ſoon be the caſe when my intereſt ſhall be no longer intermixed with yours." Lewis endeavoured to alleviate his afflictions by every method in his power. He wrote him an anſwer filled with the kindeſt expreſſions, and promiſed never to forſake him in his misfortunes.

The queen was no ſooner informed of this victory, than ſhe ſent 30,000l. to Portſmouth, to be diſtributed among the ſailors: ordered medals to be ſtruck for the officers, and cauſed the bodies of admiral Carter and colonel Haſtings, who had fallen in the engagement, to be honourably interred. The French, in their turn, were threatened with an invaſion, and about ſeven thouſand men embarked on board the fleet for that purpoſe. Great expectations were formed with regard to this expedition; but the advanced ſeaſon of the year was thought a ſufficient reaſon for laying it aſide; and the troops were ſent over to ſerve in Flanders.

But if Lewis was unfortunate at ſea, it was different with regard to his army in the low countries. Soon after opening the campaign, he laid ſiege to Namur, the ſtrongeſt place in the Netherlands, both by its advantageous ſituation betwen the Sambre and the Maeſe, and by its citadel, which is built on a rock. His army conſiſted of 120,000 men, with part of which he inveſted the town on the twenty-fifth of May; while Luxemburg, with the remainder, covered the ſiege. The operations were carried on with ſuch ſpirit and reſolution, that in eight days the French made themſelves maſters of the town, and of the citadel in twenty-two; while Luxemburg prevented William from paſſing the Mahaigne, who had advanced to the banks of the river, at the head of eighty thouſand men, to raiſe the ſiege. Lewis, after making this conqueſt, returned to Verſailles, leaving Luxemburg to oppoſe the army of the allies.

William, rightly imagining that it would be ſome reflection either on his conduct or courage, to have ſuffered a place of ſo much conſequence as Namur to be taken in his ſight, earneſtly ſought an opportunity of retrieving his reputation. Accordingly, he formed a deſign to ſurprize Mons; but, being prevented in this enterprize, he determined to fight the French army at all events, eſpecially as he had juſt received a reinforcement of eighty thouſand Hanoverian forces. Luxemburg had pitched his camp in a very advantageous ſituation, covered by a wood, and thick hedges, between Eghein and Steinkirk. Here William reſolved to attack them, from the information of ſome perſons who were thought to underſtand the nature of the ground; though it was afterwards found that they were miſtaken, the paſs being much narrower than they imagined.

Accordingly, on Sunday the 24th of July, the army was ordered to march at break of day, and fall upon the enemy in their camp. The prince of Wirtemberg began the attack when the French were all aſleep in their tents, not dreaming of ſuch a diſagreeable viſit, and one whole brigade was cut entirely to pieces before the marſhal was acquainted with the attack. He was at that time very ill; a fatal circumſtance at a juncture when the utmoſt activity was neceſſary; but the greatneſs of the danger inſpired him with new ſtrength. He changed his ground; gave a field of battle to his army, which before was pent up; recovered the right wing, which was entirely in confuſion; rallied his men three ſeveral times, and three times charged at the head of the houſhold troops. Theſe ſeveral actions were performed in leſs than two hours. He had with him the duke of Chartres, then not above fifteen years old, and conſequently could not be ſuppoſed to be of any great ſervice in ſuch operations; but his preſence greatly contributed to animate the ſoldiers. A grandſon and a grand nephew of the famous Conde alſo ſerved at that time under Luxemburg. The one was duke of Bourbon, the other prince de Conti. Theſe were rivals in courage, ambition, and fame; and accordingly exerted themſelves in a particular manner to retrieve the fortune of the day. Theſe princes put themſelves at the heads of the rallied troops, where they made a moſt furious and deſperate reſiſtance. Wirtemberg, unable to contend with ſuch ſuperior numbers, ſent ſeveral meſſages to count Solmes, ſoliciting a reinforcement. But that nobleman, from ſome picque he had conceived againſt the the Engliſh, diſregarded his requeſt.

William, informed of the danger to which his troops were expoſed, ſent peremptory orders to the count to march to their aſſiſtance; but the horſe, on account of the unevenneſs of the ground, could be of no ſervice; ſo that the Britiſh troops, aſſiſted with a few Dutch and Daniſh, ſuſtained the whole fury of the fight. At length Bouflers, who was poſted with a ſtrong body of dragoons at ſome diſtance from the field of battle, coming up, and joining the French army, the confederates, unable to withſtand this ſuperiority, riority, gave way, and retreated in good order; the French contenting themſelves with having recovered their troops from the diſorder into which they were thrown. Nor did William think it prudent to renew the engagement; and accordingly drew off his forces. In this deſperate attack the allies loſt five or ſix thouſand men, and among them lieutenant-general Mackay, Sir John Lanier, the earl of Angus, Sir Robert Douglas, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction. The loſs of the French was alſo very conſiderable, both in private men and officers of rank; and they would have ſuffered ſtill more, had it not been for the treachery of one Millevoix, ſecretary to the elector of Bavaria, who had, for a conſiderable time, made it his practice to ſend intelligence to the enemy, of all the reſolutions agreed to in the councils of the allies. Being detected on this occaſion, he was hanged on a tree at the right wing of the confederate army.

But a ſcene of greater treachery was about this time brought to light. The French court, finding they could not deſtroy king William in open war, reſolved to take him off by ſecret villainy; and, accordingly, an attempt was now formed againſt his life under the conduct of Barbeſieux, ſecretary of ſtate to Lewis, and one colonel Parker, who had fled to that court for protection. Grandval, a French knight of deſperate fortune, was encouraged by conſiderable ſums in hand, and ſtill more conſiderable promiſes, to aſſaſſinate the king of England when he was riding at the head of his troops, or whenever he perceived a favourable opportunity. In order to encourage him to execute this piece of daring villainy, a body of troops was ordered to attend him at a diſtance, in order to carry him off as ſoon as the murder was perpetrated. Grandval admitted two other perſons into the conſpiracy as his aſſiſtants, Dumont, and Leeſdale, a Dutch papiſt. Theſe three inhuman monſters had ſeveral times attempted to put their infernal deſign into execution, both at Loo and in the camp. Dumont had entered into the allied army as a deſerter, in order to have a better opportunity: but being at length diſcouraged by various diſappointments, and ſtruck with horror at the villainous deſign in which he was engaged, he made a full diſcovery of the whole plot. Grandval was accordingly ſeized as he was ſkulking about the king's quarters; and being examined before a court-martial, he, for ſome, denied his having any knowledge of the intended aſſaſſination; till being confronted by Dumont, and ſeveral papers produced, in which the whole plan of operations was laid down, he confeſſed the deſign, together with all the circumſtances that had attended it from time to time, and made a full diſcovery of the perſons who formed the ſcheme, and had engaged to ſupport him. Upon full evidence of his guilt, he received ſentence of death, as in caſes of high-treaſon, and was hanged, drawn, and quartered; his head and quarters being, by way of terror, ſet upon poles without the camp. Dumont and Leeſdale were ſuffered to eſcape with their lives, on account of their having given evidence againſt Grandval.

A few days after the battle of Steinkirk, the count Sericlas de Tilly fell in with a ſtrong detachment of French ſent out of Namur, to lay the country under contribution. This corps he totally defeated, took four hundred priſoners, and among them thirty officers of conſiderable note, who were ſent to Hays. Among the ſlain was the marquis of Hacquincourt. Our army being about the ſame time reinforced by the recruits from England, under the duke of Leinſter, a detachment from the camp, under the command of lieutenant-general Talmaſh, was ſent towards Newport, when they poſſeſſed themſelves of Furnes, a very important poſt, fortified it, and ſeized on Dixmuyde, with the villages and all the dependent territories. Many ſkirmiſhes happened during theſe tranſactions, but none worthy of a place in a general hiſtory.

In the mean time the town of Reinfeldt was inveſted by count Tallard; while the duke of Savoy made an incurſion into Dauphine, but ſoon retired; and the ſeaſon being now advancing for cloſing the campaign, many of the troops were ſent into winter quarters; but ſome ſtill remained in the ſeveral poſts to prevent the enemy from making incurſions.

William, having conferred the command of the allied army on the elector of Bavaria, embarked for England on the 15th of October. He landed at Yarmouth on the 18th, and was met by the queen at Newhall on the 20th, from whence he immediately proceeded to the capital, where he was received by the people with the utmoſt demonſtrations of joy.

We muſt here make a ſhort digreſſion, to admit an account of a very ſingular tranſaction that happened in Scotland during this year's campaign on the continent. About the time the king embarked for Holland, a very barbarous maſſacre was committed in that kingdom, which ſhewed at once the cruelty and treachery of ſome of thoſe who had inſinuated themſelves into the king's confidence.

The earl of Braidalbin formed a ſcheme for quieting all the highlanders, provided the king would defray the neceſſary expences, amounting to 12 or 15,000l. The offer was accepted, and the ſum demanded remitted from England, with orders to divide it among the chiefs of the highland clans.

Braidalbin employed his emiſſaries among them, and told them that the beſt ſervice they could do king James was to lie quiet, and reſerve themſelves for better times: and, provided they ſubmitted to take the oaths, the king would be contented, and they would be entitled to a ſhare of this ſum, which was ſent down down to purchaſe a tranquillity for that country: but their demands roſe ſo high, that the ſcheme became abortive. They knew that this nobleman had money to diſtribute among them; they were perſuaded that he intended to keep the greater part of it for himſelf; and, therefore, they aſked more than he was able to give.

Among the moſt obſtinate and clamorous of thoſe clans were the Macdonalds of Glencoe; who were ſuſpected of having committed many robberies and murders, and gained too much by their barbarous methods of making war to be eaſily prevailed upon to give it over. The chief of that clan had ſo provoked lord Braidalbin, by rendering his whole ſcheme abortive by his oppoſition, that he determined to take an ample revenge. William had already offered, by a proclamation, an indemnity to all the highlanders who had been in arms againſt him, on their coming in by a fixed day, and taking the oaths. This period had been twice or thrice prolonged; and at laſt with a poſitive threatening of military execution on all who ſhould not ſubmit by the laſt day of the preſent year.

This threatening produced the deſired effect: they all came in; and even Macdonald himſelf repaired to the governor of Fort-William. But that commander, being only a military man, could not, or would not, tender the oaths; and Macdonald was obliged to have recourſe to ſome legal magiſtrate to perform the office refuſed by the governor of Fort-William. The ſnows were then fallen, ſo that four or five days paſſed before he could reach the houſe of any magiſtrate. He took the oaths in his preſence, but, as the time of the laſt proclamation was elapſed, he could not, by the ſtrict letter of the law, gain any benefit from his ſubmiſſion. The whole affair was repreſented to the council; who reprimanded the magiſtrate for giving him the oaths when the day was paſſed.

This particular circumſtance was concealed from the king, when the earl of Braidalbin came to court to give an account of his diligence, and to return the money, as he could not perform the ſervice for which he had received it. He laid an information againſt Macdonald, as the principal perſon who had defeated this good deſign; and, that he might at once gratify his own revenge, and render the king odious to the highlanders, he propoſed that military execution ſhould be performed on thoſe of Glencoe. An inſtruction was accordingly drawn up by one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, to be both ſigned and counterſigned by his majeſty, that no blame might fall on Braidalbin, but that it might lay wholly on the king. This inſtruction declared that all who had not taken the oaths within the time limited ſhould loſe the benefit of the indemnity; and be received only upon mercy. But when it was found that this was not ſufficient to authoriſe what was intended, a ſecond order was ſigned and counterſigned, importing, that if the Glencoe men could be ſeparated from the reſt of the highlanders, ſome examples might be made of them, in order to ſtrike terror into the reſt: and the king, without any further enquiry, ſigned the order. In the mean time, William was totally ignorant of Macdonald's having offered to take the oaths within the limited time, and of his having actually taken them as ſoon as he could reach the houſe of a magiſtrate.

Theſe orders being ſent down to Scotland, the ſecretary of ſtate wrote ſeveral letters to Levingſtone, commander of the forces in that kingdom, giving him a ſtrict charge, and particular direction, for carrying them into execution; cautioning him particularly to keep the paſſes of the valley, which were ſo exactly deſcribed, that the account muſt have been drawn up by ſome perſon well acquainted with the country. He alſo gave orders that no quarter ſhould be given, in order to render the execution as terrible as poſſible. He preſſed this upon Levingſtone with ſuch ſtrains of vehemence, that the commander ſuſpected there was ſomething more than ordinary in it, though the ſecretary pretended it was wholly occaſioned by his zeal for the king's ſervice. Adding, it was neceſſary to make examples of ſuch robbers and murderers.

In the month of February a company of ſoldiers were ſent to Glencoe, where they were kindly received, and quartered in different parts of the valley; the inhabitants thinking themſelves entirely ſafe from hoſtilities. After ſtaying a week among them, they took an opportunity, in the night, of killing ſix and thirty of them; the reſt, taking the alarm, made their eſcape. This raiſed a general clamour, and was publiſhed by the French in their gazettes, and by the Jacobites in their libels, repreſenting the king's government as cruel and barbarous; though it always appeared that his own inclinations were rather too mild and generous. His majeſty ſent orders to make a ſtrict enquiry into the affair, but it appearing that ſo many were involved in it, William thought it more prudent to proceed no farther, contenting himſelf with diſmiſſing the maſter of Stair from his ſervice.

The Highlanders were ſo enraged at this, that they were ready to break out into open rebellion on the firſt favourable opportunity. Indeed, the king's not puniſhing the authors of this maſſacre with the rigour they deſerved was the greateſt blot of his whole reign, and conſiderably contributed to alienate the Scottiſh nation from the king and his government.---But to return to the affairs in England.

On the 4th of November the parliament met, when the king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, thanked them for their laſt ſupply, congratulated them on the late victory obtained at ſea; condoled with them, on the bad ſucceſs of the laſt campaign on the continent; and obſerved that the diligence of the French in augmenting their forces was ſo remarkable, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to have as great a force to oppoſe them; and therefore demanded a ſupply ſuitable to the exigence. He expreſſed the greateſt concern in being obliged to ſend ſuch large ſums out of the nation for the payment of the army, and wiſhed they could find ſome method of removing ſo great an inconveniency: he intimated a deſign of making a deſcent upon the coaſt of France, and hoped that his parliament would diſpatch ſo ſpeedily the buſineſs of the ſupplies, that the preparations might be early and effectual: he declared that he had no ſeparate intereſt from them, nor any deſire but that of rendering them a happy people. "Hitherto, added he in concluſion, I have never ſpared my own perſon for the good and welfare of this nation; and I am ſo ſenſible of your good affections to me, that I ſhall continue ſo to do with great chearfulneſs upon all occaſions, wherein I may contribute to the honour and advantage of England."

A ſtrong party, under the directions of the earl of Marlborough, was now formed in the upper houſe, againſt the meaſures of the miniſtry; ſo that inſtead of receiving the king's ſpeech with that pleaſure which was expected, they immediately began an enquiry into the commitment of thoſe peers who had lately been ſent to the Tower. This enquiry was carried on with great violence and animoſity; but the king agreeing to releaſe thoſe lords upon bail, the affair was at length compromiſed.

On the 11th of November the commons preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, thanking him for his ſpeech; and another, deſiring that the ſtate of foreign alliances might be laid before them. On the twelfth, a bill was introduced for regulating trials for high-treaſon. At the ſame time, they voted their thanks to admiral Ruſſel, and to the reſt of the officers for their noble behaviour in the late fight off Cape La Hogue.

The next matter taken into conſideration was, the article of ſupplies: and the proper eſtimates being laid before them, they reſolved to grant the whole ſum demanded, amounting to near five millions; two millions for the ſervice of the navy and ordnance; above two millions for the land forces; and 750,000l. for making good the deficiencies in the laſt year's grants.

In order to raiſe this money, a tax of 4s. in the pound was laid on all lands according to their real value; and on all offices and employments of profit, except thoſe belonging to the army or navy. They alſo empowered his majeſty to borrow money on the credit of this tax, at the rate of four per cent. and alſo raiſe one million on the general credit of the exchequer, by granting annuities. This was the firſt annuity act, and became the principle cauſe of involving this nation in debt.

A third method of raiſing money conſiſted in levying additional duties on all goods and merchandize imported or exported; particularly the ſum of 8l. on every ton of French wine. A new impoſition of eight per cent. was alſo laid on the capital ſtock of the Eaſt-India company, eſtimated at 744,000l. of one per cent. on the African, and of 5l. on every ſhare of the ſtock, belonging to the Hudſon's-bay company; and empowered his majeſty to borrow half a million on theſe funds, which were entirely ſet apart for carrying on the war.

Among other bills brought in this ſeſſion, was one for incapacitating perſons, enjoying certain civil and military employments, to ſit in the houſe of commons. The bill readily paſſed the lower houſe, but occaſioned long and warm debates in the houſe of peers. In this conteſt the earl of Mulgrave diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a ſpirited and elegant ſpeech in favour of the bill. He obſerved, that the commons were the repreſentatives of the people: "But if, ſays he, after they are choſen, they ſhould change their dependence, and engage in employments evidently repugnant to the great truſt repoſed in them, what can the people expect from their ſervices? A commoner who enjoys a command in the army muſt have a divided duty; and perhaps his troops or regiment may be engaged in ſome action abroad, at the time his preſence may be neceſſary at home; ſo that he muſt either have the diſgrace of being abſent from his forces, or from the lower houſe, where he is intruſted with the liberties of the people. There is ſtill, added he, another ſort of incapacity worſe than the former, that of parliament men holding ſuch poſts in the exchequer, whoſe principal profits ariſe from the money voted to the king in the houſe of commons. Would any of your lordſhips intruſt a perſon to make a bargain for you, whoſe intereſt is concerned in making you give as much as poſſibly he can?" After ſeveral other arguments of a ſimilar nature, he deſired the houſe "to conſider of how great conſequence it was that ſo many votes ſhould be free, when upon one ſingle voice the whole ſecurity or ruin of the nation might depend; adding, that the people could never be prevailed upon to bear ſo great a provocation, as that of being debarred from a ſecurity in their own repreſentatives; and would be eaſily perſuaded by thoſe whoſe intereſts it was to inflame their minds with diſcontent, that all thoſe vaſt ſums that had been, and muſt ſtill be raiſed for carrying on the war, were not diſpoſed of in ſo fair and equitable a manner as they ought to be; and thence very naturally conclude that their money is not given but taken." This bill, however, was thrown out, after a long debate, by a majority of two voices only; the argument againſt paſſing it being, that it ſeemed to eſtabliſh an oppoſition between the crown and the people, as if thoſe who were employed by the one were not fit to be truſted by the other.

About this time a grievance of a public nature was univerſally complained of, namely, the preſſing of land-men for the ſea ſervice by the officers of the navy, who carried them over to Holland, and there ſold them to the officers of the army; a villainous practice which would, in all probability, have paſſed unnoticed, had not a ſervant belonging to one of the members of parliament been thus taken away. Sir John Trevor, the ſpeaker of the lower houſe, being ordered to lay this grievance before his majeſty, the king was pleaſed to expreſs his juſt reſentment on the occaſion; and ordered that no naval officer ſhould preſume to preſs landmen for the future, on pain of being caſhiered.

The parliament next proceeded to take into conſideration the ſtate of Ireland, concerning which they examined a number of witneſſes. Both houſes then preſented addreſſes to his majeſty, wherein they complained of the conditions that had been granted to the Iriſh, on the ſurrender of Limerick, and of the king's having diſpoſed of ſome of the forfeited eſtates and effects of the rebels in that kingdom: as alſo of the licentiouſneſs of the ſoldiers for want of pay, which they were perſuaded they had provided for. They complained of recruiting his majeſty's forces, with Iriſh papiſts, and of ſelling the forfeited eſtates much under their real value, to the prejudice of the revenue; of the embezzlement of the ſtores in the towns and garriſons, taken from king James; and repreſented that certain additional articles to the treaty of Limerick, after the capitulation had been ſigned, had given too much encouragement to the Iriſh papiſts, and greatly weakened the proteſtant intereſt in that kingdom. Theſe abuſes, they beſought his majeſty to redreſs; particularly that the ſoldiers might be paid their arrears; that no Iriſh papiſt might be permitted to ſerve in the army in that kingdom; and that no grant might be made of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, till that matter ſhould be ſettled in parliament. The king anſwered, in general terms, that whatever was amiſs ſhould be remedied.

A. D. 1693. On the 14th of March the king came to the houſe of peers, and after giving the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, he put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he thanked the parliament for the large ſupplies they had given him; and recommended the peace of the ſeveral counties to their reſpective care. He told them that his preſence was neceſſary abroad, but would take care to leave a ſufficient number of troops to ſecure the peace of the kingdom; and concluded with aſſuring them, that he ſhould continue to expoſe his perſon on all occaſions for the happineſs and ſecurity of theſe kingdoms; and that his ſincere endeavours ſhould never be wanting to render England a great and flouriſhing nation.

On the 31ſt of March the king embarked at Graveſend, and landed ſafely at the Maeſe in Holland, on the 2d of April. He ſoon after put himſelf at the head of the allied army, and advanced againſt the enemy. Luxemburg ſurprized and attacked him at Nerwind with a ſuperior army. The king loſt not a moment. He drew up his forces in order of battle, expoſed himſelf to every kind of danger, but was obliged at laſt to give way to the numbers of the enemy. Though vanquiſhed, he made a glorious retreat, and was ſtill reſpectable. Nor did the French reap any other advantage from their victory than that of making themſelves maſters of Charleroy.

William was thought to have gained more real honour in the battle of Nerwind than when he triumphed at the Boyne. His very enemies were charmed with his conduct. It was a common ſaying in the French camp, that "they wanted only ſuch a king to make themſelves maſters of Chriſtendom." The prince of Conti, in a letter he wrote to his conſort, uſed the following expreſſion: "I ſaw the king expoſing himſelf to the greateſt dangers; and ſurely ſo much valour very well deſerves the peaceable poſſeſſion of the crown he wears." The king of France himſelf is reported to have ſaid, "That Luxemburg's behaviour was like that of the prince of Conti, but William's like that of marſhal Turenne."

At the ſame time Germany and Piedmont were alſo the theatres of war. The palatinate was inhumanly ravaged by the duke of Lorges. The duke of Savoy, who, the preceeding year, had ſpread deſolation through Dauphiny, was defeated near Marſeilles by Catinat. But Lewis XIV. notwithſtanding ſo many victories, found enemies in every quarter, capable of making the ſtrongeſt reſiſtance. The dreadful ſcourge of war, after ſtrewing the plains with the bodies of the dead, frequently leaves nothing more behind than vain exultations on the ſide of the victor. The more dreadful ſcourge of famine followed that of war. Two harveſts had failed, and the vintage had ſuffered greatly; ſo that the French had neither bread nor wine. The utmoſt diligence was uſed to import corn from other countries; and the famous Dubart ſeaſonably purchaſed large quantities both in Sweden and Denmark, conveying it ſafely into the harbours of France.

The affairs at ſea this year were alſo far from being advantageous to England. The French had, in ſome meaſure, repaired their loſſes at La Hogue, and the commerce of the allies ſuffered greatly. The Engliſh and Dutch fleets were, indeed, very ſtrong, and ſailed early. The admirals were not at firſt reſtrained by any particular inſtructions, but ordered in general to deſtroy the ſhips of the enemy, and protect the trade; but they afterwards received particular inſtructions with regard to a large fleet of near 400 ſail of merchant ſhips belonging to England, Holland, and Hamburgh. After ſeveral councils held on this occaſion, it was determined that the whole fleet, together with the Mediterranean ſquadron, ſhould proceed in junction thirty leagues weſt-ſouth-weſt from Uſhant; when Sir George Rook, who was appointed to command the ſquadron deſtined to convoy them, was to proceed with them towards the ports to which they were bound. Accordingly Sir George, with all the Turkey ſhips, left the main body of the fleet on the 6th of June; and ſteering for the Streights, left by the way the veſſels bound for Bilboa, Liſbon, St. Ubes, and other ports. When he was within ſixty leagues of Cape St. Vincent, he diſcovered part of the French fleet; on which he immediately called a council of war, where it was reſolved, that as the wind was northerly, and a freſh gale, the merchant ſhips ſhould make the beſt of their way to Cadiz. This reſolution was hardly taken, before the whole fleet of the enemy, conſiſting of eighty ſail, under the command of Tourville, was diſcovered. Rooke was perſuaded there was now no time to retreat; but Vandergoes, the Dutch vice-admiral, informed him, that he choſe to avoid an engagement, which he thought extremely hazardous. Rook therefore followed his advice, and they both ſtood off with an eaſy ſail, that the heavy ſhips might work up to windward. At the ſame time, the Sheerneſs was diſpatched with orders to the ſmall ſhips, near the land, to endeavour to keep cloſe under the ſhore during the night, and take ſhelter in Faro, St. Lucar, or Cadiz. About ſix in the evening, the van of the enemy came up with the ſternmoſt of the confederate fleet, conſiſting of three Dutch men of war. Theſe bravely fought, firſt eleven, and then ſeven of the enemy's ſhips, for five hours together. They had the good fortune to clear themſelves from the former; but were obliged to ſubmit to the latter, after making a moſt obſtinate reſiſtance. The Dutch merchant ſhips immediately tacked and ſtood in for the ſhore, and the enemy after them. Rooke ſtood off to ſea during the night; and the next morning fifty-four of the merchant ſhips, and ſeveral men of war, were about him; but no more than two of the latter belonged to the Dutch. Five ſail of the enemy's ſhips were ſeen to leeward, and two to windward; the latter kept in ſight of him till it was night. The next day the admiral called a council of war, where it was determined to ſail directly to the Madeiras, in order to procure water, and thence either to Cork or Kingſale. This reſolution was accordingly executed, and Sir George conducted that part of the fleet back to Ireland in ſafety.

Had the enemy purſued their firſt advantage with the ſame conduct and reſolution, hardly a ſhip could have eſcaped; for when the Dutch tacked and ſtood in for the ſhore, the van of the French were within cannon-ſhot of the Engliſh admiral; but their tacking after the Dutch gave the other part of the fleet an opportunity of eſcaping. The loſs, however, was very conſiderable, and fell chiefly on the Hollanders, the enemy having taken above eighty ſail of merchant ſhips, and three men of war. The Engliſh loſt only one man of war, and about five merchantmen.

After the engagement, the French admiral ſtood away for Cadiz, in order to attack that place, but he found the attempt impracticable. They then bombarded Gibraltar, where the merchants ſunk their ſhips to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. From Gibraltar they entered the Streights, and proceeded along the coaſts of Spain; burnt ſeveral Engliſh and Dutch ſhips at Malaga and Alicant; and returned to Toulon about the latter end of September.

In the mean time fifteen ſhips of the line and two frigates were ordered by William to Holland; and twenty-ſix men of war, and ſeven fire-ſhips, were deſtined for the winter fleet, which it was then thought would put an end to the naval operations this year: but it ſoon after appeared that a ſecret expedition had been formed, in order to check the immoderate boaſtings of the French for their ſucceſsful expeditions at ſea.

The Engliſh trade had, for a conſiderable time paſt, ſuffered very ſeverely from the privateers of St. Malo's. Never did one port ſend out ſo great a number of thoſe cruiſers; or even acquire, in ſo ſhort a ſpace of time, ſo much wealth, without engaging in any branch of commerce: the ſea was covered with their ſhips from the channel to the Mediterranean; and their very names were become a terror to the merchants of London, Amſterdam, and Cadiz. The repeated complaints of the ſufferers by this depredatory war, ſo alarmed the Engliſh government, that a reſolution was taken to deſtroy St. Malo's, the port of theſe formidable enemies to the trade of the confederates. Purſuant to this reſolution, commodore Benbow, and captain Phillips a famous engineer, were appointed commanders of this expedition. Every thing being ready, they put to ſea, with a ſquadron of twelve men of war, four bomb-ketches and other veſſels, and arrived before St. Malo's on the 16th of November. After bombarding the town for three days, they took the advantage of a freſh gale of wind, a ſtrong tide, and very dark weather, on the night of the 19th, when they ſent in a fire-ſhip of a particular conſtruction, with a deſign to lay the whole town in aſhes. This would undoubtedly have been the conſequence, had not the effect been prevented by an accident; for when ſhe had arrived within piſtol ſhot of the town, where they intended to have moored her, a ſudden guſt of wind drove her upon a rock, where ſhe continued immoveable. At laſt the engineer, who was on board, perceiving her ſides beginning to open, and fearing ſhe might ſink, ſet fire to her. The exploſion was ſo terrible, as to ſhake the whole town like an earthquake, unroof above 300 houſes, and brake all the glaſs and earthen ware for three leagues round. The inhabitants were ſtruck with ſuch conſternation that a ſmall body of troops might have taken the place; but the miniſtry, by an effect of their uſual inattention, or perhaps, by ſomewhat worſe, had ſent out this ſquadron without a ſingle ſoldier on board. Sir George Rooke's ſquadron was by this time arrived in England, and laid up: and with Benbow's expedition ended the naval tranſactions of this year; as little to the honour of the Engliſh as any during the whole courſe of the war.

Such a continued ſeries of misfortunes threw the whole nation into confuſion: every individual in the kingdom exclaimed againſt the miniſtry, and even openly accuſed them of treachery to their country. It was aſſerted that the French court was privately acquainted with all the deſigns of ours; and thereby enabled to take the proper meaſures for rendering them abortive; while the Engliſh miniſtry remained, or affected to remain, totally ignorant of the ſchemes of the enemy. The weight of this accuſation fell chiefly on the earls of Nottingham, Killegrew, and Delaval; two of the admirals, the marquis of Caermarthen and the earl of Rocheſter. But whether they were or not guilty of the charge is uncertain: they were at leaſt known to have been firmly attached to the late king, and not yet thoroughly reconciled to the preſent government, though they poſſeſſed ſome of the moſt lucrative and honourable poſts in the adminiſtration.

The campaign being now cloſed in Flanders, William returned to England the latter end of October. His firſt care was, to ſilence the murmurs of the people, by making a thorough change in his miniſtry. The earl of Nottingham was now laid aſide, and his place ſupplied by the earl of Shrewſbury: the command of the fleet was committed ſolely to the care of the intrepid admiral Ruſſel. In a word, the tory party were obliged to make way for their antagoniſts, the whigs; thoſe only, who were known to be firm friends to the revolution being continued in office. Theſe meaſures were chiefly owing to the repreſentations of the earl of Sunderland, who had acquired a conſiderable influence with his majeſty, and found means to perſuade him that the whigs only were his true friends: while the tories, under the maſk of pretended loyalty, were, in their hearts, devoted to the intereſt of their late ſovereign.

The parliament met on the 7th of October, when the king opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

" My lords and gentlemen,

" I am always glad to meet you here; and I could heartily wiſh that our ſatisfaction were not leſſened at preſent by reflecting upon the diſadvantages we have received this year at land, and the miſcarriages in our affairs at ſea. I think it is evident, that the former were only occaſioned by the great number of our enemies, which exceeded ours in all places. For what relates to the latter, which reflects ſo great diſgrace upon the nation, I have reſented it extremely; and as I will take care that thoſe who have not done their duty ſhall be puniſhed, ſo I am reſolved to uſe my utmoſt endeavours, that our power at ſea may be rightly managed for the future: and it will well deſerve your conſideration, whether we are not defective, both in the number of our ſhipping, and in proper ports to the weſtward, for the better annoying our enemies, and protecting our trade, which is ſo eſſential to the welfare of theſe kingdoms.

" I am very ſenſible of the good affection wherewith you have always aſſiſted me to ſupport the charges of the war, which have been very great; and yet I am perſuaded that the experience of this ſummer is ſufficient to convince us all, that, to arrive at a good end of it, there will be a neceſſity of increaſing our forces, both by ſea and land, the next year. Our allies have reſolved to add to theirs; and I will not doubt, that you will have ſuch regard to the preſent exigence, as that you will give me a ſuitable ſupply to enable me to do the like. I muſt therefore earneſtly recommend it to you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, to take ſuch timely reſolutions, as that your ſupplies may be effectual, and our preparations ſo forward, as will be neceſſary both for the honour and ſecurity of the nation."

In anſwer to this ſpeech, the commons unanimouſly reſolved, " that they would ſupport their majeſties and their government; and grant a ſufficient ſupply for a vigorous proſecution of the war." But before they proceeded on that ſubject, they thought proper to make a ſtrict enquiry into the cauſes that occaſioned the miſcarriages of the fleet laſt ſummer. This enquiry took up a conſiderable ſpace of time. Great exceptions were made againſt the many delays, by which the houſe ſuſpected a ſcheme was laid to prevent the Smyrna fleet from ſailing out of the Engliſh harbours, till the French had ſufficient notice of the deſign, in order to be ready to intercept them. Our want of intelligence was much complained of: the inſtructions which the admirals who commanded the fleet had received from the cabinet council, were conſidered as badly drawn up, and worſe executed. The orders appeared ambiguous and defective; nor had the commanders ſhewed any zeal to do any thing more than ſtrictly to obey them; which they had done with the moſt ſcrupulous attention: they had uſed no methods to procure certain intelligence concerning the French fleet, whether it was at ſea, or ſtill in Breſt harbour. Inſtead of which they had truſted to general and uncertain reports, though a fleet o the utmoſt conſequence to the nation was intruſted t their care: nor had they ſailed far enough wit Rooke to ſee him paſt danger. To theſe charge they anſwered, that they had obſerved their orders that they had great reaſon to think the French wer ſtill in Breſt; and therefore thought it was not ſafe t ſail too far from the coaſt of England, when they had, as they ſuſpected, left behind them a ſtrong nava force, which might, during their abſence, alarm, and perhaps ravage the Engliſh coaſt. It was repreſented as impracticable to obtain any authentic informatio from Breſt; and added ſeveral ſuſpicious reaſons i ſupport of their conduct. But though their reaſon were thought far from being ſufficient to juſtify th meaſures they had purſued; yet, as they had obeye their orders, they could not be puniſhed; and accordingly a vote paſſed in their favour.

This enquiry being finiſhed, the commons proceeded to deliberate on the ſupplies, and voted, tha 500,000 pounds be raiſed towards diſcharging th wages due to the ſeamen; and that a farther ſum o 2,000,000 be granted to their majeſties for th maintenance of the fleet, including the ordinance that the number of forces in their majeſties pay b increaſed to ſix new regiments of Engliſh dragoon and fifteen new regiments of Engliſh foot: th 83,000,121 men, including commiſſion and non commiſſion officers, were neceſſary for the ſervice o the enſuing year, to be employed in England and beyond the ſeas: and that the ſum of 2,535,590 poun be granted for the maintenance of the land force They alſo voted 118,000 pounds to make goo the annuity deficiency, and 296,692 pounds make good the deficiency of the poll-bill. Thus th ſupplies voted for the ſervice of the enſuing ye amounted to near five millions and a half, and we raiſed by a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound by an increaſe of annuities; a farther exciſe on bee and a duty on ſalt.

After the commons had granted the neceſſary ſu plies, they paſſed a bill for rendering all members their houſe incapable of truſt and profit. This bill al paſſed the upper houſe, and lay ready for the roy aſſent; but when the king came to the houſe of pee to paſs the land-tax bill, he thought proper to refu it. This refuſal alarmed the commons: the who houſe was turned into a committee on the ſtate of t nation, and it was reſolved, " That whoever adviſ the king not to give the royal aſſent to the act whi was to redreſs a grievance, and take off a ſcand from the commons in parliament, is an enemy their majeſties and the kingdom; and that a repr ſentation be made to the king to lay before him h few inſtances have been, in former reigns, of de ing the royal aſſent to bills for the redreſs of gr vances; and the grief of the commons for his having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral public bills, and in particular to this bill, which tends ſo much to clear the reputation of this houſe, after having voted ſo freely to ſupply the public occaſions."

Theſe reſolutions being formed into a repreſentation, it was preſented by the whole houſe to the king, who was pleaſed to return the following anſwer:

"I am very ſenſible of the good offices you have expreſſed for me on many occaſions, and the zeal you have ſhewn for our common intereſt; I ſhall make uſe of this opportunity to tell you, that no prince ever had a higher eſteem for the conſtitution of the Engliſh government, than myſelf; and that I ſhall ever have a great regard for the advice of parliament.

"I am perſuaded that nothing can ſo much conduce to the welfare of this kingdom, as an entire confidence between the king and people, which I ſhall by all means endeavour to preſerve; and I aſſure you I ſhall look upon ſuch perſons as my enemies, who ſhall adviſe any thing that may leſſen it."

This anſwer, however, was far from being ſatisfactory: it was thought by ſome too vague and general. A motion was therefore made, "that application be made to the king for a more particular anſwer." This occaſioned a very warm debate; but the queſtion being at length put, it paſſed in the negative by a great majority.

A bill was now brought into the houſe for naturalizing foreign proteſtants, which occaſioned great debates, and in a particular manner engaged the attention of the public. It was repreſented on one hand, that the ravages of war, the depopulation of the kingdom, the decay of agriculture, the wealth and induſtry of the refugees, already eſtabliſhed in England, the proſpect of increaſing their numbers, and thereby giving ſubjects to the ſtate, and freſh reſources to commerce and manufactures, were conſidered as objects of the laſt importance, and urged in behalf of the bill. On the other hand it was alledged, that foreigners engaged in the manufactures of the Engliſh, would infallibly be of great prejudice to them; that after amaſſing fortunes at their expence, they would leave the kingdom, and return with their riches to their native country; that numbers of artificers were ſtarving for want of employment, and that the evil, inſtead of being leſſened, would be increaſed by this meaſure. In ſhort, to admit ſo many non-conformiſts into the number of natural born ſubjects, was to expoſe the church of England to danger which ſhould be avoided. The laſt obſervation was urged with great warmth; and prevailed with many who conſidered the church and ſtate as a prey to foreigners. Popular prejudices are often formidable. The court party ſaw the difficulty, and deſpairing of ſucceſs, withdrew the bill till a more favourable opportunity.

A. D. 1694. This year was opened by a dreadful diſaſter at ſea. A fleet of merchant ſhips, under a convoy of men of war, commanded by Sir Francis Wheeler, having ſailed from Gibraltar up the Streights, met with a moſt violent ſtorm, which continued the whole day and the ſucceeding night, and occaſioned the moſt melancholy misfortune. The Suſſex, the ſhip on board of which Sir Francis carried his flag, foundered, and he himſelf with his whole crew, except two Moors, periſhed; the Cambridge and Lumley-caſtle men of war, the Serpent bomb-ketch, and the Mary ketch, together with ſix merchantmen, were driven aſhore, to the eaſtward of Gibraltar, and moſt of their men loſt. The ſame fate attended three Dutch ſhips richly laden; but rear-admiral Nevill, and three Dutch men of war, had the good fortune to eſcape into Cadiz.

On the 26th of April his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and after giving the royal aſſent to the bills that were ready, put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſhort ſpeech from the throne; in which he thanked the commons for the large ſupplies they had given him, and as the poſture of affairs rendered his preſence neceſſary abroad, he recommended to both houſes to do every thing in their power to preſerve the public peace during his abſence.

Having thus ſettled affairs at home, William embarked for Holland on the 6th of May, and, after a very ſhort paſſage, arrived ſafe at the Brill. From hence he immediately ſet out for the Hague; and, after preſiding at an aſſembly of the ſtates, he repaired to Loo, where he continued till the opening of the campaign.

The French monarch turned his chief force againſt Spain, where he was very ſucceſsful. He had ſome time before, in order to relieve his ſubjects from the miſeries they ſuffered, offered the Spaniards a ſeparate peace, provided they would declare the duke of Anjou, one of his grandſons, heir to their crown. But theſe overtures being rejected, Lewis propoſed to invade that kingdom by ſea and land. With this view, the marſhal de Noailles taking the field early in the ſpring, advanced at the head of an army of 30,000 men to the banks of the Ter, and, on the 28th of May, forced the paſſage of that river, in the face of 16,000 of the Spaniſh forces encamped on the oppoſite bank of the river on purpoſe to oppoſe him. After this ſucceſs, he marched directly to Palamos, which he immediately inveſted; while the combined ſquadrons of Breſt and Toulon, under Tourville and d'Etrees, blocked it up by ſea. On the 7th of June the place was taken by ſtorm, and the moſt inhuman cruelties exerciſed upon the wretched inhabitants. This ſtruck the Spaniards with ſuch a panic, that they immediately withdrew their garriſons from Felieu de Quixolo and the caſtle of St. Elmo, in order to reinforce that of Gironne, a town well fortified and capable of ſupporting a long ſiege: but ſuch was the terror of the Spaniards, that the town ſubmitted a few days after the firſt ſummons.

Encouraged by this ſucceſs, the marſhal de Noailles, after having refreſhed his troops, determined to attempt the reduction of Barcelona, the capital, and indeed the only fortified place in Catalonia now remaining to the Spaniards. His plan was to attack the town both by ſea and land at the ſame time, by which means he hoped to be ſoon maſter of the place, and in a capacity of deſtroying every town on the ſea-coaſt of Spain.

But this ſcheme was rendered totally abortive by the aſſiduity of William. That monarch had been previouſly informed of the marſhal's deſign, and therefore reſolved to ſend a ſtrong fleet up the Mediterranean, at once to aſſiſt the Spaniards, and prevent the French ſquadrons from coming into the ocean. Accordingly the utmoſt diligence was uſed both in England and Holland, to fit out a more numerous fleet, and have the ſhips earlier at ſea than in any year ſince the commencement of the war. By this extraordinary diſpatch, Ruſſel ſailed from St. Helen's on the 3d of May, with the combined ſquadrons, conſiſting of 52 Engliſh, and 41 Dutch ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, fire-ſhips, and other ſmall veſſels. On his arrival off Breſt, he found that Tourville with his ſquadron, had already quitted that harbour; and Ruſſel determined to purſue him. But being informed by a captain of a Swediſh ſhip, that there was a fleet of merchantment lying in a harbour near Conquet-bay, he detached captain Pritchard in the Monmouth, with the Roebuck and Reſolution fire-ſhips, to attempt the taking or deſtroying them. This ſervice Pritchard performed ſo effectually, that out of 55 ſail, he burnt or ſunk thirty-five, and drove the man of war, which was appointed to convoy them, on the rocks, where ſhe was loſt, and all the crew periſhed.

Ruſſel, not having been able to meet with the Breſt fleet, returned to St. Helen's; but ſoon received orders to proceed to the Mediterranean with the principal part of his fleet. On his arrival off the rock of Liſbon, he was joined by rear-admiral Neville from Cadiz, and the Dutch vice-admirals Calemberg and Evertzen, with ſixteen ſhips of the line. By this additional reinforcement the ſhips under his command amounted to ſixty-three. Ruſſel now made the beſt of his way to Barcelona, in order to ſave that city, together with the whole province of Catalonia, from falling into the hands of the enemy, who had now blocked it up both by land and ſea. On his appearing before the town, the French admirals, who were in no condition to withſtand ſo powerful a fleet, returned with great precipitation into the harbour of Toulon, and Noailles abandoned his enterprize. Thus the Spaniſh dominions were freed from the danger that threatened them, by this well-timed expedition; and the French fleet blocked up cloſely in the harbour of Toulon; a circumſtance that ſufficiently confuted their boaſting aſſertions, of being in a condition to give laws to all the maritime powers of Europe.

During theſe tranſactions, the confederate army, commanded by the king of England in perſon, took the field, and encamped at Mont St. Andre. It conſiſted of 31,000 horſe and dragoons, and 51,000 foot, all veteran troops, beſides a body of 7000 men under count Thian, near Ghent. The French were not greatly inferior in numbers; but the dauphin of France, who commanded in perſon, declared that he had orders not to ſtir out of his camp while the allies continued in theirs: ſo that theſe two powerful armies continued inactive, waiting to take ſome advantage of each other, till near the end of the campaign, when William attempted to paſs the Schelde, and force the enemy to a battle; but, by an almoſt incredible march of the enemy, his deſigns were fruſtrated.

Having in vain endeavoured to bring the French to an engagement, William gave orders for beſieging Huy, which was, accordingly, inveſted by count Tilly; and after a defence of ten days, ſurrendered to the allies, who put a ſtrong garriſon into the place. This conqueſt ſecured the biſhopric of Liege from the incurſions of the French; and the ſeaſon for putting an end to the campaign now advancing, both armies retired into winter quarters.

In the mean time, the prince of Baden, who commanded the imperialiſts on the Rhine, diſdaining to remain inactive, croſſed that river, and marched towards the French army commanded by marſhal Lorges, who, being apprized of the prince's deſign, retired towards Landen. But he ſuffered ſeverely in this retreat, great part of his rear being cut off by the imperialiſts; who, as the French retreated, advanced and plundered ſeveral towns, made a very conſiderable booty, and laid the whole adjacent country under contribution.

Before William left England, he had concerted a plan for making a deſcent upon Breſt, and other places on the ſea-coaſt of France; the execution of which was committed to lieutenant-general Talmaſh. Accordingly, ſoon after admiral Ruſſel ſailed for the Mediterranean, the lord Berkeley, with thirty ſail of men of war and tranſports, having on board between ſix and ſeven thouſand ſoldiers, under general Talmaſh, was ordered to make a deſcent at Camaret-bay, near Breſt, in order to deſtroy that harbour, or, at leaſt, to render it of no ſervice to the French. A high rock, or rather promontory, extends from Camaret to the harbour of Breſt, and commands all the ſhipping paſſing in or coming out of that port. This promontory is joined to the continent by a narrow iſthmus, which might be defended with a ſmall number of men againſt the greateſt force. It was propoſed to poſſeſs ourſelves of this important ſpot, where we were to have built a fort, which, had this ſcheme ſucceeded, would not only have prevented the French from aſſembling their fleets there as uſual, and have deprived them of the only port they had fit for receiving their large men of war, but we ſhould have had it in our power to make incurſions into the province of Britany at pleaſure. Lewis, however, having early intelligence of the deſign, and ſenſible of the fatal conſequence that muſt attend its ſucceſs, ordered Vauban, the famous engineer, to have the iſthmus, the rock, and all the avenues to it ſo fortified as to render it inacceſſible. A large army was alſo ſent there, and ſtrong batteries were raiſed, that commanded every place where there appeared the leaſt poſſibility of landing.

On the 7th of June the Engliſh fleet arrived before the place, having on board lord Berkeley, general Talmaſh, the marquis of Caermarthen, lord Cutts, and ſeveral other experienced commanders. It was immediately repreſented to general Talmaſh, by ſeveral of the officers, what diſadvantages muſt attend an attempt upon a place ſo well prepared for annoyance, as well as defence, and they warmly adviſed him not to expoſe himſelf or his men. But Talmaſh, firm in his reſolution, told them, that their advice came too late, that the honour of the Engliſh nation was at ſtake, for which reaſon he muſt and would land. The marquis of Caermarthen, with the utmoſt intrepidity, now ſtood in with eight men of war, and came to an anchor very near the ſhore, in order to cover the deſcent of the troops. He ſoon found his ſhips expoſed to the fire of ſeveral batteries which till then they had not diſcovered. But he, not at all daunted by the danger of his ſituation, returned the fire of the enemy very briſkly. Eight hundred men, under the command of general Talmaſh, got ſafe to ſhore; but they were no ſooner landed, than the general found the enterprize impracticable, and made a ſignal to retreat. This command came too late, for it being ebb tide, the boats ſtuck faſt upon the ooze. The men were now expoſed to the fire from the batteries, by which 600 of them were killed, and a ſquadron of the French coming down to the ſhore, obliged thoſe that were left alive to lay down their arms, and demand quarter. Talmaſh eſcaped to a boat, which brought him back to his ſhip; but that brave officer had received a wound in his thigh by a ball, and, notwithſtanding the greateſt care, died before he reached England.

The ſhips that covered the deſcent were now in a terrible ſituation, having loſt a great number of their men, and had moſt of their maſts and rigging cut in pieces by the batteries; notwithſtanding which the marquis, with infinite hazard and difficulty, brought them all off, a Dutch frigate of thirty guns excepted, which fell into the hands of the enemy. A council of war was now called, wherein it was reſolved to return immediately to Spithead, at which place they arrived on the fifteenth of June. Here a council was held, by order of the queen, to conſider how the ſhips and troops might be employed to the moſt advantage. After ſeveral conſultations it was reſolved to make ſome attempts on the coaſt of Normandy. On the 8th of July they arrived before Dieppe. On the 12th they began to fire on the town; which they continued without intermiſſion for twelve hours, in which they threw 1100 bombs and carcaſes into the town, which, the ſtreets being narrow row, the houſes old, and moſt of them built of timber, was ſet on fire in twenty places at once, and the chief part of it reduced to aſhes. Our fleet then ſailed along the coaſt, and on the 15th lord Berkeley arrived off Havre de Grace, which place he immediately began to bombard. Here the houſes were often ſet on fire, and numbers of the French ſoldiers killed in endeavouring to extinguiſh it. During this ſervice the Grenada bomb veſſel was blown up, with all the men on board, and ſeveral ſmall ſhips ſo much ſhattered that it was thought moſt prudent to retire to St. Helen's. An attempt was ſoon after made upon Dunkirk, by a fleet under the command of Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, but that place was ſo well fortified, and the garriſon ſo ſtrong, that the deſign was ſoon found impracticable. In his way home, Sir Cloudeſley Shovel ſent a bomb veſſel into the harbour of Calais, which diſcharged ſo many ſhells into the town, that about 40,000 houſes were deſtroyed, after which he returned with his whole ſquadron into the Downs.

The campaign in Flanders being now cloſed, William embarked for England on the 18th of November, and the next day landed ſafe at Margate, from whence he immediately proceeded to London. On the third day after his arrival he opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he informed them that, though no great advantage had been gained, a ſtop had been put to the progreſs of the French arms; that having had ſo much experience of their affections, and their zeal for the public, he could not doubt of their being willing to aſſiſt him with ſupplies ſufficient for carrying on the war with vigour, the only means of obtaining a ſafe and honourable peace. He concluded with earneſtly recommending a bill for the encouragement of ſeamen. "You muſt be ſenſible," ſaid he, "how much a law of this nature would tend to the advancement of trade, and of the naval ſtrength of this kingdom; which is our great intereſt, and ought to be our principal care."

The parliament made no difficulty of complying with the king's requeſt. The ſupplies, which amounted to near 5,000,000, were readily granted. But at at the ſame time the commons brought in a bill for the more frequent calling of parliaments. This bill went hand in hand with thoſe for the ſupply, and, having paſſed both houſes, received the royal aſſent on the 22d of December. By this bill it was enacted that a new parliament ſhould be called every third year, and that the preſent parliament ſhould be diſſolved before the end of the ſucceeding year. The paſſing of this bill gave great joy to the people. They were perſuaded that the manner of procuring votes at elections by bribery and corruption would now be laid aſide; and that the commons would recover at once their ſtrength and reputation.

While theſe things were tranſacting in parliament, Dr. John Tillotſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury, paid the debt of nature, ſincerely lamented by all who eſteemed piety and virtue. He was a perſon of great judgment, clear underſtanding, and a tender and compaſſionate heart: a faithful and zealous friend, but a gentle and forgiving enemy. Without affectation, bigotry, or ſuperſtition, he was truly religious. His notions of morality were at once excellent and ſublime. His reaſoning was clear, eaſy, and ſolid. He enforced the precepts of the goſpel in pure and elegant language. His ſermons were ſo greatly admired, that they were eſteemed the beſt examples of ſacred declamation in any language: nor have they yet loſt their eſteem.

Both the king and queen were greatly affected at the death of this pious prelate. The queen for ſeveral days mentioned him in the tendereſt manner, and never without tears. He died ſo poor, that if the king had not given up his firſt-fruits, his debts could not have been paid. He was too charitable to acquire riches, and the only legacy he left to his family was his works. Dr. Tenniſon, biſhop of Lincoln, was judged moſt proper to ſupply his place; and he was accordingly tranſlated to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury.

The queen herſelf did not long ſurvive her favourite prelate. She was ſeized with the ſmall-pox on the 21ſt of December, and died the 28th, in the 33d year of her age, and in the 6th of her reign.

Queen Mary was doubtleſs an excellent woman, and enjoyed a large ſhare of the virtues that adorn the ſex. Her charity was very extenſive, and without oſtentation. She was a bright example of conjugal affection, the will of her huſband being the ſole rule of all her actions; and to this alone we muſt impute the little reluctance ſhe ſhewed at mounting the throne from whence her father had been depoſed. Her treatment of her ſiſter is not, perhaps, ſo eaſily juſtified; all, therefore, we ſhall add in extenuation of her conduct is, that Mary was not exempt from the conſtant attendants of human nature. Her perſon was tall and elegant; ſhe had a natural air of greatneſs that demanded reſpect, adorned with a graceful countenance and an affable diſpoſition. Her apprehenſion was clear and ready; her memory tenacious; her judgment ſolid; equally formed to bear adverſity or proſperity; ſhe ſeemed to have added the courage of the other ſex to the ſoftneſs of her own.

Senſible that his majeſty's intereſt was greatly weakened by the death of the queen, both houſes of parliament attended on his majeſty with their addreſs of condolance. That of the lords was as follows:

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſub-
"jects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament
"aſſembled, do, with inexpreſſible grief, humbly
"aſſure your majeſty of the deep ſenſe we have of "the loſs your majeſty and the whole kingdom doth
"ſuſtain by the death of that excellent princeſs, our "late ſovereign lady the queen; moſt humbly be-
"ſeeching your majeſty, that you would not indulge
"your grief on this ſad occaſion, to the prejudice
"of the health of your royal perſon, in whoſe pre-
"ſervation, not only the welfare of your own ſub-
"jects, but all Europe is ſo much concerned. We "farther beg leave on this ſad occaſion, humbly to "renew to your majeſty, the hearty and ſincere
"aſſurances, of our utmoſt aſſiſtance againſt all your "enemies, both at home and abroad, and of all
"other demonſtrations of duty and affection, that "can poſſibly be paid by the moſt faithful ſub-
"jects."

To this addreſs his majeſty returned a moſt gracious anſwer, which was couched in the following terms: "I heartily thank you for your kindneſs to "me; but much more for the ſenſe you ſhew of our "great loſs, which is above what I can expreſs."

The example of the two houſes was followed by the whole nation, and conſolatory addreſſes were preſented to his majeſty from every part of the kingdom. But nothing gave him greater ſatisfaction than the following letter, which he received from the princeſs of Denmark, on this melancholy occaſion:

"Sir,

"I beg your majeſty's favourable acceptance of "my ſincere and hearty ſorrow for your great afflic-
"tion in the loſs of the queen; and I do aſſure your

" majeſty, that I am as ſenſibly touched with the " ſad misfortune, as if I had never been ſo unhappy " as to have fallen under her diſpleaſure.

" It is my earneſt deſire your majeſty would give " me leave to wait upon you, as ſoon as it may be " done without danger of increaſing your affliction, " that I may have an opportunity myſelf, not only " of repeating this, but of aſſuring your majeſty of " my real intentions to omit no occaſion of giving " you conſtant proofs of my ſincere reſpect, and " concern for your perſon and intereſt, as becomes, " Sir,

" Your majeſty's affectionate ſiſter,
" and ſervant,
" ANNE."

This letter totally removing all the king's apprehenſions of the princeſs's forming a party againſt him, he liſtened to the advice of the earl of Sunderland, who brought about a reconciliation between them. The king made her a preſent of moſt of the late queen's jewels, and aſſigned her St. James's palace for her reſidence. But notwithſtanding all theſe appearances of friendſhip, his majeſty ſtill appears to have entertained ſome remains of jealouſy. A few formal viſits paſſed between him and his ſiſter-in-law, but he admitted her to no ſhare in public buſineſs; nor would he ſuffer his miniſters to attend her, or inform her of any of the tranſactions of the cabinet.

The queen, after lying in ſtate at Whitehall, was interred with great ſolemnity in Weſtminſter abbey. Not only her majeſty's houſhold, but all the judges, ſerjeants at law, the lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, and (which raiſed the mournful pomp to the higheſt pitch of ſpiendor) both houſes of parliament attended the royal corpſe to the abbey, where a funeral ſermon was preached by D. Tenniſon archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Before we proceed to the remainder of William's reign, we ſhall here take notice of the remarkable occurrences that happened from the joint acceſſion of their majeſties, to the death of the queen.

In the month of September, in the fourth year of their reign, the ſhock of an earthquake was felt in London, and in many other parts of England, as well as in France, Germany, and the Netherlands. Violent agitations of the ſame kind had happened about two months before in Sicily and Malta. In the former eſpecially, no leſs than an 100,000 perſons are ſaid to have periſhed on the occaſion. Soon after, the town of Port-Royal in Jamaica was almoſt totally deſtroyed by an earthquake, about fifteen hundred perſons being buried in the ruins.

In their fifth year, ſtamp-duties were firſt impoſed in England, viz. on paper, vellum, and parchment.

A ſhort time before the queen's death a beginning was made for carrying on the deſign of the now noble and magnificent hoſpital of Greenwich, for the reception of decayed ſailors ſerving in the royal navy. Their majeſties had for ſome time ſtrongly fixed their minds on this eſtabliſhment, and they accordingly made a grant of the royal palace at Greenwich (a part of which, on the weſt ſide, had been begun to be rebuilt for a royal palace for king Charles II.) as alſo of a large adjoining ſpace of ground. For this end king William, after the death of his royal conſort, appointed by patent a number of commiſſioners for directing the building and endowing of this intended hoſpital, and granted a large ſum out of his civil liſt for that purpoſe; and his royal ſucceſſors were conſiderable benefactors to it. At length annual ſums were granted by parliament for the finiſhing of this truly noble ſtructure, which was fully compleated in the reign of his late majeſty king George the Second.

W I L L I A M III.

A. D. 1695. WHILE the commons were aſſiduouſly employed in projecting ways and means for raiſing the ſupplies voted, their attention was called off by the diſcovery of an alarming ſcene of bribery and corruption; in which not only the agents of the army, and ſome members of parliament, but even the privy-counſellors themſelves, were deeply concerned.

This diſcovery aroſe from a petition preſented to the houſe by the inhabitants of Royſton, in Hertfordſhire, complaining that the officers and ſoldiers of the regiment commanded by colonel Haſtings, which was quartered upon them, demanded and exacted ſubſiſtence money, both in their quarters and on their march; and were, at the ſame time, guilty of many other abuſes. Upon this colonel Haſtings, his agent, Mr. Tracy Pauncefort, his brother Edward Pauncefort, major Montell, and the agents of ſome other regiments were ſent for and examined before the houſe, where after giving the moſt ſpecious account of their proceedings, Tracey Pauncefort was ſent to the tower, for having refuſed to anſwer certain queſtions propoſed to him; his brother was alſo ſent to the ſame place for having defrauded the regiment of colonel Haſtings, of 500 guineas. Theſe were ſoon followed by Henry Guy, eſq; a member of the houſe, and ſecretary to the treaſury, who was proved to have received a bribe of 200 guineas for procuring the payment of the arrears due to the regiment.

The houſe next proceeded to draw up an addreſs to his majeſty, which they preſented on the 4th of March. In this addreſs they obſerved, that the violences complained of from the ſoldiers were in a great meaſure occaſioned by the bad practices of the agents of the army, who detained the ſoldiers pay, and converted i to their own uſe; by their intolerable exaction and extortions, upon the officers and ſoldiers for paying money by way of advance, and by charging mo for the diſcount of tallies than they actually paid that colonel Haſtings, in particular, had compelle ſeveral officers of his regiment to take their cloath from him at a very exorbitant price, in order to increaſe his own private advantage, without the lea regard to his majeſty's ſervice or the diſcipline of th army; that the ſaid colonel had fraudulently detaine 500 guineas, out of a bounty given by his majeſty t the officers of his regiment, under pretence of h having paid that ſum as a bribe to obtain the paymen of the ſaid bounty; and, at the ſame time, had take two-pence in the pound out of the money due to the officers and ſoldiers, without having any authority for making ſuch deduction: that the agent for colonel Haſtings had either refuſed or neglected giving an account of the pay due to the captains of his regiment and their companies; which apparently tended to defraud the officers and ſoldiers: that many heavy and grievous deductions had been arbitrarily made by the agents, who had endeavoured to conceal their frauds, under the ambiguous term of contingencies: that colonel Haſtings had diſcharged an enſign, and appointed another in his room, contrary to the known diſcipline of the army: that the ſaid colonel Haſtings had taken money for recommending to commands in his regiment, to the diſcouragement of the officers who were to ſerve in his majeſty's army, as they ought to be ſuch as merited their commiſſions, and not ſuch as purchaſed them. Theſe abuſes the houſe humbly intreated his majeſty to remove.

The king received this addreſs very graciouſly, and aſſured the houſe that he would immediately grant their requeſt. Accordingly colonel Haſtings was caſhiered, and his regiment given to Sir John Jacob, his lieutenant-colonel. At the ſame time his majeſty appointed a council of officers to ſit weekly, and examine all complaints that might be made againſt any officer or ſoldier, and publiſhed a proclamation for the ſtrict diſcipline of the army, and the payment of the ſoldiers in their quarters.

The commons, however, ſtill continued to proſecute their enquiries, and ſeveral other ſpecies of corruption (ſome of which were of a very extraordinary nature) were diſcovered. But before they had finiſhed their enquiries, the king came to the houſe of peers, and ſending for the commons, put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am come to give you thanks for the ſupplies provided for carrying on the war in which we are engaged; and, at the ſame time, to conclude this ſeſſion, which cannot be continued longer without manifeſt prejudice to the end for which theſe ſupplies were given, the ſeaſon of the year making it ſo neceſſary for me to be abroad, that it were to be wiſhed our buſineſs at home would have allowed me to have been there ſooner.

"I will take care to place the adminiſtration of affairs, during my abſence, in ſuch perſons, on whoſe care and fidelity I can entirely depend; and I doubt not, my lords and gentlemen, that every one of you, in your ſeveral ſtations, will be aſſiſting to them. This is what I require of you, and that you will be more than ordinarily diligent in preſerving the public peace."

The king immediately embarked for Holland, after nominating a council of regency, in which neither the princeſs nor prince of Denmark had any ſhare. This occaſioned a freſh ſubject of complaint, and the king's conduct was reflected on with great ſeverity.

The campaign of this year was more favourable to the allies than any of the preceding. Their army being ſuperior to that of the French in the Netherlands, his majeſty reſolved to ſtrike ſome blow of importance. He accordingly, for ſome time, amuſed marſhal de Villeroy, who commanded the French army in the room of Luxemburg, that great general having paid the debt of nature during the preceding winter. But on the third of July, William inveſted the city of Namur. This celebrated fortreſs, the greateſt place of ſtrength in the Netherlands, was ſtrongly defended both by art and nature. The garriſon conſiſted of fifteen thouſand choſen men, commanded by the count de Guiſcard; and marſhal Bouſflers, who commanded a ſeparate army from that of Villeroy, though ſubjected to the other's orders, found means to throw himſelf into the town with ſeveral regiments, and thereby increaſed the garriſon to near twenty thouſand men.

It was natural to expect that a place of ſo much importance, defended by ſo numerous a garriſon, and ſo ſtrongly fortified, would diſpute every inch of ground with the beſiegers; and indeed it made a very bold and deſperate defence for near two months. At length, Marſhal Villeroy, perceiving the place muſt fall, notwithſtanding all the power of the beſieged, determined to cut off prince Vaudemont, who commanded the army that covered the ſiege, conſiſting of fifty battalions of foot, and as many ſquadrons of horſe, encamped at Aerſeele. The French were more than double the number of the prince's army; and were very near ſurprizing him in his trenches. But he effected a retreat to Ghent, hardly to be paralleled in antient or modern hiſtory. He firſt ſent off his baggage and artillery, which were followed by his infantry; after which he drew off his horſe. This was all performed with ſo much ſecrecy and addreſs, that the enemy had not the leaſt ſuſpicion of his deſign.

Villeroy was ſo enraged at this maſterly manœuvre, that he ſent Montal, to attack the rear of the prince's army, but met with ſo warm a reception, that they were glad to retire, after having ſuffered pretty conſiderably. William was ſo highly pleaſed with the conduct of the prince, that he wrote him a letter with his own hand, wherein he acknowledged he was greatly obliged to him: adding, "that he had given ſtronger marks of a general, conſummate in the art of war, than if he had gained a complete victory."

Diſappointed in this attempt, Villeroy next endeavoured to ſurprize Newport; but this alſo proved ineffectual. He, however, met with better ſucceſs in his third attempt, which was an attack on the forts of Dixmuyde and Dynſe, both which ſurrendered to him on the firſt ſummons; though their garriſons conſiſted of near 7000 men, among whom were two battalions of Engliſh; and what rendered this misfortune the greater, was, the French detained theſe troops, priſoners of war, notwithſtanding it was repugnant to the cartel eſtabliſhed between the contending powers.

Encouraged by this ſucceſs, Villeroy attempted the bombardment of Bruſſels; which was carried on with ſuch fury, that in leſs than 48 hours above 2000 houſes in the heart of the town were reduced to aſhes. The ſtadthouſe, the great church and ſeveral other public ſtructures, were demoliſhed. The electreſs of Bavaria, who was then in the city, though removed from danger, was ſo terrified at this dreadful and inceſſant noiſe, that ſhe miſcarried, and nearly loſt her life. This deſtruction of a capital city, which, by the cartel, was exempted from bombardments, was juſtified by the French, on account of the bombardments made by the Engliſh on the French coaſt.

After the perpetration of this unmanly revenge, Villeroy (having reinforced his army with all the troops that could be ſpared out of the garriſons and the forces from the ſea coaſts) marched towards Namur, at the head of an army of 80,000 men, and which came ſoon enough to be witneſſes of the ſurrender of that important city. William having poſſeſſed himſelf of the camp, which the French had occupied during the ſiege; the marſhal was ſufficiently convinced that there were no hopes of ſucceſs if he attacked him, and therefore marched towards the Mehaigne.

The garriſon of Namur now loſt all hopes of being relieved. They had, indeed, made a very noble reſiſtance, and perhaps military valour and ſkill were never more illuſtriouſly diſplayed, than in the attack and defence of that place. At length, the garriſon being reduced from 20 to 6000, Bouſflers thought proper to ſurrender, and the capitulation was accordingly ſigned on the 2d of September.

The French garriſon marched out of the caſtle on the 5th of November, when William cauſed marſhal Boufflers to be arreſted and detained priſoner, by way of repriſal for the detenſion of the garriſons of Dixmuyde and Dynſe, contrary to the cartel eſtabliſhed between the two nations. But the French court, thinking it proper to give its parole of honour, that thoſe garriſons ſhould be reſtored, the marſhal was ſet at liberty. The king now gave the command of the army to the elector of Bavaria, and retired to Loo, the uſual place of his receſs; ſoon after which both armies retired into winter-quarters.

The conqueſt of Namur coſt the allies near 12,000 men; among whom were the count de Rivera, the baron de Heckeren, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction. The prince of Holſtein-Norburgh, the prince of Heſſe-Homburgh, and ſeveral inferior officers were wounded.

No remarkable circumſtance happened on the Rhine during this whole campaign. The army of the empire under prince Baden, and that of the French commanded by the marſhal de Lorges were ſo nearly equal, that neither of the generals would hazard a battle. In Italy, the only military tranſaction which happened worthy our notice was the ſurrender of Caſal, which, to the ſurprize of all Europe, was yielded up to the duke of Savoy in fourteen days. But it was afterwards diſcovered that Lewis and the duke had carried on a private negotiation with each other, which gave riſe to a conjecture that the former had made a voluntary ſacrifice of this fortreſs to the duke, in order to engage his forbearance during the remainder of the campaign. In Catalonia, the French made a very indifferent figure; for admiral Ruſſel, who wintered at Cadiz, prevented them from forming the ſiege of Barcelona; upon which they retired to Palamos. This place Ruſſel bombarded ſo furiouſly, that the greateſt part of the town and caſtle were deſtroyed. He then returned to Cadiz, where he made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for ſecuring the Engliſh trade in the Mediterranean; after which, leaving Sir David Mitchel, rear-admiral of the red, with a ſquadron of 23 ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and bomb veſſels, he returned with the reſt of his fleet to England.

On the 23d of June a fleet, commanded by lord Berkley of Stratton, ſailed from Spithead, and on the 4th of July arrived before St. Malo's. The next morning early the bombardment began, which was ſo vigorouſly purſued, that in two hours, a great fire broke out in the eaſt part of the town, and about four in the afternoon, a ſecond dreadful fire broke out in the weſt part. By ſeven in the evening, the bomb veſſels had ſpent 9000 bombs and carcaſſes, which being all they had, the ſignal was given to put to ſea. The loſs ſuſtained by our fleet on this occaſion, was ſixty men killed and wounded, by the enemy's fire from their batteries, and one bomb veſſel ſunk. The bombardment laſted near twelve hours, and laid the chief part of the town in ruins.

The ſatisfaction which the nation muſt have felt from the ſucceſs of our arms on the continent was much abated by the loſs our trade ſuffered by the enemy's privateers, who, notwithſtanding our uncontrolled dominion at ſea, found means to ſlip out of their ports, and take a number of our merchant ſhips. By the ill conduct of the marquis of Caermarthen, who was ſtationed with a ſquadron off the iſles of Scilly, the Barbadoes fleet, on its return home, was left a defenceleſs prey to the French privateers, who, beſides a great number of merchant ſhips, took five belonging to the Eaſt-India company, valued at a million ſterling. At the ſame time, a French man of war fell upon our factory on the coaſt of Guinea, took a ſmall fort we had there, and deſtroyed it.

During theſe tranſactions a parliament was held in Scotland, which was remarkable for a ſtrict enquiry made into the affair of Glencoe. The reſult of this enquiry was, that they entirely acquitted his majeſty from any ſhare of guilt in that barbarous maſſacre, by unanimouſly reſolving, "that the king's inſtructions to Sir Thomas Levingſtone contained no warrant for the execution of the Macdonalds: that the ſaid execution was a downright murder: that the maſter of Stair's letters exceeded the king's inſtructions: that Sir Thomas Levingſtone had reaſon to give the orders he had given: that lieutenant colonel Hamilton ſhould be immediately arreſted, and brought to his trial for the murder of the Macdonalds: that Campbell of Glenlion, captain Drummond, lieutenant Lindſey, enſign Lundy, and ſerjeant Barber, who had been concerned in the ſaid maſſacre, ſhould be likewiſe proſecuted: and that an impeachment ſhould be lodged againſt the earl of Braidalbin, who had ſo groſly impoſed upon his majeſty, and abuſed his authority." By theſe reſolutions, the king appears to be ſolemnly acquitted, notwithſtanding which, his ill judged lenity, in inflicting no puniſhment on ſuch inhuman delinquents, ſubjected him to much cenſure, which his enemies took care to improve to ſuch a height, as at length to deprive him of the affection of the Scots.

William having ſettled his affairs on the continent, embarked for England, whither he arrived on the 10th of October, and was received in triumph by his ſubjects. The next day he iſſued a proclamation for diſſolving the parliament, and aſſembling another on the twenty-ſecond of November; which, having accordingly met, the commons choſe Paul Foley, eſq; for their ſpeaker. The following day the king came to the houſe and opened the ſeſſion by a ſpeech; wherein he told both houſes, "that he engaged in the preſent war by the advice of his firſt parliament, and the laſt had, with the utmoſt chearfulneſs, aſſiſted him in carrying it on, and he did not doubt but that the preſent one would as willingly ſupport him in it by their ſupplies: that he could not but take notice, on this occaſion, of the ſignal bravery of the Engliſh forces during the laſt campaign, which had reflected equal honour on themſelves, and on the nation to which they belonged: he lamented as a great misfortune his having been obliged from the beginning of his reign to aſk ſuch large aids from his ſubjects, though abſolutely neceſſary for the effectual proſecution of the war; he took notice that the funds had been deficient, and the condition of the civil liſt ſuch, that he could not poſſibly ſubſiſt without their care: he ſaid that compaſſion obliged him to mention the miſerable condition of the French proteſtants, who ſuffered for their religion; he recommended to them the framing bills for the encouragement and increaſe of ſeamen, and the advancement of trade, particularly that of the Weſt-Indies, and that the army might be properly recruited without giving the ſubject cauſe of complaint: he then obſerved the ill ſtate of the coin, and concluded with exhorting them to uſe diſpatch, and to avoid heats and diviſions."

The firſt bill paſſed by this parliament was that reſpecting trials for high-treaſon; a ſubject which, though of the laſt importance, had hitherto been open to many abuſes. By this bill it was enacted, that the perſon impeached ſhould have a copy of the impeachment five days before the trial came on, and be allowed counſel for his defence: that no perſon ſhould be impeached, but on the teſtimony of two credible witneſſes: that if the impeachment conſiſted of ſeveral articles, the two witneſſes could only be conſidered as one, when their depoſitions were not upon the ſame article: that the perſon accuſed ſhould have a liſt of the witneſſes two days before the trial; and that three years after the crime was committed, no accuſation ſhould take place, unleſs the crime was an attempt againſt the life of the king. The lords added a clauſe, whereby a peer was to be judged by the whole houſe of lords. Had this law taken place ſooner, it would have ſaved the lives of many illuſtrious men, and liberty would have had a part againſt deſpotiſm and miniſterial vengeance.

This celebrated bill being diſpatched, the commons proceeded to take into their conſideration the ſupplies for the ſucceeding year. The neceſſary eſtimates were laid before them, and they voted 5,024,853l. for that ſervice. The funds neceſſary for raiſing this prodigious ſum were the following: 1. By a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound. 2. By duties continued on wine, vinegar, tobacco, Eaſt-India goods, and other merchandizes. 3. An additional duty upon all French commodities. 4. Duties on low wines or ſpirits of French extraction. 5. Duties continued upon ſalt, glaſs-wares, tobacco-pipes, &c. They alſo ſettled a fund for raiſing 500,000l a year for the civil liſt; and another for raiſing 15,000l a year for the relief of French proteſtants.*

A. D. 1696. This year was opened by the diſcovery of a horrid plot for aſſaſſinating the king, which had been concerted between James and Lewis the French king, in order to reſtore the former to the throne of England. The earl of Ayleſbury, the lord Montgomery, Sir John Fenwick, Sir John Friend, captain Porter, and captain Charnock, appeared to be the principal perſons concerned in this infamous deſign, which, from the bloody circumſtances attending it, was called the Aſſaſſination Plot. Theſe, with the reſt of the conſpirators, held various meetings in order to concert the moſt proper meaſures for executing their horrid deſign. In the month of February, Sir George Berkeley, a native of Scotland, and a furious bigot to the church of Rome, came over with a private commiſſion from king James, by virtue whereof the party in England were implicitly to obey his orders. This perſon undertook the deteſtable taſk of murdering the king, with the aſſiſtance of forty horſemen furniſhed by the conſpirators.

Various methods were at firſt propoſed for effecting this purpoſe; but it was at laſt determined to attack the king on his return from Richmond, where he uſually hunted every Saturday, and the place pitched upon was the lane leading from Brentford to Turnham-green. Perhaps a more likely place than this could not have been found; for his majeſty generally returning late from the chace, uſually croſſed the ferry attended by only a few of his guards, without coming out of his coach; and when he landed, the coach drove on without ſtopping for the reſt of the guards, who were obliged to wait on the Surry ſide till the boat returned to carry them over: ſo that the king muſt inevitably have fallen into the hands of the conſpirators, before the reſt of his guards could have come to his aſſiſtance.

The diſpoſition of their men was contrived with no leſs art than the time and place; for having ſecured ſeveral places in Brentford, Turnham-green, and other houſes in the neighbourhood, to put up their horſes till the king returned from hunting, one of the conſpirators was ordered to wait at the ferry till the guards appeared on the Surry ſide of the water; and then to give ſpeedy notice to the reſt, that they might be ready at their reſpective poſts, while the king was croſſing the river. In order to this, they were divided into three parties, who were to make their approaches by three different ways; one from Turnham-green, another from the lane leading to the Thames, and a third from the road leading through Brentford. One of theſe parties was to attack the king's guards in the front, and another in the rear; while ten or twelve of the moſt bloody and reſolute were to aſſaſſinate his majeſty, by firing their blunderbuſſes at him through the coach windows. It was alſo agreed, that when the bloody purpoſe was accompliſhed, the conſpirators ſhould form one body, and continue their route to Hammerſmith, where they were to divide into ſmall parties of three or four, and make the beſt of their way for Dover.

Saturday the 15th of February was fixed for the murder of the king; but his majeſty being indiſpoſed, did not go abroad that day. This circumſtance ſtruck the aſſaſſins with diſmay: they immediately concluded the conſpiracy was diſcovered; but finding all remaining quiet, they again met, and agreed to be in readineſs the Saturday following. Juſt as they were ſetting out, they received advice from two of their accomplices, that the guards were all come back in great haſte, and that there was a whiſper among the people, that a horrid plot was diſcovered. This news put the conſpirators into the utmoſt conſternation, and they immediately diſperſed.

The method by which this conſpiracy came to be diſcovered was as follows; captain Porter, the day before the ſcheme was to have been put in execution, related the whole affair to an intimate friend of his, named Pendergraſs, whom he ſolicited to be one of their number. Pendergraſs ſeemingly complied: but, ſtruck with horror at the atrociouſneſs of the crime, he inſtantly acquainted the earl of Portland with the ſcheme, and deſired he might be introduced to his majeſty, which being complied with, he fully made known to him all the particulars he knew of the conſpiracy; and after many intreaties from the king, added to a ſolemn promiſe that he ſhould not be produced as an evidence without his own conſent, he gave his majeſty a liſt of the aſſaſſins.

A proclamation was now iſſued for apprehending the conſpirators, and moſt of them ſecured, but Berkeley found means to eſcape. Admiral Ruſſel was ordered to Chatham, to haſten the fleet out to ſea. The rendezvous was appointed in the Downs, to which place all the men of war then in the ſea ports, were ordered to ſail. This was accompliſhed with ſuch expedition, that in a few days a fleet of fifty ſail had aſſembled, with which the admiral ſtood over to the French coaſt. The enemy, aſtoniſhed at his ſudden appearance retired with the utmoſt precipitation into their harbours; and James, perceiving that his deſign was defeated, returned, overwhelmed with deſpair, to St. Germains, where he paſſed the remainder of his life.

On the 24th of February the king went to the houſe of peers, and in a ſpeech to both houſes informed formed them of the conſpiracy. The parliament, in a very affectionate and loyal addreſs, congratulated him on the eſcape of his royal perſon from the deſigns of his enemies; declared their abhorrence of ſuch villainous attempts; and ſolemnly promiſed to ſtand by and aſſiſt his majeſty againſt all his enemies, open and private; and if he ſhould come by a violent death, to revenge it on all the papiſts. They alſo drew up an aſſociation for the preſervation of his majeſty's perſon, which was ſigned by all the members of the houſe; and likewiſe by the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of the city of London. The form of this aſſociation, which was carried to every part of the kingdom, and ſigned by all ranks of people, was as follows:

* The neceſſity of amending our money at this time occaſioned ſeveral debates, which ended in a reſolution to proceed to a new coinage by calling the diminiſhed ſilver coin into the mint by tale. The next point to be determined was, whether the new money in its different denominations ſhould retain the original weight and purity of the old, or the eſtabliſhed ſtandard be raiſed in value. After ſeveral arguments for and againſt, the commons reſolved that the eſtabliſhed ſtandard ſhould be preſerved with regard to weight and fineneſs, and that the loſs ariſing from calling in the old money, which was calculated at two millons ſterling, ſhould be ſuſtained by the public, and a fund ſettled for ſupplying the deficiency.

"Whereas there has been a horrid and deteſtable "conſpiracy, formed and carried on by the papiſts, "and other wicked and traiterous perſons, for aſ"ſaſſinating his majeſty's royal perſon, in order to "encourage an invaſion from France, to ſubvert "our religion, laws and liberty: We, whoſe names "are hereunto ſubſcribed, do heartily, ſincerely, "and ſolemnly profeſs, teſtify and declare, that his "preſent majeſty, king William, is rightful and law"ful king of theſe realms. And we do mutually "promiſe and engage to ſtand by and aſſiſt each "other, to the utmoſt of our power, in the ſupport "and defence of his majeſty's moſt ſacred perſon and "government, againſt the late king James, and all "his adherents. And in caſe his majeſty come to "any violent, or untimely death (which God forbid) "we do hereby further freely and unanimouſly oblige "ourſelves, to unite, aſſociate, and ſtand by each "other, in revenging the ſame upon his enemies, and "their adherents; and in ſupporting and defending "the ſucceſſion of the crown, according to an act "made in the firſt year of king William and queen "Mary, entitled, An act declaring the rights and li"berties of the ſubject, and ſettling the ſucceſſion of "the crown."

On the 11th of March, Robert Charnock, Edward King, and Thomas Keys, three of the conſpirators, were brought from Newgate to their trials at the Old Bailey. The court indulged them with all the liberty they could wiſh to make their defence; notwithſtanding which they were, on the fulleſt evidence, found guilty of high treaſon; and ſentence being paſſed upon them, they were, on the 18th of March, hanged and quartered at Tyburn. Their execution was followed by that of ſeveral others of their accomplices: a proclamation was iſſued for apprehending lord Montgomery, and Sir John Fenwick, who were ſuſpected of being principally concerned in the plot; and the earl of Ayleſbury was committed to the Tower on the ſame ſuſpicion.

On the 27th of April the king went to the houſe of peers, and cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he thanked the parliament for the generous concern they had teſtified for his perſon, and the zealous attachment they had ſhewn to his government, and likewiſe for the large ſupplies they had granted him, deſired they would preſerve the public peace, and aſſiſt the lords juſtices while he was abroad. His majeſty then gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral acts, after which the parliament was prorogued to the 16th of June.

The king embarked for Holland on the 5th of May, and two days after arrived at the Hague. Before his departure he appointed the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord-keeper Somers, and five others of the principal officers of ſtate, lords-juſtices for governing the nation during his abſence.

The campaign was opened on the continent by the allies burning a prodigious magazine which had been laid up at Givet, for the uſe of the enemy. But though the beginning was proſperous, and the war continued with the ſame animoſity, the powers engaged in it were no longer capable of making the ſame efforts. Notwithſtanding the ardour of William, the campaign in Flanders had no ſtriking events. Lewis XIV. leſs fortunate than before, was now deſirous of peace. He accordingly diſpatched M. de Callieras, as his ambaſſador to the ſtates-general, for ſettling ſuch preliminaries as might ſerve as a baſis for a treaty. The Dutch, with the conſent of king William, liſtened to the propoſal; and it was agreed to accept the mediation of the king of Sweden, which had already been offered by the baron Lillenroot, his ambaſſador at the Hague. Lewis, however, did not wholly depend upon negotiation; he made very advantageous offers to the duke of Savoy, and drew him off from the grand alliance.

This perfidious conduct of the duke greatly enraged the allies: his miniſters, indeed, attempted to excuſe it, by alledging, that it was abſolutely neceſſary for him to embrace the offers of France, in order to prevent his own ruin; and that common prudence would not ſuffer him to let ſlip an opportunity of procuring ſuch ſingular advantages to his own family.

The diſtreſſes of the army abroad was very great, at this time, for want of their pay, occaſioned by the calling in and recoining the money. The ſame calamity was alſo felt at home among the manufacturers, who where moſt of them idle, owing to the want of money, few maſters being able to employ any workmen. An order of council was therefore iſſued in July, directing the juſtices of the peace to meet frequently in their reſpective diviſions, in order to conſult the moſt effectual means to relieve and ſubſiſt the poor, till a ſufficient quantity of money could be iſſued to relieve the preſent ſcarcity. The attorney-general was alſo ordered to proſecute all thoſe who had entered into confederacies not to employ any workmen in the woollen and other manufactures during the preſent ſcarcity of coin.

The campaign in Catalonia, and on the Rhine, was as barren of events as that in Flanders: the advantage, if any, was on the ſide of the allies; but all the armies retired into winter quarters in the beginning of October.

The military operations abroad being conclude for the preſent year, William immediately embarke for England, and opened the ſeſſion of parliament o the 20th of October. He told them, "that h thought it a great happineſs that no diſadvantage ha happened abroad, nor any diſorder at home durin the laſt ſummer, conſidering the great diſappointments in the funds, and the trouble that had ariſen i receiving the money: that the buſineſs they had before them would be attended with great difficulty, a they were not only to provide for the ſervice o the enſuing year, but alſo to make good the deficiencies of the laſt." He obſerved, "that overtures o peace had indeed been made him; but he was certai they would prove abortive; that the only way t procure an honourable peace was to treat ſword i hand; and therefore the ſupplies for the ſucceedin year muſt, at leaſt, be equal to thoſe for the laſt. H alſo preſſed them to maintain the honour of parliament, by making good the funds they had grante He reminded them of the civil liſt and the Frenc proteſtants, and of making ſome farther proviſion fo remedying the difficulties relating to the coin, an for recovering the national credit."

The commons, in anſwer to this ſpeech, aſſured h majeſty, "That though this was the eighth year th had aſſiſted him with large ſupplies, for carrying o this juſt and neceſſary war, they ſhould be neith amuſed nor diverted from their firm reſolution of o tainin taining, by war, a ſafe and honourable peace;" and concluded with declaring, "That they would continue to ſupport his majeſty againſt all his enemies, both at home and abroad."

They accordingly voted 5,000,000 for the ſea and land ſervice for the ſucceeding year; beſides a ſupply for the civil liſt, and new funds for making good the deficiencies, and ſecuring the public debts, which now amounted to near 12,000,000. Notwithſtanding it was ſo very large, they purſued ſuch vigorous meaſures, that they ſurmounted every difficulty, and placed the credit of the nation on a ſure and ſolid baſis.

This buſineſs being done, the commons took into conſideration the caſe of Sir John Fenwick, one of the principal perſons concerned in the late conſpiracy for aſſaſſinating the king. He had been concealed in London from the time of the firſt diſcovery of the plot till the beginning of June this year, when he endeavoured to make his eſcape over to France, but was taken at Romney, on the coaſt of Kent, before he could get on ſhipboard; and, being brought to London, was committed to Newgate. Though his guilt was thoroughly proved, yet he could not be convicted, there being only one poſitive evidence that appeared againſt him. In conſequence of this, after the moſt violent debates, a bill of attainder was paſſed by both houſes, to which the royal aſſent being given, he received ſentence of death. He was complimented with the axe, in conſideration of his rank and of his alliance with the family of Howard, and ſuffered on Tower-hill, on the 28th of March following. He owned his loyalty to king James, and prayed for his reſtoration; but declared himſelf perfectly innocent of the intended aſſaſſination of king William, which he juſtly termed a moſt villainous project.

When the attention of the commons was diſengaged from the affair of Sir John Fenwick, they proceeded to enact ſeveral laws for regulating the domeſtic œconomy of the nation; and, among others, paſſed an act for the more effectual relief of creditors in caſes of eſcape, and for preventing abuſes in priſons and pretended privileged places. Ever ſince the reformation, certain places in and about the city of London, which had been ſanctuaries during the prevalence of the papiſts, afforded aſylum to debtors, and were become receptacles of deſperate perſons, who ſet all law at defiance. One of theſe places, called White Friars, was filled with a ſet of ruffians, who every day committed acts of violence and outrage; but the law was ſo vigorouſly put in execution, that they were obliged to abandon the diſtrict, which was ſoon filled with more creditable inhabitants. The Mint, in Southwark, another of thoſe infamous places, was likewiſe cleared of its diſſolute tenants in the ſame manner.

In this ſeſſion an act paſſed for the increaſe and encouragement of ſeamen, eſtabliſhing a regiſter for thirty thouſand ſailors, to be in readineſs at all times, as the preamble ſets forth, for ſupplying the royal navy, in conſideration of a yearly premium or bounty of forty ſhillings each.' It enacts, that none but ſuch regiſtered ſeamen ſhall be capable of preferment to any commiſſion or warrant-offices in the royal navy: they ſhall have a double ſhare or dividend for all prizes, more than non-regiſtered ſeamen of equal rank; with other privileges as in that act ſet forth: and particularly, they were to have the ſole right, when maimed or ſuperannuated, of being admitted into the newly eſtabliſhed hoſpital for ſeamen at Greenwich; or if killed in the ſervice, their widows and children were to have the ſame admiſſion. The law for regiſtering ſeamen was unhappily repealed by an act of the ninth year of queen Anne; and although ſundry ſchemes have ſince been ſet on foot for the reviving ſuch a regiſter, yet ſo many objections have been ſtarted, that no law has as yet been framed for ſecuring a body of ſeamen in readineſs, in caſe of any ſudden emergency, without having recourſe to the cruel and unconſtitutional practice of preſſing.

On the 12th of December his majeſty was pleaſed to nominate the earl of Pembroke lord privy-ſeal, viſcount Villiers, and Sir Joſeph Williamſon, to be his plenipotentiaries, to treat with thoſe of the French king, with regard to a general peace, the preliminaries of which had been ſettled between M. de Callieras and the States-general.

A. D. 1697. On the 16th of April the king went to the houſe of peers, and, after ſigning the bills that were ready, cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he thanked them for the large ſupplies they had granted him; congratulated them on the ſucceſs of their endeavours for reſtoring public credit; acquainted them with his intention of paſſing over to the continent; and begged they would carry with them into their reſpective counties the ſame loyal principles they had ſo conſpicuouſly diſplayed in parliament.

William, having appointed a regency during his abſence, embarked for Holland on the 26th of April, that he might be preſent to direct the negotiations for a general peace. The conferences were opened at Ryſwick on the 29th of May, and the negotiation proceeded with very little trouble. The demands of Spain (that France ſhould reſtore all the conqueſts that had been made during the war) ſeemed the only difficulty. Lewis was therefore determined to exert all his force againſt that kingdom, in order to induce the Spaniſh plenipotentiaries to accept the offers of France. The city of Barcelona was accordingly beſieged and taken by the duke de Vendome. De Pontis, a French commodore, was ſent with a ſmall fleet to the Weſt Indies, where he took and plundered the town of Carthagena, and returned with an immenſe booty.

Theſe ſucceſſes tended greatly to haſten the concluſion of the treaty, which, after ſome controverſies, was ſigned between England, France, Spain and Holland, on the 20th of September; and by the emperor on the 30th of October.

By this treaty Lewis gave up almoſt all his conqueſts. To Spain he reſtored Luxemburg, Mons, Aeth, Courtray, beſides what he had taken in the neighbourhood of the Pyrenees. To the Empire, Friburg, Briſac, Philipſburg, &c. And, laſtly, he acknowledged the prince of Orange king of England.

Thus was William confirmed in his poſſeſſion of the throne, while France abandoned all the fruits of her victories. Lewis ſubmitted to theſe conditions more from policy than generoſity. The burden of the war was become intolerable. The victors and the vanquiſhed were equally weakened. It was abſolutely neceſſary that the finances ſhould be repaired, and the murmurings of the people ſatisfied. Lewis, after he had deluged Europe with blood to ſatisfy his ambition, was obliged to purchaſe peace at the expence of his conqueſts.

A ſhort time after the ſigning of this treaty, William embarked for England, and was received by his ſubjects with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy. On the 3d of December, he opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne; wherein he obſerved, "That the war he had entered into by the advice of his people, was, by their aſſiſtance, brought to the end he had ever propoſed, a ſafe and honourable peace: that he was ſorry, however, to acquaint them, that his ſubjects could not immediately find that relief from the peace they might expect, the funds having fallen ſhort, and there remaining ſo great a debt to the navy and army, beſides what was wanting to ſupport the civil liſt. He obſerved, that the navy was increaſed almoſt double ſince his acceſſion, and could not be ſupported without a proportional increaſe of money; and he believed they would agree with him in allowing, that the chief ſtrength of England muſt ever conſiſt in a powerful navy: that, conſidering the ſtate of affairs abroad, he was of opinion, that the kingdom could not be ſafe without a land force. He promiſed to rectify whatever abuſes might have crept into any part of the adminiſtration during the war, and effectually to diſcourage prophaneneſs and immorality. He expreſſed his ſatisfaction with the proofs his people had given him of their loyalty and attachment to his perſon; and concluded with declaring, "That as he had, at the hazard of his life, reſcued their religion, laws, and liberties, when they were in the extremeſt danger; ſo he ſhould place the chief glory of his reign in preſerving and leaving them entire to poſterity."

The parliament, in their addreſs, complimented the king on the peace; and aſſured him, "That they would be always ready to ſupport his majeſty, who had confirmed them in the quiet poſſeſſion of their rights and liberties; and, by putting an end to the war, fully compleated their deliverance."

Notwithſtanding, however, theſe congratulations and compliments, the parliament oppoſed his majeſty's deſigns. This politic and warlike prince was deſirous of eſtabliſhing a ſtanding army, which could not fail of rendering him reſpectable both at home and abroad. The conduct of Lewis, who ſtill retained a conſiderable part of his army, ſeemed to lay the other powers under a neceſſity of doing the ſame. This was a very plauſible reaſon, and adopted by ſeveral of the members; but the majority was alarmed at the king's propoſal. It had an apparent tendency to eſtabliſh deſpotiſm on the ruins of the conſtitution. They were perſuaded the nation would ſoon loſe its privileges, and the people their liberties, if mercenary troops were at the command of the government. "This cuſtom," ſaid they, "being once eſtabliſhed, will become a maxim of ſtate; and elections, parliaments, every thing will depend upon the caprice of the court. Is not the kingdom ſufficiently defended by the ocean that ſurrounds it? May not the militia be eſtabliſhed and regularly exerciſed? And will not ſuch men be more zealous in the defence of their country than mercenaries? Will not theſe with a formidable fleet be a ſufficient ſecurity againſt any invaſion?" Theſe arguments ſeemed unanſwerable, and prevailed with the majority. Ten thouſand only of the land forces were retained; and three thouſand added to the navy.

William was ſo highly offended with this reſolution of the commons, from a perſuaſion that they ſuſpected he had formed deſigns againſt their liberties, that he declared he would have had nothing to do with the government, if he could have ſuſpected the parliament would have been guilty of ſo much diſtruſt and ingratitude.

A. D. 1698. On the 14th of January, the king went to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent to the two folllowing bills, viz. An Act for calling in the hammered ſilver money to be recoined; and another to prevent correſponding with king James and his adherents.

Theſe bills being paſſed, the commons applied themſelves aſſiduouſly to the diſcovery of means for the diſcharge of the public debt. The neceſſary ſupplies amounted to near five millions ſterling; and it required all their wiſdom to raiſe ſo large a ſum, after the nation had been impoveriſhed by the late war. The Eaſt India company offered to advance ſeven hundred thouſand pounds for the ſervice of the public, at the rate of four per cent. intereſt, provided the legiſlature would ſettle on them the excluſive trade to India. This offer was favourably received by the miniſtry, and would, in all probability, have been accepted, had not another company of merchants made more advantageous propoſals. They offered to lend the government 2,000,000 on the ſame terms. They alſo propoſed that their ſubſcribers ſhould not be obliged to trade in a joint ſtock; but if any number of their members deſired to be incorporated, a charter ſhould be granted them for that purpoſe. The laſt propoſal was thought the moſt eligible, and a bill was accordingly brought into parliament, and eaſily paſſed the commons; but on its being ſent up to the lords, the old company petitioned the houſe, and they were heard by their council againſt the bill. They alledged, "that the company had actually acquired, at their expence, revenues at Fort St. George, Fort St. David, and Bombay, as well as in Perſia, and other parts, amounting to 44,000 pounds per annum, ariſing from cuſtoms and licences for a great number of particulars: that they had alſo erected forts and ſettlements, and procured ſettlements in the iſland of Sumatra, and on the coaſt of Malabar, without which the pepper-trade muſt have been actually loſt to England: that they had alſo a ſtrong fort in the kingdom of Bengal, and alſo many factories, buildings and ſettlements in various other parts, having purchaſed at high rates, of the Indian princes, many valuable privileges and immunities: that they were encouraged to do this from a preſumption that their rights and inheritance would always be objects of the nation's care: that ſince this bill had been brought into parliament, the company had agreed to ſubmit their preſent ſtock to a valuation of 50 per cent. viz. 20 per cent. for their dead ſtock, namely their forts, factories and lands, and 30 per cent. for their quick ſtock, which they were content even to warrant at that rate: and upon theſe terms the company likewiſe offered to raiſe a ſubſcription of 2,000,000."

In anſwer to this, it was obſerved by the council for the new ſubſcribers, "That the old company, in reciting their charters, had forgot to mention the proviſos they contained, the kings of England, who granted them, having reſerved to themſelves a diſcretionary power to make them void on three years warning: that the king could not grant the trade, excluſive of all others, by his charter alone, it being directly contrary to poſitive laws; nor had his preſent majeſty in fact granted any ſuch excluſive right: that ſeveral recoveries had been made at law againſt the company for proſecuting ſuch pretended right: that his majeſty's meſſage to the commons in the year 1692, plainly ſignified that the concurrence of parliament was neceſſary for making a complete and uſeful ſettlement of this trade: that the company's managers, in order to obtain their laſt new charter and regulations, had made no ſcruple of having recourſe to the indirect methods of bribery and corruption: that it was never eſteemed a breach of public faith, nor a derogation from the authority of the great ſeal, or from the honour of our kings, to have their patent annulled by parliament, when it appeared that ſuch grants were either unprofitable, or contrary to the common rights of the ſubject; neither did any o our kings think themſelves bound in honour or conſcience to refuſe paſſing an act of parliament for the annulling of ſuch grants: that moreover kings having been often deceived by ſuch grants, they have even frequently been annulled by the common cour of law."

On the other hand it was replied, and urged, i behalf of the old company, "That the properties o many families, widows, and orphans, would b greatly affected by the bill now depending, which they ſaid made no proviſion for a determined ſtock; ſo that it may hereafter happen that the trade may be loſt to the nation for want of a ſufficient capital to carry it on; it appearing, by thirty years experience, that it requires at leaſt 600,000 pounds a year to carry it on in its full extent: that by this bill the new ſubſcribers were permitted to trade during the three years, as well as the company, which is directly contrary to the charter, will create great confuſion, and render the ſaid three years allowed the old company of no benefit, becauſe they are ſtill bound to export to the value of 100,000 pounds annually in our own manufactures, though the new ſubſcribers are under no ſuch obligations: that the old company are beſides obliged to pay taxes to keep up forts, factories, &c. while the new ſubſcribers are to have an equal benefit of the trade without either: that ſince the laſt ſubſcription the company has loſt, either by accidents, or the calamities of war, twelve large ſhips, which, with their cargoes, would have ſold for near a million and a half ſterling; and yet, notwithſtanding ſuch loſſes, they have paid in cuſtoms ſince that period 295,000 pounds, beſides 85,000 in taxes: that they had, moreover, ſupplied his majeſty in Holland, on a very preſſing occaſion, with 6000 barrels of gunpowder; and had alſo, at a time of great extremity, ſubſcribed 80,000 pounds for circulating exchequer bills, at the inſtance of the treaſury; and that many hundred families have their whole fortunes depending in the ſtock of the preſent company, who muſt be utterly ruined if this bill takes effect."

Notwithſtanding the forcibility of theſe arguments, the bill paſſed the lords in favour of the new company, without paying any regard to antient charters, or the fortunes of a multitude of families. They received their charter on the 3d of September; and on the 5th his majeſty incorporated them as one joint-ſtock excluſive company, trading to the Eaſt-Indies.

The diſquiſitions of the parliament were not wholly confined to the commercial ſtate of the nation; they exerted themſelves nobly to prevent that corruption of manners which was every day gaining ground in the kingdom. Perſuaded that unleſs care be taken to keep the people's morals from being tainted, wealth and power will only become the ſources of poiſon; that the vices of the citizens are infectious to the body politic; that a ſtate without virtue has almoſt as many enemies as ſubjects; and that its grandeur is a preſage of its ruin: they preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, in which they enumerated the exceſſive irregularities that prevailed, and were daily increaſing; and requeſted him to iſſue orders to the magiſtrates to put the laws in force againſt impiety and debauchery. Their addreſs was very favourably received. The king promiſed to attempt, without delay, a reformation of manners, and teſtified his zeal for the ſuppreſſion of impious books, which uſually corrupt at once both the heart and the underſtanding. Schemes of this nature, however laudable, however neceſſary in themſelves, are ſeldom executed. A ſociety for the reformation of manners, under the protection of his majeſty, was eſtabliſhed; the members of which engaged to inform the magiſtrates of ſuch debaucheries and vices as came within their knowledge. The fines impoſed were deſtined for charitable uſes. A number of eccleſiaſtics were to promote virtue by public lectures; and a liberal proviſion was made for their maintenance.

While the parliament was laudably employed in contriving ways and means for raiſing the neceſſary ſupplies, and endeavouring to ſtop the progreſs of vice and immorality, Peter Alexowitz, czar of Muſcovy, ſince known by the appellation of Peter the Great, viſited this kingdom. Having formed the noble deſign of civilizing his barbarous ſubjects, of introducing the arts and ſciences among them, and of rendering the forces of his empire by ſea and land equal to thoſe of his politer neighbours, he travelled through moſt countries in Europe to gain inſtruction. He was particularly deſirous of eſtabliſhing a marine, and of having a reſpectable fleet in the Baltic: and therefore his principal intention was to learn the art of ſhip-building. In the ſummer of the preceding year he ſent an embaſſy to Holland, to regulate ſome points of commerce with the States-general, and accompanied his ambaſſadors diſguiſed as one of their retinue. While he was on this tour he diſcovered himſelf to king William, and had a private interview with that prince at Utrecht, and in conſequence of his invitation he now viſited England. He ſtaid here above three months, during which time he was lodged and entertained with all the magnificence poſſible for a prince, who choſe to remain unknown. He paſſed his time here, as he had done in Holland, in examining the dock-yards, and improving himſelf in the art of ſhip-building; to attain which he worked ſeveral hours every day as a common ſhipwright, in the royal yard at Deptford. At his departure William made him ſeveral magnificent preſents; and particularly the yatch in which he himſelf uſed to paſs over to Holland. She was a very beautiful veſſel, finely adorned, and called the Royal Tranſport. And it being thought abſolutely neceſſary to gain his friendſhip, he was allowed to engage ſeveral Engliſh artificers in his ſervice; and to take two of the ſcholars from Chriſt-church hoſpital; and theſe afterwards laid the foundation of the marine academy at Peterſburgh.

The Spaniſh monarch, Charles II. had long been in a very declining ſtate, and having no iſſue, the conſequence that might attend his large dominions paſſing either into the Bourbon family, or that of Auſtria, alarmed all Europe. William paſſed over to the continent, where he negotiated a treaty with Lewis XIV. for the diviſion of the Spaniſh monarchy. By this treaty the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, the province of Guipuſcoa, and ſeveral other places dependent on Spain, were deſtined to the dauphin; the Milaneſe to the archduke, Charles II. ſon to the emperor; and the reſt to the young prince of Bavaria, who was about eight years of age. But the latter dying ſoon after the treaty was agreed to, a new one was made, in which Bavaria was aſſigned to the archduke; Lorraine added to the poſſeſſions of the dauphin; and Milan given to the duke of Lorraine.

Having finiſhed this buſineſs on the continent, William returned to England, and on the 3d of December opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne; wherein he ſtrongly recommended to them the keeping up ſuch a force, as might preſerve that weight and influence they at preſent enjoyed in the affairs of the continent; and their making a farther progreſs in diſcharging the national debt contracted by the war. He concluded with recommending three popular ſubjects to their particular attention: the making proviſion for the poor, the advancement of trade; and the diſcouraging vice and prophaneneſs. It is remarkable that in this ſpeech William made no mention of the partition treaty he had ſo lately concluded abroad, and which afterwards ſo greatly excited the attention of the kingdom. This was induſtriouſly concealed both from the parliament and the privy-council. Probably he ſuſpected the ſincerity of Lewis, and therefore thought it extremely neceſſary too keep a good body of troops in readineſs to compel the French monarch to obſerve the late treaty in caſe of the king of Spain's death.

The parliament, ignorant of the partition treaty, and of the neceſſity of keeping a large body of troops in pay, immediately took that part of the king's ſpeech into conſideration. William, when he paſſed over to Holland, had left orders with the miniſtry to retain 16,000 men in the ſervice, notwithſtanding the vote of the commons, by which the army was limited to 10,000. This arbitrary act ſo irritated the new parliament, that they reſolved to oppoſe the king in all his demands. They accordingly came immediately to the following reſolution, "That all the land forces in Engliſh pay, exceeding 7000 men, and theſe his majeſty's natural born ſubjects, be forthwith paid off and diſbanded; and that all the forces in Ireland, exceeding 12,000 men, all his majeſty's natural born ſubjects, be likewiſe forthwith diſbanded and paid off." This reſolution being paſſed, a bill was ordered in, and ſoon paſſed both houſes; in conſequence of which not only the French proteſtant regiments, but even the king's favourite Dutch guards were to be removed out of the Britiſh dominions.

A. D. 1699. William was highly exaſperated at the proceedings of the parliament. Their jealouſy ſo deeply affected him, that he actually formed a reſolution of abandoning the government, and had even compoſed a ſpeech which he intended to have delivered on that occaſion; but was diverted from his raſh deſign by his moſt intimate friends; and at laſt perſuaded to give the royal aſſent to the bill for reducing the army.

Accordingly, on the 2d of February he went to the houſe of peers, and addreſſed himſelf to the parliament in the following manner: "I am come to paſs the bill for diſbanding the forces as ſoon as I knew it was ready for my aſſent. Though the reduction of the army to ſo inconſiderable a number may, in our preſent circumſtances, be attended with the moſt fatal conſequences; and though I might juſtly complain of the harſh treatment I have received in being deprived of thoſe guards who accompanied me into this kingdom, and have conſtantly attended me in all my fortunes, yet as I am convinced that nothing can be more prejudicial to our common intereſt, than to ſuffer any jealouſy or miſunderſtanding to ariſe between me and my people, I am firmly reſolved to comply with your requeſt. Nevertheleſs, after having thus aſſigned my reaſons for paſſing this bill, I muſt likewiſe in diſcharge of the truſt you have repoſed in me, declare, that, in my opinion, the nation is left too naked and defenceleſs; it is your duty, therefore, to take this matter into your conſideration, and immediately to provide ſuch a ſtrength as may be deemed neceſſary for the ſafety of the kingdom, and the preſervation of that peace we have ſo lately obtained."

But notwithſtanding the king had paſſed the bill for diſbanding the army, he was very unwilling to part with his guards, and accordingly ſent a meſſage to the commons, informing them, "that the neceſſary preparations were made for tranſporting the guards who came with him into England, and that he intended to ſend them away immediately, unleſs, out of conſideration to him, the commons could find out ſome way to continue them longer in his ſervice, which his majeſty would take very kindly." But the commons were inexorable. They reminded him of his former promiſe to diſmiſs all foreign troops. The happineſs of the kingdom, they added, depended on the mutual confidence of the prince and the people. That this confidence required him to intruſt the care of his ſacred perſon to his ſubjects.

Finding it would be in vain to contend with the commons, William yielded to neceſſity, and the Dutch guards were tranſported to Holland. It muſt be owned that the behaviour of the lower houſe with regard to the Dutch guards ſtrongly indicated that they were rather inſpired with the ſpirit of ferocious obſtinacy than genuine patriotiſm. William was perſuaded of this, and took no pains to diſguiſe his ſentiments. "Had I as many places to beſtow," ſaid he one day to the earl of Sunderland, "as there are members in the houſe of commons, I ſhould not know what it was to have my will diſputed."

There being ſeveral bills ready for the royal aſſent, the king went to the houſe of peers on the 4th of May, and after ſigning them, put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he told them, "that having ſat ſo many months, the ſeaſon of the year, as well as their own particular affairs, made it reaſonable they ſhould enjoy a receſs; that he took it for granted they had finiſhed all the bills they thought neceſſary, and he had given his aſſent to all they had preſented to him; that if any thing elſe was wanting to their ſafety, the ſecurity of the public credit, the diſcharge of the national debt, the advancement of trade, the ſuppreſſion of vice, and the employment of the poor, the things he propoſed to them at their meeting, he did not doubt but effectual care would be taken of them next winter; and wiſhed no inconveniency might happen in the interval."

The Spaniſh monarch Charles II. who was no ſtranger to the late treaty of partition between William and Lewis, highly reſented their uſurping a power to diſpoſe of his dominions without his conſent. He determined therefore to make a will in favour of the archduke, ſecond ſon to Leopold, the reigning emperor. The queen of Spain alſo uſed her utmoſt endeavours to give the crown to that young prince, to whom ſhe was ſo nearly related. She accordingly new modelled the council; beſtowed the government of Milan upon prince Vaudemont; appointed the prince of Heſſe Darmſtadt viceroy of Catalonia, and carried the ſick king to Toledo, under pretence that the air there was much more wholeſome than that of Madrid.

But all theſe meaſures were rendered abortive by the indiſcreet and imperious conduct of the court of Vienna. Charles now altered his mind, and determined not to make a will in favour of the archduke. On the other hand the marquis d'Harcourt, ambaſſador of Lewis XIV. managed the Spaniards with more dexterity and addreſs. Their inveterate antipathy to France decreaſed every day. The grandees were as unwilling as their maſter to diſmember the monarchy; and France alone ſeemed capable of preventing an incident ſo deſtructive to the honour and power of their country. They adviſed Charles therefore to give the preference to a prince of that nation. Pope Innocent XII. who then filled the papal chair, was conſulted on this intereſting ſubject, and approved the meaſure, as agreeable to the laws of Spain, and the intereſt of religion.

The French monarch, ignorant of this reſolution in favour of his family, cauſed 60,000 of his beſt troops to advance towards Catalonia, while a great number of ſhips and gallies cruized along the coaſts and entered the Spaniſh harbours. It was now abſolutely neceſſary for ſome meaſures to be taken; and the dying monarch ſacrificed the intereſts of his family to thoſe of his kingdom: he nominated the duke of Anjou, youngeſt ſon to the dauphin, heir to his dominions, with this proviſo, however, that the two crowns of France and Spain ſhould never be united.

The parliament meeting on the 16th of November, the king opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, wherein he obſerved, "That his calling them together ſo early was owing to an abſolute neceſſity of making ſome farther proviſion for the ſecurity of the kingdom by ſea and land; and recommended particularly the repairing the royal navy and fortifying the harbours. He reminded them alſo of making good the deficiences of the funds, diſcharging the national debt, and providing ſupplies for the enſuing year. He told them, he hoped that the nation was already convinced of the good effects of the peace, by the evident increaſe of their trade, which he ſhould uſe his utmoſt endeavours to promote and encourage; that he thought, however, it might receive a farther advantage, by paſſing a bill for puniſhing the unlawful and clandeſtine running of goods; and by employing the poor, who were become a burden to the nation: he declared himſelf to be fully aſſured of the love and affections of his people, which he ſhould endeavour to preſerve, by maintaining their rights and liberties, by ſupporting the eſtabliſhed religion, by diſpenſing juſtice with clemency and impartiality, by countenancing virtue and diſcouraging vice, and by declining no difficulties or dangers to promote their welfare and proſperity." Having particularly declared his intentions, he concluded his ſpeech in the following manner: "Since, therefore, our aims are only for the public good, let us act with confidence in one another, which will not fail, with God's bleſſing, to make me a happy king, and you a great and flouriſhing people."

Though this ſpeech was certainly of the moſt kind and tender nature, yet it gave high offence to the commons. The ſpirit of party magnifies every thing. The expreſſion of "acting with confidence in each other," was conſtrued into an implication of a diſtruſt, or want of confidence in them, and they determined to reſent it. They accordingly returned no addreſs of thanks; but, on the 4th of December, preſented what may be conſidered as a remonſtrance; in which they declared, "That being highly ſenſible nothing was more neceſſary for the peace and welfare of the kingdom, the quieting of the minds of the people, and the diſappointing the deſigns of their enemies, than a mutual and entire confidence between his majeſty and his parliament, they eſteemed it their greateſt misfortune, that, after having ſo amply provided for the ſecurity of his majeſty and his government, any jealouſy or diſtruſt had been raiſed of their duty and affection: and, at the ſame time, begged leave to repreſent, that it would greatly conduce to the continuing and eſtabliſhing an entire confidence between his majeſty and his parliament, if he would be pleaſed to ſhew marks of his high diſpleaſure towards ſuch perſons as ſhould preſume to miſrepreſent their proceedings to his majeſty; and they ſhould, on their part, diſcourage all falſe rumours and reports reflecting on his majeſty and his government, whereby any miſunderſtandings might be created between him and his ſubjects." *

Aſtoniſhed at this repreſentation, the king replied, "That no perſon had ever yet dared to miſrepreſent the proceedings of either houſe; and if they had, they would immediately have felt the higheſt marks of his diſpleaſure: and that he took very kindly the aſſurance they gave him of diſcouraging all falſe rumours and reports reflecting on himſelf and his government."

Theſe proceedings were ill calculated to produce the harmony ſo neceſſary between the different branches of the legiſlature, for rendering the nation reſpectable abroad, and happy at home. The commons did every thing in their power to mortify the king; and William gave them, in return, many indications of his reſentment. They paſſed a bill of reſumption, whereby the eſtates in Ireland he had given to his favourites were taken from them, and became again the property of the crown. But not ſatisfied with this victory, they proceeded to ſuch abſurd lengths in their career, that they came to a reſolution to addreſs his majeſty, that no perſon, who was not a native of his dominions, except the prince of Denmark, ſhould be admitted into his councils of England or Ireland. But before this addreſs could be preſented, the king came to the houſe of peers; and, after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, put an end to the ſeſſion.

A. D. 1700. During the ill-humour that ſubſiſted between the king and the houſe of commons, Charles II. of Spain paid the debt of nature. The death of this prince, who left no iſſue, ſeemed to threaten the balance of power in Europe. Lewis XIV. and the emperor Leopold, were related to him in the ſame degree; and the renunciation of Maria Tereſia of Auſtria, wife to Lewis, and the eldeſt daughter to Philip III. appeared to the enemies of France an engagement of very little weight. Nor was this of any great conſequence, becauſe the balance of power would be equally deſtroyed, whether Leopold or Lewis obtained the ſucceſſion. This was the true motive that induced William to ſign the treaty of partition, which, it was apprehended, would prevent a general war, as well as the two contending monarchs from becoming too powerful for the other princes of Europe. He was miſtaken; the emperor refuſed to accede to the treaty; and it appeared, on the death of Charles, that he had bequeathed his dominions to the duke of Anjou.

Lewis, for ſome time, heſitated whether he ſhould accept the bequeſt or not, from the proſpect of a war more formidable than any in which he had hitherto been engaged. But ambition ſoon decided in favour of the will. He, however, thought it neceſſary to juſtify his conduct to the king of England, and the States-general. In order to this, he repreſented, that the treaty of partition had occaſioned great and general complaints; that is was abſolutely impracticable to carry it into execution; and that, in renouncing this treaty, he made large ſacrifices to peace and the public good, having abandoned Sicily, Naples, and ſeveral other territories which France was to have enjoyed. But thoſe arguments were by no means ſolid, and the known ambition of the houſe of Bourbon gave great uneaſineſs to the powers of Europe. The States-general, for ſome time, refuſed to acknowledge the duke of Anjou king of Spain; but being in no condition to oppoſe the progreſs of Lewis, ſhould he attempt to invade their territories, they made a virtue of neceſſity, by acknowledging that prince king of Spain, under the title of Philip V. William diſſembled his intentions; and conſidering himſelf as deſtined to hold the balance of power, which was now on the point of being deſtroyed by the ambition of the houſe of Bourbon, he reſolved, if poſſible, to form a new league, for rendering their alarming attempts abortive.

William had met with ſo many mortifications during the laſt parliament, that he determined now to make a change in the miniſtry. He accordingly gave his confidence to the earl of Rocheſter, who was at the head of the Tories, and who undertook that the whole party ſhould exert all their power to ſupport the meaſures adopted by his majeſty. That nobleman was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland; the privy-ſeal was given to the earl of Tankerville; Sir Charles Hedges was made ſecretary of ſtate; lord Godolphin appointed firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury; and the management of the commons intruſted to Mr. Robert Harley, who had hitherto oppoſed the court with great warmth and ability.

The new miniſtry, however, ſoon found that they had not ſufficient weight of intereſt to carry the points they intended in the preſent parliament, which ſtood prorogued to the 15th of January. They therefore perſuaded his majeſty to diſſolve it, and call a new a new one; which was accordingly done, and the members appointed to meet on the 6th of Februray following.

In the mean time the Scottiſh parliament paſſed the following reſolution: "That in memory of the "great, and never to be forgotten, deliverance, "which it had pleaſed God to give that kingdom, "by means of his majeſty; and upon the preſervation of whoſe life their ſafety and happineſs, under God, depended; they would ſtand by and ſupport his majeſty and his government to the utmoſt "of their power, and maintain ſuch a number of "forces as ſhould be neceſſary for obtaining ſuch "ſalutary ends." Accordingly an act paſſed for keeping on foot a body of three thouſand men till the firſt of December 1702, and another for a land-tax to maintain theſe troops. Theſs acts being paſſed, the commiſſioner produced the king's letter, wherein his majeſty deſired that he might have eleven hundred men on his own account till the firſt of June following, which the parliament readily granted.

A. D. 1701. The uſual means of corruption had been exerted in electing the members for the new parliament; and venality prevailed ſo far, that the tories had a very conſiderable majority in the houſe of Commons. They met, according to appointment, on the 6th of February, but were prorogued to the 10th, when Mr. Harley was choſen ſpeaker; and the next day the king went to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne. He obſerved that the death of the king of Spain, together with the declaration he had made with regard to his ſucceſſor, had occaſioned ſuch an alteration in the affairs abroad, that it required their particular attention; and that he did not doubt but their reſolutions thereupon would be ſuch as ſhould moſt conduce to the intereſt and ſafety of England, the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, and the tranquillity of Europe. He requeſted ſupplies for the current year, and put them in mind of the deficiencies and public debts which were yet unprovided for; and at the ſame time recommended to them, the putting the royal navy into a reſpectable condition, and fortifying the ſea coaſts. And as the duke of Glouceſter, the only remaining child of the princeſs of Denmark, had lately paid the debt of nature, he obſerved there was now an abſolute neceſſity for their making a farther proviſion for the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, and therefore recommended it to their early and ſerious conſideration. He alſo recommended the improvement of trade and making proviſion for the poor, and concluded with exhorting them to proceed in their reſolution, with ſuch vigour and unanimity, as would convince the world that they were united among themſelves, than which he obſerved, nothing could contribute more to preſerve tranquillity at home, and render the nation reſpected abroad.

In compliance with his majeſty's requeſt, the commons, after providing for the credit of the exchequer-bills, took into conſideration the great object of ſettling the ſucceſſion to the crown. This produced long debates, on the cloſe of which it was reſolved, that, in order to exclude every catholic prince from the ſucceſſion, the heir ſhould be of the church of England; that if he were a foreigner, the nation ſhould not engage, without conſent of parliament, in any war for the defence of the dominions he might poſſeſs out of the kingdom; that he ſhould not leave England, Scotland, or Ireland, without the ſame conſent; that when this act of limitation ſhould take effect, no foreigner, though a naturalized inhabitant, unleſs of Engliſh extraction, ſhould be admitted into the council, become a member of either houſe, or obtain, by a grant from the crown, any lands or inheritance: that whoever ſhould hold any penſion or lucrative employment under the king, ſhould be incapable of ſitting in the houſe of commons; and that a pardon, under the great ſeal, ſhould be of no effect againſt an impeachmeat of the houſe. Having voted theſe regulations, which greatly reſtrained the prerogative, and implied a ſevere cenſure on the preſent government, it was reſolved that the princeſs Sophia, dutcheſs-dowager of Hanover, and grand-daughter to James I. was the next heir in the proteſtant line, after the reſpective deſcendants of the king and the princeſs of Denmark. A bill was ordered to be brought in on theſe reſolutions; and, after paſſing both houſes, received the royal aſſent.

This buſineſs being done, the next object of importance that engaged the attention of parliament was, the partition treaty lately ſigned by his majeſty. The commons were ſo far from approving of the king's proceedings on this head, that they condemned them with the greateſt aſperity. They complained loudly of its having been ſigned without conſent of parliament; and obſerved not even common decency in their debates. Sir Edward Seymour compared the diviſion which had been made to the Spaniſh territories, to the diſtribution that highwaymen make of their booty; and Mr. Howe had even the inſolence to call it a felonious treaty; an expreſſion which ſo highly incenſed the king, that he is reported to have ſaid, he would have demanded perſonal ſatisfaction with his ſword, had he not been reſtrained by the diſparity of condition between himſelf and the perſon who had offered ſo outrageous an inſult to his honour.

The lords alſo were far from approving of the treaty, but their debates were guided by prudence and diſcretion. They examined its tendency with candour, and then repreſented it, in an addreſs to the king, as incompatible both with the intereſt of England and the ſafety of Europe. They prayed his majeſty to be adviſed by his own ſubjects, and place his confidence in them rather than in ſtrangers. They added, that ſince the French king's accepting the will of Charles II. was a manifeſt violation of the treaty, they humbly adviſed his majeſty, in future treaties with that prince, to proceed with ſuch caution as might carry a real ſecurity.

The king was highly offended at this addreſs; but he thought proper to diſſemble his reſentment, and only returned for anſwer, "That their addreſs contained matter of very great moment; and he would always take care that all treaties he made ſhould be for the honour and ſafety of England."

Lewis XIV. having embraced the will of Charles II. made great preparations for ſupporting the duke of Anjou on the Spaniſh throne; and refuſed to grant any other fecurity, than that of renewing the peace of Ryſwick. This refuſal being communicated to the parliament, both houſes reſolved to requeſt his majeſty would concert meaſures with the ſtates-general for putting a ſtop to the deſigns of France in the Netherlands; aſſuring him they would always be ready to enable him to fulfil the conditions of the treaty ſubſiſting between England and Holland.

The king thanked both houſes for the aſſurances they had given him; and ſaid, he did not doubt but the readineſs they had ſhewn on this occaſion would greatly contribute to the procuring ſuch a ſecurity a they deſired. But he was far from approving thei addreſs, as it implied their diſapprobation of a new confederacy, which he was very deſirous of forming. They ſeemed to limit their aſſiſtance to the obtaining a new barrier in the Netherlands, without enterin into a war for the recovery of the kingdom of Spain. He therefore thought it moſt prudent to acknowledge the duke of Anjou's title to that crown, and to congratulate him on his acceſſion.

Th

The emperor, exaſperated at this incident, complained that he was abandoned by his allies at the very time he ſtood moſt in need of their aſſiſtance. He, however, determined to aſſert his right by force of arms; and accordingly ſent prince Eugene into Italy, at the head of an army, to take poſſeſſion of the duchy of Milan, as a fief of the empire.

During theſe tranſactions d'Avaux, the French ambaſſador, employed every artifice to perſuade the ſtates of the cordial kindneſs of his maſter towards them. But the Dutch had too dearly experienced the French monarch's pretended love to their republic, to be eaſily perſuaded of the truth of his profeſſions; and therefore wiſely exerted themſelves in providing for their own ſecurity, by reinforcing their garriſons, and ſoliciting ſuccours from foreign powers. They alſo wrote a letter to king William, in which they expreſſed the moſt ſincere zeal for the intereſt of England, and earneſtly preſſed that the ſtipulated number of troops ſhould be immediately ſent to their aſſiſtance. Accordingly the Scottiſh regiments, which the king had retained in his own pay, were directly ſent them from Scotland. At the ſame time the king communicated the letter of the ſtates-general to the houſe of commons, who, having taken it into conſideration, came to the following reſolution, "that they would effectually aſſiſt his majeſty to ſupport his allies in maintaining the liberties of Europe, and immediately provide the ſtipulated ſuccours for the ſtates-general."

The peers went ſtill farther: they addreſſed the king in a very warm, affectionate manner; requeſting that his majeſty would not only perform the articles of any former treaty with the ſtates-general, but that he would enter into a league offenſive and defenſive with them for their common preſervation, and invite into it all princes and ſtates that were concerned in the viſible danger ariſing from the union of France with Spain. They alſo exhorted him to enter into ſuch alliances with the emperor as his majeſty ſhould think prudent; aſſuring him of their reſolution to aſſiſt him in the moſt effectual manner.

But notwithſtanding both houſes had declared their reſolutions to ſupport his majeſty, they determined to ſhew their diſpleaſure againſt the partition treaty. The earls of Portland and Oxford, the lords Somers and Hallifax, by whoſe advice the treaty was ſuppoſed to have been concluded, were impeached by the commons; but the upper houſe declared the impeachments null and void. This exaſperated the commons, and the moſt alarming animoſities between the two houſes ſucceeded.

As the Tories were now become obnoxious to the people, the Whigs determined to exert their whole force againſt them. They openly charged them with being penſioners to the French king, whoſe intereſts they eſpouſed on all occaſions. They repreſented them as implacable enemies to the preſent government; and that all their views and actions tended ltimately to the reſtoration of the abdicated king nd his family. They even endeavoured to procure etitions from the city of London, and ſeveral of e principal counties of England, to expreſs their ſapprobation of the proceedings of the commons, d the preſent miniſtry; flattering themſelves with ing able, by that means, to procure a revolution favour of their own party. They, however, failed general; the county of Kent alone could be preiled upon to ſend up a petition to parliament; the oſt material parts of which were as follow:

" We, the gentlemen, juſtices of the peace, grand ry, and other freeholders, at the general quarterſſions of the peace at Maidſtone in Kent, deeply ncerned at the dangerous eſtate of this kingdom, d of all Europe; and conſidering that the fate of , and our poſterity, depends upon the wiſdom of our repreſentatives in parliament; think ourſelves bound in duty humbly to lay before this honourable houſe the conſequences, in this conjuncture, of your ſpeedy reſolutions and moſt ſincere endeavours to anſwer the great truſt repoſed in you by our country.

"And in regard that, from the experience of all ages, it is manifeſt that no nation can be great or happy without union; we hope that no pretence whatever ſhall be able to create a miſunderſtanding among ourſelves, or the leaſt diſtruſt of his moſt ſacred majeſty, whoſe great actions for this kingdom are writ in the hearts of his ſubjects, and can never, without the blackeſt ingratitude, be forgot.

" We moſt humbly implore this honourable houſe to have regard to the voice of the people, that our religion and ſafety may be effectually provided for; that your royal addreſſes may be turned into bills of ſupply; and that his moſt ſacred majeſty, whoſe propitious and unblemiſhed reign over us we pray God long to continue, may be enabled powerfully to aſſiſt his allies before it is too late."

This petition, which was ſigned by the deputy-lieutenants of the county, ſeveral juſtices of the peace, and all the grand jury and other freeholders, was boldly delivered to the houſe of commons by David Polhill, William Colepepper, Thomas Colepepper, Juſtinian Champney, and William Hamilton, Eſqrs. The houſe was immediately in a flame: the petition was voted to be a ſcandalous, inſolent, and ſeditious libel, calculated to deſtroy the conſtitution of parliaments and to ſubvert the eſtabliſhed government of theſe kingdoms. It was, at the ſame time ordered, that the five perſons who had preſented it to the houſe ſhould be taken into cuſtody.

This tyrannical exertion of power raiſed a great ferment in the nation, and the moſt indecent reflections were publiſhed againſt the Tories. Among the reſt a memorial appeared, ſigned Legion, againſt the houſe. "The Engliſh (ſaid the memorialiſts) ought no more to be ſlaves to the parliament, than to the king." They promiſed to ſecond him in all his meaſures, to ſet bounds to the exorbitant power of France; and concluded with this remarkable ſentence, "Our name is Legion, and we are many."

Theſe complaints of the people were far from being prejudicial to the king. The commons ſaw their error, and inſtantly altered their meaſures. They preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, wherein they declared they would ſupport him to the utmoſt; and deſired him to engage in ſuch alliances with the emperor, and other powers, as he ſhould think neceſſary for bridling the exorbitant power of France, and maintaining the independency of Europe. They voted the ſum of 1,500,000l. for the public expences, 30,000 ſeamen, and that 10,000 troops ſhould be ſent immediately to the aſſiſtance of the ſtates-general.

The miſunderſtanding, however, between the two houſes ſtill continued ſo great, that it was thought proper to put an end to the ſeſſion of parliament. Accordingly, on the 24th of June the king went to the houſe of peers, and the commons being ſent for, they attended with their ſpeaker, who, on preſenting the money-bills, addreſſed his majeſty as follows:

" Sir, it is with great joy and ſatisfaction that I attend your majeſty at this time, ſince your commons have complied with all your majeſty was pleaſed to deſire at their meeting. They have paſſed the bill of ſucceſſion, which has ſettled the crown in the proteſtant line, and continued the liberty of England, which your majeſty hath ſettled and preſerved. They have paſſed a bill for taking away thoſe privileges which might have proved burdenſome and oppreſſive to your ſubjects. They have given your majeſty thoſe ſupplies, which are more than ever were given in a time of peace, to enable your majeſty, when you are abroad, to ſupport your allies, procure either a laſting peace, or to preſerve the liberties of Europe by a neceſſary war."

After his majeſty had given the royal aſſent to ſeveral acts, he cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he returned both houſes thanks for the great zeal they had expreſſed for the public ſervice, and their ready compliance with what he recommended to them at the opening of the parliament; and particularly thanked the commons for the ſupplies, and for the encouragement they had given him to enter into alliances for the preſervation of Europe.

William having given the command of the 10,000 auxiliaries, voted by the commons for the ſervice of the ſtates-general, to the earl of Marlborough; placed the earl of Pembroke at the head of the admiralty; appointed Sir George Rooke to command the fleet; ſettled the regency and other matters relating to domeſtic government, he embarked for Holland on the 1ſt of July. Immediately on his arrival at the Hague, he aſſiſted at an aſſembly of the ſtates-general, whom he addreſſed in a moſt affectionate ſpeech, wherein he aſſured them, "that he always came into that country with joy, but more ſo in this dangerous conjuncture, becauſe he foreſaw his preſence would be neceſſary for the ſervice of the ſtate: that he hoped to have paſſed the reſt of his days in repoſe and peace, and to have left that ſtate in a flouriſhing condition; but there had happened ſuch great alterations in the affairs of Europe, that he knew not what might be conſequences: that he could, however, aſſure their high mightineſſes, whether things were accommodated amicably, or whether they ſhould be obliged to have recourſe to arms, he perſiſted in the ſame zeal he ever had for their ſervice and proſperity: and that he could farther aſſure them the whole Engliſh nation was ready to aſſiſt the ſtates, and ſtrongly to contribute towards their defence, and to whatever might tend to the common ſecurity."

The States, in their anſwer, which was equally affectionate, told his majeſty, "That they could not omit to thank him for his aſſurances, not only in his own, but in the name of the Engliſh nation, in favour of themſelves and the common cauſe, well knowing how much they might rely upon a people whoſe courage had gained ſo much reputation in the world, and were always of opinion that their intereſts were inſeparable from thoſe of England."

William now ſpent ſome time in reviewing the frontier garriſons of the ſtates, and gave ſuch orders as he judged neceſſary for the better defence and ſecurity of the country. When he returned to the Hague, he was informed that the count d'Avaux, the French ambaſſador, had delivered a letter from Lewis to the ſtates, accompanied with a memorial of his own, to notify his being called home by his maſter, and wherein he obſerved, "that the ties between their high mightineſſes and the king of England were too ſtrict, and they had too well made known their blind ſubmiſſion to the ſentiments of that monarch; and no doubt but that they had already taken a reſolution to make the ſame declaration to the moſt chriſtian king's ambaſſador."

On the 1ſt of Auguſt the ſtates-general returned a very ſpirited anſwer to this memorial, wherein they ſaid, "that they could not comprehend, why the effect of the union between them and the king of Great Britain ſhould be rather war than peace, ſince his Britannic majeſty on all occaſions had given ſufficient proofs of his inclination to peace: that they did not blindly follow the king of Great Britain's ſentiments, but had the utmoſt deference for his advice; tho' they acknowledged themſelves to be ſtrictly united to him by alliances contracted many years ſince for their mutual ſecurity: that he was one of the chief parties in the partition treaty; and that they had declared, previous to their entering on theſe negotiations, that they thought his conſent neceſſary, both with regard to thoſe reaſons and his private relation with the republic".

Soon after this a treaty was ſigned between the emperor England and Holland, againſt France, for recovering the Spaniſh monarchy to the houſe of Auſtria; and for the ſecurity of England and Holland with regard to their commerce and navigation, and of the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover to the crown of Great Britain, as well as a ſafe barrier to the Dutch.

Every method was now made uſe of, both by France and the allies, for increaſing their forces by ſea and land; but, perhaps, a declaration of war might have been ſome time farther off, had not an accident happened which haſtened the criſis. James II. paid the debt of nature at St. Germains on the 16th of September, in the 68th year of his age, and the 15th of his exile. In conſequence of this, a queſtion was ſtarted in the French council, what ſteps ſhould be taken with regard to his ſon. Lewis was inclined to give him the ſame titles his father had borne; but the miniſtry adviſed their maſter to remain paſſive, and ſuffer him to aſſume what titles he pleaſed. They enforced their advice with ſuch reaſons of ſound policy, that Lewis reſolved not to acknowledge the ſon of James II. as king. The ſame day, however, Mary of Modena, widow to the deceaſed king, went to Madam de Maintenon's apartment to ſpeak to the French king. She found him there, and with a flood of tears, conjured him not to treat her ſon, herſelf, and the memory of a king he had protected, with ſo much indignity as to refuſe a title the only remains of their former greatneſs. She obſerved, that as her ſon always received the honours of prince of Wales, he ought to be treated as king after the death of his father, and that even William himſelf could not complain of this, provided he was left to enjoy the throne of which he had deprived him. She then obſerved, that whether he acknowledged the ſon of James or not, the Engliſh would, nevertheleſs, declare war againſt France, and that he would only feel the regret of having ſacrificed the moſt noble ſentiments to a fruitleſs precaution The entreaties of the royal widow were powerfull ſeconded by Madam de Maintenon. Lewis reſumed his former ſentiments, and James's ſon was proclaimed king of England, Scotland, and Ireland by the title of James III, and this title was likewiſ recognized by the king of Spain, the duke of Savo and the pope.

As ſoon as William was informed of this tranſaction, he diſpatched a courier to the king of Sweden as guarantee of the treaty of Ryſwick, to complai of this manifeſt violation of that treaty. At the ſame tim he recalled his ambaſſador, the earl of Mancheſte from Paris, with orders to return without takin leave, and M. Pouſſin, the French reſident, wa told to depart the kingdom.

It was in vain that Lewis declared, in a manifeſt he publiſhed on this occaſion, that he meant not t violate the treaty of Ryſwick, or to diſturb Willia in his poſſeſſion of the crown. The Engliſh, alre dy diſpoſed for war, conſidered themſelves as inſulte and breathed nothing but vengeance. The city London, and moſt of the counties in England, tran mitted addreſſes to his majeſty in Holland, declarin their ſenſe of the indignity offered him, and promiſin to ſupport his government againſt the pretender a all his enemies.

William, having concluded alliances with ſever foreign princes, and concerted meaſures with t ſtat ſtates for attacking the French frontiers the next campaign, embarked for England, and arrived in London on the 5th of November. A few days after his arrival the parliament was diſſolved, and a new one appointed to meet on the 30th of December. The reaſon alledged for the diſſolution of this parliament was, that his majeſty might have the ſenſe of the nation at this alarming conjuncture; but it is more than probable, that the chief inducement was that of preventing a revival of the heats and animoſities, between the two houſes, as it was feared they might delay the ſupplies neceſſary for the approaching war.

The new parliament met agreeable to the time appointed; and though the whigs had gained an inconteſtible majority, yet Mr. Harley, who was conſidered as the leader of the tory party, was choſen ſpeaker. The next day the king went to the houſe, and opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ I promiſe myſelf you are met together, full of that juſt ſenſe of the common danger of Europe, and the late proceedings of the French king, which has been ſo fully and univerſally expreſſed in the loyal and ſeaſonable addreſſes of my people.

“ The owning and ſetting up the pretended prince of Wales for king of England, is not only the higheſt indignity offered to me and the nation, but does nearly concern every man who has a regard for the proteſtant religon, or the preſent and future quiet and happineſs of his country, that I need not preſs you to lay it ſeriouſly to heart, to conſider what future effectual means may be uſed for ſecuring the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, and extinguiſh the hopes of all pretenders, and their open and ſecret abettors.

“ By the French king's placing his grandſon on the throne of Spain, he is in a condition to oppreſs the reſt of Europe, unleſs ſpeedy and effectual meaſures be taken. Under this pretence he is become the real maſter of the whole Spaniſh monarchy: he has made it to be entirely depending on France, and diſpoſes of it as his own dominions; and by that means he has ſurrounded his neighbours in ſuch a manner, that though the name of peace may be ſaid to continue, yet they are put to the expence and inconveniences of war.

“ This muſt affect England in the neareſt and moſt ſenſible manner, in reſpect to our trade, which will ſoon become precarious in all the various branches of it; in reſpect to our peace and ſafety at home, which we cannot hope ſhould long continue; and in reſpect to that part which England ought to take in the preſervation of Europe.

“ In order to obviate the general calamity with which the reſt of Chriſtendom is threatened by this exorbitant power of France, I have concluded ſeveral alliances according to the encouragement given me by both houſes of parliament, which I will direct ſhall be laid before you, and which, I doubt not, you will enable me to make good.

“ There are ſome other treaties ſtill depending, which ſhall likewiſe be communicated to you as ſoon as perfected.

“ It is fit I ſhould tell you the eyes of all Europe are upon this parliament: all matters are at a ſtand till your reſolutions are known, and therefore no time ought to be loſt.

“ You have yet an opportunity, by God's bleſſing, to ſecure to you and your poſterity, the quiet enjoyment of your religion and liberties, if you are not wanting to yourſelves, but will exert the antient vigour of the Engliſh nation; but I tell you plainly, my opinion is, if you do not lay hold of this occaſion, you have no reaſon to hope for another.

“ In order to do your part it will be neceſſary to have a great navy, and to provide for the ſecurity of our ſhips in harbour; and alſo that there be ſuch a force at land, as is expected in proportion to the forces of our allies.

“ Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

“ I do recommend theſe matters to you with that concern and earneſtneſs which their importance requires: at the ſame time I cannot but preſs you to take care of the public credit, which cannot be preſerved, but by keeping ſacred that maxim, that they ſhall never be loſers who truſt to parliamentary ſecurity.

“ It is always with regret when I do aſk aids of my people; but you will obſerve that I deſire nothing which relates to any perſonal expence of mine: I am only deſiring you to do all you can for your own ſafety and honour, at ſo critical and dangerous a time; and am willing that what is given ſhould be wholly appropriated to the purpoſe for which it is intended.

“ And ſince I am ſpeaking on this head, I think it proper to put you in mind, that during the late war, I ordered the accounts to be laid yearly before you, and alſo gave my aſſent to ſeveral bills for ſtating and examining the public accounts, that my ſubjects might have the ſatiſfaction to know how the money given for the war was applied; and I am willing that matter may be put in any other way of examination, that it may appear whether there have been any miſapplications and miſmanagement, or whether the debt that remains upon us has really ariſen from the ſhortneſs of ſupplies, or the deficiency of the funds.

“ I have already told you how neceſſary diſpatch will be for carrying on that great public buſineſs, whereon our ſafety, and all that is valuable to us, depends. I hope what time can be ſpared will be employed about thoſe other very deſirable things I have recommended from the throne; I mean the forming ſome good bills for employing the poor, for encouraging trade, and the ſuppreſſion of vice.

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ I hope you are come together determined to avoid all manner of diſputes and differences, and reſolved to act with a general and hearty conſent, for promoting the common cauſe, which alone can make this a happy ſeſſion.

“ I ſhould think it as great a bleſſing as could fall on England, if I could find you as much inclined to lay aſide thoſe unhappy and fatal animoſities, which divide and weaken you, as I am diſpoſed to make all my ſubjects ſafe and eaſy as to any, even the higheſt offence, committed againſt me.

“ Let me conjure you to diſappoint the only hopes of your enemies, by your unanimity. I have ſhewn, and will always ſhew, how deſirous I am to be the common father of all my people. Do you, in like manner, lay aſide parties and diviſions: let there be no other diſtinction heard amongſt us for the future, but of thoſe who are for the proteſtant religion and the preſent eſtabliſhment, and of thoſe who wiſh for a popiſh prince and a French government.

“ I will only add this, if you do in good earneſt deſire to ſee England hold the balance of Europe, and to be indeed at the head of the proteſtant intereſt, it will appear by your rightly improving the preſent opportunity.”

In anſwer to this excellent and patriotic ſpeech, the two houſes preſented ſeparate addreſſes to his majeſty, which were moſt graciouſly received; and at the ſame time he gave them aſſurances of the great ſatisfaction he conceived of their duty and affection.

A. D. 1702. The utmoſt expedition was now uſed by parliament for completing the neceſſary armaments for carrying on the war with vigour, both by ſea and land. Forty thouſand men were voted for the ſea ſervice, and the ſame number to make up the complement of the army. The commons alſo voted, that whoever would advance or lend the ſum of 600,000l. for the ſervice of the fleet, and 50,000l. for the preſent ſubſiſtence of the land forces, ſhould be paid the principal, with intereſt after the rate of ſix per cent. out of the firſt aids granted by parliament.

The parliament (as well as the nation in general) were ſo irritated at the conduct of Lewis, that both houſes joined in an addreſs to his majeſty, beſeeching him that no peace ſhould be concluded with France till reparation was made to the king and the people by the French monarch. They prepared a bill of attainder againſt the pretender, James's ſon; and another to oblige all perſons in office to take an oath to maintain the eſtabliſhed government, and the church of England, with a toleration for non-conformiſts. Ten peers proteſted againſt this bill, as appearing to them to impoſe a new obligation, as uſeleſs as it was ſevere.

William's attention was now wholly engaged in making preparations for the enſuing campaign. He had fully reſolved to put himſelf at the head of his army; but this he never accompliſhed. His life was drawing to a period, and an accident happened which haſtened the melancholy event. His health had been for ſome time viſibly declining; and he had retired to Hampton-court, where he amuſed himſelf with his favourite diverſions of riding and hunting. As he was taking the air on the 21ſt of February, in the park of Hampton-court, he unfortunately fell from his horſe and broke his collar bone. He was immediately carried into the palace, where the bone was ſet, and he returned the ſame evening to Kenſington. He ſeemed to be in a fair way of recovery, till the firſt of March, when a defluxion fell upon his knee, attended with very alarming ſymptoms. This prevented his going in perſon to the parliament houſe, as he before intended; but being very ſolicitous about the national affairs then depending, he granted a commiſſion, under the great ſeal, to ſeveral peers, for paſſing the bills then lying ready for the royal aſſent; among which were, a bill for the attainder of the pretended prince of Wales, and an act that the ſolemn affirmation and declaration of the people called quakers ſhould be accepted inſtead of an oath in the uſual form.

His majeſty was ſo well recovered on the 4th of March, that he took ſeveral turns in the gallery; but being ſomewhat fatigued, he ſat down on a couch and fell aſleep. He was ſoon after ſeized with a fever; and, notwithſtanding all attempts to remove his complaint, the diſorder continued to encreaſe. He was ſenſible that his end was approaching, and met death with that firmneſs of mind which always diſtinguiſhed him. "I know (ſaid he to the phyſicians) that you have done every thing your art could do to aſſiſt me; but it is uſeleſs, and I ſubmit." He continued ſenſible to the laſt moment, and died about eight in the morning of the eighth of March, in the fifty-firſt year of his age, and the fourteenth of his reign.

William III. (according to biſhop Burnet) was in his perſon of the middle ſtature, a thin body, and delicate conſtitution; ſubject to an aſthma and continual cough from his infancy. He had an aquiline noſe, ſparkling eyes, a large forehead, and a grave and ſolemn aſpect. He ſpoke very little; and when he did, his converſation was dry, and his manner diſguſting.

With reſpect to the character of this prince, it has ſhared the ſame fate which commonly attends thoſe who act in exalted ſtations. His friends have repreſented him as a perſon adorned with every virtue: his enemies as a prince deformed with every vice. But the frantic joy which his enemies ſhewed at his death ſufficiently confuted the latter, and is, perhaps, the greateſt eulogium on his memory.

He was generally unfortunate in the many battles he fought againſt the French, yet he muſt be allowed the title of a great general and a great king; for though he was repeatedly beaten, he generally gained much more by his defeat, than the victors by their good fortune. He had inſpired his troops with a confidence and courage which rendered them ſuperior to every danger, and every misfortune. His campaign in Ireland, and his taking Namur, were perhaps the only inſtances, when fortune favoured his arms; but though ſhe ſeemed to have delighted in traverſing his military projects, ſhe could never ſhake his courage, his fortitude, his equanimity, in which he equalled the moſt eminent warriors of antiquity.

In the government of his dominions he diſcovered an exquiſite diſcernment, and conſummate prudence. The principal powers of Europe conſidered him as a friend in whom they could repoſe an unlimited confidence: a diſtinction never before poſſeſſed by any king of England, and which William maintained by the moſt inviolable attachment to the intereſt of his allies, and an unwearied application to buſineſs. He checked the alarming progreſs of the French in Flanders and Germany; he was the ſupport of Europe, when ready to ſink beneath the force of the ambitious Lewis. The Engliſh are indebted to him for a knowledge of their own ſtrength as a commercial and maritime nation. Nor did the embarraſſments and obſtructions in his meaſures, by his parliaments, ever get the better of his ſolicitude for promoting the glory and happineſs of theſe kingdoms. Prejudice and party zeal, which blinded the writers of the laſt century, having now ſubmitted to juſtice and equity, William III. is juſtly conſidered as one of the greateſt princes that ever ſwayed the Engliſh ſceptre.

But notwithſtanding all the virtues of William, we are far from repreſenting him as free from imperfections; he was ambitious; generoſity was not one of his favourite virtues; and he was juſtly blameable for that impolitic, or rather ungrateful partiality, which he, on all occaſions, diſcovered toward his foreign favourites. This was the principal cauſe of the diſtruſt between him and his people, and affords an example which all princes, who are called to the government of a foreign country, would do well to remember.

In a word, his virtues greatly over-balanced his failings; nor can any Engliſhman think on him but with gratitude, as an illuſtrious inſtrument in the hand of providence, for reſcuing theſe kingdoms from popiſh ſuperſtition and arbitrary power.

The only remarkable occurrences that happened during William's ſeparate reign were the two following:

In his ſeventh year a tax was laid on all widowers in England; by which a duke was to pay 12l. 10s. per annum; the other nobility, and inferior orders, in proportion; and the common people one ſhilling.

On the 8th of January, 1698, a dreadful fire broke out at Whitehall, occaſioned by the careleſſneſs of a laundreſs; by which accident all the body of the palace, with the council-chamber, and ſeveral adjoining apartments, were entirely conſumed; and it was with great difficulty that the Banquetting-houſe eſcaped ſharing the ſame fate.

ANNE.

ON the death of William III. the crown, purſuant to the act of ſucceſſion, devolved on the princeſs Anne, ſecond daughter of James II. and ſiſter to the late queen Mary. The privy-council having been aſſembled during the late king's illneſs, they waited on the princeſs immediately after his death, and recognized her title to the throne. She received them with the moſt engaging affability, expreſſed her ſenſe of the great loſs the nation had ſuſtained, and of the heavy burden it brought upon herſelf in particular. But added, that the ſincere regard ſhe had to the religion and liberties of her country would influence her to leave nothing undone on her part to preſerve them invioalable, to maintain the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, and the government as by law eſtabliſhed. She alſo declared her reſolution to carry on the preparations for oppoſing the exorbitant power of France; and that ſhe would loſe no time in giving her allies the ſtrongeſt aſſurances, that ſhe would purſue the true intereſt of England, together with that of the confederates, for the ſupport of the common cauſe.

The parliament (which, by virtue of an act paſſed in the late reign, continued ſitting after the king's death) declared the princeſs Anne the lawful queen of theſe realms, and iſſued orders for proclaiming her, which was accordingly done, the ſame day, with the uſual ceremonies.

The whole nation promiſed themſelves a long ſeries of proſperity, under the government of this beloved princeſs. Her irreproachable manners, the gravity of her diſpoſition, and her firm attachment to the church, had already rendered her perſon dear to the people.

On the 11th of March her majeſty went to the houſe of peers with the uſual ſolemnity, and delivered the following ſpeech to the parliament:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot too much lament my own unhappineſs in ſucceeding ſo immediately after the loſs of a king, who was the great ſupport, not only of theſe kingdoms, but of all Europe: and I am extremely ſenſible of the weight and difficulty it brings upon me.

"But the true concern I have for our religion, for the laws and liberties of England, for the maintaining the ſucceſſion to the crown in the proteſtant line, and for the government in church and ſtate as by law eſtabliſhed, encourages me in this great undertaking, which I promiſe myſelf will be ſucceſsful by the bleſſing of God, and the continuance of that fidelity and affection, of which you have given me ſo full aſſurance.

"The preſent conjuncture of affairs requires the greateſt application and diſpatch; and I am very glad to find in your ſeveral addreſſes ſo unanimous a concurrence in the ſame opinion with me, that too much cannot be done for the encouragement of our allies, to reduce the exorbitant power of France.

"I cannot but think it very neceſſary, upon this occaſion, to deſire you to conſider of proper methods towards obtaining an union between England and Scotland, which has been ſo lately recommended to you as a matter that very nearly concerns the peace and ſecurity of both kingdoms.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I need not put you in mind that the revenue for defraying the expences of the civil government is expired.

"I rely entirely upon your affections for ſupplying it in ſuch a manner as ſhall be moſt ſuitable for the honour and dignity of the crown.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It ſhall be my conſtant endeavour to make you the beſt return for that duty and affection you have expreſſed to me by a careful and diligent adminiſtration for the good of all my ſubjects: and as I know my own heart to be entirely Engliſh, I can very ſincerely aſſure you, there is not any thing you can expect or deſire from me, which I ſhall not be ready to do for the happineſs and proſperity of England; and you ſhall always find me a ſtrict and religious obſerver of my word."

This ſpeech was received with the higheſt ſatisfaction by the parliament. Both houſes joined in a warm addreſs of thanks to her majeſty; and on the 14th of March they voted, that the ſame revenue which had been ſettled on king William ſhould be ſettled on her majeſty for life. The ſame day the earl of Marlborough was elected a knight of the garter; and on the 15th he was appointed captain-general of all her majeſty's forces in England, and of thoſe which were employed abroad in conjunction with her allies.

The queen loſt no time in informing the confederates of her reſolution to purſue the meaſures of his late majeſty. She wrote a letter to the ſtates-general, aſſuring them that they ſhould find the ſame readineſs to purſue the meaſures for preſerving the common liberties of Europe, as they would had the life of the late king been extended to a much longer date. Animated by theſe aſſurances, the ſtates renewed their applications to the neceſſary buſineſs for carrying on the war with vigour; and publiſhed the queen's letter to refute the reports that had been artfully raiſed by the enemy, that the queen would not purſue the meaſures concerted by king William and the confederates. Marlborough arrived at the Hague on the 28th of March, in quality of her majeſty's ambaſſador extraordinary, and plenipotentiary to their high mightineſſes. He confirmed them in their reſolution for having recourſe to vigorous meaſures, and animated the league that was formed to humble France.

Perſuaded that the alliance formed by the late king would terminate with the breath of William, Lewis could not refrain his joy when the news of his death reached Verſailles. He immediately ſent inſtructions to his miniſter at the Hague, for renewing the negotiations with the ſtates, in order to detach them from the grand alliance. The French ambaſſador accordingly preſented a memorial, offering them the friendſhip of his maſter, and very advantageous terms, if they would agree to a treaty of peace. He added, that he doubted not of their accepting his offer, now they were no longer under the influence of the late king. But, at the ſame time, gave them to underſtand, that if, contrary to his expectation, they refuſed his offers, the forces of his maſter were ready to enter upon action; and they muſt now determine whether they choſe quiet and liberty, or war and ruin. "The choice (ſaid he) is in your own power, and I hope you will not ſacrifice the happineſs and tranquillity of your country to foreign intereſts."

The anſwer returned by the ſtates-general was worthy of a people who were determined to preſerve their liberty. "We have always (ſaid they) cheriſhed a high eſteem for his moſt chriſtian majeſty's friendſhip, nor ever done any thing to incur his diſpleaſure; but the alarming preparations for war ſo near on our frontiers, lay us under a neceſſity of putting ourſelves in a poſture of defence, and of aſking aſſiſtance from our allies. You are miſtaken, Sir, if you think we had not as much liberty to debate, and take ſuch reſolutions as were judged neceſſary for our preſervation, in the life-time of his Britannic majeſty, as at preſent. We cannot, indeed, enough deplore our misfortune, in being deprived of his wiſe conduct and councils, whoſe deſerts the republic can never forget; and we are reſolved to follow the ſame principles, and continue the ſame alliances we entered into during his life-time; and make uſe of ſuch other means as God hath put into our hands for maintaining our liberties and religion."

It is little to be wondered at that ſo ſpirited an anſwer ſhould render the negotiation abortive. The French ambaſſador returned to Paris, and the ſtates-general applied themſelves, with the utmoſt vigour, to the moſt likely meaſures for oppoſing the ambitious deſigns of the French. The allies were animated by the declaration of the queen; and the earl of Marlborough, after concerting meaſures for beginning the military operations, returned to England.

During theſe tranſactions abroad, the Engliſh parliament paſſed ſeveral bills; particularly an act for the better ſupport of her majeſty's houſhold, and the honour and dignity of the crown; an act for the ſtating the public accounts, and ſeveral private bills; when her majeſty came to the houſe of peers and gave them the royal aſſent. This being done, her majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein ſhe told them, it was with the greateſt pleaſure ſhe gave her aſſent to the act for ſtating the public accounts, thinking it highly reaſonable her ſubjects ſhould be ſatisfied how the large ſums they had granted her were expended; eſpecially when the common intereſt required a continuance of great taxes. She returned the commons thanks for their having continued to her, during her life, the ſame revenue they had granted to the late king, telling them, that though it would, in all probability, fall ſhort of what his had formerly produced, ſhe would, nevertheleſs, give directions that 100,000l. thereof ſhould be annually applied to the public ſervice. "I am willing, ſaid ſhe, to ſtraiten my own expences, rather than not contribute all I can to the eaſe and relief of my people."

A declaration of ſo generous and unexpected a nature could not fail of being highly agreeable to the parliament; and accordingly both houſes preſented her majeſty addreſſes of thanks, in which they mentioned her unparalleled goodneſs, in contributing ſo largely, out of her own revenue, to the relief of her ſubjects.

It was now warmly debated in council, whether the Engliſh ſhould engage as auxiliaries or principals in the war. The tories, with the earl of Rocheſter at their head, ſupported the former, and the whigs the latter. It was urged by thoſe who thought it moſt prudent to act as auxiliaries only, that in the laſt war, the emperor, and ſome other of the allies, had been very remiſs in furniſhing their quotas, and bringing their troops early into the field, whereby many advantages had been loſt, and the whole burden of the war had been, in a manner, thrown upon the Engliſh, who conſtantly ſupplied their deficiencies; and, from a delicate notion of honour, anticipated their revenues, and mortgaged their country in the quarrel: whereas it would have been otherwiſe, had they acted only as auxiliaries; they would have had nothing more to do than to have ſent their quota of troops; and the burden of the war muſt have been borne by thoſe who were moſt nearly concerned in the diſpute.

Theſe arguments, however, were ſtrongly oppoſed by the whigs, the principal of whom were the dukes of Devonſhire and Somerſet, who inſiſted on the neceſſity of the Engliſh engaging as principals in the war; and the earl of Marlborough joined them in this opinion. He obſerved, on the occaſion, that the honour of the nation was concerned to fulfil the late king's engagements; and affirmed that the power of France could never be reduced within due bounds, unleſs the Engliſh engaged as principals in the quarrel. This allegation was ſo ſtrongly ſupported by the whigs, that the majority declared in favour of their opinion; and a declaration of war was ordered to be prepared againſt France and Spain.

Accordingly, on the 4th of May, the declaration was publiſhed, with the utmoſt ſolemnities; in which the queen reproached Lewis with interrupting the freedom of commerce and navigation; with having formed a deſign of enſlaving Europe; with having ſeized a conſiderable part of the poſſeſſions of Spain; and with having perſonally inſulted her, by acknowledging the ſon of James II. to be king of England.

Two days after publiſhing the above declaration, the lord Godolphin was conſtituted lord-high-treaſurer, a poſt he had for ſome time refuſed, but was at laſt prevailed upon to accept it by the earl of Marlborough, who refuſed to command the forces abroad, unleſs the treaſury was put under the care of Godolphin, on whoſe punctuality, in point of remittances, he knew he could depend. Marlborough being thus ſure of the finances, honoured with the higheſt confidence of the queen, ſecure of the favour of the parliament and people, bleſſed with a capacity equal to his intereſt, of indefatigable activity and invincible courage, made the neceſſary preparations for putting himſelf at the head of the allied army.

In the mean time the emperor and the ſtates-general followed the example of the Engliſh, and declared war againſt France and Spain. The declaration of the former turned principally on the flagrant injury that had been done to the Auſtrian family by the French king's accepting of the will of Charles II. in favour of his grandſon, the duke of Anjou. The ſtates-general obſerved, "That Lewis had long ſince caſt his eyes upon their provinces; that he had twice attacked them by a moſt unjuſt war, in order to open himſelf a paſſage to univerſal monarchy; that he was ſo far from intending to preſerve the peace of Ryſwick, that he aimed only at lulling the allies aſleep, by prevailing upon them to lay down their arms; and, by ruining the commerce of the Dutch, to render them incapable of making any effectual oppoſition to his ambitious deſigns; for that treaty was hardly ratified, before he began evidently to encroach on their trade, the great ſinew of their ſtrength, by openly refuſing the tariff promiſed by that treaty."

Lewis was highly incenſed at theſe declarations, eſpecially that of the ſtates, which he affected to treat with the utmoſt contempt; but did not publiſh his declaration of war till the beginning of July. He exerted all his power to engage the German princes in his intereſt, and was ſo far ſucceſsful, that the electors of Bavaria and Cologne, the two dukes of Wolfenbuttle (Rodolphus and Anthony) were prevailed upon to declare in his favour.

The campaign was opened with the ſiege of Keyſerſwaert, a ſtrong town on the Rhine, which the elector of Cologne had put into the hands of the French. The place was inveſted by the prince of Naſſau-Saarburgh, marſhal du camp to the emperor; but the badneſs of the weather and the overflowing of the Rhine ſo greatly retarded the progreſs of the beſiegers, that Keyſerſwaert was not taken till a month after the trenches were opened; and marſhal Bouſflers, who commanded the French army under the duke of Burgundy, eldeſt grandſon of France, was very near ſurprizing the city of Nimeguen, while the allied army was engaged in the ſiege. The earl of Athlone, who commanded a ſeparate army of the Dutch, arrived about an hour before the French, and poſted his army under the walls of Nimeguen, and by that means prevented the loſs of that important place; for which he received the thanks of the ſtates-general. Coehorn, with a detachment of 10,000 men, broke into Flanders, forced and demoliſhed the French lines between the two forts of St. Donat and Oſabella, which the French had been many months forming with great labour and expence, and laid the greater part of the Chatellany of Bruges under contribution. But on the approach of the marquis of Bedmer and count de Motte, he was obliged to retire under the walls of Sluys.

The earl of Marlborough was now at the Hague, regulating the operations of the campaign. Trained up to arms in the military ſchool of the great Turenne, he had more than once received the approbation and thanks of that conſummate maſter in the art of war, for his gallant behaviour. Equally ſkilled in the intrigues of the cabinet and the field, he poſſeſſed the happy art of gaining the hearts of all who were connected with him. Endowed with an exquiſite diſcernment, he always diſcovered the lucky moment, the very inſtant it preſented itſelf, and never failed to take the advantage it offered, either in the field or the cabinet. He thoroughly underſtood the intereſts of the powers he ſerved, and ſeldom failed to penetrate the deſigns of the enemy. Favoured in a particular manner with the confidence of the troops, he was able to avert the impending dangers by his prudence and foreſight, or pluck the wreath of conqueſt from the foe by his courage and preſence of mind.

Marlborough's firſt campaign gained him univerſal applauſe, and confirmed the expectations the allies had formed of his great abilities. He joined the army in the neighbourhood of Nimeguen on the thirtieth of June, paſſed the Maeſe on the ſixteenth of July, and endeavoured to bring the French army, commanded by the duke of Burgundy and marſhal Bouflers, to a general engagement; but this he found impoſſible. The French choſe rather to abandon Spaniſh Guelderland to the diſcretion of the allies, than hazard a battle. They retreated under the canon of Nimeguen; and the duke of Burgundy, who came to the army merely to learn the method of conducting an engagement, learned nothing but how to avoid one.

The ſtates-general now requeſted Marlborough to make himſelf maſter of the towns in Spaniſh Guelderland, which would open entirely the navigation of the Maeſe, and on that account be of the utmoſt advantage to Holland. The general readily liſtened to their deſire, and immediately prepared to beſiege Venlo, which was accordingly inveſted on the twenty-ninth of Auguſt, and on the twenty-fifth of September the town ſurrendered. Fort St. Michael was attacked on the eighteenth of September, and the garriſon ſurrendered on honourable terms, on the twenty-fifth of the ſame month.

While this ſiege was carrying on, Marlborough detached general Schutz with a body of troops, to attack the town and caſtle of Wertz, both of which ſurrendered after a very ſlight reſiſtance.

In the beginning of October, Marlborough inveſted Ruremonde, which, after a ſtout reſiſtance of five days, ſurrendered to the allies, together with Stevenſwaert, both ſituated on the Maeſe. The army then marched towards Liege, and, on its approach, marſhal Boufflers, to whom the duke of Burgundy had now left the command of the French army, thought proper to retreat from thence to Tongeren, on the river Jecker, and thence towards Brabant; in order to defend ſuch places as were not, at that time, intended to be attacked.

When the allied army came before Liege, they found the city abandoned, and Marlborough took poſſeſſion of it without oppoſition. The citadel, however, together with another ſtrong fort, called the Chartreuſe of Liege, held out for ſome days. The former, which was defended by eight French battalions, was taken by ſtorm on the 23d of October, the manner of executing which is thus related by Marlborough himſelf, in the account he ſent to the Engliſh court: "All things, ſays he, being prepared, and the ſignal given, our troops were out of their trenches, and marched towards the enemy without firing a ſhot, and with an order and intrepidity hardly to be paralleled. They then attacked the counterſcarp with ſuch fury, that the enemy were obliged to abandon the poſt; but our men, inſtead of forming a lodgment there, forced their paſſage into the covert-way: paſſed the mount, and aſcended the breach: whereupon the governor, who little expected ſo vigorous an attack, beat a parley: our troops, however, being already in the place would not hearken to it, and would have cut the whole garriſon in pieces, had they not thrown down their arms and called aloud for quarter, which was granted them. In this glorious action, the hereditary prince of Caſſel ſignalized his courage; he went a volunteer in the attack, at the head of the grenadiers, was the firſt man who mounted the breach, and with his own hands wreſted the colours from the French officer. Mr. Wentworth, brother to lord Reby, alſo ſerved as a volunteer in this action, and died glorioufly in the bed of honour. M. Vivlane, the governor, and the duke of Charoſt were made priſoners."

The citadel of Liege was extremely rich, the moſt opulent merchants and others having there depoſited their valuable effects, as in a place of ſafety. No leſs than 300,000 florins in gold and ſilver were found in it, beſides notes for about 1,200,000 florins more, drawn upon ſubſtantial merchants in Liege, who paid the money. The whole booty was, in ſhort, ſo conſiderable, that an Engliſh grenadier is ſaid to have received 1000 louis d'ors for his own ſhare.

With this conqueſt ended the firſt campaign, equally advantageous to the allies and the honour of Marlborough, who had now eſtabliſhed his military character beyond all controverſy, and entirely ſecured the affection of the ſtates.

The confederate army being ſeparated, the earl of Marlborough repaired to Maeſtricht, and embarked immediately on the Maeſe for Holland, in company with M. Gueldermanſel, one of the deputies of the ſtates, and the baron d'Opdam, general of the Dutch horſe, taking with him twenty-five ſoldiers, under the command of a lieutenant, by way of guard. But in paſſing down that river, a party of fifty-three men, belonging to the garriſon of Guelder, the only place in that province now belonging to the French, who lay ſkulking on the banks of the Maeſe, waiting for prey, obſerving the boat, ſuddenly ſeized the rope by which it was drawn; and haling it on ſhore, immediately diſcharged their pieces on the paſſengers; but having examined the ſeveral paſſports without knowing Marlborough, they ſearched the trunks and baggage, made the guard priſoners, and ſuffered the boat to proceed. The governor of Venlo, informed of this tranſaction, took it for granted that Marlborough was made priſoner, and carried to Guelder. Accordingly he marched out at the head of his whole garriſon to attack that place. The ſame account being carried to the Hague, filled the Dutch with the greateſt conſternation. The ſtates immediately aſſembling, reſolved, that all their forces ſhould march inſtantly, and threaten the garriſon with the utmoſt extremity, unleſs they inſtantly releaſed the general. But before theſe orders could be diſpatched, the earl arrived at the Hague, where he was received with every mark of the moſt perfect eſteem.

An expedition had been planned by the late king for reducing Cadiz, and it was now determined to carry it into execution. Sir George Rooke was appointed admiral of the fleet, and the duke of Ormond commander of the land-forces. The fleet, when joined by the Dutch, conſiſted of fifty ſhips of the line, thirty Engliſh, and twenty Dutch; and the tranſports had on board fourteen thouſand land-forces.

The fleet failed on the firſt of July, and on the twelfth of Auguſt anchored in the bay of Bulls, about two leagues diſtant from Cadiz. The troops were landed on the fifteenth of Auguſt, and ſoon after made themſelves maſters of Rota and Port St. Mary's. The ſtricteſt orders had been iſſued againſt plundering before the forces reached either of theſe places; but it was not in the power of the officers to prevent their hungry and thirſty ſoldiers from forcing the houſes where they expected to find refreſhments. Nor was it long before they made their way to the cellars, which they found ſtored with rich and ſtrong wines. They now became wholly ungovernable, plundered the city, and, being joined by the ſeamen, ſent the ſpoil on board the ſhips. They ſtripped the churches and altars of their plate, and the houſes of their treaſure and rich furniture; ſo that the value of the whole was about a million ſterling. The duke of Ormond was ſo highly incenſed at theſe violences, committed in contempt of his orders, that he commanded Sir Henry Bellaſis and Sir Charles O'Hara, who commanded the troops that took poſſeſſion of the place, to be put under arreſt, and would have proceeded with greater ſeverity, had the offenders been leſs numerous.

In the mean time, the garriſon of Cadiz had recovered from their conſternation; and the late exceſſes had ſo highly provoked the Spaniards, that they joined their army from every quarter in great numbers, determined to oppoſe the invaders of their country. The ſeaſon of the year was alſo now ſo far advanced, that the ſhips could not, without the utmoſt danger, continue longer in thoſe ſeas. The troops were therefore reimbarked, and the Engliſh left the Spaniſh coaſt, greatly chagrined at their diſappointment.

Though this expedition proved abortive, yet an incident happened which enabled them to perform an action of the utmoſt ſervice to their country. In their paſſage they were met by captain Hardy, commander of the Pembroke. He had been detached with ſome ſhips to Lagos, a harbour on the coaſt of Portugal, and had received information, that M. Chateau Renauld, with a ſquadron of French men of war, and the Spaniſh flota were put into Vigo, a ſea-port of Galicia, in Spain. Having imparted this important advice to Sir George Rooke, he immediately informed the Dutch admiral; adding, that it was his opinion, that they ſhould ſteer directly for Vigo. The next day he called a council of war, when the admiral's propoſal being unanimouſly approved, they directed their courſe immediately to the port where the enemy's fleet had taken ſhelter.

The weather proved ſo very hazy, that the inhabitants of Vigo did not ſee the combined fleet, till they were within a few miles of the harbour. They immediately fired almoſt inceſſantly on the fleet; but the Engliſh took very little notice of it, paſſing on with all their ſails to the harbour where the French fleet and galleons lay.

The paſſage into the harbour, which was not above three quarters of a mile over, was defended with ſeveral forts, batteries and breaſt-works on each ſide; by a ſtrong boom of iron chains and cables drawn acroſs the harbour, and buoyed up with top-maſts, &c. moored at each end to a ſeventy gun ſhip. Within this boom were moored five ſhips of the ſame force, with their broadſides to the entrance of the paſſage.

It was now determined, that as the paſſage into the harbour was ſo narrow, that the whole fleet could not attack the enemy's ſhips and galleons, without running foul of each other, a detachment of fifteen Engliſh and ten Dutch men of war, with all the fire-ſhips, ſhould be ſent into the harbour in order to take and deſtroy the enemy's fleet; that the frigates and bomb veſſels ſhould follow the rear of this detachment, and that the large ſhips ſhould move after them, and enter the harbour, if it ſhould be thought neceſſary. It was alſo determined that the land forces ſhould be ſet on ſhore at the ſame time, and attack the forts that defended the entrance of the harbour.

In conſequence of theſe reſolutions, the duke of Ormond landed early in the morning of the twelfth of October, in a ſandy bay about ſix miles from Vigo, at the head of 2,500 men; and not meeting with any oppoſition, he ordered the grenadiers to march, under the command of lord Shannon, to the fort that guarded the entrance of the harbour, where the boom lay. This ſervice he performed with the moſt intrepid gallantry, notwithſtanding there appeared at the ſame time about 8,000 Spaniſh foot, between the fort and the hills, they retired after a few ſkirmiſhes with the grenadiers, who alſo drove before them another party of the enemy, followed them to the fort, and made themſelves maſters of the lower battery. Upon this, lieutenant-general Churchill's regiment advanced towards the left, and took their poſts. After taking the two batteries, the enemy retired into an old caſtle, or ſtone-tower, and fired from thence for ſome time upon the Engliſh; but opening the gate, in order to make a ſally, the grenadiers forced their way into the tower ſword in hand, and obliged the garriſon, conſiſting of French and Spaniards, to ſurrender priſoners of war.

The taking of theſe fortifications greatly facilitated the attempt on the ſhipping. The admiral made a ſignal to weigh ſoon after the land forces were aſhore, and the whole ſquadron ſtood in towards the boom; but when the van was within cannon-ſhot of the batteries, it fell calm, ſo that they were under a neceſſity of coming to an anchor; but a freſh gale ſpringing up ſoon after, they cut their cables, and ſtood directly for the harbour. Vice-admiral Hobſon, in the Torbay, who led the van, crowded all the ſail he could, and ſtood directly againſt the boom, which immediately gave way, and he entered the harbour. The reſt of the fleet were not ſo fortunate. The Dutch admiral and his ſquadron, who laid their ſhips broadſides to the boom, in order to add weight to the ſhock of the Torbay, ſtuck faſt, and they were obliged to cut themſelves a paſſage. The whole ſquadron now entered the harbour, through a terrible fire from the enemies ſhips and batteries, which, however, they ſoon ſilenced. But Admiral Hobſon was in the utmoſt danger. He was boarded by a fire-ſhip, but had the good fortune to beat her off, though not till after his ſhip had received ſo much damage, that he was obliged to ſhift his flag on board the Monmouth.

After a moſt deſperate engagement, the French finding themſelves unable to contend againſt the ſuperior force and valour of the aſſailants, reſolved to ſet fire to their own ſhips, in order to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. They accordingly burnt eight ſhips, ſix galleons, and two advice-boats, but ten French men of war and eleven galleons were taken. The Spaniards had, however, ſecured a conſiderable part of their plate, and other rich merchandize, on the appearance of the combined fleet. Near 14,000,000 of pieces of eight were loſt in ſix galleons that were burnt, and about half that value brought off by the conquerors.

When the action was over, the duke of Ormond propoſed to have made himſelf maſter of Vigo, and to have wintered in Spain, if the admiral could have ſpared him a ſquadron of men of war and proviſions for his troops; but the admiral declaring it was not in his power, the land forces were re-embarked, and on the 19th of October, Sir George Rooke, with twenty men of war, ſailed for England, leaving Sir Cloudeſley Shovel to convoy home the prizes. He, having burnt the ſhips that could not be got off, and taken 110 braſs cannon out of the enemy's ſhips and from their batteries, followed the grand fleet in a few days, and on the 7th of November they all arrived ſafe in the Downs.

Admiral Benbow was not ſo fortunate in the Weſt-Indies. He had, for ſome time, protected the trade, with great vigilance and ſucceſs, in that quarter of the world. That brave, but violent man, had incurred the hatred of ſeveral of his officers, which, joined with a daſtardly ſpirit, gave the enemy an advantage they could never otherwiſe have obtained. Benbow's fleet conſiſted of ſeven ſail of the line, and with this force he ſcoured the ſeas of the many privateers that were very injurious to the Engliſh trade. Being informed that M. du Caſſe, a French admiral, with ten ſail of ſhips, was expected at Hiſpaniola, Benbow determined, if poſſible, to intercept him. On the 19th of Auguſt, he had ſight of the enemy, and ſoon after began the engagement with three ſhips only; the other four falling a-ſtern, came not within gun-ſhot of the enemy. Had they done their duty, the whole French ſquadron muſt have fallen into their hands. Benbow, however, continued the fight, and ſoon diſabled one of the enemy's ſhips. But du Caſſe perceiving that he was not ſeconded by the reſt of his ſhips, attacked him with the utmoſt fury, and the admiral had the misfortune to have one of his legs ſhattered to pieces by a chain-ſhot. He, however, continued the fight with the ſame intrepidity; but fearing, from the behaviour of his captains, that they would deſert to the enemy, he was obliged to retire to Jamaica. On his arrival, he iſſued a commiſſion to vice-admiral Whetſtone to hold a court-martial, and try them for cowardice. Hudſon, of the Pendennis, died before the trial; Kirby of the Defiance, and Wade of the Greenwich, were convicted, and ſentenced to be ſhot; Conſtable of the Windſor was caſhiered and impriſoned; Vincent of the Falmouth, and Fogg, the admiral's own captain, were convicted of having ſigned a paper, that they would not fight on the preſent occaſion; but as they had behaved gallantly in the action, the court only inflicted on them the puniſhment of ſuſpenſion, nor was that to take place till the lord high admiral's pleaſure ſhould be known. Wade and Kirby were ſent home in the Briſtol, and, upon their arrival at Plymouth, ſhot on board the ſhip; a dead warrant for their immediate execution having lain there for ſome time. In the mean time admiral Benbow was ſo deeply affected by this miſcarriage, that he became melancholy, and his grief having augmented the fever, occaſioned by his wound, it ſoon put a period to his life.

On the 2d of July her majeſty thought proper to diſſolve the parliament, and call a new one, which met for buſineſs on the 23d of October. The tories had ſo prejudiced the people againſt the behaviour of the whigs, that they had a very conſiderable majority in this parliament; a circumſtance very agreeable to the queen, whoſe partiality for that party was always remarkable. The commons having choſen Robert Harley, Eſq; for their ſpeaker, her majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is with great ſatisfaction I meet this parliament; which I have ſummoned to aſſiſt me in carrying on the juſt and neceſſary war in which we are engaged. I have called you together as early as was conſiſtent with your convenience in coming out of your ſeveral counties; and I aſſure myſelf of ſuch evidences of your affections to me, and your zeal for our common cauſe, as will not only give ſpirit and forwardneſs to our own preparations, but ſuch example and encouragement to our allies, as, by God's bleſſing, cannot fail of a good effect, for the advantage of the whole confederacy.

"I have met with ſo many expreſſions of joy and ſatisfaction in all the counties through which I have lately had occaſion to paſs, that I cannot but look upon them as true meaſures of the duty and affection of the reſt of my ſubjects.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I muſt deſire you to grant me ſuch ſupplies as will enable me to comply both with our particular treaties and engagements already made, and ſuch others as may be neceſſary for the encouragement of our allies, and the proſecuting the war where it ſhall moſt ſenſibly affect our enemies, and be moſt effectual for diſappointing the boundleſs ambition of France.

"And that my ſubjects may the more chearfully bear the neceſſary taxes, I deſire you to inſpect the accounts of the public receipts and payments; and if there have been any abuſes or miſmanagements, I hope you will detect them, that the offenders may be puniſhed, and others be deterred, by ſuch like examples, from the like practices. I muſt obſerve to you, with ſome concern, that the funds given by the laſt parliament have, in ſome meaſure, fallen ſhort of the ſums propoſed to be raiſed by them; and though I have already paid and applied to the public ſervice the 100,000 pounds I promiſed to the laſt parliament, yet it has not ſupplied that deficiency.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot, without much trouble, take notice to you of the diſappointment we had at Cadiz. I have not yet had a particular account of that enterprize, nor of all the difficulties our forces may have met with there. But I have had ſuch a repreſentation of diſorders and abuſes committed at Port St. Mary's, as has obliged me to give the directions for the ſtricteſt examination of that matter.

"I am earneſtly deſirous, for all our ſakes, that this may prove a ſhort ſeſſion. However, I hope you will find time to conſider of ſome better and more effectual method to prevent the exportation of wool, and to improve that manufacture, which is of ſo great conſequence to the kingdom. On my part, nothing ſhall be omitted for its encouragement.

"I am firmly perſuaded, that the love and good affection of my ſubjects is the ſureſt pledge of their duty and obedience, and the trueſt and juſteſt ſupport of the throne. And as I am reſolved to defend and maintain the church as by law eſtabliſhed, and to protect you in the full enjoyment of all your rights and liberties; ſo I rely on your care of me. My intereſts and yours are inſeparable; and my endeavours ſhall never be wanting to make you all ſafe and happy."

Both houſes were ſo well ſatisfied with this ſpeech, that they preſented ſeparate addreſſes to her majeſty, which were full of the ſtrongeſt expreſſions of duty, eſteem and acknowledgment. The addreſs of the commons was remarkable for their prejudice againſt the memory of the late king. The purport of the addreſs was, that the aſtoniſhing progreſs of her majeſty's arms, under the earl of Marlborough, had retrieved the antient honors of the Engliſh nation. This expreſſion was very injurious to the memory of William, and therefore occaſioned long and very warm debates in the houſe. The word "retrieved" was particularly objected to, and the word "maintained" offered to be ſubſtituted in its room. But the tories ſupported the expreſſion, and it paſſed by a great majority.

On the 30th of October lord Shannon arrived from the confederate fleet, with the news of its ſignal ſucceſs over the French and Spaniards at Vigo. The 12th of November was appointed for a public thankſgiving for the ſucceſſes of the campaign, and the queen went to St. Paul's, attended by both houſes of parliament and the chief officers of ſtate. The duke of Ormond, who was now returned from his expedition, and happened to be that day one of the ſtaff officers in waiting, was received by the populace with the loudeſt acclamations of joy.

The next day his Grace went to the houſe of peers, when the lord-keeper returned him thanks, in the name of the houſe, for the ſignal ſervices performed at Vigo. The commons alſo returned the duke and Sir George Rooke, the thanks of their houſe for their gallant atchievements; though at the ſame time they drew up an addreſs to the queen, deſiring ſhe would order the duke of Ormond and Sir George Rooke to lay before them an account of their proceedings, a requeſt with which her majeſty complied.

On the 21ſt of November the queen ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, by Mr. Secretary Hedges, informing them, "that her majeſty, conſidering there was but a very ſlender proviſion made for the prince her huſband, if he ſhould ſurvive her; and that ſhe was reſtrained from increaſing the ſame by the late act of parliament for ſettling the revenue, thought it neceſſary to recommend the making a further proviſion for the prince to their conſideration." In conſequence of this meſſage the commons unanimouſly reſolved, "that the yearly ſum of 100,0000 pounds be ſettled upon his royal highneſs, in caſe he ſhould ſurvive her majeſty." He was alſo exempted from that clauſe in the act of ſucceſſion, which excluded all foreigners from offices, though they were naturalized; and was created lord high-admiral of England. But the quality of huſband to the queen gave him no authority. Anne reigned alone; and he ſhared in her glory, without acquiring any part of it himſelf.

The earl of Marlborough being now returned from Holland, received the thanks of both houſes for his ſignal ſervices; and on the 2d of December her majeſty declared in the committee of council, "that ſhe was ſo ſatisfied of the eminent ſervices of lord Marlborough to the public and herſelf, both in the command of the army, and the entire confidence he had ſettled between her majeſty and her allies, the ſtates-general, that ſhe intended to create him a duke." On the tenth of the ſame month ſhe ſent the following meſſage to the houſe of commons.

ANNE. R.

"The earl of Marlborough's ſervices to her majeſty and to the public have been ſo eminent, both in his command of the army, and his having eſtabliſhed an entire confidence and good correſpondence between her majeſty and the ſtates-general, that ſhe has thought fit to grant the title of a duke of this kingdom to him and to the heirs male of his body, and alſo a penſion of 5,000 pounds per annum upon the revenue of the poſt-office, for the ſupport of his honour during her majeſty's life: if it had been in her majeſty's power, ſhe would have granted the ſame term in the penſion as in the honour, and ſhe hopes you will think it ſo reaſonable in this caſe as to find ſome proper methods of doing it."

This meſſage occaſioned great debates in the houſe, the reſult of which was an addreſs, ſhewing their inexpreſſible grief that her majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal commons ſaw any inſtances where they were unable to comply with what her majeſty propoſed to them; but they begged leave humbly to lay before her majeſty the apprehenſions they had of making a precedent for the future alienation of the revenue of the crown, which had been ſo much reduced by the exorbitant grants of the laſt reign, and which had been ſo lately ſettled and ſecured by her majeſty's unparalleled grace and goodneſs. They, however, declared themſelves infinitely pleaſed to obſerve, by her majeſty's late gracious acceptance of the duke of Marlborough's ſervices, that the only way to obtain her majeſty's favour was to deſerve well of the public, and begged leave to aſſure her majeſty, that whenever ſhe ſhould think fit to reward ſuch merit, it would be to the entire ſatisfaction of her people. The queen, in her anſwer to this addreſs, told the commons, "that ſhe ſhould always think herſelf much concerned to reward thoſe who had deſerved well of her, and that on this account ſhe had beſtowed ſome favours on the duke of Marlborough, and was glad to find they thought them well placed."

The Tories, who had greatly the majority in the houſe of commons, and were favoured by the queen, carried all before them with the utmoſt violence. Firmly attached to the church of England, they covered their animoſities under the pretence of zeal. Great part of the whigs, though, to all appearance, united with the church of England, at leaſt ſo far as not to ſcruple the ordinary oaths, frequented the aſſemblies of the non-conformiſts, without being deprived of any advantage as ſubjects. The reigning party, inſtigated by the hatred they bore them, were deſirous of excluding them from all employments. They conſidered as a real ſchiſm that occaſional conformity, which, under an appearance of ſubmiſſion, concealed a determined revolt from the orthodox faith. In conſequence of this opinion, a bill was brought into the lower houſe, the preamble to which condemned perſecution, though it ſeemed wholly calculated to promote it. Whoever had taken the oaths for holding a place, and afterwards frequented any of the aſſemblies of the non-conformiſts, became, according cording to the tenor of this bill, incapable of holding ſuch employment, was liable to pay a fine of 100 pounds, and five pounds for every day he held his employment, after having been at any ſuch meeting: nor could he hold any other employment till after one whole year's conformity.

It was pretended, by the promoters of this bill, that a national church being requiſite, as well for the ſupport of religion as the tranquillity of the ſtate, it was abſolutely neceſſary to maintain it by truſting the civil power in the hands of ſuch only as were faithful to its rules and principles; that it was abſurd to give places of conſequence to a ſet of men whoſe conſciences were too tender to obey the laws, yet hardy enough to violate them; that it was contradictory to common ſenſe to be at the ſame time a conformiſt and a non-conformiſt, and to embrace ſincerely a communion to which they did not accede; and that this bill added nothing to the rights of the church of England, nor took any thing from the rights of toleration paſſed in the late reign.

In oppoſition to theſe arguments, the opponents of the bill alledged, "that the diſſenters were in general well affected to the preſent conſtitution; that in the laſt and greateſt danger to which the church was expoſed, they zealouſly ſupported her againſt all the papiſts, their common enemies, and have ever ſince continued to ſhew every mark of affection and ſubmiſſion to the government, in church and ſtate: that to lay any real hardſhip upon them, or give riſe to jealouſies and fears at ſuch a juncture, might be attended with dangerous conſequences: that toleration had greatly contributed to the ſafety and reputation of the church; and plainly proved, that liberty of conſcience and gentle meaſures were the moſt effectual means for increaſing the votaries of the eſtabliſhed religion, and diminiſhing the number of diſſenters: that the non-conformiſts could not properly be termed ſchiſmatics, without bringing a heavy charge upon the church of England, which had not only tolerated ſuch ſchiſm, but even allowed communion with the reformed churches abroad: that the penalties of this bill were even more ſevere than thoſe impoſed by law upon the papiſts for aſſiſting at the moſt ſolemn act of their religion; and, that toleration and tenderneſs had always been productive of peace and union, while perſecution and violence had never failed to excite diſcord, and extend ſuperſtition."

Notwithſtanding the forcibility of theſe arguments, they were not ſufficient to induce the Tories to lay the bill aſide: they ſupported it with all their intereſt, and the bill paſſed the lower houſe by a conſiderable majority. It was different in the houſe of peers, where many of the members were in the whig intereſt. A very warm debate enſued on the firſt reading, and ſeveral amendments were made to it, namely, that jacobite meetings ſhould be included; that the 100 pounds penalty ſhould be reduced to 20, and that the whole incapacitating clauſes ſhould be omitted. They alſo ſhortened the terms for information and proſecution, and exempted the diſſenters from holding offices for which they could not be qualified without taking the ſacrament, provided the act did not extend to univerſity churches, to thoſe of the French and Dutch, or to the governors of hoſpitals, or the aſſiſtants of corporations. Theſe amendments were refuſed by the commons, and ſeveral conferences between the two houſes were held on the occaſion; but as the lords perſiſted in adhering to their amendments, and the commons in refuſing them, the conferences broke up, and both parties publiſhed their proceedings, in vindication of their conduct. The whole intereſt of the court was exerted on this occaſion, but the bill was rejected by only one voice.

The convocation had been ſummoned to meet with the new parliament, but no buſineſs of importance was tranſacted, the diſputes between the two houſes preventing their taking notice of any thing that required their attention. The whole body of the clergy ranged themſelves into two different parties, diſtinguiſhed by the appellations of "High Church" and "Low Church." The former accuſed the latter of being preſbyterian hypocrites, and the latter branded the former with being partizans of tyranny and perſecution.

A. D. 1703. In the beginning of January the queen informed the commons, that the ſtates-general had preſſed her to augment her forces, as the only means to render ineffectual the great and early preparations of the enemy. The commons immediately reſolved, that 10,000 men ſhould be hired as an augmentation of the forces to act in conjunction with the allies: but at the ſame time they entreated her majeſty to make it a point with the ſtates-general, that they ſhould put an immediate ſtop to all commerce and correſpondence with France and Spain; which they obſerved was a meaſure abſolutely neceſſary for carrying on the war, as it would interrupt the enemy's trade, and expoſe them to the utmoſt difficulties; and they deſired England might not be charged with the pay of ſuch additional troops, but from the day that this ſtep ſhould be taken by the ſtates. The lords alſo addreſſed her majeſty to the ſame effect. She acknowledged the juſtneſs of their precautions, and promiſed to comply with their requeſts; in which promiſe ſhe was very ſincere, and the ſtates-general, much againſt their inclination, were obliged to publiſh a prohibition of all commerce with the ſubjects of France and Spain.

Diſputes ſtill ſubſiſting between the two houſes, her majeſty reſolved to prorogue the parliament. She accordingly went to the houſe of peers on the 22d of February; and, after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, ſhe put an end to the ſeſſion by a ſpeech from the throne, in which ſhe thanked them for the diſpatch they had given to the public affairs, for the large ſupplies they had given, and for the proviſion they had made for the prince. She told them ſhe hoped the diſſenters would reſt ſatisfied with the act of toleration, which ſhe was reſolved to maintain; that the members of the church would remember ſhe had been educated in their principles, and had been expoſed to great difficulties for maintaining them, and therefore they might be aſſured ſhe would make it her peculiar care to encourage and maintain the church, and tranſmit it, ſecurely ſettled, to poſterity. She thought ſome farther laws were neceſſary for reſtraining the licentiouſneſs of the preſs, and hoped they would endeavour to ſuppreſs pernicious libels; but above all, ſhe recommended union among themſelves; and concluded with acquainting them, that ſhe would apply her ſhare of the prizes taken during the war to the public ſervice.

The troubles and diſputes in Scotland were now riſen to ſuch a height, that it was feared the contagion would be propagated in England. The queen, deſirous of putting an end to all differences between the two kingdoms, had made an attempt to unite them, and an act of parliament was paſſed for that purpoſe. But though the Scots acknowledged her authority, and ſwore obedience, they ſeemed averſe to the project. They gave inceſſant inſtances of their inquietude, jealouſy, and the animoſity of parties, during a long ſeſſion of their parliament. The antient genius of the nation ſhewed its turbulent activity. Bills followed bills without number; the ſpirit of party had infected all their deliberations. One Fletcher, a furious and intrepid republican, aſſerted, that Scotland would be enſlaved if ſhe ſubmitted to the ſucceſſor of the crown of England without previouſly eſtabliſhing ſuch conditions of government as might ſerve her as a rampart againſt the Engliſh miniſtry. The conditions he propoſed for the queen's ſucceſſors were, That all places civil and military, together with all penſions, ſhould be conferred by parliament; that the preſident ſhould be choſen by the aſſembly; that during the receſs of parliament a committee of thirty-ſix members ſhould have the adminiſtration of government under the prince, ſhould act in quality of his council, and be accountable to the parliament of Scotland. He alſo propoſed that the ſucceſſor ſhould be elected by a majority of voices; and declared he would rather nominate a papiſt with theſe conditions, than a good proteſtant without them. Theſe propoſitions, however extravagant they may appear, were ſupported by a ſtrong party in the Scottiſh parliament, and they were reduced into the form of a bill. Fletcher had many imitators and many friends. The cry of liberty, and invective againſt the miniſter echoed from every part of the houſe. At laſt the queſtion was put whether they ſhould take into conſideration the ſupplies, or the ſtate of the nation. One of the members ſaid, that all the fruit of the labours and expences of the nation was only to burden them with freſh ſupplies, and bend their necks to the yoke of ſervitude. Another added that their liberties were deſtroyed, and that the privileges of parliament would ſoon ſhare the ſame fate; but that he would defend his own rights at the hazard of his life, and rather die a freeman than live a ſlave. The duke of Queenſberry, the queen's commiſſioner, oppoſed the deliberations on Fletcher's bill. This exaſperated the party ſtill more, and the earl of Roxborough declared, that if there were no other means of obtaining a right ſo eſſential to parliament, it ſhould be ſought by the ſword. The whole houſe was now in the higheſt ferment, and the duke of Queenſberry in the utmoſt danger of being cut to pieces. He however, appeaſed the ſtorm by promiſing that they ſhould purſue their meaſures in favour of liberty; and taking advantage of this interval of quiet, he prorogued the parliament.

In the mean time the greateſt preparations were making for the enſuing campaign. It had been agreed that the archduke Charles, ſon to the emperor, ſhould aſſume the title of king of Spain, demand the infanta of Portugal in marriage, and with the aſſiſtance of the maritime powers, undertake ſome enterprize of importance. The emperor had alſo promiſed to ſend ſo powerful an army into the field as to be able to drive the elector of Bavaria from his dominions; but he was ſo dilatory in his proceedings, that the French king broke all his meaſures by ſending a powerful reinforcement to the elector under the command of marſhal Villars. The imperialiſts were defeated near Donavert; the duke of Burgundy made himſelf maſter of Old Briſac; Tallard took Landau, and gained a victory over the prince of Heſſe. The emperor, who had now declared his ſon king of Spain by the title of Charles III. trembled for his empire.

The duke of Marlborough was the only ſucceſsful commander among the allies: that able general made himſelf maſter of Bon, Huy, and Limbourg. The Dutch general, Opdam, was defeated by the marſhal Boufflers, near Eckeren. Nor were the naval operations this year ſucceſsful. Hardly any thing was done againſt the enemy: Sir George Rooke, indeed, in a cruiſe to the bay of Biſcay, took a French Eaſt-India ſhip, worth 100,000 pounds, a man of war of thirty-ſix guns, and a Weſt-India merchantman, worth 40,000 pounds. But having been for ſome time in an ill ſtate of health, he returned home, and obtained leave to go to Bath.

By the ill ſucceſs of this campaign, Lewis was ſtill able to make head againſt the united efforts of the grand alliance: it was therefore reſolved to weaken him by detaching from his intereſt two of his principal allies, viz. the duke of Savoy and the king of Portugal. The project ſucceeded; and Lewis, with amazement, heard, that the duke of Savoy was in actual treaty with the emperor. He immediately ſent orders to the duke of Vendoſme to ſeize and diſarm the troops of Savoy that were in his ſervice, to the number of 22,000 men. The duke, by way of repriſal, commanded ſeveral French officers that were in Turin, and the French ambaſſador himſelf, to be put under arreſt. This proceeding produced a ſecond order from Lewis to the duke of Vendoſme, to invade Savoy immediately, and to tranſmit the following letter, in his moſt Chriſtian majeſty's name, to his royal highneſs.

" Sir,

" If neither religion, honour, intereſt, alliance, or even your own hand-writing, are of any force between us, I ſend my couſin, the duke of Vendoſme, at the head of my armies, to make known unto you my intentions. He will allow you but twenty-four hours to reſolve what you have to do.

" Lewis."

In return to this conciſe epiſtle, the duke of Savoy publiſhed a manifeſto, ſetting forth the neceſſity and juſtice of his proceedings, and ſent expreſſes to the confederated powers to ſolicit their aſſiſtance againſt the impending ſtorm.

Queen Anne, knowing the importance of the duke, as well as his ſelfiſh diſpoſition, aſſured him of her protection, and both ſhe and the ſtates ſent ambaſſadors to the court of Turin. In the mean time the duke concluded a treaty with the court of Vienna, who promiſed him all that France and Spain had refuſed him, viz. Montſerrat, Mantua, Alexandria, Valencia, and the countries between the Po and the Tanaro, with more money than he received from France in ſubſidies. The money was to be furniſhed by England, for the emperor had ſcarcely ſufficient to pay his troops. In return the duke of Savoy acknowledged the archduke Charles as king of Spain, and prepared for the event.

Scarce had France received intelligence that ſhe had loſt this ally, but ſhe alſo heard that Portugal had deſerted her. Mr. Methuen, our ambaſſador at that court, had ſpared no pains to detach his Moſt Faithful Majeſty from his unnatural connections with the grand monarch. He repreſented to him, that ſhould the crowns of France and Spain ever devolve upon the ſame perſon, he muſt not expect to remain long a king. He alarmed his apprehenſions for his preſent ſafety, by painting to him in the moſt ſtriking colours, the acknowledged ſuperiority of the confederates by ſea, the weight of whoſe power he muſt certainly expect to feel, ſhould he at any time, in conſequence of an alliance with France, refuſe them the free uſe of his ports, and that his compliance with ſuch a demand would, on the other hand, render his friendſhip to France of little account. Theſe arguments had their full weight with his Portugueſe majeſty, who was moreover allured by the proſpect of a match between the infanta his daughter and the archduke Charles, to whom the emperor and the king of the Romans ſhould transfer all their pretenſions to the crown of Spain. A treaty was now ſet on foot, and ſoon concluded at Liſbon, between the emperor, the queen of Great Britain, the king of Portugal, and the ſtates-general. In this treaty it was ſtipulated, that king Charles ſhould be conveyed to Portugal by a powerful fleet, having on board 12,000 ſoldiers, with a great ſupply of arms and ammunition, and that 28,000 Portugueſe ſhould be ready to join him immediately at Liſbon.

In conſequence of theſe arrangements, the emperor made great preparations for ſending his ſon to Portugal, by way of Holland, and at the ſame time diſpatched letters to his Portugueſe majeſty and the queen of Great Britain, recommending him to their protection. About the middle of September, king Charles ſet out from Vienna for Holland, and paſſing through the territories of the elector of Hanover, was met by that prince, who complimented him on his acceſſion. At Duſſeldorp he was viſited by the elector Palatine and the duke of Marlborough, the latter of whom made him compliments of congratulation in the name of the queen. On the 2d of November his majeſty arrived at the Hague, where he repreſented to the ſtates, that the province of Limburgh belonged to him as king of Spain, and deſired he might have the civil government thereof; which the ſtates complying with, his majeſty appointed count Zinzerdorf to take poſſeſſion of the town and province of Limburgh in his name.

On the 9th of November the queen opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, wherein ſhe took notice of the declaration by the duke of Savoy, and the treaty with Portugal, as circumſtances very advantageous to the allies: ſhe told them, "that no proviſion was made for the expedition to Liſbon and the augmentation of the land forces, the funds had anſwered ſo well, and the prizes had turned out ſo valuable, that the public had not incurred any debt by thoſe additional ſervices: that ſhe had contributed, out of her own revenue, to ſupport the circle of Suabia, whoſe firm adherence to the alliance deſerved a reaſonable aſſiſtance: that ſhe would not engage in any unneceſſary expence of her own, that ſhe might have the more to ſpare towards the eaſe of her ſubjects: that ſhe recommended a union among themſelves, a diſpatch in the buſineſs before them, and above all deſired they would avoid all heats or bickerings that might give encouragement to the common enemies of the church and ſtate."

Both houſes preſented addreſſes of thanks to her majeſty for her ſpeech, much to the ſame effect. The commons, in theirs, acknowledged her goodneſs for having engaged the king of Portugal and the duke of Savoy in the alliance; for contributing part of her own revenue to the public ſervice, and for her aſſiſtance to the circle of Suabia; and they aſſured her, that they would ſupport her majeſty in her alliance, and enable her to carry on the war with vigour.

The treaty with Portugal being now laid before the lower houſe, and duly conſidered, they voted 40,000 men, including 5,000 marines, for the ſea ſervice of the enſuing year; the like number of land forces to act in conjunction with the allies, beſides the additional 10,000; and they reſolved that the proportion to be employed in Portugal ſhould amount to 8,000. For the maintenance of theſe armaments, as well as for the diſcharge of the ſubſidies, payable to her majeſty's allies, they granted the ſum of 3,881,006l. 15s. They likewiſe preſented an addreſs to the queen, in which they aſſured her, that they would provide for the ſupport of ſuch alliances as ſhe had made or ſhould make with the duke of Savoy.

About this time, Simon Frazer, lord Lovat, and two other perſons, were ſent over from St. Germains to Scotland, with inſtructions to learn the ſtrength and ſentiments of the clans, and endeavour to perſuade ſome of the nobility and leading men to enter into a deſign the French had formed of reſtoring the pretender to the crown of that kingdom. Frazer had undertaken to raiſe a body of 12,000 highlanders, and Lewis was to aſſiſt them with ſome French troops. Frazer was no ſooner landed in Scotland than he waited privately upon the duke of Queenſberry, and informed him of the whole tranſaction, at the ſame time delivering him a letter from the late king James's queen, directed to the marquis of Athol. This letter was couched in general terms, that might have been addreſſed to any of the nobility, and the direction was written in a different hand, ſo that it was generally believed that Frazer, who had a private pique againſt the marquis, had forged it, in order to wreak his vengeance upon him. In conſequence of this ſervice, and of the informer's promiſing to make him acquainted with the whole correſpondence between the pretender and his friends in Scotland, Queenſberry provided him with a paſs, under favour of which he made a progreſs through the highlands, to ſound the chieftains. He afterwards propoſed a ſecond journey to France, pretending that he ſhould then be able to make more material diſcoveries, and the duke procured a paſs for him, under a feigned name, from the earl of Nottingham, ſecretary of ſtate. The duke had already imparted the diſcovery to her majeſty, but, at the requeſt of the informer, had concealed his name. The queen was the more readily induced to credit the particulars, on account of the evidence given by Sir John Maclean, who had lately come over from France to England, and had been apprehended at Folkſtone in Kent, from whence he was brought to London, in cuſtody of the queen's meſſengers. A perſon named Keith was apprehended at the ſame time, as was Mr. Lindſey, who had been under ſecretary to king James and the pretender. James Boucher, who had been aid de camp to the duke of Berwick, was taken on the coaſt of Suſſex, coming over from France. Such a number of rebels and outlaws coming over at this time, tended to confirm the truth of a conſpiracy being in agitation, though they made uſe of the ſpecious pretence, that their only deſign was to live peaceably at home, under her majeſty's government, for the future. Sir John Maclean, being examined at the earl of Nottingham's office, ſaid, that he was going to Scotland to take the benefit of the queen's pardon; but afterwards both he and Keith being more cloſely interrogated, acknowledged that they had heard ſome conſultations at St. Germain's concerning the ſending a body of troops to join the mal-contents in Scotland, but declared there was no other deſign on foot at this time, than to pave the way for the pretender's aſcending the throne after the queen's deceaſe. But now one Ferguſon, who had been concerned in almoſt every jacobite plot, came in voluntarily, and declared that Frazer had been employed by the duke of Queenſberry to draw ſome perſons whom that nobleman had a diſlike to, into a plot, but that there was in reality no ſuch thing in agitation. Theſe aſſurances, however, gained little credit, and the houſe of lords, taking theſe matters into conſideration, reſolved, that a committee ſhould be appointed to examine into the particulars, and ordered that Sir John Maclean and the other emiſſaries ſhould be taken into the cuſtody of the black rod, and no perſon admitted to ſpeak to them. This ſtep greatly offended her majeſty; ſhe thinking it too officious an interpoſition to take them out of the hands of her meſſengers, informed the lords, "that ſhe thought it would be inconvenient to change the method of examination already begun, and that ſhe would, in a ſhort time, inform the houſe of the whole affair."

On the 17th of December, the queen went to the houſe of peers, and, in a ſpeech which ſhe made, informed both houſes, "that ſhe had unqueſtionable Information of the practices and deſigns carried on by the emiſſaries of France and Scotland, which might have proved extremely dangerous to the peace of theſe kingdoms, as they would ſee by the particulars, which ſhould be laid before them as ſoon as the examination could be carefully perfected, and made public without prejudice, and that, in the mean time, ſhe doubted not but, by this timely diſcovery, ſhe ſhould be able to give ſuch directions for their ſecurity, as would effectually prevent any ill conſequences from theſe pernicious deſigns." Notwithſtanding this ſpeech, the lords perſiſted in their reſolution to bring the enquiry into their own houſe, and proceeded to name their committee by ballot. The choice fell upon the dukes of Somerſet and Devon, the earls of Sunderland and Scarborough, and the lords Somers, Townſhend and Wharton.

The commons (who were far from being on good terms with the lords) knowing that the queen was diſpleaſed with their proceedings, preſented an addreſs on the 23d of December, in which they expreſſed the juſt concern they were under to ſee her royal prerogative violated. They ſaid they were ſurprized to find that when ſeveral perſons, ſuſpected of treaſonable practices, were taken into cuſtody by her majeſty's meſſengers, in order to be examined, the lords, in violation of the known laws of the land, had wreſted them out of her majeſty's hands, and without her leave or knowledge, in a moſt extraordinary manner, taken the examination of them ſolely to themſelves, whereby a due enquiry into the evil practices and deſigns againſt her majeſty's perſon and government might, in a great meaſure, be obſtructed. They deſired her majeſty, that ſhe would ſuffer no diminution of her prerogative, in the exerciſe whereof they were reſolved to ſupport her, as well as in carrying on the war.

Fired with indignation at the charge brought againſt them by the commons, the lords reſolved to vindicate their honour, and exert their privileges. Accordingly they came to the following reſolution, "That by the known laws and cuſtoms of parliament, they had an undoubted right, whenever they conceived it to be for the ſafety of the crown and the kingdom, to take examination of perſons charged with criminal matters, whether they be in cuſtody or not, and to order that ſuch perſons as are to be examined, be taken into cuſtody by the ſworn officers of the crown, attending that houſe; and that the ſaid addreſs of the commons was unparliamentary, groundleſs, without precedent, &c." This reſolution they ſupported by a remonſtrance to the queen, couched in the ſtrongeſt terms, and expreſſed in the moſt elegant ſtile.

In anſwer to this remonſtrance, her majeſty obſerved, that ſhe was ſorry for any miſunderſtanding that might happen between the two houſes of parliament, as it interrupted the public buſineſs, and gave her ſo much uneaſineſs: that ſhe could not avoid taking notice with particular ſatisfaction, of the aſſurances their lordſhips gave her, that they would carefully avoid every thing that had the leaſt tendency to occaſion them. She thanked them for the concern they expreſſed for the rights of the crown, and her prerogative, which ſhe declared ſhe ſhould never exert ſo willingly, as for the good of her ſubjects and the protection of their liberties."

When the commons peruſed the remonſtrance of the lords, they preſented another to the queen, in vindication of their own conduct; but this was couched in the language of irritated faction, by which, indeed, both houſes were too much actuated.

The anſwer returned by the queen to the commons was nearly the ſame with that ſhe had before returned to the lords. The commons, upon this, preſented an addreſs to her majeſty, praying her to re-aſſume the juſt exerciſe of her prerogative, and take upon herſelf the examination of the conſpiracy; declaring that the eſtabliſhing a committee of ſeven lords, for the ſole examination of the conſpiracy, was of dangerous conſequence, and might tend to the ſubverſion of the government.

A. D. 1704. The lords, however, notwithſtanding the addreſs of the commons, proceeded in their re-examination of the Scottiſh plot; and on the 29th of January the earl of Nottingham acquainted them, that the queen had commanded him to lay before them the account, containing all the papers hitherto diſcovered in relation to that affair; but that there was one circumſtance that could not be properly communicated, without running a riſk of preventing a diſcovery of much greater importance.

Keith, who accompanied Frazer over to England, had, it ſeems, tampered with his uncle, to diſcloſe the whole ſecret of the correſpondence between the court of St. Germains and the Scottiſh jacobites. This was the circumſtance the queen was deſirous of concealing, till the ſucceſs of her endeavours ſhould be known, and which at laſt proved abortive. But the lords, not ſatisfied with the reſerve, preſented an addreſs, deſiring that all the papers, without diſtinction, might be ſubmitted to their inſpection, in order to enable them to penetrate to the bottom of this conſpiracy before the concluſion of the ſeſſion.

The queen conſidered this application as an affront, and returned for anſwer, "that ſhe did not expect to be preſſed in this manner immediately after the declaration ſhe had made; but hoped, that before the end of the ſeſſion ſhe ſhould be able to inform them of thoſe particulars which could not at preſent be publiſhed without the moſt palpable inconvenience." The queen, however, a few days after ſent the papers ſealed to the houſe; and all the lords were ſummoned to attend on the 8th of February, that they might be then opened and examined.

The lords being aſſembled according to the ſummons, they began with the moſt material paper, drawn up by the earl of Nottingham, entitled, "An account of the conſpiracy in Scotland," and was an abſtract of all the examinations the council had taken. They then proceeded to examine Sir John Maclean, who mentioned ſeveral circumſtances not to be found in Nottingham's paper. He named the perſons who ſat in council at St. Germains: he ſaid the command of the troops agreed to be ſent over to Scotland from France, was offered to the duke of Berwick, who thought proper to ſuſpend his acceptance, till trial ſhould be made, whether the duke of Hamilton, whom he judged the more proper perſon, would refuſe it: he likewiſe explained the particular directions which had been ſent to Scotland, in order to prevent the eſtabliſhing the ſucceſſion in that kingdom.

Theſe material omiſſions in Nottingham's paper cauſed many ſevere reflections on the conduct of that nobleman. It was even moved to cenſure the account he had given; but on the queſtion being put, it was carried in the negative by eleven voices.

Having finiſhed the examinations, the lords voted, that there had been dangerous plots between ſome perſons in Scotland and the courts of France and St. Germains; and that the encouragement for this plotting aroſe, from not ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown in the houſe of Hanover. Theſe votes were ſignified to the queen in an addreſs, and the lords promiſed, that when this ſucceſſion ſhould be once ſettled, they would endeavour to promote the union of the two kingdoms, upon juſt and honourable terms.

During theſe diſputes between the two houſes of parliament, her majeſty ſent a meſſage to the commons, in which ſhe told them, "that having maturely conſidered the mean and inſignificant maintenance appointed for the clergy, in various parts of the kingdom, ſhe had remitted the arrears of the firſt fruits and tenths, to the ſaid poor clergy: that ſhe would grant her whole revenue ariſing out of this fund, as far as it ſhould become free from incumbrances, towards an augmentation of their maintenance; and that if the houſe of commons could diſcover any method by which her good intentions towards the clergy could be rendered more effectual, it would be at once a great advantage to the public and very acceptable to herſelf."

The commons, on receiving this meſſage, voted an addreſs to the queen, in which they expreſſed their thanks for her gracious meſſage, and her pious concern for increaſing the maintenance of the poor clergy out of her own revenue; and aſſured her majeſty they would do their utmoſt to make her majeſty's charitable intentions more effectual. Accordingly a bill was brought in "for making more effectual her majeſty's gracious intentions for the augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy, by enabling her majeſty to grant in perpetuity the revenue of the firſt-fruits and tenths." They alſo repealed the ſtatute of mortmain ſo far, as to give free liberty to all men, either by deed or their wills, to give what they thought proper towards the augmentation of benefices. This part of the bill was ſtrongly oppoſed in the houſe of lords, where it was alledged it would be opening a door for the clergy to practiſe on the weakneſs of dying men. This argument was not, however, ſtrong enough to gain over the majority: the bill paſſed both houſes, and afterwards received the royal aſſent.

The queen exerted herſelf to bring about a reconciliation between the two houſes, but in vain. Their animoſities, however, did not indeed hinder the more eſſential buſineſs of the nation; but as it was feared they might be productive of very fatal conſequences, the queen determined to put an end to the ſeſſion of parliament, which was accordingly done on the 3d of April, when her majeſty, after thanking them for the large ſupplies they had granted, and the diſpatch they had given to the public buſineſs, added, "At the opening of this ſeſſion, I earneſtly expreſſed my deſires of ſeeing you in perfect union among yourſelves, as the moſt effectual means imaginable to diſappoint the ambition of our enemies, and reduce them to an honourable and laſting peace. And though this has not met with the ſucceſs I wiſhed and expected, yet being fully convinced that nothing is ſo neceſſary to our common welfare, I am not diſcouraged from perſiſting in the ſame earneſt deſires, that you would go down into your ſeveral counties ſo diſpoſed to moderation and unity as becomes all thoſe who are joined in the ſame religion and intereſt.

"This I am perſuaded will make you ſenſible, that nothing, next to the bleſſing of God, can ſo much contribute to our ſucceſs abroad and ſafety at home."

The affairs of Scotland alſo gave her majeſty great uneaſineſs. In order to ſettle the ferments in that kingdom, where the thirſt of independence was grown outrageous, ſhe conſented to an act of ſurety, which had paſſed the Scottiſh parliament. The purport of this act was, that in caſe the queen died without iſſue, the parliament ſhould immediately aſſemble and nominate a ſucceſſor to the crown, diſtinctly from the crown of England, unleſs a national eſtabliſhment, conformable to the laws of the country, and independent of the Engliſh councils, previouſly took place, and the court had not given the people a power to arm in their defence. Lord Godolphin, then prime-miniſter, adviſed her majeſty to yield, on this occaſion, to the neceſſity of circumſtances; though by this proceeding he expoſed himſelf greatly to the cenſure of the tories.

By this time the emperor's affairs were in the moſt deplorable ſituation. Preſſed on one ſide by the Hungarians who had ſhaken off the yoke, and under prince Ragotſki, were fighting for their liberty; and on the other by the elector of Bavaria, who held every thing upon the Danube, and threatened Vienna itſelf with a ſiege; he had no other reſource than that of imploring the aſſiſtance of her Britannic Majeſty. The duke of Marlborough ſtrongly preſſed the neceſſity of ſending immediate aſſiſtance to the emperor, and the queen accordingly returned a favourable anſwer to the memorial of that diſtreſſed prince. Marlborough arrived at the Hague about the beginning of May, and repreſented, in the ſtrongeſt terms, to the ſtates-general the danger which the empire, and even all Europe were threatened, if an immediate check was not given to the French and Bavarians in Germany. The ſtates, perſuaded that it would be bad policy to oppoſe him, though they were very deſirous of keeping the army in Flanders, gave their conſent; and prepared for carrying into execution the plan he had formed, that of marching into the heart of Germany, and delivering the houſe of Auſtria from impending ruin.

The duke marched with ſuch expedition that he reached Mildenheim on the 10th of June; where he was viſited by prince Eugene, and the next day by prince Lewis of Baden. A long conſultation was held by the generals, in which it was agreed that prince Eugene ſhould command a ſeparate army on the Rhine, and that the duke and prince Lewis ſhould command alternately. The march was proſecuted with the utmoſt expedition, till they reached the banks of the Danube, near Donawert, oppoſite to the Bavarian lines, where about 8000 French and as many Bavarians lay intrenched to guard the country they had conquered. Alarmed at the approach of the allies, the duke of Bavaria ſent a detachment of his beſt troops to reinforce count d'Arco, who was poſted at Schellenberg, a riſing ground on the Danube, near Donawert. As that poſt was of very great importance, d'Arco had, for ſome time, employed his troops in throwing up entrenchments. Marlborough knowing his works were not completed, reſolved, if poſſible, to drive the enemy from their poſt. Accordingly, on the 6th of July, at three in the morning, he advanced at the head of a detachment of 600 foot, 30 ſquadrons of Engliſh and Dutch, and three battalions of imperial grenadiers, the reſt of the army following with the greateſt diligence. But the diſtance, badneſs of the road, and other incidents, ſo greatly retarded his march, that it was three in the afternoon before the artillery paſſed the river Wermitz, which runs by Donawert.

At length the attack was begun with the utmoſt intrepidity, by the Engliſh and Dutch, before the Imperialiſts could come up. The enemy made a gallant reſiſtance; but prince Lewis leading up the Imperialiſts, the entrenchments were forced; a terrible ſlaughter enſued; and the greater part of the enemy puſhed into the Danube, where numbers of them periſhed. The victory was complete; and the troops that had the good fortune to reach the oppoſite ſide of the Danube, fled in the utmoſt confuſion. Sixteen pieces of cannon and thirteen ſtandards were taken. Donawert immediately ſurrendered; and the elector of Bavaria, informed of the defeat of his troops, repaſſed the Danube, marched with the utmoſt precipitation, and encamped under the cannon of Augſburg. He was offered very advantageous terms, provided he would abandon the French intereſt, and join the grand alliance. At firſt the elector ſeemed to liſten to the propoſal; but being informed that marſhal Tallard had paſſed the Black Foreſt, and was advancing, by forced marches, to his aſſiſtance, he broke off the negotiation, declaring, that ſince the French monarch made ſuch powerful efforts to ſupport him, he thought himſelf obliged in honour to remain firm to his alliance. This conduct of the elector was highly reſented by the confederate generals, who detached thirty ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons to lay waſte the country of Bavaria, to the very walls of its capital.

The utmoſt vigilance was exerted by prince Eugene for preventing marſhal Tallard from joining the duke of Bavaria; but all his endeavours proved abortive. The junction was made at Biberach, near Ulm, about the end of July. Marlborough immediately left his camp, and joined prince Eugene at Munſter; while prince Lewis of Baden formed the ſiege of Ingoldſtadt.

On the 12th of Auguſt, Marlborough and Eugene reconnoitred the camp of the enemy, whom they found advantageouſly poſted on a hill near Hochſtet, their right being covered by the Danube and the village of Blenheim; their left by the village of Lutzingen; and their front by a rivulet, the banks of which were ſteep, and the bottom very marſhy. This advantageous ſituation did not, however, intimidate theſe two great generals: they reſolved to attack the enemy before they had time to fortify their camp; advice having been received that Villeroy was on his march for Wirtemberg, in order to deſtroy that country, and cut off the communication of the allies from the Rhine, which muſt have been attended with very fatal conſequences, could it have been effected. Orders were therefore iſſued that very night for all the baggage of the army to be ſent towards Donawert, and the troops ready to march by break of day. About ſeven in the morning of the 13th of Auguſt the allies appeared in ſight of the enemy's camp, where every thing was in a profound ſilence; not imagining the allies would dare to attack them in ſo advantageous a poſt. They were therefore thrown into the utmoſt confuſion at the appearance of our troops: they diſcharged two pieces of cannon to call in their foraging parties, and ſet fire to ſeveral ſmall villages that were between them and the allied army.

About nine in the morning the canonading began, on both ſides, and continued, without intermiſſion, till one in the afternoon. The French and Bavarian armies conſiſted of near 60,000 men. The right wing was commanded by marſhal Tallard, and the left by the elector of Bavaria, aſſiſted by Manſin. The confederate army did not exceed 50,000 men. Prince Eugene commanded on the right; the lords Cutts and Orkney, the generals Churchill, Lumley and Ingoldſby, the left; and the duke of Marlborough, as commander of the whole, took his ſtation in the center.

Such was the ſituation of the two armies when the battle began about one o'clock in the afternoon of the 13th of Auguſt. There was a neceſſity for croſſing the rivulet already mentioned before the allies could attack the enemy, who had taken care to guard it with three ſquadrons of horſe, under the command of M. de Zurlauben, a Bavarian general, who fell ſo vigorouſly on the allies, that they were obliged thrice to give ground; but this handful of men not being properly ſupported, they were ſoon overpowered by numbers, and driven from their poſt. Had the French generals properly ſupported theſe brave troops, the allies would not have found the paſſage of the rivulet an eaſy taſk; but by neglecting this, they committed an error they could never retrieve. Their artillery played very hotly, but did very little execution; and the paſſage of the rivulet was effected in the face of the enemy. As ſoon as the center and part of the right had paſſed the rivulet in different places, they formed on the other ſide, without any interruption from the enemy, who remained quiet on the hills. Marlborough immediately led his troops to the attack of Tallard's cavalry. The French ſtood the ſhock, with great firmneſs, for ſome time; but were at laſt broken, and forced to give way. Tallard flew immediately to the village of Blenheim, where he had poſted twenty-ſeven battalions and twelve ſquadrons. Theſe troops formed a diſtinct army, and kept up a continued fire on Marlborough's diviſion, while he attacked the right wing. Tallard, having given his orders in the village, haſtened back to the place of action, where the duke, with a body of horſe and ſome battalions of foot between the ſquadrons, was driving the French cavalry before him, and which Tallard could not prevent.

In the mean time the cavalry of the confederates left wing, being now completely formed, aſcended the hill of Lutzingen with aſtoniſhing intrepidity, and charged the enemy's horſe with ſuch fury, that though they rallied ſeveral times, they were obliged at laſt to betake themſelves to flight. The victorious Marlborough now forced his way between the two bodies of the French army on one ſide, while the reſt of the generals got between the village of Blenheim, and Tallard's diviſion on the other. In this deſperate ſituation, Tallard flew to rally ſome of his broken ſquadrons; but the badneſs of his ſight completed his misfortune. He miſtook a ſquadron of Heſſians for his own forces, and was taken priſoner, together with many officers of diſtinction.

Prince Eugene had attempted the paſſage of the rivulet at a place where the banks of the ſtream were very ſteep, and the bottom rough and uneven. The leaſt oppoſition on the part of the enemy muſt, therefore, have rendered his efforts fruitleſs, and obliged him to retire and ſeek a more favourable ſpot for the execution of his purpoſe; but the enemy made none. He had no ſooner reached the oppoſite bank, than he attacked the left wing, commanded by marſhal Marſin, with the utmoſt vigour. But the imperial horſe behaved very ill on this occaſion; they were ſo intimidated by the conſtant fire of the enemy, that they could not be brought to advance within muſket-ſhot. The Daniſh and Pruſſian troops alſo gave back in the ſame manner; but being at length animated by the gallant example of their officers, they flew to the charge, and exerted themſelves with ſo much vigour, that they put the enemy to flight; and Marſin finding it in vain to make any farther reſiſtance, abandoned Oberklau and Lutzingen, and was purſued as far as the villages of Morſelingen and Teiſſenhoven, whence he retired to Dillingen and Lavingen. The route now became general through the whole French and Bavarian armies: every one fled with the greateſt precipitation; numbers ran headlong into the Danube and periſhed.

The count de Bourg ſaved a ſmall part of the infantry by retreating over the marſhes of Hochſtet. But the little army cooped up in Blenheim was forgot. It conſiſted of twenty-ſeven battalions, and twelve ſquadrons, amounting in the whole to about 11,000 effective men, and the beſt troops in France. They were waiting at Blenheim for orders, and knew nothing of the rout of their army, till they were ſurrounded by the allies. It was impoſſible for them to make any effectual reſiſtance: the ſtreets were too narrow for them to form; and their own artillery, now in the hands of the allies, would ſoon have decided the conteſt. They, therefore, thought proper to lay down their arms and ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war.

Such was the event of the celebrated battle of Blenheim, or, as the French call it, the battle of Hochſtet; where the allies gained one of the moſt glorious and complete victories. The French army was almoſt entirely deſtroyed: of 60,000 men, ſo long accuſtomed to victory, not above 20,000 could be collected after the battle. Ten thouſand French and Bavarians Bavarians were killed on the ſpot; the greater part of thirty ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons periſhed in the Danube; 13,000 were made priſoners, including 1200 officers: the allies took 100 pieces of cannon, with 21 mortars, 129 colours, 110 ſtandards, 17 pair of kettle-drums, 3600 tents, 34 coaches, 300 loaded mules, two bridges of boats, and 15 pontoons; together with 24 barrels and 8 caſks of ſilver. The loſs of the allies amounted to about 5000 men killed, and 8000 wounded and taken priſoners.

The duke of Bavaria was obliged to fly, and abandon his country to the conquerors, who penetrated into Alſace, took Landau, and ſcattered terror in every region through which they paſſed. Marlborough ſignalized himſelf in the action, no leſs by his courage than by his military talents. His priſoner, Tallard, complimenting him on having conquered the beſt troops in the world, he anſwered, that his own were certainly better, becauſe they had conquered them. Marlborough received a recompence worthy of his ſervices. The emperor created him a prince of the empire; the ſtates received him with the ſame reſpect as if he had been the ſtadtholder; and his country received him with every demonſtration of joy.

The campaign in Portugal was far from being ſucceſsful. To fight in conjunction with heretics was conſidered by the Portugueſe as a kind of apoſtacy. It was therefore in vain to hope for ſucceſs: and accordingly, inſtead of making conqueſts in Spain, ſeveral of the towns of Portugal were taken by the enemy. The duke of Schomberg, who commanded the allied army, was ſo enraged at the behaviour of the Portugueſe, that he deſired leave to reſign his commiſſion. His requeſt was granted, and the earl of Galway ſent over to ſucceed him, with eight thouſand Dutch troops, who reached Liſbon the beginning of Auguſt.

The operations at ſea this year were very conſiderable. Sir George Rooke cruiſed for ſome time on the coaſt of Portugal; but being requeſted to aſſiſt in executing a deſign on Barcelona, projected by the prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt, he readily gave his conſent, and took on board that prince with a detachment of land forces; but the attempt proving fruitleſs, he croſſed the Mediterranean, and came to an anchor in the road of Tetuan.

A council of war was now held on board the admiral's ſhip, where it was determined to make an attempt on Gibraltar, which was known to be ſlightly garriſoned. The next day the whole fleet got under ſail, and on the 21ſt of July came to an anchor in Gibraltar bay. The land forces, amounting to 1800, with the prince of Heſſe at their head, were landed, about four in the afternoon, on the neck of land to the northward of the town, in order to cut off all communication with the country. A ſummons was now ſent to the governor to ſurrender the town; but he anſwered he would defend it to the laſt extremity. The next morning the cannonade from the ſhips began with the utmoſt fury; and it was ſoon perceived that the Spaniards were driven from the ſouth mole head; on which all the boats of the fleet were manned and armed, and took poſſeſſion of the fortifications. The Spaniards immediately ſprung a mine, which deſtroyed all the fortifications on the mole, killed two lieutenants and forty men, and wounded about ſixty. The ſeamen, however, kept their poſt; and having made themſelves maſters of a redoubt between the mole and the town, they turned the cannon againſt the enemy. A peremptory ſummons was now ſent to the governor, who, on the 24th in the morning, capitulated, and the prince of Heſſe took poſſeſſion of the place.

The town of Gibraltar being thus reduced, the admiral ſailed again into the Mediterranean, in order, if poſſible, to meet with the French fleet, that had, for ſome time, been lying at Toulon. He diſcovered them on the 11th of Auguſt, and on the 13th they were not above three leagues diſtant, and a little to the weſtward of Malaga. They now drew up in a line of battle, and lay ready to receive him. Their fleet conſiſted of fifty-two ſhips and twenty-four gallies, and the Engliſh of fifty-three ſhips. Sir George Rooke, aſſiſted by the rear-admirals Byng and Dilkes, commanded in the center; Sir Cloudeſly Shovel and Sir John Leake led the van; and the Dutch formed the rear.

About four in the morning the action began, when the van and rear preſſed forward to a cloſe engagement, and ſoon obliged that part of the French line to give way; but the French center ſtood firm, and the fight was maintained with the greateſt obſtinacy till night obliged them to deſiſt. The French took advantage of the night to bear away to leeward; and the wind ſhifting before the day appeared, they were ſeen at leaſt three leagues to windward. Both ſpent the day in repairing the damages they had ſuſtained; and in the night the French ſtood away farther to the northward; nor could the Engliſh bring them to an engagement, though they followed them two days for that purpoſe. In conſequence of this Sir George ſailed to Gibraltar to refit, and leaving a ſquadron of eighteen ſhips under Sir John Leake, ſet ſail for England, where he arrived in the beginning of September.

The parliament met on the 24th of October, and the ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, in which her majeſty obſerved, that the great and remarkable ſucceſs with which God had bleſſed her arms, infuſed an unanimous joy through the whole kingdom; and that a timely improvement of the preſent advantages would enable her to procure a laſting foundation of ſecurity for England, as well as a firm ſupport for the liberties of Europe. She declared, that her intention was to be kind and indulgent to all her ſubjects. She expreſſed her hope that they would do nothing to endanger the loſs of this opportunity; and that there would be no contention among them but who ſhould do moſt for the public welfare. "Such a temper as this (added ſhe) in all your proceedings, cannot fail of ſecuring your reputation both at home and abroad. This would make me a happy queen, whoſe endeavours ſhall never be wanting to make you a happy and flouriſhing people."

Both houſes waited on her majeſty the next day, with ſeparate addreſſes of thanks for her ſpeech. The lords congratulated her on the great and glorious ſucceſs of her arms under the command of the duke of Marlborough, without mentioning Sir George Rooke; but the commons congratulated her majeſty "as well upon the victory obtained by Sir George Rooke, as upon that obtained by the duke of Marlborough." They alſo aſſured her that they came diſpoſed to do every thing neceſſary for the effectual proſecution of the war, and that they would give ſuch a ſpeedy diſpatch to the public buſineſs as might enable her majeſty to purſue the advantages ſhe had obtained over the common enemy.---They were, indeed, as good as their word; for almoſt 5,000,000 were voted for the ſervice of the enſuing year.

The meaſures of the Scottiſh parliament, the act of ſurety, and the ſeeds of rebellion ſcattered through the kingdom, occaſioned the moſt diſagreeable apprehenſions. The matter was firſt opened in the houſe of peers by lord Haverſham, who obſerved, "that the ſettlement of the ſucceſſion of Scotland had been poſtponed, partly becauſe the miniſtry of that kingdom were weak and divided, and partly from a received opinion that the ſucceſſion was never ſeriouſly and cordially intended by thoſe who managed the affairs of Scotland in the cabinet-council:" he expatiated on the bad conſequences that might attend the act of ſecurity, which he ſtiled a Bill of Excluſion; "for," ſaid he, "can any reaſonable man believe, that thoſe who promoted that bill could ever be real friends to the ſucceſſion as ſettled by the Engliſh parliament?" He particularly mentioned that clauſe by which the heritors and burghs were ordered to exerciſe their fencible men every month: he ſaid, "that the nobility and gentry of Scotland were as learned and brave as any in Europe, and that theſe were generally diſcontented; that the common people were very numerous, very robuſt, and very poor; and aſked, who was the man that could tell what ſuch a multitude, ſo armed and ſo diſciplined, might do under ſuch leaders, ſhould they find opportunities ſuitable to their intentions? Beſides, added he, I look upon it as of the laſt importance to England, that there ſhould not be the leaſt ſhadow or pretence for a neceſſity to keep up a regular ſtanding army in time of peace." Theſe particulars he earneſtly recommended to the conſideration of the houſe, and concluded his ſpeech with the following words of lord Bacon, "Let men beware how they neglect or ſuffer matter of trouble to be prepared, for no man can forbid the ſparks that may ſet all on fire."

This ſpeech produced very warm debates in the houſe of peers, but the majority agreeing with lord Haverſham, they came to the following reſolutions; "That to prevent the inconveniences that might happen by the late act paſſed in Scotland, the queen might be enabled, on the part of England, to name commiſſioners to treat about an entire union with Scotland, provided thoſe powers be not put in execution till commiſſioners ſhould be named on the part of Scotland, by the parliament of that kingdom: that the traffic of cattle from Scotland to England ſhould be ſtopped: that orders ſhould be iſſued for ſeizing ſuch veſſels as ſhould be found trading from Scotland to France, or to the ports of any of her majeſty's enemies: that cruiſers ſhould be appointed for that purpoſe: and that exportation of Engliſh wool into Scotland ſhould be prohibited." On theſe reſolutions a bill for an union with Scotland was brought into the houſe, and being paſſed by the lords, it was ſent down to the commons, received the ſanction of that houſe, and afterwards the royal aſſent.

A. D. 1705. The duke of Marlborough being now returned home, at his firſt appearance in the houſe of peers, the lord-keeper, in the name of the whole houſe, congratulated him upon his ſucceſſes in the late campaign, and returned him their thanks for his ſignal ſervices. A committee of the houſe of commons alſo waited on his grace with the thanks of that houſe, and to congratulate him on his ſucceſſes: they alſo preſented an addreſs to the queen, intreating her to conſider of ſome proper means to perpetuate the memory of ſuch noble actions. On the 17th of January the queen returned an anſwer by the chancellor of the exchequer, in which ſhe acquainted the houſe, that ſhe was willing to grant the intereſt of the crown in the honour and manor of Woodſtock and hundred of Wooton, to the duke of Marlborough and his heirs; and that as the lieutenancy and rangerſhip of the parks, with the rents and profits of the manors and hundreds were already granted for two lives, ſhe judged it proper to remove that incumbrance, and deſired the aſſiſtance of the houſe therein. In conſequence of this intimation, a bill was prepared, enabling her majeſty to beſtow theſe honours on the duke and his heirs, and deſiring her to advance the money to clear the incumbrances. The queen, beſides complying with this addreſs, ordered the comptroller of the board of works to build in Woodſtock a magnificent palace for the duke, to be diſtinguiſhed by the name of Blenheim-houſe.

Such were the honours and rewards heaped upon the duke of Marlborough; while Sir George Rooke, who had ſpent his life in the ſervice, and who had done great honour to his country, was not only neglected, but diſmiſſed from his command, and ſuffered to retire to his ſeat in Kent. He was ſucceeded by Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, who was then declared rear-admiral of England.

The good underſtanding that had for ſome time ſubſiſted between the two houſes was now interrupted by a queſtion relating to the rights of electing members of parliament. And, particularly, whether an elector's vote being refuſed by the officer appointed to take the poll, he might not bring an action at law againſt the offender? Several conferences were held between the two houſes in order to an amicable deciſion of the queſtion; but neither being willing to recede in the leaſt from the principles they had adopted, and the diſputes ſeeming to threaten very ſerious conſequences, the queen determined to put an end to the ſeſſion. Accordingly ſhe came to the houſe of peers on the 14th of March, and after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, and making a ſhort ſpeech from the throne, ſhe prorogued the parliament. On the fifth of April it was diſſolved by proclamation, and writs were iſſued for calling a new one, purſuant to the act for triennial parliaments.

The Scottiſh parliament met on the 28th of June; but many of the members being abſent, the lord-commiſſioner adjourned the houſe till the 3d of July, when a letter from the queen was read to the aſſembly. In this letter her majeſty expreſſed herſelf to the following purport: "That at their laſt meeting ſhe recommended to them, with the greateſt earneſtneſs, the ſettling of the ſucceſſion of that kingdom in the proteſtant line; and ſeveral particulars having ſince happened which ſhewed the great inconvenience of that matter continuing in ſuſpence, ſhe could not but at preſent moſt ſeriouſly renew the recommendation of that ſettlement, as being convinced of the growing neceſſity of it, both for the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, the peace and ſafety of all her dominions, and for defeating the deſigns and attempts of all her enemies. And to prevent any objection to to the ſaid ſettlement, that could be ſuggeſted from the views or fears of future inconveniences that might happen to that kingdom from thence, ſhe ſhould be ready to give the royal aſſent to ſuch proviſions and reſtrictions as ſhould be found neceſſary and reaſonable in a caſe of ſuch importance; and, therefore, ſhe muſt recommend it to them, as the moſt neceſſary for all the ends already mentioned, that they ſhould proceed to the ſettlement of the ſucceſſion before all other buſineſs." She ſaid, "ſhe was fully ſatisfied, and doubted not but they were, that great benefits would ariſe to all her ſubjects by an union of Scotland and England, and that nothing would contribute more to the compoſing of differences, and extinguiſhing heats that were unhappily raiſed and fomented by the enemies of both nations, than the promoting of every thing that had a tendency to procure ſo valuable an end; ſhe, therefore, heartily recommended to them to paſs an act for a commiſſion to ſet a treaty on foot between the kingdoms, as the parliament of England had done, for effectuating what was ſo deſirable, and for ſuch other matters and things as might be judged proper for her honour, and the good and advantage of both kingdoms for ever, in which ſhe ſhould moſt heartily give her beſt aſſiſtance."

The duke of Argyle, high-commiſſioner for Scotland, ſtrongly recommended the meaſures mentioned in the queen's letter to the conſideration of the houſe, and was ſeconded by the lord-chancellor. The affair of the ſucceſſion was accordingly taken into conſideration, when duke Hamilton propoſed that the treaty with England ſhould be firſt diſcuſſed, and the limitations ſettled before they proceeded any farther in the act of ſucceſſion. This was agreed to, and that nobleman made a motion for leaving the nomination of the commiſſioners to the queen. This occaſioned a very violent debate; but the queſtion being at laſt put, Whether the nomination ſhould be left to the queen or the parliament? the duke's motion was approved of by a ſmall majority. A bill was therefore brought in and paſſed by the houſe for treating about an union with England; but it was declared that the treaty ſhould not commence till the clauſe in the Engliſh act of parliament, declaring the ſubjects of Scotland, "Aliens," be reſcinded.

It is now time to attend to the affairs on the continent. The duke of Marlborough had, ever ſince the battle of Blenheim, employed his thoughts in forming a plan for improving the advantage he had gained by that action; and, after the moſt mature deliberation, none appeared ſo rational, as that of making an impreſſion on the frontiers of France. Accordingly, the Moſelle was pitched upon as the ſcene of action, and large magazines were formed at Triers. The ſtates-general having agreed to the project, and even contributed their part towards the carrying it into execution, Marlborough ſet out for Maeſtricht, in order to aſſemble his army. This was performed with ſuch expedition, that by the latter end of May the troops paſſed the Maeſe, and directed their march towards the Moſelle, under the command of general Churchill; while the duke himſelf ſet out for Raſtadt, to viſit prince Lewis of Baden. Here a long conference was held between theſe two celebrated generals, in which it was reſolved that a ſufficient number of German troops ſhould be left for ſecuring Lauterburg and Stolhoffen, under the command of general Thungen; and that prince Lewis ſhould advance at the head of a large detachment towards the Saar, in order to act in concert with the duke of Marlborough, in forming the ſiege of Saar-Louis, the taking of which would open a paſſage into the very bowels of France.

After paſſing the Saar, the duke encamped at Elſt, in ſight of marſhal Villars, who was poſted in that neighbourhood with a numerous army, but, upon the approach of the allies, he retired to Coningsmacheren.

As forage was very ſcarce in that part of the country, and, therefore, impoſſible for the allied army to ſubſiſt long between the Moſelle and the Saar, Marlborough ſent repeated remonſtrances to quicken the march of the imperialiſts: but neither his remonſtrances, nor thoſe of the deputies of the ſtates, had any effect. A few of the imperial troops were indeed detached from Lauterburg for the Moſelle, but they marched ſo ſlowly, that inſtead of being on the banks of the Saar by the ninth or tenth of June at the fartheſt, they did not arrive till the 20th, and even then there were neither horſes nor artillery provided.

In the mean time the French did not fail to make uſe of their ſuperiority in the Low Countries, where M. d'Auverquerque was in no condition to oppoſe their progreſs. They inveſted Huy, and carried on their attack with ſuch vigour, that in leſs than fourteen days the garriſon were obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. Fluſhed with this ſucceſs, and encouraged by the abſence of the duke of Marlborough, the elector of Bavaria and marſhal Villeroy undertook the reduction of Liege, and actually began to raiſe battlements before the citadel.

This diſagreeable news no ſooner reached the allied army, than the deputies of the ſtates repreſented to the duke of Marlborough, "that it was impoſſible to ſubſiſt the army any longer in their preſent ſituation; that the Germans, by their delays, had rendered the beſieging Saar-Louis impracticable, and defeated the whole ſcheme for a campaign on the Moſelle: that it was to no purpoſe to continue in theſe parts, when their forces might be better employed in the Netherlands, in ſtopping the progreſs of the enemy." The duke was ſufficiently perſuaded of the truth of theſe repreſentations; but being willing to remain till the laſt extremity, he did not decamp till the 17th of June, when he found all his hopes of penetrating into the bowels of France rendered abortive.

The duke proſecuted his march with ſuch expedition, that he ſaved Liege, the enemy retiring at his approach with great precipitation. He ſoon after retook Huy, and obliged the enemy to retire behind their lines, from whence he determined to force them, though the French and Bavarians conſiſted of near 100 battalions, and 146 ſquadrons.

To facilitate this difficult undertaking, it was determined to make a falſe attack, in order to divide the attention of the enemy. Accordingly, the army under the command of M. d'Averquerque decamped early in the morning of the 17th of July, and marched towards Burdine on the other ſide of the Mehaigne. Marlborough made a motion at the ſame time, as if he intended to ſupport Averquerque in his attack of the lines in the neighbourhood of Meſſelin, where they were weakeſt. This feint produced the deſired ſucceſs; the French detached large bodies of forces to theſe parts; leaving the others, where the duke really intended to make his attack, in a very weak condition. As ſoon as night came on, the duke put his army in motion, while d'Averquerque repaſſed the Mehaigne to join, and both marched in conjunction to ſupport a detachment ordered to make an attempt on the enemy's lines near Heyliſham. This was the ſtrongeſt part of the whole, and conſequently where the enemy leaſt expected an attack. They were therefore ſeized with aſtoniſhment when the allies appeared, and incapable of making any effectual oppoſition, the greater part of their forces having been drawn off to guard the other parts.

The confederate troops paſſed the lines with very little oppoſition; but were afterwards attacked by twenty-four ſquadrons of Bavarian horſe, and twenty battalions. The diſpute was for ſome time very ſharp; but the horſe and dragoons of the right wing coming up, the enemy were put to flight, leaving behind them their ſtandards, colours and artillery. The marquis d' Alegre, and the count de Horne, lieutenant-generals, were taken priſoners, together with one major-general, two brigadier-generals, and 74 other officers.

Nothing farther of moment happened in Flanders, during the preſent campaign. The duke put his army into winter quarters, and, after concerting the operations of the next campaign with the emperor and the ſtates-general, he embarked for England.

The army in Portugal gained ſome advantages over the enemy, but not equal to what was expected. The Portugueſe, with their allies the Engliſh and Dutch, marched to the frontiers of Spain, and meeting with no enemy in the field on that ſide, they laid ſiege to d'Alcantara, in the province of Alentejo, which they ſoon took by ſtorm. The garriſon of Abuquerque, a town of no great ſtrength, capitulated. Several councils were afterwards held for ſettling the operations of the enſuing part of the campaign. The earl of Galway and general Fagel propoſed laying ſiege to Badajox; but that town being much better fortified than either of the former, and furniſhed with a garriſon of nine or ten battalions to defend it, the deſign was laid aſide for the preſent; and the army, about the middle of June, ſent into quarters of refreſhment.

In the mean time the marquis del Minas, who commanded a ſeparate body of Portugueſe in the province of Beyra, attacked the town of Salvaterra, in which was a garriſon of 360 men, who ſurrendered at diſcretion. The marquis afterwards plundered and burnt Sarea, but receiving intelligence that a ſtrong body of French and Spaniards were in full march againſt him, he thought proper to retire to Penamacos. As ſoon as the ſummer heats were abated, the earl of Galway again renewed his inſtances to form the ſiege of Badajox, which were not liſtened to till about the latter end of September, when an army marched towards that place, and on the 4th of October the trenches were opened. The ſiege was carried on with ſuch vigour that, had it not been for an unforeſeen accident, the garriſon muſt ſoon have ſurrendered; but the earl of Galway being one day in the trenches, a cannon ball took off his right arm; and the command then devolving on general Fagel, he did not carry on the ſiege with that vigour his predeceſſor had done, which gave the marquis de Theſſe an opportunity of throwing a relief of 1000 men into the place. All hopes of reducing Badajox were now over: the allied army therefore abandoned the enterprize, and marched into winter quarters.

The ſucceſs in Catalonia, however, made up for this diſappointment. Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, and the earl of Peterborough, reduced Barcelona, and the whole province of Catalonia ſubmitted to Charles. A very remarkable incident happened at the ſiege of Barcelona, which does the higheſt honour to the earl of Peterborough. While the viceroy was capitulating with the Engliſh general at one of the gates of the city, a party of German ſoldiers penetrated into the place, and began to pillage the houſes and maſſacre the inhabitants. The viceroy complained of this treachery. Peterborough aſſured him that he might depend on his honour, and deſired permiſſion to enter with his troops, promiſing to appeaſe the tumult, and return to finiſh the articles of capitulation. He was truſted, and marched into the city, followed by the Engliſh; where he ſoon put a ſtop to the diſorders, diſperſed the German ſoldiers, took from them their plunder, and returned to ſign the articles of the treaty.

After the reduction of Barcelona, a council of war was aſſembled, wherein it was reſolved, that Sir Cloudeſley Shovel ſhould ſail for England with the beſt part of the fleet: that Sir John Leake with a ſtrong ſquadron ſhould be left in the Mediterranean: that ſix ſhips ſhould remain with the earl of Peterborough; two more be ſtationed at Gibraltar; and a third and fourth to be employed, at the requeſt of his Portugueſe majeſty, in cruiſing for the homeward-bound Brazil fleet. In purſuance of theſe reſolutions, Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, with nineteen ſhips of the line, and part of the Dutch fleet, ſailed through the Streights, and arrived at Spithead on the 16th of November.

The new parliament met on the 27th of October, when her majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which ſhe repreſented the neceſſity of acting vigorouſly againſt France, as the common enemy to the liberties of Europe. She recommended the fortitude of the duke of Savoy, which, ſhe ſaid, was without example, and merited all their endeavours to encourage him to perſevere in the ſame conduct. She informed them of her intention of iſſuing commiſſions for treating of an union with Scotland. She earneſtly recommended unanimity and brotherly affection among her people; and obſerved that ſome perſons had endeavoured to foment animoſities, and even to ſuggeſt in print, that the eſtabliſhed church was in danger. "Such (added ſhe) are enemies to me and my kingdom, and mean only to cover deſigns which they dare not publicly avow, by endeavouring to diſtract the nation with unmeaſurable and groundleſs diſtruſts and jealouſies." She declared ſhe would always affectionately ſupport and countenance the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed; that ſhe would inviolably maintain the toleration; that ſhe would endeavour to promote religion and virtue, encourage trade, and every thing elſe that had a tendency to make them a happy and a flouriſhing people." And they (added ſhe) who ſhall concur zealouſly with me in carrying on theſe good deſigns, ſhall be ſure of my kindneſs and favour."

Both houſes were ſo well pleaſed with this ſpeech, that they preſented ſeparate addreſſes, in which they promiſed to aſſiſt her majeſty to the utmoſt of their power. And on the 13th of November the commons preſented a ſecond, in which they returned her thanks for her great care and endeavours to ſettle the ſucceſſion to the Scottiſh crown in the houſe of Hanover, and promoting the union of the two kingdoms; aſſuring her no endeavours ſhould be wanting on their part to aſſiſt her in perfecting ſo ſalutary a work.

A few days after the meeting of the parliament the commons preſented the thanks of the houſe to the duke of Marlborough, (now returned from abroad) for the ſignal ſervices he had performed during the laſt campaign, and for his prudent negotiations with the allies. The credit of this nobleman was indeed extremely high at this juncture: for the emperor having propoſed a lone of 500,000l. on a branch of his revenues, in Sileſia, the whole ſum, by the intereſt of Marlborough, was immediately ſubſcribed by the merchants of London. Public credit was very high at this juncture: the nation was bleſſed with plenty; the forces were well paid notwithſtanding the great quantity of coin exported for the maintenance of the war; the paper currency ſupplying the deficiency ſo well, that few murmurs were heard in the kingdom.

The firſt buſineſs of the parliament was to eſtabliſh the funds neceſſary for carrying on the war with vigour during the approaching campaign. This being done, they took into conſideration the union with Scotland; and the parliament of that kingdom having declared, that they would enter into no treaty with England till the act in which they were declared aliens ſhould be reſcinded, the two houſes immediately repealed that act, and alſo took off the ſeveral prohibitions and reſtrictions which had been laid upon the trade between the two kingdoms.

A. D. 1706. The neceſſary ſupplies being granted, and ſeveral bills paſſed for the good of the nation, her majeſty went to the houſe of peers on the 19th of March, and after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, ſhe made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which ſhe expreſſed her acknowledgements for the unanimity and diſpatch with which they had conducted the public buſineſs, and the zeal and affection they had ſhewn for her ſervice; after which the parliament was progued till the firſt of May following.

Soon after the prorogation of the parliament, her majeſty appointed commiſſioners for treating of an union between England and Scotland; a treaty which ſhe was very deſirous of concluding.

Every thing being ready for entering on this important work, the commiſſioners of both kingdoms met on the 16th of April, at the council-chamber in the cockpit, in order to negotiate an agreement that wa was for ever to put an end to the diſputes that had for ſo many ages ſubſiſted between theſe two ſovereignties.

The Scottiſh commiſſioners firſt propoſed to conclude a fœderal union like that ſubſiſting between the cantons of Switzerland; but nothing leſs than an incorporating union would ſatisfy the Engliſh, who were determined to take away effectually from the Scottiſh parliament the power of repealing the articles of this treaty. Purſuant to this reſolution, the lord-keeper of England propoſed, "That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland ſhould be united into one nation, by the name of GREAT BRITAIN; that it ſhould be repreſented by one parliament; and that the ſucceſſion of the monarchy, in failure of heirs of her majeſty's body, ſhould be ſubject to the limitations mentioned in an act of parliament made in England, in the thirteenth year of the reign of king William III. intitled, An act for the farther limitation of the crown, &c."

Finding a fœderal union would not be accepted, the commiſſioners of Scotland agreed to the preliminaries propoſed by the lord-keeper, with this proviſo only, "That all the ſubjects of the united kingdoms of Great Britain ſhould have full freedom and intercourſe of trade and navigation to and from any part or place within the ſaid united kingdom, and plantations thereunto belonging; and that there ſhould be a communication of all other privileges and advantages which do or may belong to the ſubjects of either kingdom." No objection was made to this proviſo, except a reſerving ſuch particulars as, in the courſe of the negotiation, ſhould appear to be advantageous to the ſubjects of both countries.

Theſe preliminaries being ſettled, the queen made them a viſit, in order to quicken their deliberations, and finiſh a treaty ſhe had ſo greatly at heart. They accordingly exerted themſelves, in order to ſatisfy the requeſt of her majeſty; and at length finiſhed the negotiation for uniting the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. The following are the articles that compoſed this treaty of union.

ARTICLES OF UNION BETWEEN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.

I. That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland ſhall, from the firſt of May, 1707, be united into one kingdom, by the name of Great-Britain; and that the enſigns armorial of the ſame united kingdoms be ſuch as her majeſty ſhall appoint, and the croſſes of St. Andrew and St. George be conjoined in ſuch a manner as her majeſty ſhall think fit, and uſed in all flags, banners, ſtandards, and enſigns, both by ſea and land.

II. That the ſucceſſion of the united monarchy of Great-Britain ſhall be to the princeſs Sophia, and her heirs; and that all papiſts, or perſons who marry papiſts, ſhall be for ever excluded from inheriting the crown of Great-Britain, agreeable to the proviſion for the deſcent of the crown of England made in the firſt year of the reign of their late majeſties, king William and queen Mary, intitled, An Act declaring the rights and liberties of the ſubject, &c.

III. That the united kingdoms of Great-Britain ſhall be repreſented by one and the ſame parliament, to be ſtiled the parliament of Great-Britain.

IV. That the ſubjects of the united kingdoms ſhall have freedom of trade and navigation within the ſame, and plantations belonging to it; and that there be a communication of all other rights, privileges and advantages, except where it is otherwiſe expreſſed in theſe articles.

V. That all ſhips or veſſels belonging to the Scots [at the time of ratifying the treaty of the two kingdoms in the parliament of Scotland] ſhall be deemed Britiſh built; the owners making oath that [at the time of ratifying the treaty of union in the parliament of Scotland] the ſame did, in the whole or in part, belong to them.

VI. All parts of the united kingdom to be under the ſame regulations of trade, and liable to the ſame cuſtoms and duties, except and reſerving the duties upon export and import of ſuch particular commodities, from which any perſon, the ſubject of either kingdom, are eſpecially liberated and exempted by their private rights, which, after the union, are to remain ſafe and entire to them, in all reſpects as before the ſame; and that from and after the union, no Scots cattle carried into England ſhall be liable to any other duties, either on the public or private account, than thoſe duties to which the cattle of England are or ſhall be liable within the ſaid kingdom; and ſeeing, by the laws of England, there are rewards granted upon the exportation of certain kinds of grain, wherein oats, ground or unground, are not expreſſed, that from and after the union, when oats ſhall be ſold for fifteen ſhillings ſterling per quarter, or under, there ſhall be paid two ſhillings and ſixpence ſterling for every quarter of the oat-meal exported in the term of the law, whereby and ſo long as rewards are granted for the exportation of grains. And that the beer of Scotland have the ſame reward as barley. And becauſe the importation of victual into Scotland would prove a diſcouragement to tillage, therefore the prohibition now enforced by the law of Scotland againſt importation of victual from Ireland, or any other place beyond Sea, into Scotland, do, after the union, remain in the ſame force as at preſent, until more proper and effectual ways be provided by the parliament of Great-Britain, for the diſcouragement of the importation of the ſaid victual from beyond ſea.

VII. That all parts of the united kingdom be liable to the ſame exciſe upon the ſame exciſeable liquors, except only that the thirty-four Engliſh barrel of beer or ale, amounting to twelve gallons Scots preſent meaſure, ſold in Scotland by the brewer at nine ſhillings and ſixpence ſterling, excluding all duties, and retailed, including duties and the retailer's profit, at two-pence the Scots pint, or eighth part of the Scots gallon, be not, after the union, liable, on account of the preſent exciſe on exciſeable liquors in England, to any higher impoſition than two ſhillings ſterling upon the aforeſaid thirty-four gallons Engliſh barrel, being twelve gallons the preſent Scots meaſure.

VIII. Foreign ſalt in England ſhall pay the ſame duty as in Scotland; [but becauſe the duties of foreign ſalt imported may be very heavy on the merchant importer, that therefore all foreign ſalt imported into Scotland ſhall be cellared and locked up under the care of the merchant importer, and the officers employed for levying the duties upon ſalt; and that the merchant may have whatever quantity thereof his occaſions may require, not under a weight of forty buſhels at a time, upon his giving ſecurity for the duty of what quantities he receives, payable in ſix months.] By this article it was alſo provided, that ſalt made in Scotland ſhould be exempted for ſeven years from the Engliſh duty. But from the expiration of the ſaid ſeven years, ſhall be ſubject to the ſame duties as ſalt made in England. [That Scotland ſhall, after the ſaid ſeven years, remain exempted from the duty of two ſhillings and ſixpence on home ſalt, impoſed by an act made in the ninth and tenth years of king William III. and if the parliament of Great Britain ſhall at, or before, the expiration of the ſaid ſeven years, ſubſtitute any other fund in the place of the ſaid two ſhillings and four-pence of exciſe upon the buſhel of home ſalt, Scotland ſhall, after the expiration of the ſaid ſeven years, bear a proportion of the ſaid fund, and have an equivalent in the terms of this treaty.] No ſalt whatſoever ſhall be brought from Scotland to England by land under certain penalties denounced: and for eſtabliſhing an equality in trade, it was provided, that all fleſh exported from Scotland to England, and ſhipped in Scotland to be exported beyond ſea; and proviſions for ſhips in Scotland and foreign voyages, may be ſalted with Scotch ſalt, paying the duty for what ſalt is ſo employed, and the like quantity of freſh ſalt pays in England, and under the ſame penalties, forfeitures, and proviſions for preventing frauds as are mentioned in the laws of England. And that for the encouragement of the herring fiſhery, there ſhall be allowed and paid to the ſubjects inhabitants of Great Britain, during the preſent allowances for other fiſheries, ten ſhillings and five-pence ſterling for every barrel of white herrings which ſhall be exported from Scotland; and that they ſhall be allowed five ſhillings ſterling for every barrel of beef or pork ſalted with foreign ſalt, without mixture of Britiſh or Iriſh ſalts, and exported for ſale from Scotland to parts beyond ſea, alterable by the parliament of Great Britain.

IX. That whenever the ſum of one million nine hundred, ninety-ſeven thouſand, ſeven hundred and ſixty-three pounds, eight ſhillings and four-pence half-penny, ſhall be enacted by the parliament of Great Britain on land, that part of the united kingdom, now called Scotland, ſhall be charged with the additional ſum of forty-eight thouſand pounds, as the quota of Scotland for ſuch tax; and ſo proportionally for any greater or leſſer ſum raiſed in England on land; the ſaid quota to be aſſeſſed in the ſame manner as the aſſeſs now is in Scotland; but ſubject to ſuch regulations as ſhall be made in the parliament of Great Britain.

X. That Scotland ſhall not be charged with ſtamp-duties now in force in England.

XI. Nor with the duties payable in England on windows.

XII. Nor thoſe on coals or culm.

XIII. Scotland ſhall not pay the malt duty during its continuance in England, which was to expire the twenty-fourth of June 1707.

XIV. Scotland ſhall not be charged with any other duties impoſed by the parliament of England before the union, except thoſe conſented to in this treaty: and if the parliament of England in their proviſion for the ſervice of the year 1707 ſhall impoſe any farther cuſtoms, the Scots ſhall have an equivalent for the ſhare thereof they may be liable to. [And Scotland ſhall not be charged with any impoſition on malt made or conſumed in that kingdom during the war.]

XV. Stipulates, that whereas by the terms of this treaty, the ſubjects of Scotland, for preſerving an equality of trade throughout the united kingdom, will be liable to ſeveral cuſtoms and exciſe now payable in England, which will be applicable towards paying the debts of England, payable before the union, it is agreed that an equavilent ſhall be made to Scotland for ſuch part of the Engliſh debts, as Scotland may hereafter become liable to pay by reaſon of the union, other than ſuch appropriations as have been made by parliament in England, of the cuſtoms and other duties on exports and imports, exciſes and all exciſeable liquors, in reſpect of which debts equivalent are herein before provided; which equivalent is here ſtipulated to be three hundred ninety-eight thouſand, eighty-five pounds ten ſhillings ſterling, to be granted by the parliament of England in the manner as in this article is particularly and at large explained. The diſtinction of this equivalent is in the ſame article applied, 1. For endemnifying private perſons from any loſſes they may ſuſtain by reducing the coin of Scotland to the ſtandard and value of that of England. 2. For endemnifying the ſufferers in the late African and Indian company of Scotland. 3. For diſcharging the public debts of Scotland. 4. For improving the manufacture of the coarſe wool of Scotland. 5. For encouraging and promoting the fiſheries, and ſuch other manufactures and improvements in Scotland, as may moſt conduce to the general good of the united kingdom: and for which end commiſſioners were to be appointed. [It ſeems the Scots were ſo inflamed by the deſtruction of their Darien and African company by the government of England, that nothing but the abſolute aſſurance of an equivalent for reimburſing their whole capital employment in that affair, with intereſt, amounting to two hundred and thirty-two thouſand, one hundred and ſixty-two pounds, ſixteen ſhillings and eleven pence halfpenny, could have induced them to agree to treat of the union, and they even inſiſted on the inſertion of the above clauſe.] That if the ſaid ſtock, capital and intereſt ſhall not be paid in twelve months after commencement of the union, that then the ſaid company may from henceforth trade, or give licence to trade until the ſaid whole capital ſtock and intereſt ſhall be paid.

XVI. That the coin be of the ſame ſtandard throughout the united kingdom as now in England, and a mint to be continued in Scotland under the ſame rule as the mint of England.

XVII. That the ſame weights and meaſures be uſed throughout the united kingdoms as are now uſed in England; and ſtandards ſhall be kept in the burghs, agreeable to the ſtandard of the Engliſh exchequer.

XVIII. That the laws for the regulation of trade, cuſtom, and ſuch exciſes as Scotland is to be liable to, ſhall be the ſame as thoſe in England. Other laws in Scotland to remain as before the union, but alterable by the parliament of Great Britain. Laws which concern public right, policy, and civil government, may be the ſame throughout the united kingdom; but no alteration ſhall be made in the laws which concern private right, except for the evident utility of the ſubjects of Scotland.

XIX. The court of ſeſſion and other courts ſhall remain in Scotland the ſame as before the union, ſubject, nevertheleſs, to ſuch regulations, for the adminiſtration of public juſtice, as ſhall be made by the parliament of Great Britain; and that hereafter none ſhall be named by her majeſty or her royal ſucceſſors to be ordinary lords of ſeſſion, but ſuch as have ſerved in the college of juſtice as advocates or principal clerks of ſeſſion for the ſpace of five years, or as writers to the ſignet for the ſpace of ten years, with this proviſion, that no writer to the ſignet be capable of being admitted a lord of ſeſſion, unleſs he undergo a private and public trial on the civil law before the faculty of advocates, and be found by them qualified for the ſaid office two years before he be named to be a lord of ſeſſion, yet ſo as the qualification made, or to be made, for capacitating perſons to be named ordinary lords of ſeſſion, may be altered by the parliament of Great Britain.

XX. That all heritable offices, ſuperiorities, heritable juriſdictions, offices for life, and juriſdictions for life, be reſerved to the owners thereof as rights of property, in the ſame manner as they are now enjoyed by the laws of Scotland, this treaty in any wiſe notwithſtanding.

XXI. The rights and privileges of the royal burghs in Scotland, as they now are, ſhall remain entire after the union, and notwithſtanding thereof.

XXII. That by virtue of this treaty, ſixteen of the peers of Scotland, at the time of the union, ſhall ſit and vote in the houſe of lords, and forty-five of the members of the repreſentatives of Scotland in the houſe of commons in the parliament of Great Britain, the choice whereof to be according to the act paſſed in Scotland for that purpoſe; which act is hereby declared to be valid, as if it were part of it, and engroſſed in the treaty: and in caſe her majeſty ſhall, on the firſt of May, 1707, declare this preſent parliament to be the firſt of Great Britain, the preſent parliament of England may be ſo on the part of England, and the ſixteen peers and the forty-five commoners for Scotland to ſit with them; ſuch parliament to continue no longer than the Engliſh parliament is allowed to continue.

XXIII. That the aforeſaid ſixteen peers of Scotland, mentioned in the preceding article, to ſit in the houſe of lords in the parliament of Great Britain, ſhall have all the privileges of parliament which the peers of England now have, and which they or any peers of Great Britain ſhall have after the union, and particularly the right of ſitting upon the trial of peers; and that all peers of Scotland, and their ſucceſſors to their honours and dignities, ſhall, from and after the union, be peers of Great Britain, and have rank and precedence next and immediately after the peers of the orders and degrees in England at the time of the union, and before all peers of Great Britain, of the like orders and degree, who ſhall be created after the union.

XXIV. That from and after the union there ſhall be one great ſeal for the united kingdom of Great Britain, which ſhall be different from the great ſeal now uſed in either kingdom; and that the quarter of the arms, as well as the rank and precedency of Lyon king at arms in Scotland, ſhall be left to her majeſty; and that in the private ſeal, ſignet, caſſet, &c. now uſed in Scotland be continued; but that the ſaid ſeals be altered and adapted to the union, as her majeſty ſhall think fit: that the crown, ſceptre, and ſword of ſtate, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls and records whatſoever, both public and private, general and particular, and warrants thereof, continue to be kept as they are, within that part of the united kingdom called Scotland; and that they ſhall ſo remain, in all time coming, notwithſtanding the union.

XXV. That all laws and ſtatutes in either kingdom, ſo far as they are contrary to, or inconſiſtent with the terms of theſe articles, or any of them, ſhall, from and after the union, cloſe and become void, and ſhall be ſo declared to be by the reſpective parliaments of the ſaid kingdoms.

No proviſion was made in this treaty with reſpect to religion; for in the acts of parliament of both kingdoms, which empowered the queen to name commiſſioners for treating of an union, there was an expreſs reſtriction that they ſhould not treat of thoſe matters.

The above articles being agreed to, they were ſigned by the reſpective commiſſioners on the 22d of July, 1706; and the next day the lords commiſſioners waited on the queen with the treaty; when the lord-keeper, Cowper, in the name of the Engliſh commiſſioners, made a ſpeech, congratulating her majeſty on the concluſion of a treaty which ſo happily united the different parts of this iſland under the ſame monarchy. The earl of Seafield, lord-chancellor of Scotland, ſpoke to the ſame effect on the part of the commiſſioners of that kingdom; to which her majeſty was pleaſed to return the following anſwer:

"My lords,

"I give you many thanks for the great pains you have taken in this treaty, and am very well pleaſed to find your endeavours and application have brought it to ſo good a concluſion: the particulars of it ſeem ſo reaſonable that I hope they will meet with approbation in the parliaments of both kingdoms. I wiſh, therefore, my ſervants of Scotland may loſe no time in going down to propoſe it to my ſubjects in that kingdom; and I ſhall always look upon it as a particular happineſs if this union (which will be ſo great a ſecurity and advantage to both kingdoms) can be accompliſhed in my reign."

While the miniſters of the two kingdoms were employed in eſtabliſhing an union between their reſpective countries, the armies of the belligerant powers were carrying on their hoſtile attempts with great fury. Lewis XIV. had determined to exert his utmoſt efforts in the courſe of this campaign, and had accordingly ſent very numerous forces into the field. His army in Flanders was commanded by the marſhal de Villeroy, a nobleman of great generoſity and a favourite at court; but an indiſcreet general, blindly confident, and deaf to counſel. He formed the deſign of ſurpriſing the duke of Marlborough before he could be joined by the Danes and Pruſſians, who were employed laſt year to act as auxiliaries. The French, accordingly, paſſed the Dyle early in May, and advanced directly towards the confederate army. It was in vain to hope that it was poſſible to ſurprize ſo vigilant a general as Marlborough. He was well informed of all their motions, and diſpatched an expreſs to the Danes to join him immediately, and was readily obeyed. Before this junction the allied army conſiſted of ſeventy-four battalions of foot, and 123 ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, provided with 100 pieces of cannon, twenty hawbitzers, and forty-two pontoons. About the ſame time the Danes joined the allied army, that of the French was joined by the marſhal Marſin's horſe, and by this addition their army amounted to ſeventy-ſix battalions and 132 ſquadrons. This ſuperiority determined Villeroy to give battle to the allied army, though he knew his hopes of ſurprizing the active Marlborough were rendered abortive.

The allies moved forward to meet the enemy, who had now taken poſſeſſion of the ſtrong camp at Mont St. Andre, their right extending to the Mahaigne, and their left to Anderkirk, the villages of Offuz and Ramillies being in the center. On the 12th of May, about two in the afternoon, the allied army was drawn up in order of battle, with the right wing near Foltz, on the brook Yauſe, and the left near the village of Franquennes, which was occupied by the enemy. The action was begun on the left of the allied army, who puſhed a brigade of foot from their poſt on the Mahaigne. About the ſame time M. d'Auverquerque, the Dutch general, charged the French houſhold troops at the head of the horſe of the left wing. For near half an hour the ſucceſs was doubtful; but a reinforcement coming up, the French retired. Lieutenant Scultz was now ordered, with twelve ſquadrons, and twenty pieces of cannon, to attack the village of Ramillies, which was ſtrongly fortified with artillery. The attack was made with great vigour and reſolution; and the enemy at laſt driven from the village, who endeavouring to make their retreat, were moſt of them killed or taken priſoners.

In the mean time the Dutch and Daniſh horſe of the left wing of the allied army fell upon the foot in the right of the enemy, cut twenty battalions of them to pieces, and made themſelves maſters of their colours and artillery. The French now began to retreat in good order, covered by their cavalry of the left wing; but the Engliſh horſe forcing their paſſage over the rivulet which ſeparated them from the enemy, attacked them with ſo much intrepidity that they entirely abandoned their foot, who were expoſed to all the fury of the cavalry. The French now gave way on all ſides, and it was not without difficulty that marſhal Villeroy and the elector of Bavaria ſaved themſelves by flight. An accident which now happened completed the deſtruction of the French army. Several of the waggons of the vanguard happening to break down in a narrow paſs, ſo obſtructed the paſſage, that neither the baggage nor artillery could proceed, nor could the troops defile in order. The opportunity was not neglected by the victorious horſe; they preſſed upon them ſo vigorouſly, that the French king's own regiment of foot called for quarter, and delivered up their arms and colours. The purſuit was continued with great ſucceſs about five miles from the field of battle.

Few battles recorded in hiſtory were more complete than this of Ramillies. The greater part of the enemy's cannon and baggage fell into the hands of the allies, with above 120 colours, and ſeveral kettle-drums. The French loſt about 40,000 men, near one half of their army; while the loſs of the allies was not more than 2000. The French general retired with great precipitation to Bruſſels, while the allies took poſſeſſion of Louvaine, and next day encamped at Bethlem.

The battle of Ramillies was followed with the immediate conqueſt of all Brabant; the cities of Louvaine, Mechlin, Bruſſels, Antwerp, Bruges, and Ghent, ſubmitted without reſiſtance, and acknowledged king Charles. Oſtend, though ſecured by a ſtrong garriſon, ſurrendered after a ſiege of ten days only. Menin, eſteemed the moſt finiſhed fortification in the Netherlands, and guarded by 6000 men, ſubmitted to the ſame fate. Dendermonde ſuſtained a blockade of ſome weeks, which the duke of Marlborough afterwards ordered to be turned into a regular ſiege, which terminated in the garriſon's ſurrendering themſelves priſoners of war. Aeth was next inveſted, and ſubmitted on the ſame terms, after twenty days reſiſtance. Thus finiſhed this glorious campaign of the allies in Flanders, after which the army went into winter-quarters. The duke of Marlborough returned to the Hague, and M. d'Auverquerque, being appointed commander in chief in the Netherlands, took up his reſidence at Bruſſels.

During theſe tranſactions in the Netherlands, the French army exerted themſelves in Italy, where Lewis had flattered himſelf with being able to make himſelf maſter of Turin, the duke of Savoy's capital; and almoſt the only place of ſtrength that prince had now left. Soon after the opening of the campaign the French attacked the imperialiſts at Calcinato, in the abſence of prince Eugene, drove them from their poſts, and obliged them to quit the territories of Breſciano, with the loſs of 3000 men killed and taken priſoners, beſides all their cannon and baggage.

Encouraged by this ſucceſs, Lewis ſent immediate orders to duke de la Feuillade to inveſt the city of Turin. This order was obeyed, while prince Eugene was on the other ſide of the Adige; and at too great a diſtance to come to its relief. Beſides, a long train of intrenchments thrown up along the bank of that river, ſeemed to render the paſſage impracticable. Fifty-ſix ſquadrons and 100 battalions formed the ſiege; which was opened on the eighth of June. On the 15th the French began to fire red-hot bullets, many of which fell near the duke's palace. His highneſs therefore ſent away immediately his wife and mother, with the young prince and princeſſes, to ſome diſtance from the city; and marched out himſelf on the 17th, leaving a numerous garriſon under the command of count Thuan, general of the emperor's forces. This ſtep was taken in order to amuſe the duke de la Feuillade; and, accordingly, the latter immediately quitted the direction of the ſiege in order to purſue the prince; but he being much better acquainted with the country, baffled his intention. Convinced that all his attempts to ſurprize the duke of Savoy would be in vain, he returned to the ſiege, leaving the duke of Aubeterre with forty ſquadrons and five battalions to watch the duke of Savoy's motions. The duke of Vendoſme had been poſted on the banks of the Adige from the 13th of May to the twentieth of June, in order to cover the ſiege of Turin; and thought himſelf certain that ſeventy battalions and ſixty ſquadrons were ſufficient to defend all the paſſages againſt prince Eugene. But that commander ſoon convinced him that he was miſtaken. He croſſed both the Adige and the Po, a river larger, and, in many places, more difficult to paſs, than even the Rhine itſelf.

Vendoſme had received orders to leave Italy, in order to take upon him the command of marſhal Villeroy's ſcattered forces in Flanders (that general having been diſgraced on account of his late defeat by the allies;) but before his departure he ſaw prince Eugene in a condition to advance to the relief of Turin.

Lewis, on recalling Vendoſme, ſent his nephew, the duke of Orleans, to command his army in Italy, who found, on his arrival, the troops in as much diſorder as if they had ſuffered a defeat. Eugene had before paſſed the Po in ſight of Vendoſme, and now croſſed the Tanaro in view of the duke of Orleans; took Corpi, Corregio and Reggio; ſtole a march upon the French, and joined the duke of Savoy's army near Aſti on the firſt of September.

In the mean time the city of Turin was reduced to great diſtreſs; moſt of the ammunition being ſpent, and the French having made a lodgment on the counterſcarp. In this dangerous ſituation the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene ſaw themſelves under a neceſſity of marching immediately to the defence of the place. Accordingly, they paſſed the Doria on the ſixth of September, and encamped on its banks. The next morning, at break of day, the army moved towards the enemy. Never, perhaps, was a bolder march than the allied army made on this occaſion; having a continual fire to ſuſtain from forty pieces of cannon, which the enemy had pointed to gall them.

The duke of Orleans perceiving that all his efforts were not ſufficient to ſtop the intrepidity with which the duke and the prince marched towards him, propoſed to quit the intrenchments, and give them battle. He was joined in this propoſal by the greater part of the general officers in the French army: but marſhal Marſin producing a written order from Lewis, which left every thing to his deciſion, in caſe of an action; and, giving his opinion to remain in the lines, the duke of Orleans was forced to acquieſce.

As ſoon as the confederate army came within half cannon ſhot of the French line, they drew up in order of battle, and began the attack with their artillery. On this the whole army moved in a moment; the infantry marched up with their muſkets to the foot of the intrenchments, and prince Eugene, putting himſelf at the head of the left wing, began the charge, which was made with ſuch aſtoniſhing vigour and activity, that in leſs than two hours he carried the enemy's line. The ſame was done by the duke of Savoy in the centre, and on the right; ſo that by noon the allies were maſters of the French camp, and the defeat of the army was become general. The duke of Orleans behaved with great preſence of mind, and received ſeveral wounds in the action. Marſhal Marſin was taken priſoner, after having his thigh ſhattered by a cannon ball, and died in a few hours after, under the amputation. The French loſt in the action near 7000 men, beſides 300 officers, and about 8000 private men taken priſoners ; 250 pieces of cannon, 108 mortars, 7800 bombs, 32,000 hand granades, 48,000 cannon balls, 4000 cheſts of muſquet balls, 86 barrels of gunpowder, all their tents and baggage, 5000 beaſts of burden, 10,000 horſes belonging to 13 regiments of dragoons, and the mules of the commiſſary, all fell into the hands of the victors. The mules were ſo richly laden, that this part only of the booty was valued at near 130,000l. ſterling. The loſs of the confederates did not amount to 3000 men, killed, wounded or diſabled in the attack ; excluſive of 2000 of the garriſon of Turin, who had fallen during the courſe of the ſiege.

The duke of Savoy now entered his capital in triumph, and the duke of Orleans, finding it impoſſible to procure ſubſiſtence for his troops, retired into Dauphiné.

It would be unpardonable to omit the following ſingular circumſtance, which occurred during the above ſiege of Turin. The enemy had broke into one of the largeſt ſubterranean galleries belonging to the citadel, and the French engineer was rewarded with 200 Louis d'ors, for making the diſcovery. The French now concluded they ſhould make their way into the citadel by means of this ſecret paſſage, and accordingly poſted 200 grenadiers there. One Micha, a Piedmonteſe peaſant, who ſerved as a pioneer, and who, by his good natural parts, and long practice, had acquired ſuch a ſkill in his profeſſion as to be made a corporal of that corps, was then working near the ſpot, with about twenty men, in order to complete a mine ; but hearing the French buſy over his head in ſecuring their poſt in the gallery, he immediately perceived that his work was become uſeleſs, and that the enemy was poſſeſſed of a poſt that would be of infinite advantage to them : at the ſame time, he was convinced that it would coſt him his life to prevent them; his mine having no ſauciſſon, by which he might ſpring it with leſs danger. There was, however, no time for deliberation, and he inſtantly formed a ſcheme that would have done honour to the greateſt hero. He ordered his companions to withdraw out of the mine, and to fire a muſket as a ſignal, when they reached a place of ſafety ; at the ſame time, requeſting them to acquaint the duke, his maſter, that Micha implored aſſiſtance for his wife and children. His companions immediately retired, and on this intrepid pioneer's hearing their ſignal, he ſet fire to the mine, and thus ſacrificed his own life to the ſervice of his country. The 200 French grenadiers were blown up into the air, and the ſecret paſſage on which the enemy had placed ſuch flattering hopes, was totally obliterated. His companions faithfully delivered his meſſage to the duke, who not only provided for his widow and children, but ſettled a perpetual annuity of 600 livres a year upon Micha's deſcendants.

The French were equally unſucceſsful in Catalonia as in Flanders and Italy. Philip, aſſiſted by the marſhal de Teſſe, laid ſiege to Barcelona early in the ſpring. The city was defended by Charles, his rival, in perſon. The ſiege was carried on with the utmoſt vigour, and the place at laſt reduced to extremity. The earl of Peterborough advanced to its relief at the head of 2000 men ; but finding it impoſſible to enter the city, he took poſt on a neighbouring hill, and harraſſed the beſiegers with perpetual ſkirmiſhes. The ſiege was, however, preſſed with ſuch vigour, that it was thought impoſſible for the beſieged to hold out many days, when the news of the approach of the Engliſh fleet obliged the French admiral, who had blocked up the place by ſea, to retire. Philip, however, ſeemed determined to carry on his approaches, even after the combined fleets of England and Holland came to an anchor in the bay : but the next morning he raiſed the ſiege in a very diſorderly manner, leaving behind him all his tents, and great part of his military ſtores, together with his ſick and wounded. The marſhal de Teſſe recommended the latter to the care of the earl of Peterborough. He could not have applied to a more humane general. The ſick and wounded felt the lenient hand of compaſſion, and were uſed with the greateſt tenderneſs. In the mean time, lord Galway took ſeveral Spaniſh towns, and penetrated to the capital itſelf, which was abandoned at his approach ; but Charles protracting his ſtay in Arragon, notwithſtanding repeated expreſſes, lord Galway was obliged to abandon Madrid, and retire before the Spaniſh army.

The pride of Lewis was now humbled to ſuch a degree as might have excited even the compaſſion of his enemies. He employed the elector of Bavaria to write letters, in his name, to the duke of Marlborough, and the deputies of the ſtates-general, containing propoſals for opening a congreſs. He had already tampered with the Dutch, in a memorial preſented by the marquis d'Alegre. He offered to cede either Spain and the Weſt-Indies, or Milan, Naples and Sicily, to Charles, to give up a barrier for the Dutch in the Netherlands, and to indemnify the duke of Savoy for the ravages which had been committed in his dominions. The powers that formed the confederacy were fired with the ambition of making conqueſts ; and England in particular thought herſelf entitled to an indemnification for the immenſe ſums ſhe had expended. Animated by theſe concurring conſiderations, queen Anne and the ſtates-general rejected the offers of France, declaring they would not enter into any negotiations for a peace, but in conſort with their allies.

During the campaign abroad, England and Scotland were engaged in treating of the union which had been agreed to by the commiſſioners between the two kingdoms. The Scottiſh parliament met on the 3d of October, when a letter from the queen was read to the aſſembly ; in which ſhe acquainted them, that the commiſſioners appointed to treat of an union between the two kingdoms had finiſhed the treaty, and hoped the articles would prove acceptable to her ſubjects of Scotland : that an entire and perfect union would be the ſolid foundation of a laſting peace ; it would ſecure their religion, their liberties, and their properties ; remove the animoſities that prevailed among themſelves, and the jealouſies that ſubſiſted between the two nations. She renewed her aſſurance of maintaining the government of the church ; and told them they had now an opportunity of taking ſuch ſteps as might be thought neceſſary after the union : deſired the neceſſary ſupplies till the parliament of Great Britain could provide for thoſe matters : and obſerved, that the great ſucceſs with which it had pleaſed God to bleſs her arms, afforded a nearer proſpect of a happy peace, with which they would enjoy the full advantages of this union : and concluded with recommending calmneſs and unanimity in debating on this great and weighty affair, of ſuch importance to the whole iſland of Great Britain.

But notwithſtanding the union was ſo uſeful in the ſyſtem of government, and ſo neceſſary to the well-being of the ſtate, it met with the moſt violent oppoſition in the Scottiſh parliament. All parties ſeemed at firſt united to oppoſe it. The preſbyterians imagined their religion would be loſt; and the jacobites were enraged to ſee the pretender for ever excluded from the crown. The nobility were ſhocked at the loſs of their beſt privileges, by the total abolition of their parliament. The merchants trembled for their commerce, commerce, notwithſtanding the advantageous liberty of trading to the Engliſh colonies. The nation in general conſidered itſelf as robbed of its rights, given up to ſlavery, and ſold to a foreign power. The duke of Hamilton, who headed the party that oppoſed the union, made a moſt vehement ſpeech againſt the treaty. "What!" cried he, "ſhall we abandon in the ſpace of one half hour, what our anceſtors have maintained for ſo many ages at the expence of their lives and fortunes? Are there here no deſcendants of thoſe brave patriots, who defended the liberty of their country againſt every aſſault? Where are the barons, where are the peers, who once joined their breaſts as a bulwark to the nation? Shall we ſacrifice the ſovereignty, the independency of our country, when our conſtituents call upon us to defend them, when they promiſe us ſupport?" Others obſerved, that to conſent to the treaty would be to overturn the conſtitution of the kingdom; that every people had their fundamental laws, which no authority could invade; that the exiſtence of the rights of parliament forming an eſſential part of the ſtate, the parliament itſelf had no right to diſpenſe with them: that the whole body of individuals ought to concur in the ſacrifice of their privileges; and that a ſacrifice of that kind was moſt palpably pernicious.

The clamour without doors was ſtill greater than within: the preſbyterian preachers employed all their power and credit to rouze the reſentment of their hearers againſt the treaty; nor did they labour in vain. The populace, tranſported with fury, erected the ſtandard of rebellion, burnt the articles of the union publickly, publiſhed a maniſeſto, and declared they intended to diſſolve the parliament. Even in the capital itſelf the people grew mutinous, and aſſaulted the houſe of Sir Patrick Johnſon, provoſt of Edinburgh, and one of the commiſſioners of the union; nor did the perſon of the high-commiſſioner eſcape inſult, the rabble throwing ſtones into his coach as he paſſed through the ſtreets though ſurrounded by his guards. Theſe tumults alarmed the miniſtry, and it was thought neceſſary to march ſeveral regiments of horſe and dragoons into the north of England, that they might be in readineſs ſhould the enraged multitude break out into open rebellion. At laſt, however, affairs took a more favourable turn; whether the influence of the court or the means of corruption prevailed over the national ſpirit; whether the advantages of the union appeared in the end to over-balance its inconveniences, and the firſt alarms ſubſiding, reaſon and argument took place; or whether all theſe operated in conſort, the Scottiſh parliament ratified all the articles with ſome ſlight alterations.

The Engliſh parliament met on the 3d of December, when her majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which ſhe congratulated them on the glorious ſucceſs of the Britiſh arms; deſired the commons would grant ſuch ſupplies as would enable her to improve thoſe ſucceſſes; and concluded with recommending diſpatch in public affairs, as the ſureſt method of convincing both friends and enemies of the vigour and firmneſs of their proceedings.

The parliament were highly pleaſed with her majeſty's ſpeech, and affectionate addreſſes were preſented by both houſes. The commons, after examining the eſtimates, voted near 6,000,000 for the enſuing year; and when the ſpeaker preſented the money bills to her majeſty, he told her, that as the glorious victory obtained by the duke of Marlborough at Ramillies was gained before it could be ſuppoſed the armies were in the field, ſo the commons had granted ſupplies to her majeſty before the enemy could well know that the parliament were ſitting. The parliament alſo voted their thanks to the duke of Marlborough for the eminent ſervices he had done his country during the laſt campaign.

On the 7th of December the lords preſented an addreſs to her majeſty, expreſſing their deſire, that the honours and titles of the duke of Marlborough might be ſettled upon his poſterity by act of parliament, and begging her majeſty's direction therein, which ſhe was pleaſed ſoon after to ſignify; when a bill was brought in, paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent.

The commons ſoon after preſented an addreſs to the queen, intimating, that as her majeſty was pleaſed to erect the houſe of Blenheim as a monument of the glorious actions of the duke of Marlborough, they were deſirous of making proviſion for the more honourable ſupport of his dignity to his poſterity, in whatever manner her majeſty ſhould think fit. To which the queen was pleaſed to anſwer, "that ſhe having ſettled a penſion of 5000*l.* per annum, out of the revenues of the poſt-office, on the duke of Marlborough, it would be agreeable to her, if it might be continued to his poſterity for ever." Accordingly a bill was brought into the houſe of commons, and ſoon after paſſed into an act.

A. D. 1707. On the 28th of January her majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and in a ſpeech to both houſes, informed them, that the treaty of union, with ſome ſmall alterations and additions, was ratified by the Scottiſh parliament: that ſhe had ordered it to be laid before them, and hoped that it would meet with their approbation and concurrence. She deſired the commons would provide for the payment of the equivalent in caſe the treaty was ratified; and then, addreſſing herſelf to both houſes, concluded as follows:

"Your have now an opportunity before you of putting the laſt hand to a happy union of the two kingdoms, which I hope will be a laſting bleſſing to the whole iſland, a great addition to its wealth and power, and a firm ſecurity to the proteſtant religion.

"The advantages that will accrue to us all from an union are ſo apparent, that I will add no more, but that I ſhall look upon it as a particular happineſs, if this great work, which has been ſo often attempted without ſucceſs, can be brought to perfection in my reign."

On the 3d of February the commons formed themſelves into a committee of the whole houſe on the treaty of union; when it was oppoſed with the utmoſt violence by the tory party. Sir John Packington obſerved, that the union might be compared to a forced marriage, where the woman does not conſent. "An act like this," ſaid he, "produced by corruption within doors, and by violence without, can never be permanent. The queen, obliged by her coronation oath to maintain the church of England, hath now farther engaged herſelf to ſupport the preſbyterian kirk of Scotland. How can two objects ſo incompatible be conciliated in the ſame kingdom? How can two nations, differing in a matter ſo eſſential, be united?" He concluded with obſerving, that the church of England being eſtabliſhed "jure divino," and the Scots pretending that the kirk was alſo "jure divino," he deſired the convocation might be conſulted on this critical circumſtance.

In anſwer to this colonel Mordaunt obſerved, tha for his part he knew of no other "jure divino" than God's permiſſion, and in this ſenſe the church o England and the kirk of Scotland might both be ſai to be "jure divino," becauſe God had permitted th former to prevail in England and the latter in Scot land. "The member who ſpoke laſt," continued th colonel, "may, if he pleaſes, conſult the convocation for his own particular information; but I believe th commons ſtand in no need of ſuch inſtruction: they are ſufficient judges of the propriety of their own meaſures; and in any event it would be derogatory to the rights of the commons of England to aſk, on this occaſion, the advice of any inferior aſſembly, who had no ſhare in the legiſlature."

The debate was continued for a conſiderable time with great ſpirit; till the Tory members, finding there was a very conſiderable majority againſt them, quitted the houſe. All oppoſition was now at an end: the commons examined the treaty, article by article; and on the 11th of February it was approved of by a great majority.

On the 15th it was taken into conſideration by the lords; but the debates were more ſolemn, and carried on with more deliberation than they had been in the lower houſe. Lord Haverſham obſerved, that the articles came to their lordſhips with the greateſt countenance of authority that it was poſſible for any thing to receive; but authority, though the ſtrongeſt motive to reſtrain the will, was certainly the weakeſt in the world to convince the underſtanding. He was not, he ſaid, againſt a fœderal union, a union in intereſt and in the ſucceſſion; but this was a matter of a different nature: the queſtion was, whether two nations, independent in their ſovereignties, with diſtinct laws and intereſt, and, which is not to be forgotten, of different forms of worſhip, church-government, and order, ſhall be united into one kingdom? That, in his opinion, this was an union compoſed of ſo many diſſimilar pieces, of ſuch jarring, incongruous ingredients, that he feared it would require a ſtanding force to keep the whole from falling aſunder, and breaking to pieces every moment. He farther obſerved, that by this act, 100 Scots peers, and as many commanders, were excluded the Britiſh parliament; gentlemen who as little thought of being excluded a year or two before as any of their lordſhips did then; that their rights were as well and as ſtrongly ſecured to them as their lordſhips were at that time, by the fundamental laws of their kingdom, by the claim of right, and by act of parliament, whereby it was made high-treaſon to make any alteration in the conſtitution of the kingdom. He ſaid that the union was contrary to the ſenſe of the Scottiſh nation, as was ſufficiently evident from the murmurs of all ranks of people while the treaty was under conſideration by that parliament. But the argument on which he laid the greateſt ſtreſs, was the injury the good Engliſh conſtitution, juſtly allowed to be the moſt equal and beſt poiſed government in the world, might ſuffer by having the weight of 61 Scottiſh members, and thoſe too returned by a Scottiſh privy-council, thrown into the ſcale.

It was no difficult taſk to refute theſe arguments. Great affairs wear many different actions. The advantages and diſadvantages appear in contraſt; when the former preponderate, they ought to determine the debate. "The ſecurity and tranquillity of the kingdom," ſaid one of the advocates for the union, "will evidently be the fruits of this treaty. Our inveterate enemies, France and Popery, will be no longer formidable, when Great Britain is united into one body. With reſpect to eccleſiaſtical affairs, a wiſe and moderate government may put an end to diſputes. Are not the Swiſs cantons united, though of different religions? And is not the German diet a proof that diverſity of creeds is no obſtacle to political union?"

A treaty ſupported by reaſon, and oppoſed only by weak arguments, carried the majority of votes. The parliament approved the union; and experience ſoon made thoſe phantoms vaniſh, which imagination had raiſed againſt the good of the public. A bill of ratification was now brought in, which paſſed both houſes; and on the 4th of March her majeſty went to the houſe of peers, when the bill being preſented to her by the dukes of Queenſberry and Dover, her majeſty received it with the moſt diſtinguiſhed marks of ſatisfaction, and after having given it the royal ſignet, addreſſed herſelf to the parliament as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is with the greateſt ſatisfaction I have given my aſſent to a bill for uniting England and Scotland into one kingdom.

"I conſider their union as a matter of great importance to the wealth, ſtrength, and ſafety of the whole iſland; and, at the ſame time, a work of ſo much difficulty and nicety in its own nature, that till now, all attempts that have been made towards it, in the courſe of above one hundred years, have proved ineffectual; and therefore I make no doubt but it will be remembered and ſpoke of hereafter to the honour of thoſe who have been inſtrumental in bringing it to ſuch a happy concluſion. I deſire and expect from all my ſubjects of both nations, that from henceforth they act with all poſſible reſpect and kindneſs one to another, that ſo it may appear to all the world they have hearts diſpoſed to be one people.

"This will be a great pleaſure to me, and will make us all quickly ſenſible of the good effects of this union.

"And I cannot but look upon it as a particular happineſs, that in my reign ſo full a proviſion is made for the peace and quiet of my people, and for the ſecurity of our religion, by ſo firm an eſtabliſhment of the proteſtant ſucceſſion throughout Great Britain.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I take this occaſion to remind you of making effectual proviſion for the payment of the equivalent to Scotland within the time appointed by the act; and am perſuaded you will ſhew as much readineſs in this particular, as you have done in all the parts of this great work.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The ſeaſon of the year being now pretty far advanced, I hope you will continue the ſame zeal, which has appeared throughout this ſeſſion, in diſpatching what yet remains of the public buſineſs before you."

Thus, after many vigorous, tho' ineffectual, attempts for the purpoſe, was at length happily accompliſhed an union between England and Scotland, which took place on the 1ſt day of May 1707. And thus was a final period put to thoſe fatal quarrels that had ſo often deſolated great part of both kingdoms.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the French king determined to make another attempt to recover his affairs, and, if poſſible, procure an honourable peace. He ſent freſh troops into Spain, however neceſſary they might be in Flanders, where the victorious Marlborough triumphed over every oppoſition. The duke of Berwick, natural ſon to James II. commanded the army of Philip, and advanced to Almanza; while the allies, under the command of lord Galway, marched to meet the enemy. On the 14th of April, the two armies were in ſight of each other, and a general engagement was now unavoidable. This was the moſt fatal battle the allies ſuffered during the whole war; and the following account of it was publiſhed by authority.

"Our army entered the plain of Almanza about noon, formed into a line of battle, and marched in that poſition till they came within a mile of the enemy. Lord Galway, to ſupply our want of cavalry, had interlined a brigade of foot with each wing of horſe: but the enemy having drawn from the left ſome ſquadrons to reinforce the right wing, lord Tyrawley, who commanded on the left wing, ordered the Portugueſe horſe of the left of the rear-line, commanded by the count of Attalaya, to double into our firſt line, in order to make an equal front with the enemy.

"On the 25th of April, about three in the afternoon, the earl of Galway poſted himſelf at the head of the Engliſh dragoons, and advanced to begin the battle with the enemy's right wing of horſe; the Portugueſe being ordered to take the charge as it ſhould come to them from the left, but not before the Engliſh and Dutch were actually engaged. While we were advancing, the enemy began to play upon us from a battery on a riſing ground, nearly in the front of their right; but our troops preſſing on to come to a cloſe engagement, the cannon on either ſide did very little execution; and a detachment of dragoons being ſent, under colonel Dormer, to attack the enemy's battery, they retired, with their artillery, with great precipitation. As ſoon as our left wing was advanced within an hundred paces of the enemy's horſe, they alſo advanced out of their line to meet our charge, and the engagement ſoon became very bloody and obſtinate on both ſides. The enemy, by the weight of their ſquadrons, forced ours to retreat ſome paces; but two regiments of foot, on the left of that brigade which was interlined with the horſe in the firſt line, coming up, threw in their fire upon the enemy's flank and rear; and our cavalry, at the ſame time, renewing their charge in front, they were drove, in diſorder, through their own lines, with great ſlaughter.

"By this time the Engliſh and Dutch foot, who formed the center of our army, under the command of lieutenant-general Erle and baron Freyſheim, were ſharply engaged, and broke through the enemy's firſt and ſecond line, bearing all down before them as far as the walls of Almanza: but this ſucceſs was not of long duration; for the enemy's ſquadrons of the ſecond line fell upon their flank, and forced our infantry back with great loſs.

"The enemy obſerving that the cavalry of our right did not advance with our left wing, detached ſome ſquadrons to fall upon the Portugueſe, who formed the right wing, under the command of the marquis das Minas. Theſe troops, in the moſt daſtardly manner, gave way upon the firſt charge; the whole horſe of the right wing fled, and abandoned their infantry, who were moſt of them either killed or taken priſoners. The battle ſtill continued on our left wing, the enemy ſtill charging us with freſh ſquadrons, but without ſucceſs; which the duke of Berwick perceiving, he ſent nine battalions, moſt of them French, who drew up before the firſt line of Spaniſh horſe, to oppoſe our brigade of foot, conſiſting of five regiments. At the ſame time, he brought up ſeveral freſh ſquadrons, to make another charge upon our left wing of horſe. The count de Attalaya, who commanded the Portugueſe horſe that were mixed with our dragoons, was caried off wounded. Our troops were now attacked on every ſide; and being left naked in the flanks by the cowardly flight of the Portugueſe wing, were ſurrounded and hemmed in on all ſides.

"In this dreadful ſituation, they formed themſelves into a hollow ſquare, and retired from the field of battle. Had they been able to make good their retreat, the enemy would have had no great cauſe to boaſt of the victory, the loſs on both ſides being nearly equal; but the men, after marching nine hours without any refreſhment, and fighting about ſix, were faint with fatigue: all their ammunition was ſpent; they ſaw themſelves abandoned by their own horſe, and in a country to which they were utter ſtrangers; deſtitute of proviſions, and cut off from all hopes of a ſupply. Theſe conſiderations induced them to ſurrender themſelves, amounting to thirteen battalions, priſoners of war. They accordingly diſpatched a meſſenger to the duke of Berwick, deſiring honourable terms, which were readily granted. The duke, who believed this body beyond his reach, immediately diſpatched the count d'Asfeldt to receive their ſurrender, on theſe conditions: that they ſhould be priſoners of war till exchanged; that they ſhould be all diſarmed, except the officers, who were to keep their ſwords; and that they ſhould have liberty to ſend for their baggage before they marched any farther. The Portugueſe, and part of the Engliſh horſe that guarded the baggage, retreated to Alcira."

The confederates loſt in this action upwards of 10,000 men, 2,000 of whom were left dead on the field of battle, and among thoſe ſeveral officers of diſtinction. Lord Galway himſelf was wounded in the face, and ſeveral others very dangerouſly. The loſs of the enemy on the field was nearly equal to that of the allies.

After this unfortunate battle, the earl of Galway retired with the poor remains of his army to the frontiers of Catalonia, in order to join Charles. The next day the duke of Orleans joined the French army, marched into Valencia, and reduced almoſt the whole province, together with its capital city, before the middle of May. He marched thence to Saragoſſa; and on his approach, that city, with the whole kingdom of Arragon, made their ſubmiſſion to him, imploring the duke to intercede for them to Philip. Orleans promiſed to uſe all his intereſt to obtain their pardon; but, at the ſame time, thought proper to diſarm them, and obliged them to purchaſe their peace with large ſums of money, and procure proviſions for the ſubſiſtence of his army. The duke of Orleans cloſed the campaign with the taking of Lerida, which happened on the 2d of November; after which both armies retired into winter quarters.

In the mean time Villars became formidable in Germany; but France was ſtill in danger. The duke of Savoy and prince Eugene paſſed the Var, and beſieged Toulon. The combined fleets of England and Holland, under the command of Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, blocked up the place by ſea, and aſſiſted in the reduction of this important place. Had the enterprize ſucceeded, Provence would have been loſt, and the allies might have carried the conqueſt much farther into France. But the operations were not puſhed with that vigour that ſeems to command ſucceſs. The ſecret of the expedition had not been kept, and a powerful reinforcement arrived before the place could be taken. It was therefore determined to raiſe the ſiege, but not before they had left evident marks of their viſit. Orders were therefore iſſued for a general bombardment, both by ſea and land. This dreadful farewell greatly diſtreſſed the enemy: eight ſhips of the line were burnt in the harbour, twenty-three were ſunk at the entrance of the mole, few of which could ever be recovered; ſeveral magazines, and above ſixty houſes, were deſtroyed in the city; and the devaſtations committed in the adjacent country were eſtimated at near 500,000 pounds ſterling.

The raiſing the ſiege of Toulon was followed by ſeveral other croſs accidents and loſſes to the allies. The very ſeaſons ſeemed to arm againſt them. Their fleets were greatly ſhattered by bad weather at ſea, by which ſeveral ſhips were loſt, or fell a prey to the enemy's cruiſers. England in particular ſuffered a ſenſible loſs in the unhappy fate of Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, who, on his return with the fleet to England, ran upon the rocks of Scilly, where his own ſhip the Aſſociation, ſociation, together with the Eagle, Firebrand, and Romney were loſt, and all the crews periſhed *.

The campaign in the Netherlands was totally barren of events. The dukes of Marlborough and Vendoſme ſpent their time in marches and countermarches, in order to gain ſome advantages over each other; but theſe great generals were ſo remarkably cautious, that no action happened between the two armies, nor was there a ſingle town beſieged. The troops on both ſides returned, at the end of the campaign, into the ſame quarters they had occupied the preceding winter.

On the 23d of October, the firſt parliament of Great-Britain met (according to appointment) at Weſtminſter. The ſeſſion was opened by her majeſty with a ſpeech from the throne; in which ſhe told them, that ſhe did not doubt but they came prepared to make the union ſo proſperous, that it might anſwer the moſt ſanguine hopes of her ſubjects, and the reaſonable apprehenſions of her enemies: that nothing was ſo material as to convince heir foes by demonſtrating, that the uniting their intereſts had not only improved their abilities, but alſo heir reſolutions to proſecute the war with vigour, till n honourable peace could be obtained. She oberved, that though the attempt upon Toulon had not een attended with the deſired ſucceſs, it had not been holly without effect. She mentioned the loſs we had ſtained in Spain, and the operations of the war in taly; and requeſted the ſupplies neceſſary for proſeuting the war during the approaching campaign. Then directing her diſcourſe to the late union, ſhe aid, "It is impoſſible but ſome doubts and difficulies muſt have ariſen on account of that meaſure, hich, however, ſhe hoped, were ſo far overcome, as o have defeated the deſigns of thoſe who would have ade uſe of that handle to foment diſturbances." Afer recommending ſeveral particulars rendered neceſry to be provided for by the articles of union, ſhe oncluded with aſſuring them, "that nothing ſhould e wanting on her part to procure her people all the leſſings that could follow from that happy circumance of her reign, and to extinguiſh the leaſt occaon of jealouſy, that either the civil or religious rights any part of her united kingdom could ſuffer by e conſequences of the union; and hoped they would ffer nothing to prevail with them to diſunite among emſelves, or abate their zeal in oppoſing the comon enemy."

In return to this ſpeech, both houſes preſented very ffectionate addreſſes to her majeſty; and immediately oted near 6,00,000 for the ſervice of the enſuing ear. They afterwards preſented an addreſs to her ajeſty againſt making any peace, as it could not be vourable to her and her allies, while Spain and the eſt-Indies, or any part of the Spaniſh monarchy, mained in the hands of the houſe of Bourbon. In ſwer to this addreſs, the queen thanked them for eir advice, told them ſhe was of the ſame opinion, d promiſed, in every particular, to direct her meares in ſuch a manner as to give ſatisfaction to them, d happineſs to her people.

A. D. 1708. Lewis XIV. was ſo irritated at the es beſieging Toulon, that he determined to retaliate e injury, by attempting an invaſion of Great-Brin. He knew that the generality of the Scots were ſperated by the union, and flattered himſelf that y would readily join a French army to place the ſon the late abdicated monarch on the Engliſh throne. e was not deceived with regard to the Scots. Highly erſe to an incorporating union with England, they could not, without the higheſt indignation, behold themſelves reduced to a ſtate of dependence upon the Engliſh; and thought no means ſo likely to ſhake off the yoke as that of bringing about a revolution in the government. Lewis accordingly received the moſt flattering promiſes of aſſiſtance ſhould he land a body of forces in that kingdom.

In conſequence of this, and the engagements of the Pretender to exert his utmoſt efforts, a fleet of men of war and tranſports was expeditiouſly fitted out at Dunkirk, and 10,000 land-forces, with many officers, a great quantity of ammunition, artillery and arms, were embarked. Major general Cadogan, her majeſty's envoy in Holland, gave immediate notice of theſe preparations; and then went to Bruſſels, and concerted matters in ſuch a manner with M. d'Auverquerque, that ten battalions of the Engliſh forces in Flanders were immediately drawn down to the coaſt, ready to be ſent to England. At the ſame time the Engliſh admiralty uſed ſuch diligence in fitting out a fleet, that three and twenty ſail of men of war, under the command of Sir George Byng, and the lord Durſley, appeared before Dunkirk on the 27th of February, when the enemy thought it impoſſible for England to have any fleet at ſea.

On the 9th of March the Pretender arrived at Dunkirk: but the ſight of the Engliſh fleet induced the French admiral, M. Fourbin, to ſend to court for freſh inſtructions. But Lewis ſent peremptory orders to his admiral to venture out of the harbour. The French admiral accordingly obeyed, and ſailed from Dunkirk, at a time when the contrary winds had drove the Engliſh from their ſtation. Their fleet was now increaſed to the number of forty ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and tenders. Sir George Byng being informed that the French had left Dunkirk, immediately ſailed in purſuit of them, and at the ſame time the forces were embarked at Oſtend, and convoyed to England by admiral Baker. Theſe forces, together with ſeveral regiments of horſe, marched for Scotland with all expedition. In the mean time Sir George Byng had, by his vigilance, rendered theſe precautions unneceſſary, arriving at the Frith of Edinburgh almoſt as ſoon as the enemy, whereupon they took the advantage of a land-breeze which ſprung up in the night, and bore away with all the ſail they could poſſibly carry. As ſoon as the day appeared, the combined fleet gave chaſe, but were out-ſailed, and, except the Saliſbury, a man of war formerly taken from the Engliſh, all the French ſhips eſcaped. They loitered about ſome time with intention to land at Inverneſs; but having no pilots, and the wind not permitting a frigate, which they had ſent for ſome proviſions, to get aſhore, they ſtood off, and, diſperſing themſelves, they, by the help of hazy weather, which prevented the confederate fleet from ſeeing them, got back to Dunkirk in a moſt ſhattered condition.

Lord Griffin, lord Clermont, Mr. Middleton, a lieutenant-general, his aid-de-camp, a colonel, two lieutenant-colonels, five captains and two lieutenants, French officers; fifteen Iriſh officers, five companies of French infantry, 250 ſeamen, and all the officers of the ſhip, were taken priſoners in the Saliſbury. The lords Griffin and Clermont, with moſt of the other principal perſons, were ſent up to London, and committed to the Tower; as were alſo the duke of Hamilton, lord Belhaven, and ſeveral of the Scottiſh nobility and gentry, on ſuſpicion of carrying on a correſpondence with the court of St. Germains; but moſt of the latter were ſoon after admitted to bail.

* Sir Cloudeſley's body being caſt aſhore was ſtripped by the ntry people, and buried in the ſand; but was afterwards diſered and brought into Plymouth, from whence it was conveyed London, and interred in Weſtminſter-abbey, where a noble ument was erected, at the expence of the queen, to the memory of this gallant officer, as a mark of gratitude for the ſignal ſervices which he performed to his country. He was born of mean parentage in the county of Suffolk; and by the force of his perſonal merit alone, without any particular patron, raiſed himſelf to the higheſt ſtation in the navy.

The only inconvenience that attended this attempt was a conſiderable run upon the bank, which it was feared would affect the credit of the nation. The commons immediately voted, "That whoever deſignedly endeavoured to deſtroy or leſſen the public credit, eſpecially at a time when the kingdom was in danger of an invaſion, was guilty of a high crime and miſdemeanor, and an enemy to her majeſty and the nation." The lord treaſurer alſo ſignified to the bank, that her majeſty would allow for ſix months an intereſt of ſix per cent. upon their bills. This advantageous propoſal induced ſeveral opulent noblemen and merchants to offer them very conſiderable ſums; and the directors having called in 20 per cent. on their capital ſtock, they were ſoon in a condition to anſwer all the demands made upon them by the timorous, the envious, or the diſaffected.

The parliament, which continued ſitting at Weſtminſter, by frequent addreſſes to the queen, gave public aſſurance that they would exert themſelves in defeating this bold attempt of the enemy. They likewiſe paſſed a bill, empowering her majeſty to impriſon all ſuch perſons whom ſhe had cauſe to ſuſpect of conſpiring againſt her perſon and government. This and ſeveral other bills being ready, on the firſt of April the queen went to the houſe, and gave them the royal aſſent; after which ſhe prorogued the parliament; and on the 15th diſſolved it by proclamation. At the ſame time new writs were iſſued for calling another, and a proclamation was publiſhed, commanding all the peers of North Britain to meet on the 17th of June, at Holyrood-houſe, in Edinburgh, in order to elect ſixteen peers to repreſent them in the enſuing Britiſh parliament, purſuant to the twenty-ſecond article of the treaty of union. The privy council of Scotland was diſſolved, and a new one conſtituted for the whole united kingdom.

Lewis, equally chagrined by adverſity as elated with ſucceſs, made ſtrong efforts to triumph over fortune. Notwithſtanding his loſſes were immenſe he ſtill found reſources. An army of 100,000 men, commanded by his grandſon the duke of Burgundy, aſſiſted by the duke of Vendoſme, was to retrieve the honour of the French arms in the Low Countries. But theſe generals, unfortunately for Lewis, were of different diſpoſitions; the former pious, the latter licentious, and conſequently agreed but ill with each other. They, however, ſurprized Ghent and Bruges; advanced into Dutch Flanders, and laid the country under contribution.

As ſoon as the duke of Marlborough (who was at this time in Flanders) was informed of theſe proceedings, he immediately wrote to prince Eugene, deſiring he would haſten his march and join him, being determined to give the enemy battle. Though the allied army was greatly inferior in number, yet he thought this the moſt prudent ſtep, and the only method to prevent their progreſs. The prince had no ſooner joined the army than it was determined to paſs the Dender and offer the enemy battle. Confident of ſucceſs from their ſuperiority of numbers, the French inveſted Oudenard, from a perſuaſion that they ſhould be able to take it before the prince could join Marlborough's army. They were deceived. The allies marched with ſurpriſing expedition, and the French thought to raiſe the ſiege at their approach. The duke of Vendoſme was for drawing up the army in order to battle; but was oppoſed by the duke of Burgundy, who reſolved to continue his march. But an incident ſoon convinced him that it was now impoſſible to avoid an engagement. General Cadogan, at the head of ſixteen battalions and eight ſquadrons, fell upon ſeven battalions of foot poſted in the village of Heynem, a little below Oudenarde, upon the Schelde. The attack was made with ſo much ſucceſs, that the enemy was ſoon driven out of the village, and being purſued with a cloſe fire, a whole brigade threw down their arms, and ſurrendered themſelves priſoners. The duke of Burgundy now endeavoured to diſengage his troops from the hollow ways and defiles through which they were marching, in order to draw them up in the plain; but the confederate generals were too experienced to give him time to effect his purpoſe; their army was already drawn up in order of battle, and advanced to the charge with great alacrity. The enemy faced about and formed, but with great diſorder, which was increaſed by the miſunderſtanding that prevailed between their two generals, the duke of Burgundy continually countermanding what the duke of Vendoſme had ordered. On the 12th of July, about four in the afternoon, the battle began, and continued with great firmneſs till ten at night. The allies had the advantage in every attack, and drove the enemy from one poſt to another, till night put an end to the combat. The foot were principally engaged in this action, the broken ground rendering it very difficult for the horſe to act. Marlborough perceived it, and detached the greater part of his cavalry from the right and left wing to a very conſiderable diſtance, where they fell upon the enemy both in flank and rear with ſuch impetuoſity, that the French were thrown into confuſion, part of them retired with the baggage and artillery towards Deynſe and Ghent, and another part to Courtray. The duke de Vendoſme, ſeeing the forces flying in every part, formed a rear-guard of about twenty-five ſquadrons, and the ſame number of battalions, wi which he ſecured the retreat of his forces. Thi precaution proved the ſafety of the whole Frenc army; for the next morning at day-break the duk of Marlborough detached a large body of horſe an foot, under the command of the lieutenant genera Bulau and Lumley, to purſue the fugitives; but th prudence of the duke de Vendoſme prevented them from executing their deſigns.

In this action, which was called the battle of Ou denarde, about 4000 of the enemy were left dea on the field of battle, 2000 deſerted, and abou 8000 were taken priſoners, including a great numbe of officers. The allies alſo took ten pieces of can non, about 100 ſtandards, eight pair of kettle drum and 4000 horſe. The loſs of the allies did not amoun to 1000, officers included.

This conqueſt was followed by an attempt that ſu priſed all Europe, namely, the laying ſiege to Li in ſight of a formidable army, which might at lea carry off their convoys, and by that means reduc them to the laſt extremity, if they did not attac them in their intrenchments. But, notwithſtandin all theſe circumſtances, the place was inveſted on th 30th of Auguſt; prince Eugene commanding o one ſide, and the prince of Orange on the othe while the duke of Marlborough encamped a Helchin to cover the ſiege. Liſle was the ſtronge town in Flanders, furniſhed with ammunition, an every neceſſary, and the garriſon had been late reinforced with one and twenty battalions of the be troops in France, commanded by marſhal Bouffler

The ſiege was carried on with the utmoſt vigou while every effort was made by the French to oblig the confederates to abandon the undertaking. T dukes of Burgundy and Vendoſme marched towar the duke of Marlborough, and for ſome days cann naded his camp: but finding all their endeavours bring him to an engagement fruitleſs, and not dari to attack him in his ſtrong camp, they retired, a determined for the future to employ their troops cutting off the convoys coming with proviſions a ammunition for the beſiegers; and in covering th provinc provinces which were expoſed to the incurſions of the allies.

The duke of Marlborough had detached 6000 men to cover the march of 700 waggons coming from Oſtend with ſupplies to prince Eugene's camp. The duke of Burgundy had information of this convoy, and ſent an army of 20,000 men to intercept it. But the ſmall detachment that guarded the waggons made ſo noble a defence, under the command of major general Webb, that they obliged the enemy to retire with the loſs of 7000 men killed on the ſpot. This action is called the battle of Wynenendale, and was one of the moſt glorious atchievements performed during the whole courſe of the war.

In conſequence of this ſucceſs the allies carried on the ſiege with ſuch vigour, that on the 22d of October the town was ſurrendered, and the garriſon retired into the citadel, where they made a gallant defence till the 8th of December, when the marſhal delivered up the place. The garriſon marched out with all the honours of war, and were eſcorted to Douay.

While the allies lay before Liſle, the duke of Bavaria made an attempt to reduce Bruſſels, which he had nearly effected, when the duke of Marlborough marched with the army to its relief, and prevented his deſign. On the 18th of December the duke inveſted Ghent, where the count de la Motte commanded with thirty battalions. On the 24th the trenches were opened, and notwithſtanding the numerous garriſon, the town ſurrendered on the 30th. After theſe two important conqueſts, the numerous army under the dukes of Burgundy, Berwick, and Vendoſme, began by degrees to diminiſh, and having ſuffered the duke to take Bruges, and every other poſt, at laſt retreated to their own country; while the generals of the allies, having ſettled the plan of winter-quarters, repaired to the Hague, leaving the forces under the command of count Tilly.

In the mean time the duke of Savoy made himſelf maſter of the paſſes leading into Dauphiné. The emperor Joſeph, brother to the archduke Charles, got poſſeſſion of Landau, one of the keys of France. Paris now trembled, and the whole kingdom was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion.

During this campaign the Engliſh miniſtry had left nothing untried which might put the affairs of his catholic majeſty into good order, and, if poſſible, retrieve the terrible conſequences of the fatal battle of Almanza. Sir John Leake, who commanded the grand fleet, was by the 27th of March in Liſbon harbour; on the 23d of April he ſailed from thence for Barcelona, with near twenty ſail of the line, beſides tranſports, where he arrived on the 15th of May. Charles was now in a manner ſhut up in Barcelona, and had no hopes of being delivered, but by our fleet's tranſporting the German troops that lay ready for his ſervice in Italy. The firſt thing, therefore, that the admiral did was to ſend the tranſports, under the protection of a ſtrong ſquadron, to bring over theſe forces; after which it was determined to attempt the reduction of the iſland of Sardinia. Accordingly, on the 12th of Auguſt, the admiral appeared before Cagliari, the capital of that iſland, and after having bombarded it for a day and a night, general Wills landed, with about 800 men, and made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for an attack, when the governor ſaved his troops any farther trouble by a ſpeedy capitulation: and at the ſame time the greateſt part of them entered into the ſervice of Charles. The whole iſland following the example of Cagliari, the ſeveral ſtates aſſembled, gave aſſurances of their loyalty and affection to Charles, and provided 30,000 ſacks of grain for the ſubſiſtance of his troops.

General Stanhope having formed a plan for the reduction of the iſland of Minorca, concerted with Sir John Leake the neceſſary meaſures for carrying it into execution, when they reſolved to obtain from count Staremberg, the commander in chief of the allied army in Spain, a few battalions of Engliſh, Spaniards, and Portugueſe; which being granted them, they ſailed from Barcelona on the 23d of Auguſt, accompanied by brigadier Webb and colonel Petit. They were alſo furniſhed with a fine train of Britiſh artillery. On the 26th they landed with 3000 men, about two miles from fort St. Philip, and formed the ſiege of the town. The garriſon conſiſted of 1000 Spaniards and 600 French mariners: but the ſiege was carried on with ſuch vigour, that by the end of September the place ſurrendered. According to the articles of capitulation the garriſon were tranſported on board our veſſels, ſome to France and others to Spain. Fort St. Philip being thus reduced, with the loſs of forty men only, the reſt of the iſland gladly ſubmitted to the Engliſh government; and general Stanhope appointed colonel Petit governor of fort St. Philip, and deputy-governor of the whole iſland. After this important conqueſt, the general returned to the army in Spain, where an unſucceſsful attempt to ſurprize Tortoſa put an end to the campaign. Sir John Leake, with the largeſt ſhips ſailed for England, and on the 19th of October, arrived ſafely at St. Helen's.

While victory attended the confederates in every quarter, the queen had the misfortune to loſe her huſband, the prince of Denmark. He died about ten in the morning on the 28th of October, in the 56th year of his age. He was a prince of a very amiable character, without ambition or intrigue, and therefore incapable of giving offence to either party. He always contented himſelf with being the firſt ſubject, ſeldom interfering in buſineſs, though his office of lord high admiral gave him a claim to a very conſiderable ſhare. Her majeſty, who had been the moſt tender and affectionate wife, was inconſoleable for his loſs. He died at Kenſington, from whence his corpſe was removed, on the 11th of November, to the painted chamber at Weſtminſter, where it lay in ſtate till the 13th, when it was buried privately in Henry the ſeventh's chapel in Weſtminſter-abbey.

About this time an event happened which engaged the attention of the whole nation. Count Mattheoff, the Ruſſian ambaſſador, was arreſted in the ſtreet at the ſuit of one Morton, a laceman, and inſolently treated by the bailiffs, who dragged him to a ſpunging houſe; nor could he obtain his liberty till he was bailed by the earl of Feverſham and a merchant in the city. This inſult on the perſon of an ambaſſador was loudly complained of, as an attrocious breach of the law of nations. Enraged at this inſult, the ambaſſadors of the emperor, the king of Pruſſia, and thoſe of ſeveral other powers, demanded redreſs. The Czar himſelf declared he would be ſatisfied with nothing leſs than the death of the offenders. The queen, who reſented the injury as much as the Czar, was very deſirous of making him ſatisfaction: but the laws of England admit of no ſuch puniſhment. She obſerved to the Czar that juſtice in this country is diſpenſed by the laws only; and no exception was found for a caſe of this nature. The judges of the queen's-bench granted informations againſt the laceman and thirteen others. They were found guilty, and the privileges of ambaſſadors again acknowledged; and the parliament paſſed a bill for ſecuring the privileges of foreign miniſters. The queen conſented to make apologies, by her miniſters, to the Ruſſian court; and the Czar was ſatisfied. He could not help admiring, notwithſtanding his deſpotiſm, that mild legiſlation which is ſo attentive to guard the meaneſt ſubject from the attacks of arbitrary power.

The new parliament (being the ſecond of Great Britain) met on the 2d of November, and choſe Sir Richard Onſlow, by the queen's approbation, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons. Her majeſty's grief for the loſs of her conſort not permitting her to go to the houſe, ſhe appointed commiſſioners to open the ſeſſion, in whoſe name the lord chancellor made a ſpeech, importing, "that the commiſſioners were appointed by her majeſty to acquaint them, that ſhe expected they would continue to proſecute the war with the ſame vigour and reſolution with which it had hitherto been conducted: that ſhe hoped they would enable her to make ſuch augmentation of her forces as they ſhould judge neceſſary for preſerving and improving the advantages which the allies had gained in the Netherlands: that ſhe deſired they would prepare ſuch bills as might confirm and perfect the union; that if they would propoſe means for the advancement of trade and manufactures, ſhe would take pleaſure in enacting ſuch proviſions; and that, as ſhe had the moſt ſincere regard for the preſervation of their liberties, and the ſupport of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, ſhe would continue to exert her utmoſt endeavours to defeat the deſigns of the pretender, and of all his open and ſecret abettors."

Both houſes preſented addreſſes of condolance and congratulation to her majeſty; the former occaſioned by the death of her royal conſort, and the latter by the ſucceſs of her arms the laſt campaign. They proceeded to conſider of the ſupplies for the enſuing year; and an augmentation of 10,000 men was approved and judged neceſſary, to carry on the war with the utmoſt vigour. They then voted the ſupplies, which amounted to 6,457,830l. In order to raiſe theſe ſums, they ſettled the land-tax at 4s. in the pound; and the bank of England agreed to add 400,000l. upon condition of their being continued a corporation for twenty-one years longer. They propoſed to receive ſupſcriptions for doubling their ſtock, to enable them to circulate 2,500,000l. in exchequer bills, deſiring that a fund might be appointed for paying off and cancelling the ſaid bills in ſome certain time: and that a fund be granted for paying 150,000l. yearly, being the intereſt for the ſaid ſum at ſix per cent. with ſome other conditions relating to the ſaid bills; which propoſal was received by the parliament, and enacted accordingly.

During this ſeſſion ſeveral important affairs came under the conſideration of the parliament; but the principal was the naturalization of foreign proteſtants. This propoſition was debated with great ſpirit in both houſes, and many forcible arguments were advanced on both ſides of the queſtion. The whigs ſupported the bill; the tories oppoſed it. The former affirmed, that it would prove an effectual means of encouraging induſtry, improving trade and manufactures, and repairing the loſs of men which the war had occaſioned. They inſtanced the conduct of the king of Pruſſia, who, by inviting the French to ſettle in his dominions, had fertilized a barren and ill-peopled country, improved its trade and manufactures, augmented its revenues, and procured many other very conſiderable advantages. But the chief motive of the whigs for puſhing this bill was, to throw an additional weight of foreigners into the balance againſt the landed intereſt. The oppoſers of this act of naturalization objected, that ſuch a ſwarm of aliens might bring with them many dangerous conſequences to the conſtitution; that it was, in fact, inviting ſo many ſpies and informers among us, ſince it could not be ſuppoſed they would leave all affection for their mother country behind them, though they might gladly embrace, for the preſent, the aſylum offered them in this kingdom. It was ſaid, they would find means to inſinuate themſelves into many places of truſt and profit, and even to ſeats in the great aſſembly of national repreſentatives; and, by frequent intermarriages, contribute to the extinction of the Engliſh race. It was added, that they would greatly increaſe the number of our poor, already ſo great a burden to this country; and take out of the mouths of Engliſh tradeſmen and labourers great part of the bread they now earned by their induſtry. Theſe arguments, however powerful, were not ſufficient to prevent the bill from paſſing both houſes, and afterwards received the royal aſſent.[*]

Several enquiries were made, and great debates held, relative to the intended invaſion of Scotland; on the cloſe of which a bill was brought into the houſe of lords, under the title of, "An act for improving the union of the two kingdoms." By this law, trials for treaſon committed in Scotland were regulated according to the manner of proceeding in England, with very little variation. This act was oppoſed by the Scottiſh members, as an encroachment upon the form of their laws: and they were joined by ſeveral of the Engliſh, who made it a maxim to oppoſe every meaſure of the court. But, notwithſtanding all their efforts, the bill paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent. The queen, however, in order to make them eaſy, conſented to an act of grace, wherein all treaſons were pardoned, except ſuch as were committed upon the high ſeas; an exception levelled at thoſe who embarked with the pretender in his laſt expedition.

A. D. 1709. France was now not only compleatly humbled, but even trembled for its own ſafety. Reſources began to fail, credit was at a ſtand; and the people, vho had idolized their monarch in his proſperity, began to murmur againſt him when he became unfortunate. The ſeverity of the winter compleated the deſpair of the nation. The olive trees in the ſouthern provinces were deſtroyed, and the greater part of the fruit-trees killed by the froſt. There were no hopes of a harveſt, and very little corn in the granaries. The numerous armies of Lewis ſeemed to be periſhing for want, and that haughty monarch was reduced to the neceſſity of imploring a peace. He offered to demoliſh Straſburgh and Dunkirk, to abandon the pretender, and renounce all pretenſions to the Spaniſh monarchy, to grant the ſtates-general the barrier they demanded in the Low Countries, and to treat with the emperor, agreeable to the treaty of Ryſwick. The more this proud monarch was humbled by diſtreſs, the more his misfortunes were inſulted. Prince Eugene, the duke of Marlborough, and the grand penſioner Henſius, united in the ſame political views, were wiſely for reducing him to the laſt extremities. They were deſirous of preventing him from troubling the repoſe of Europe for the future. Accordingly they demanded, that as he gave up the crown of Spain, he ſhould take proper meaſures to ſee it vacated, and even employ his troops for that purpoſe. This was a propoſal nothing but the utmoſt diſtreſs could induce the French monarch to accept. He abſolutely refuſed it, and determined to carry on the war for ſome time longer, rather than ſubmit to ſuch unworthy conditions. "If I muſt uſe arms, (ſaid he) I ſhould rather chuſe to uſe them againſt mine enemies, than againſt my own children."

[*] In conſequence of this bill there came over, in the month of May this year, near 7000 of the poor Palatines and Swabians from the borders of the Rhine in Germany, who had been utterly ruined, and driven from their habitations by the French. It was at firſt propoſed to ſettle them in the New Foreſt of Hampſhire, where land might be parcelled out for them by ſhares or lots. This, however, was objected to, and ſome method remained to be concerted for their diſpoſal. At length it was agreed, that a ſufficient number of tents ſhould be erected for them on Blackheath, and near Camberwell, which was accordingly done, and a brief was granted throughout Great Britain for a collection for them. Some were taken into private houſes; 500 families of them were ſent into Ireland, where 24,000l. were granted by parliament for their ſupport. At length 3000 of them were ſent over to New-York, and ſettled upon Hudſon's River; but being badly received there, many of them removed to Penſylvania, where they were kindly entertained by the quakers, which afterwards proved the means of drawing thither many thouſands of German and Swiſs proteſtants.

Lewis, on this occaſion, had recourſe to a very extraordinary meaſure. He laid the unreaſonable demands of the allies before his people, in a circular letter; and after acquainting them with the additional burdens he was obliged to lay upon them, he endeavoured to excite their indignation, to rouſe their honour, and even excite their pity. This produced the deſired effect: the people reſolved to expend their whole ſubſtance in defence of the honour of their king, and even to fight his battles without pay, rather than abandon him to the infamy of accepting ſuch humiliating terms. The manufacturers and labourers, who wanted bread, turned ſoldiers. Villars was appointed commander in chief; Boufflers, though his ſenior, conſenting to ſerve under him. This patriotic conceſſion acquired him more honour than if he had been intruſted with the principal command.

The allied army, which amounted to 110,000 men, aſſembled in the neighbourhood of Liſle on the 22d of June, and it was determined by prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough to open the campaign immediately. Villars had taken poſſeſſion of a very advantageous camp in the plain of Lans, where he threw up entrenchments, in order to act on the defenſive. The allies, not chuſing to attack the enemy in their entrenchments, opened the campaign with the ſiege of Tournay. The town itſelf made no great reſiſtance; but the citadel was ſo ſtrong, both by art and nature, and ſo gallantly defended by lieutenant-general Surville, at the head of 4,000 men, that it held out a month againſt all the efforts of the allies, and was at laſt ſurrendered by an honourable capitulation.

Tournay being thus reduced, the victorious confederates reſolved to inveſt Mons; and Villars, in order to cover the place, poſted himſelf behind the woods of la Merte and Trainiere, in the neighbourhood of Malplaquet. The French amounted to 120,000 men; and the allies, who were now joined by the Heſſians, to near the ſame number. On the 9th of September, the two armies were ſo near each other, that a cannonade began between them; and the allies perceiving that it would be impoſſible to inveſt Mons while the French army continued in its preſent ſituation, it was determined to attack the enemy in their entrenchments. Purſuant to this reſolution, batteries were erected on the wings and in the center of the allied army, and every thing prepared for making the attempt.

General Schuylemburgh and the duke of Argyle began the attack about eight in the morning, at the head of eighty-ſix battalions, ſupported by two-and-twenty ſquadrons, commanded by count Lottum. The attack and reſiſtance were equally obſtinate; but the aſſailants at laſt prevailed, and the left wing of the French were driven from their entrenchments into the woods of Sart and Trainiere. The right of the enemy, poſted in the wood of la Merte, and ſecured by triple entrenchments, was next attacked by the prince of Orange and baron Fagel, at the head of thirty-ſix battalions of Dutch troops. The battle was here ſupported with the moſt deſperate courage on both ſides. The French were obliged to quit the firſt entrenchment, but were repulſed with great ſlaughter from the ſecond. Marſhal Villars, having received a wound in his knee at the attack, was obliged to be carried from the field of battle. The loſs of their commander greatly depreſſed the courage of the French, and their reſiſtance, from that moment, became leſs vigorous. The prince of Orange having rallied his forces returned to the charge, and ſoon drove the enemy from their entrenchments, and out of the wood into the plain, where their horſe were all drawn up in proper order. The battle now became general, and the victory was diſputed with great vigour till three in the afternoon, when the French began to give way, and were purſued, with great ſlaughter, to the defile of Bavay.

This was the deareſt victory the allies purchaſed during the whole war; near 18,000 of their troops being ſlain on the field of battle, and among them ſeveral officers of diſtinction. The loſs of the enemy did not amount to more than 8 or 9,000; but the diſgrace of a total defeat, and even of being driven from their entrenched camp, ſtruck ſuch a panic into the French ſoldiers, that their generals did not think it prudent to make any farther attempt to ſave Mons, which ſurrendered about the middle of November, when both armies retired into winter quarters.

The campaigns in Spain and Portugal were alſo very unfavourable to the allies. The city of Alicant, garriſoned by two Engliſh regiments, had been beſieged, and held out for a conſiderable time againſt a very numerous army of the enemy, under count d'Aſfeldt. At length, the city being abſolutely untenable, colonel Richards, the commander, retired with his garriſon into the caſtle, which had hitherto been deemed impregnable. In conſequence of this, d'Aſfeldt ordered the rock to be undermined; and after lodging 200 barrels of gun-powder in the cavity, gave Syburg the governor to underſtand, that he might ſend two of his officers to inſpect the condition of the works. Syburg accepted the offer; and the chevalier accompanied them to the mine, where he told them that the thoughts of ſeeing ſo many gallant men periſh in the ruins of a place they had ſo bravely defended, induced him to make this offer of ſaving themſelves from deſtruction. But Syburg, with an obſtinacy that flowed rather from ſtupidity than valour, refuſed the offer. The centinels giving notice that the fire was ſet to the mine, Syburg ordered the guard to retire, and walked out to the parade, with ſeveral officers, when the rock opening under their feet, they fell into the chaſm and were cruſhed to death.

This dreadful incident, however, was not ſufficient to intimidate d'Albeaume, who ſucceeded to the command: he determined to defend the place to the laſt extremity. In the mean time a ſquadron of 18 Engliſh men of war, under the command of Sir Edward Whitaker, ſailed from Barcelona to the relief of the place, and came into Alicant road on the 17th of April, from whence they made a furious fire upon the town, and endeavoured to land ſome forces to throw into the caſtle; but the enemy had taken ſuch meaſures to prevent their landing, that the Engliſh thought proper to deſiſt from the deſign. General Stanhope, who commanded the land forces on board the fleet, ſeeing the impoſſibility of relieving the place, ſent a boat aſhore with a flag of truce, and an officer with a letter to the Spaniſh governor, wherein he offered to ſurrender the caſtle on honourable terms, which was accordingly done, and the garriſon ſent to Minorca. Thus was Alicant reduced, the only ſtrong place that Charles had in Valencia.

The parliament met on the 15th of November, and the queen opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which ſhe told both houſes, "That the enemy had, in the beginning of the year, endeavoured, by falſe appearances, and deceitful inſinuations of a deſire after peace, to create jealouſies and diviſions among the allies; but that they had been diſappointed in their expectations, ſuch meaſures having been taken as rendered it impoſſible for them to diſguiſe their inſincerity: that God had been pleaſed to bleſs the arms of the confederates with a moſt remarkable victory, and other ſucceſſes, which had laid France open to the impreſſion of the allied arms, and conſequently rendered peace more neceſſary to that kingdom than it was at the beginning of the campaign: that ſhe hoped they would enable her to proſecute the advantages ſhe had gained, by reducing within proper limits that exorbitant and oppreſſive power, which had ſo long threatened the liberties of Europe."

Both houſes preſented addreſſes of thanks to the queen for her ſpeech, congratulated her on the ſucceſs of her arms, and thanked the duke of Marlborough for his ſignal ſervices. The commons were ſo eager for proſecuting the war with vigour, that they voted above 6,000,000 for the ſervice of the enſuing year.

Theſe immenſe ſums granted by parliament ſtruck the court of France with terror, as they ſufficiently demonſtrated that the credit of England was in its full vigour, while their own was reduced to the loweſt ebb. At the ſame time, it was evident that the Engliſh parliament was determined to carry on the war till the haughty Lewis was ſufficiently humbled.

The greater part of this ſeſſion was taken up in adjuſting a matter of a very ſingular nature, and which tended greatly to re-kindle the animoſity of parties. On the 13th of December, a complaint was laid before the houſe of commons by Mr. Dolben, againſt Doctor Henry Sacheverel, rector of St. Saviour's in Southwark, for having preached and publiſhed two ſermons, containing ſeveral dangerous poſitions. Sacheverel was a clergyman of an over-heated imagination, but narrow capacity, and took every opportunity of venting his animoſity againſt the diſſenters. This complaint was ſeconded by Sir Peter King, and the ſermons were voted malicious, ſcandalous and ſeditious libels, highly reflecting upon her majeſty and government, the late happy revolution, and the proteſtant ſucceſſion as by law eſtabliſhed; tending to alienate the affections of her majeſty's ſubjects, and create jealouſies and diviſions among them. In purſuance of this reſolution, they ordered, that Doctor Henry Sacheverel, and Henry Clements, his bookſeller, ſhould attend the bar of the houſe.

Accordingly, on the 14th of December the Doctor was brought to the bar, where he acknowledged himſelf the author of both the ſermons, and declared that he had received encouragement from the lord-mayor to print that intitled, "the perils of falſe brethren in church and ſtate." The doctor being ordered to withdraw, the lord-mayor was aſked, if he had commanded doctor Sacheverel to print the ſermon in queſtion. In anſwer to which, the lord-mayor declared he never deſired, ordered, or encouraged the printing of that libel. Upon this declaration, the commons ordered Mr. Dolben to impeach Sacheverel at the bar of the houſe of lords, in the names of all the commons of England; appointed a committee to draw up articles againſt him; and commanded the uſher of the black rod to take him into cuſtody.

On the 17th the Doctor petitioned the houſe, that he might be admitted to bail; but this indulgence was refuſed, and the commons ſeemed determined to carry on the proſecution with the utmoſt ſeverity. The lords, however, thought proper to admit him to bail, that he might be more at leiſure to draw up an anſwer to the charge. This he accordingly did, denying ſome articles, and endeavouring to juſtify or extenuate others. The commons having ſent up a replication, declaring they were ready to prove the charge, the lords appointed the 27th of February for the trial at Weſtminſter-hall.

A. D. 1710. This extraordinary trial commenced on the day appointed, and continued near three weeks, during which time all buſineſs was ſuſpended, and the capital thrown into the utmoſt ferment. The doctor was attended to and from Weſtminſter, during the time of his trial, by multitudes of people, crying out, "God bleſs the church and Sacheverel." They even proceeded to ſuch lengths, that they demoliſhed ſeveral meeting-houſes, and made bonfires in the ſtreets with the materials, at the ſame time ſhouting, with loud huzzas, "High-Church and Sacheverel."

The debates in the houſe of lords became ſo intereſting, that the queen herſelf was preſent. The earl of Wharton obſerved, that Sacheverel's doctrine of paſſive obedience might have the moſt ſerious and dangerous conſequences; that the principle of reſiſtance was the corner-ſtone of the revolution; that to ſuppoſe it unlawful, was to ſuppoſe a great part of the people, and the parliament itſelf, guilty of rebellion and injuſtice; that, of conſequence, the preſent government could not be conſidered as lawful, becauſe the queen's right was wholly derived from the revolution. Burnet, biſhop of Saliſbury, the famous partiſan of William, juſtified reſiſtance from hiſtory, both ancient and modern. He alledged the examples of the miniſters, the Dutch, the conduct of Elizabeth in their behalf, and the ſuccours granted to the Hugonots; adding, that though the contrary opinion had prevailed, thoſe who affected to ſupport it were the firſt to plead for reſiſtance when they ſaw themſelves oppreſſed. The biſhop of Bath and Wells, who was more a tory in his principles than Burnet, agreed that reſiſtance might be lawful in certain extraordinary caſes; but added, that the doctrine ought not to be propagated among the people, who would be ready, on many occaſions, to abuſe it; and that the revolution, which ſhould be rather called a "Vacation," ought not to be cited as an example; that the term, "original contract," if not uſed with great reſerve, might inſpire the moſt pernicious ſentiments; and that obedience could not be preached with too much zeal, when reſiſtance was ſupported by indiſcreet apologies. Theſe reflections irritated the duke of Argyle: he aſſerted, "that the clergy had, in all ages, abandoned the intereſts of the people, and extolled the majeſty of kings, that they might govern them with greater eaſe; and that this was a ſufficient reaſon why they ſhould not interfere in political matters." Several of the moſt diſtinguiſhed tories owned, that the doctor's ſermons were extravagant and abſurd; but inſiſted that they were not ſufficient to condemn him. He was, however, found guilty by a majority of ſeven votes; on which he was ſuſpended from the pulpit for three years, and his ſermons condemned to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. This ſentence was thought ſo favourable by Sacheverel's party, that they conſidered it as a victory over the whigs, and celebrated the triumph with bonfires and illuminations.

On the 1ſt of April, her majeſty went to the houſe, and, in a ſpeech to the lords and commons, expreſſed her concern for the neceſſary cauſe which had taken up ſo much of their time: ſhe declared that no prince could have a more true and tender concern for the welfare and proſperity of the church than herſelf; and therefore ſhe thought it very injurious to take a pretence from wicked and malicious libels, to inſinuate that the church was in danger under her adminiſtration. Her majeſty then prorogued the parliament.

During theſe tranſactions Lewis, ſeeing the miſeries of his people daily increaſe, and all his reſources fail, once more ſued for peace. The allies enjoyed the humiliation of his ambition. The negotiations were opened at the little town of Gertruydenberg, where the French ambaſſadors met with a thouſand mortifications. It was in vain that Lewis made ſuch offers as would have been ſhameful if neceſſity had not the ſame power over ſovereigns as over common men. He even offered to furniſh money ſufficient to drive his grandſon from the throne of Spain, in caſe he refuſed to abandon it, in exchange for a ſmall dominion that ſhould be aſſigned him. It was abſolutely inſiſted upon, that Lewis himſelf ſhould dethrone him by force of arms. This the French monarch refuſed, and the ambaſſadors returned to their reſpective countries.

Theſe conferences, however, did not retard the operations of the campaign. On the 15th of April, prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough ſet out from the Hague for Tournay, in order to aſſemble the forces which were quartered on the Maeſe, in Flanders and Brabant. They immediately advanced to Pont-a-Vendin, in order to attack the lines thrown up by the French to cover Douay and other frontier towns. On their approach, the troops left for the defence of the lines retired; and the allies having laid bridges over the Scarpe, the duke of Marlborough, with his diviſion, paſſed that river, and encamped at Vitry, while prince Eugene inveſted Douay. The French army, which was extremely numerous, and ſtill commanded by marſhal Villars, paſſed the Schelde and encamped at Bouchain, in order to give battle to the confederates. Upon their approach, an alteration was made in the diſpoſition of the allies, and proper precaution taken to give them a warm reception. Villars, whoſe real deſign was to interrupt the ſiege of Douay by continual alarms, advanced in order of battle; but viewing the ſituation of the confederates, marched back to the heights of Laurence, and there pitched his camp. On the 26th of June, the town of Douay capitulated; and the allies finding it impoſſible to attack the enemy in their fortified lines, undertook the ſiege of Bethune, which ſurrendered upon the 29th of Auguſt. The towns of Aire and Venant were alſo taken without much difficulty, after which the armies marched into winter quarters.

During this campaign, the war in Spain was carried on with great ſpirit, and each ſide, in its turn, experienced ſucceſs and diſgrace. General Stanhope, at the head of the horſe and dragoons of Charles's army, attacked the whole cavalry of the enemy at Almenara. Stanhope charged in perſon, and ſlew with his own hand general Ameſſaga, who commanded the guards of Philip. The Spaniſh horſe were entirely routed, and the main body of the army retired with great precipitation to Lerida. The allies purſued them to Saragoſſa, where, on the 9th of Auguſt, an engagement enſued. The enemy was totally defeated, with the loſs of all their cannon, and the greater part of their colours. Out of forty battalions, not above 4,000 men eſcaped; and of ſixty ſquadrons, only 3,400; all the reſt being either killed or taken priſoners. Charles entered the town of Saragoſſa in triumph, the garriſon and citadel having ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war; while Philip, with the wreck of his army, retired to Madrid.

Soon after this engagement, the Spaniſh army was conſiderably reinforced by detachments of French troops, and, at the ſame time, the duke of Vendoſme was ſent from France to take the command of them. On the 27th of November, the whole army ſurrounded general Stanhope, who was quartered in the little town of Brehuega. As the place was not tenable, and the general had very little ammunition, he was obliged, after a vigorous reſiſtance, to ſurrender himſelf and all his forces priſoners of war. On the news of this misfortune, count Staremberg, one of king Charles's generals, aſſembled his forces, and about eleven in the forenoon began his march towards Brehuega; but the roads were ſo bad, that night came on before he reached the heights in that neighbourhood. On the 29th they were attacked by the enemy, who were twice their number, and Staremberg's left wing was entirely defeated; but his right maintained the fight with ſurpriſing valour and perſeverance until night, when Vendoſme retired in diſorder, leaving Staremberg maſter of the field of battle and all his artillery. The allies had, however, ſuffered ſo ſeverely in the attack, that the general, after having nailed up the cannon, retired to Catalonia, and afterwards to Barcelona.

No material circumſtance happened, during this campaign, on the Rhine, both ſides being equally incapable of entering upon action. The elector of Brunſwick, who commanded the imperial army, weary of ſo inactive a life, thought proper to reſign a command, from which he plainly perceived neither honour to himſelf, nor advantage to the general cauſe could accrue: count Gronſelt was appointed to ſucceed his highneſs.

The military operations were equally languid on the ſide of Piedmont: the duke of Savoy being indiſpoſed, the command of the forces was ſtill veſted in count Thaun, who attempted to croſs the Alps, in order to force his way into Dauphiné. But the duke of Berwick, who commanded on the frontiers of that country, had ſecured it by ſuch ſtrong entrenchments, that the imperial general found himſelf obliged to deſiſt from his enterprize, and march his army back to their quarters.

During theſe tranſactions on the continent, the intrigues formed in England againſt the whig miniſters began to appear in a very diſtinguiſhed manner. A popular ſpirit of averſion to thoſe who favoured the diſſenters had been excited by Sacheverel's trial; and the queen herſelf began to ſhew her attachment to the tories. The duke of Marlborough, though born to be an honour to his country, was a man, and therefore ſubject to failings. He was too fond of wealth and grandeur, and this gave a handle to his diſgrace. He daily loſt credit with the queen, becauſe he wanted to act the maſter rather than the ſubject. The caprice and intolerable haughtineſs of his ducheſs occaſioned an incurable rupture. The queen had now another favourite, and the tories determined to employ her intereſt in bringing about a total change in the miniſtry. Mrs. Maſham, the lady in queſtion, was intimately connected with Mr. Harley, the late ſecretary of ſtate, who directed her in the manner ſhe was to proceed with the queen, and ſuch ſprings it was neceſſary to put in motion, in order to affect the intended purpoſe. Mrs. Maſham was poſſeſſed of every requiſite to make her the agreeable companion and confederate. The ducheſs of Marlborough grew intolerably jealous, and, by her natural impetuoſity, widened the wound ſhe ſhould have endeavoured to cloſe. She wrote a very inſolent letter to the queen, in which, among other haughty expreſſions, ſhe ſaid, "Do me juſtice, and give me no anſwer." She was, however, ſoon ſenſible of her fault, and was very deſirous of making reparation; but neither her repentance, her prayers, nor her tears, had power to move a wounded heart ſhe had ſo long held in ſlavery. "You deſired no anſwer," ſaid the queen, and you ſhall have no anſwer."

In the mean time Mrs. Maſham neglected neither art nor opportunity to fix herſelf firmly in the affections of her royal miſtreſs; and ſucceeded beyond her hopes. In one of their converſations, ſhe artfully gave the ſubject a political turn, in the courſe of which ſhe informed her of many things to which ſhe was before wholly a ſtranger; and when ſhe perceived her curioſity was ſufficiently awakened, ſhe referred her, for farther ſatisfaction, to Mr. Harley, of whom the queen had entertained a very high opinion. He was accordingly admitted to ſeveral private conferences, and by him the queen was informed of the general diſcontent which prevailed in every part of the kingdom, at ſeeing its moſt eſſential intereſts ſacrificed to gratify the ambitious views of a private family. He aſſured her majeſty ſhe had nothing to fear from the malignancy of party; that by far the major part of her people were inſpired with the genuine principles of loyalty, and entirely devoted to her ſervice; and engaged, if ſhe would remove from about her perſon the petty tyrants who kept her enſlaved, and engage to call a new parliament, ſuch repreſentatives would be ſent to the houſe of commons, as were the trueſt friends to monarchy, to the eſtabliſhed church, and to the proteſtant ſucceſſion.

Theſe arguments prevailed: the queen determined to ſhake off the yoke of the whigs, and ſupply their places with a tory miniſtry. Accordingly the earl of Sunderland, ſecretary of ſtate; the earl of Godolphin, lord-treaſurer: the lord chancellor Cowper; the earl of Wharton, lord-lieutenant of Ireland; lord Somers, preſident of the council; and ſeveral other whigs, were diſplaced, and their employments enjoyed by their rivals. Other changes followed, till at laſt no whig remained in any place of truſt. The parliament, in which the whiggiſh intereſt had prevailed, was diſſolved, and ſure meaſures were taken for obtaining a parliament of tories.

Though this change was entirely brought about by the intereſt of Mrs. Maſham, yet the trial of Dr. Sacheverel ſeems firſt to have rendered the queen uneaſy with regard to the principles of the whigs, who, in their ſpeeches on that memorable occaſion, had treated monarchical power in ſuch indecent terms, that the queen was alarmed: ſhe found herſelf, according to their doctrine, reduced to a mere ſervant of the people. This determined her to examine the matter to the bottom, and the conſequence was a total change of the miniſtry.

Dr. Sacheverel, whoſe trial had occaſioned ſo much noiſe, a feeble inſtrument in himſelf, but very capable of enflaming the populace, now became one of the principal agents of the court. He was appointed to a living in Wales, and repaired thither in triumph, with a pompous equipage. The univerſity of Oxford treated him as ſome illuſtrious perſonage; and the towns through which he paſſed expreſſed their zeal to do him honour. Thouſands of the populace ran before him with acclamations. The clergy in general encouraged the enthuſiaſm of the people, and every place reſounded with "The church and Dr. Sacheverel." This happened at the time of the general election; and no incident could have been of more advantage to the tories, of whom this parliament was almoſt wholly compoſed.

The new parliament met on the 25th of November, when Mr. Bromley was choſen ſpeaker without oppoſition. On the 27th her majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which ſhe recommended the proſecution of the war with vigour, eſpecially in Spain. She declared ſhe was firmly reſolved to ſupport the church of England, to preſerve the Britiſh conſtitution agreeable to the union, to maintain the indulgence allowed by law to ſcrupulous conſciences, and to employ none but ſuch as were ſincerely attached to the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover.

Both houſes preſented very affectionate addreſſes, and the commons immediately voted the neceſſary ſupplies for carrying on the war.

About the latter end of December the duke of Marlborough arrived in London, when her majeſty gave him to underſtand, that he might expect the thanks of the parliament as formerly; adding, that ſhe hoped there would be a perfect harmony between him and her miniſters. The duke wiſely expreſſed no reſentment againſt the changes that had happened in the adminiſtration, the good of his country having determined him to continue at the head of the army as long as poſſible.

A. D. 1711. On the 2d of January the queen ſent a meſſage to both houſes, acquainting them that an action had happened in Spain to the diſadvantage of Charles, in which the Engliſh forces particularly ſuffered; and that ſhe had given orders for procuring troops to repair the loſs. This opportunity was ſeized by the houſe of commons for ſhewing their hatred to the old miniſtry. The duke of Marlborough, who had long been conſidered as an honour to his country, was now become the object of parliamentary cenſure; he who had humbled the pride, and checked the ambition of France, who had retrieved the honour of the Britiſh arms, and ſecured the liberties of Europe, was now become the object of contempt, and ſuffered the moſt ſhameful indignities. So uncertain is the favour of princes, and ſo changeable is the breath of popular fame! The people now inſulted the hero they had before almoſt worſhipped. He was accuſed of pride, avarice, cruelty, violence, extortion, fraud and rapine: even his courage was diſputed in the midſt of his victories. Never did Rome or Athens know popular clamour more abſurd or unjuſt. The parliament enquired, with the ſame partiality, into the unſucceſsful war in Spain. They cenſured the conduct of Galway and Stanhope, and loaded Peterborough, their rival, with encomiums. To blacken the former miniſtry, the houſe reſolved, that thoſe who had ſupported the bill for a general naturalization, in conſequence of which vaſt numbers of poor Palatines were brought into England, were enemies to the queen and the nation.

Though Harley had ſo eminently contributed to bring about the late change in the miniſtry, he ſoon loſt the confidence of the tories, becauſe he was too prudent to join in their violent meaſures. But a dangerous circumſtance ſoon after reſtored his reputation. The marquis de Guiſcard, a French refugee in the Engliſh ſervice, thinking his ſervices very ill repaid by a precarious penſion of 400l. a year, endeavoured, in vain, to obtain an audience of the queen, in order to ſolicit a more conſiderable appointment. The deſire of revenge, added to the moſt enormous ambition, now induced him to make his peace with the court of France; and, accordingly, he offered his ſervices in a letter to one Moreau, a banker in Paris: but his packet being intercepted, a warrant was iſſued in order to try him for high treaſon. As ſoon as the warrant was ſerved he was carried to the Cock-pit in order to be examined, where ſeeing a penknife lying on the table, he took it up without being perceived by any of his attendants. Finding his correſpondence with Moreau was diſcovered, he deſired to ſpeak a word in private with Mr. ſecretary St. John, but this requeſt was refuſed; and that gentleman being out of his reach, he ſtepped ſtept up to Mr. Harley, and exclaiming, "Have at thee then," ſtabbed him in the breaſt with the penknife he had concealed. He repeated the blow with ſuch force, that though the weapon broke againſt the bone, without penetrating the cavity, the chancellor fell to the ground. Upon this Mr. ſecretary St. John cried out, "the villain has killed Mr. Harley," and immediately drew his ſword. His example was followed by ſeveral other members of the council, and Guiſcard received a number of wounds. He, however, made a deſperate defence; but being overpowered by the meſſengers and ſervants, he was conveyed from the council-chamber to Newgate, where he ſoon after died of a gangrene, occaſioned by the bruiſes and wounds he had received.

The injurious ſuſpicions that had been entertained of the miniſter vaniſhed, when an enemy to the ſtate had attempted his life. Both houſes addreſſed the queen on this occaſion, in which they declared, that Mr. Harley's fidelity to her majeſty, and zeal for her ſervice, had, in their opinion, drawn upon him the hatred of all the abettors of popery and faction: that they would effectually ſtand by and defend her majeſty, and all thoſe who had the honour of being employed in her ſervice, againſt all the public and ſecret attempts of her enemies; at the ſame time beſeeching her majeſty to take all poſſible care of her ſacred perſon, upon whoſe life the welfare and happineſs of her people, as well as the happineſs of Europe entirely depended; and for that purpoſe to give directions for cauſing all papiſts to be removed from the cities of London and Weſtminſter. In conſequence of this addreſs, a proclamation was publiſhed, ordering the laws to be ſtrictly put in practice againſt papiſts. The earl of Rocheſter dying about this time, Harley became ſole miniſter; was created baron of Wigmore, and raiſed to the rank of earl by the antient titles of Oxford and Mortimer; and was ſoon after appointed lord-treaſurer.

On the 17th of April an expreſs arrived at the Engliſh court with the news that the emperor Joſeph I. died of the ſmall-pox at Vienna on the 6th of that month. He left the dominions of the houſe of Auſtria, and the German empire, together with his pretenſions to Spain and the Weſt-Indies, to his brother Charles, who was accordingly ſoon after elected.

On the 12th of June her majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and the commons being ſent for, ſhe made a ſpeech to both houſes, and then put an end to the ſeſſion of parliament.

Though the duke of Marlborough had loſt his power in the cabinet, yet he was ſtill at the head of the allied army, and appeared again with applauſe on the theatres of his victories. He left England in the month of January, and about the middle of April aſſembled an army at Orchies, between Liſle and Douay; while marſhal Villars drew together the French forces in the neighbourhood of Cambray and Arras. The lines which Villars had formed to ſecure his army were thought impenetrable: he therefore bid defiance to all the efforts of the Engliſh general. Theſe lines began at Bouchain on the Scheld, and were continued along the Sanſet and the Scharpe to Arras; and thence along the Upper Scharpe, and the Ugy to the Canche, the openings between theſe rivers being entrenched and fortified with the utmoſt art and care. But difficulties only ſtimulated Marlborough to overcome them. He determined to make himſelf maſter of the French lines, and ſucceeded in a moſt extraordinary manner. By a feigned march he ſo artfully diverted the attention of Villars, that he entered the lines near Arleux, almoſt without oppoſition, on the 4th of Auguſt. This was juſtly conſidered as the boldeſt attempt that had been made during the whole war; and the honour of it was the greater to the duke of Marlborough, as his army was not only weakened by a large detachment which prince Eugene had carried to the Rhine, but by the calling over 5000 of the beſt troops in his army for an expedition intended to be undertaken by ſea; ſo that the troops of the enemy were ſuperior in number to his own. This raiſed his reputation beyond all he had done formerly; it was conſidered as a maſter-piece of generalſhip, which had hardly ever been exceeded. Villars, on the contrary, was not only cenſured for his conduct at Paris, but even ridiculed by his own officers. Marlborough immediately diſpatched brigadier Sutton to London with the news that he had made himſelf maſter of the French lines, without the loſs of a man, though the enemy had boaſted they were impenetrable.

Marlborough now determined to beſiege Bouchain, contrary to the opinion of the deputies of the ſtates-general, who thought the attempt too difficult. The town was ſituated in the middle of a moraſs, ſtrongly fortified, well ſupplied with proviſions and ſtores, and defended by a numerous garriſon. Add to this, that Villars with an army ſuperior in number to that of the allies, was encamped within a mile of the town. The place was inveſted on the 10th of Auguſt by 30 battalions and 12 ſquadrons, commanded by general Fagel. The ſiege was puſhed with the utmoſt vigour, and the town ſoon laid in ruins by the artillery and bombs. Marſhal Villars attempted to raiſe the ſiege, but in vain. Marlborough had taken his meaſures ſo well, that his deſigns were rendered abortive; and the place ſurrendered on the 30th of Auguſt. Nor could the garriſon obtain any better terms than that of being priſoners of war.

The allies were now in poſſeſſion of the Maeſe almoſt to the influx of the Sambre, of the Scheld beyond Tournay, and of the Lys as far as it is navigable. Beſides the conqueſts in Germany they had alſo reduced ſo much of Guelderland, as had formerly been left to Spain by the treaty of Munſter; and likewiſe Limburg, Brabant, Mechlin in Flanders; two thirds of Hainault with their fortreſſes, the conqueſt of which was thought almoſt impracticable. By the taking of Bouchain, and the progreſs of the confederate army on the Scharpe and the Lys, they were become maſters of two rivers, which, by means of the Deule and its canal, had been ſerviceable to the French for many years in their continual invaſions of the Spaniſh Netherlands, of which they were wholly deprived. All theſe important conqueſts the allies had made during the courſe of this war, under the conduct of the duke of Marlborough; who, having given orders for ſecuring the navigation of the Scharpe to Douay, and covering the workmen employed in fortifying ſeveral poſts on that river and on the Scheld, left the army, and after a ſhort ſtay at the Hague, landed in England on the 17th of November.

In the beginning of this year the duke of Argyle was appointed ambaſſador extraordinary to king Charles III. and commander in chief of her majeſty's forces in Spain. On the 29th of May his grace landed at Barcelona, where he had the misfortune to find the Britiſh troops in the utmoſt diſtreſs for want of proviſions. The French army was alſo in a wretched condition; and had Staremberg been properly ſupported by the allies, he might doubtleſs have obtained very ſingular advantages: but the remittances were ſo long in coming, that Argyle was obliged to borrow money on his own credit before the Britiſh troops could take the field. At length Staremberg advanced towards the enemy, who attacked him at the paſs of Prato del Rey, where they were repulſed with conſiderable loſs. The duke of Argyle was ſoon after ſeized with a violent fever, and conveyed back to Barcelona. Vendoſme now laid ſiege to the caſtle of Cordoua, which was vigorouſly defended till the end of December, when a detachment being ſent to the relief of the place, the beſiegers were defeated, 2000 of them killed upon the ſpot, and all their artillery, ammunition, and baggage taken. Staremberg was, however, unable to purſue this advantage. Argyle wrote preſſing letters to the miniſtry, and complained loudly that he was entirely unſupported; but all his remonſtrances were without effect, no remittances arrived, and he returned to England without having been able to attempt any thing of importance.

The new miniſtry had for ſome time carried on a negotiation for peace with the court of France, and hoped to obtain ſuch advantages in point of commerce for the ſubjects of Great Britain, as would ſilence the clamours of detraction. They made no doubt of maintaining the ſuperiority they had gained in parliament, and it is not unlikely that ſome of them cheriſhed views in favour of the pretender, whoſe ſucceſſion to the crown would have demoliſhed the whig party, and firmly eſtabliſhed them in the adminiſtration. A private meſſage was therefore ſent by the earl of Jerſey to the court of France, intimating the queen's ſincere deſire of peace, and impoſſibility of carrying on a ſecret negotiation; for which reaſon Lewis was deſired to propoſe a renewal of the conferences with the Dutch, in which caſe the Engliſh plenipotentiaries ſhould have ſuch inſtructions, as would render it impoſſible for the ſtates-general to prevent the concluſion of the treaty. This intimation was extremely agreeable to the French court, but at the ſame time it ſeemed averſe to renew the conferences with the Dutch. Mr. Prior was therefore ſent to Verſailles to communicate the preliminary demands of the Engliſh, receive the anſwer of the French king, and know whether Philip had tranſmitted a power of treating to his grandfather. When Prior arrived at Fontainbleau he preſented the queen's memorial, in which ſhe demanded, "that the Dutch ſhould have a barrier in the Netherlands and the emperor one on the Rhine: that there ſhould be a ſecurity given for the Dutch commerce, and a general ſatisfaction to all the allies: that the ſtrong places taken from the duke of Savoy ſhould be reſtored, and that he ſhould poſſeſs ſuch towns and diſtricts in Italy, as had been ceded to him in former treaties; that Lewis ſhould acknowledge queen Anne and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, demoliſh the fortifications of Dunkirk, and conclude a new treaty of commerce; that Gibraltar and Port Mahon ſhould be ceded to the crown of England: that the negro trade in America, at that time carried on by the French, ſhould be given up to the Engliſh, together with ſome towns on that continent, where the ſlaves might be refreſhed: that her majeſty's ſubjects trading to Spain ſhould have ſecurity for enjoying all the advantages granted by that crown to the moſt favoured nation: that the Engliſh ſhould be put into poſſeſſion of Newfoundland and Hudſon's bay: that both nations ſhould continue to enjoy the territories in North-America they might poſſeſs at the ratification of the treaty; and that ſubſtantial ſecurity ſhould be given, that the ſame perſon ſhould not enjoy the crowns of France and Spain."

Mr. Prior had no power to negotiate, and was ordered to return immediately, if the French ſtarted any difficulties. They, finding he was not ſufficiently empowered to treat, ordered M. Meſnager, deputy of the council of commerce in France, to attend him back to England, and at the ſame time gave him full power to ſettle the preliminaries of the treaty, which, after various diſputes, were ſigned on the 8th of October, by the French miniſter and the two ſecretaries of ſtate.

Theſe articles being communicated to the foreign miniſters reſiding in London, by Mr. ſecretary St. John, who at the ſame time notified to them, that her majeſty had fixed on the city of Utrecht for the place of congreſs, and that the conferences would begin on the firſt of January, count Gallas, the Imperial ambaſſador, treated them in ſo diſreſpectful a manner, that the queen ſent him a meſſage forbidding him her court, and at the ſame time informing him, that the ſooner he left England the more agreeable it would be to her. The ſtates-general likewiſe ſent over Mr. Buys, one of their deputies, to perſuade her majeſty not to give ear to any propoſals made by the court of France; but they were diſappointed in their expectations; the queen was determined to procure peace, and put a ſtop to the great effuſion of blood which had for ſo many years deluged half Europe. Accordingly the earl of Strafford, the Engliſh ambaſſador at the Hague, was ordered to demand the immediate concurrence of the ſtates, declaring, in her majeſty's name, that ſhe ſhould look on any delay as a refuſal to comply with her propoſitions. Intimidated by this declaration, and being apprehenſive that by ſeparating their intereſts from thoſe of Great Britain they ſhould not be able to obtain a barrier to their mind, they, after long deliberation, thought it moſt prudent to acquieſce in the queen's meaſures.

A memorial was alſo preſented by baron Bothmar, envoy extraordinary from his electoral highneſs of Hanover, diſſuading her majeſty from treating with the court of France till the demands of the allies were fully complied with. In order to quiet the apprehenſions which the elector had been inſpired with by the inſinuations of the whig party, who repreſented all theſe meaſures as ſo many ſteps to bring in the pretender, the earl of Rivers, the Engliſh ambaſſador at Hanover, was ordered to aſſure that prince, that his ſucceſſion to the crown ſhould be effectually ſecured in the treaty.

Charles VI. wrote to the queen on the ſame ſubject, and with ſimilar arguments of diſſuaſion, but her majeſty did not honour his letter with an anſwer. However, in order to render all parties as eaſy as poſſible, ſhe wrote to the allies in general, explaining to them the ſteps ſhe had taken, and inviting them to the congreſs. She even condeſcended to have a conference with the dukes of Marlborough, Grafton, and St. Alban's; the earls of Dorſet and Scarborough; the lords Somers, Cowper, and others, on the ſame ſubject; but they remained fixed in their oppoſitions to a pacification.

On the 7th of November her majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, in which ſhe obſerved, "That notwithſtanding the arts of thoſe who delighted in war, the time and place for a general congreſs were finally appointed: that her allies, eſpecially the ſtates-general, whoſe intereſt ſhe conſidered as inſeparable from her own, had, by their ready concurrence, expreſſed an entire confidence in her conduct: that her chief concern was, that the proteſtant religion, and the laws and liberties of the nation ſhould be preſerved inviolate, by ſecuring the ſucceſſion as it was limited by parliament, in the houſe of Hanover: that ſhe ſhould uſe all her endeavours, in the enſuing negotiation, to obtain all the advantages of trade and commerce, which a tender and affectionate ſovereign could procure for a dutiful and loyal people: that with regard to the princes and ſtates who were engaged in the war, ſhe would leave no means unattempted to obtain for each of them all reaſonable ſatiſfaction: that as the beſt way to forward the treaty would be to make early proviſion for opening the campaign, ſhe hoped they would grant the neceſſary ſupplies for the enſuing year; and begged they would proceed in th s affair with ſuch diſpatch, as might convince the enemy, that if ſhe could not obtain a good peace, ſhe was ready to proſecute the war with vigour."

As ſoon as the queen was retired, a motion was made in the houſe of lords for returning her majeſty thanks for her ſpeech; but the earl of Nottingham, who from being one of the chief ſupports of the tory party, had of late aſſociated with the whigs, propoſed, that a clauſe ſhould be inſerted in the addreſs, "that no peace could be ſafe or honourable to Great Britain or Europe, if Spain and the Weſt Indies were allotted to any branch of the houſe of Bourbon." This motion occaſioned a violent debate, in the courſe of which the earl of Angleſea repreſented the neceſſity of eaſing the nation of the burdens occaſioned by an expenſive war: he even affirmed, that if ſome perſons who thought it their intereſt to prolong the war, had not interpoſed, an advantageous peace might have been procured immediately after the battle of Ramillies. The duke of Marlborough, againſt whom this inſinuation was levelled, made a long ſpeech in his own vindication: he appealed to the queen, who was then in the houſe incog. whether he had not on all occaſions informed her and her council of all the propoſals offered by the enemy for a peace; and had not deſired inſtructions for his conduct on that ſubject: he declared, upon his conſcience, and in preſence of the Supreme Being, before whom he ſoon expected to appear, that he was always deſirous of a ſafe, honourable, and laſting peace, and very far from entertaining any deſign of prolonging the war for his own advantage, as had been falſely repreſented by his enemies. At laſt the queſtion was put, whether the earl of Nottingham's clauſe ſhould ſtand as part of the addreſs, and carried in the affirmative. The ſame clauſe was propoſed to be inſerted in the addreſs of the commons, but rejected by a great majority.

Perſuaded that while Marlborough continued at the head of the army, the ſtrongeſt oppoſition would be made to the offers of peace, the miniſtry determined to ſtrip him of all his poſts. The committee for examining the public accounts, having proved that he had received annually a conſiderable ſum from the victuallers of the army, the queen declared in council, that in order to enquire impartially into that affair, ſhe thought it neceſſary to diveſt him of all his employments. This declaration was the next day imparted to him in a letter wrote by the queen's own hand, in which ſhe took occaſion to complain of the treatment ſhe had received from him and his friends. It was now ſufficiently evident what reliance is to be placed on the favour of the people, when the object, however deſerving, is no longer in power. That great general, whom they had ſo lately in a manner deified and adored, and whoſe glorious actions filled every mouth with praiſes, was now become the object of the moſt indecent ſatire, and the moſt bitter invectives. He who had ſo lately poſſeſſed the favour and confidence of almoſt every power in Europe, now found himſelf unable to oppoſe the invenomed ſhafts of deſtructive party.

But notwithſtanding the miniſtry had found means to deſtroy the power of Marlborough, they perceived that it would be impoſſible to procure the approbation of the houſe of lords to the intended peace, unleſs ſome method could be found to turn the majority in favour of the court, it being now ſufficiently evident that it was in favour of the other party. Accordingly the queen was perſuaded to create no leſs than twelve new peers; a number which the miniſtry imagined would ſecure them the majority in the upper houſe.

A. D. 1712. Charles VI. thinking that of all the allies he was likely to be the greateſt ſufferer by a peace with France, thought proper to ſend prince Eugene to England, as a perſon the moſt likely to promote his intereſt with the queen, and alſo hoping that his preſence, with the aſſiſtance of the whigs, whoſe hatred to the new miniſtry appeared on every occaſion, would raiſe ſuch a flame of diſcontent in the nation, as might turn to the advantage of the advocates for war. His highneſs arrived in England on the firſt of January, and, though his buſineſs was far from being agreeable to the miniſtry, was received with all the reſpect due to his rank and diſtinguiſhed character. He was immediately admitted to an audience with the queen, who received him with great complacency, and, having peruſed the letter which he delivered to her from the emperor, ſhe told him, "She was ſorry that the ſtate of her health did not permit her to converſe with his highneſs as often as ſhe could wiſh; but that ſhe had ordered the treaſurer and Mr. ſecretary St. John to receive his propoſals, and confer with him as frequently as he ſhould think proper."

The chief buſineſs with which the prince was charged was to perſuade the queen from agreeing to the ſettlement of the crown of Spain on the houſe of Bourbon; and his memorial conſiſted of propoſals and methods for carrying on the war in that country with ſucceſs. Accordingly, as ſoon as the houſe of commons met, after the holidays, Mr. ſecretary St. John informed them that he had received her majeſty's commands to lay before the houſe a propoſal made her by prince Eugence, in the name of the emperor, for ſupporting the war in Spain. The ſubſtance of it was, "That his imperial majeſty judges that 40,000 men will be ſufficient for this ſervice; and that the whole expence of the war in Spain may amount to about four millions of crowns, towards which his imperial majeſty offers to make up the troops he has already in that kingdom, to 30,000 men, and to take one million of crowns upon himſelf."

This propoſal was received with great coldneſs in the houſe of commons; ſo that though Eugene was received with all the honours due to his birth and merit, he ſaw no proſpect of ſucceeding. He therefore haſtened back to the continent, to take upon himſelf the command of the army, in which he had now no competitor for glory.

In the mean time the examination into the conduct of Marlborough was deferred; but notwithſtanding all the regard and friendſhip Eugene ſhewed for that great leader, the commons kept no meaſures with the duke. They accuſed him of malverſation; and it is certain that too great a thirſt of wealth had ſullied the glory of that illuſtrious general. But that glory, and his eminent ſervices, were ſurely ſufficient to have thrown a veil over a few failings, eſpecially as he had it in his power to juſtify his conduct by orders from the miniſtry. He was, however, unwilling to inflame the nation, and prudently ſought refuge in foreign countries, to elude a proſecution carried on by a party who could not bear to ſee him any longer in power, or even enjoy, unmoleſted, the fruits of his victories.

The Dutch having ſhewn evident ſigns of diſpleaſure at the peace now in agitation, the commons, in revenge, attacked the treaty conclued ſome years before with the ſtates, by which the barrier was granted to them in the Low Countries. They repreſented to the queen, in a ſtudied remonſtrance, "that Holland had not furniſhed her contingent of troops, and that England had been overcharged 19,000,000 during the war." The ſtates-general publiſhed a memorial in vindication of their conduct; and the commons voted it a ſcandalous libel, injurious to the houſe, and tending to alienate the minds of the people from the preſent government.

In the mean time the conferences were opened at Utrecht with all the appearance of ſucceſs. The emperor and the ſtates-general continued obſtinate to their propoſals, and were for reducing the French monarch to the moſt humiliating conceſſions. The Britiſh miniſtry, therefore, found it abſolutely neceſſary to carry on the treaty without them, or break off the negociation. The French now delivered their ſpecific explanation of the offers for a general peace. Theſe were tranſmitted to London, and, as far as they related to Great Britain, were as follow:

"The French king will acknowledge, at the ſigning of the peace, the queen of Great Britain in that quality; as alſo the ſucceſſion of that crown according to the preſent ſettlement, and in the manner her Britannic majeſty ſhall pleaſe.

"His majeſty will cauſe all the fortifications of Dunkirk to be demoliſhed immediately after the peace, provided an equivalent be given him to his ſatisfaction.

"The iſland of St. Chriſtopher's, Hudſon's Bay, and ſtreight of that name, ſhall be yielded up entire to the crown of Great Britain; and Acadia, with Port Royal and the Fort, ſhall be reſtored entire to her majeſty.

"As to the iſland of Newfoundland, the king offers to yield up that alſo to Great Britain, reſerving only to himſelf the port of Placentia, and the right of catching and drying fiſh as before the war.

"It ſhall be agreed to make a treaty of commerce, before or after the peace, as England ſhall chuſe; the conditions of which ſhall be made as equal as poſſible between the two nations."

Theſe offers occaſioned great debates in the houſe of lords; ſeveral of the members conſidering them as trifling, arrogant, and injurious to her majeſty and her allies. Some endeavours were made to adjourn the debates, but in vain; and it was reſolved, without a diviſion, to addreſs the queen, repreſenting the juſt indignation the houſe entertained at the inſolence of France, in having propoſed to acknowledge her majeſty's title to theſe realms no ſooner than when the peace ſhould be ſigned; as alſo at the terms of peace offered to her and her allies by the plenipotentiaries of France; declaring, at the ſame time, that they would aſſiſt her majeſty to the utmoſt of their power in proſecuting the war, until they ſhould obtain a ſafe and honourable peace.

The duke of Ormond having been appointed commander in chief of the Engliſh forces, in the room of the duke of Marlborough, he paſſed over to the continent in the beginning of April; and on the 20th of May his grace, in conſort with prince Eugene, aſſembled the army between Douay and Marchienes, where it was found, upon a review, that the allied army conſiſted of 120,250 men. Prince Eugene ſoon after propoſed to attack the French army under marſhal Villars, or to inveſt the town of Queſnoy; but Ormond, who had now received freſh orders from Mr. ſecretary St. John, gave the prince and deputies of the ſtates general to underſtand, that her Britannic majeſty, having a proſpect that the negotiations would prove ſucceſsful, had commanded him not to act offenſively againſt the enemy.

The prince and the deputies of the ſtates were thunderſtruck at theſe orders, the latter of whom not only complained to the Britiſh miniſters at the congreſs, but alſo ſent over a letter to the queen, ordering their envoy at London to deliver it into her own hand. It contained an excuſe for the backwardneſs they had ſhewn in acting in conſort with her majeſty. They ſaid, "That all the difference between the queen and them, was a diſparity of ſentiments; and if for ſuch a cauſe, confederates united by the ſtrongeſt ties, might quit their engagements, no engagements could be relied on for the time to come." The Dutch envoy alſo received orders to publiſh copies of this letter in the public papers. This was accordingly done, and they were printed and diſperſed at the very time when the letter came to the queen's hand.

Incenſed at theſe proceedings, which were conſidered as a remonſtrance rather than a repreſentation, and an appeal to the people than an addreſs to the ſovereign, the queen wrote a very ſharp letter to the ſtates. At the ſame time the commons voted an addreſs to her majeſty, wherein they aſſured her "of the juſt ſenſe the houſe had of the indignity offered to her majeſty, by printing and publiſhing a letter from the ſtates-general; and humbly deſired that ſhe would ſo far reſent ſuch indignities, as to give no anſwers for the future to any letters or memorials that ſhould be ſo printed and publiſhed."

During theſe tranſactions, ſome events happened which had nearly rendered the whole ſcheme abortive. In the courſe of the preceding year the dauphin had died of the ſmall pox, and his title conferred on the duke of Burgundy; who alſo, on the firſt of February, paid the great debt of nature, ſix days after the death of his wife, Mary Adelaide of Savoy. Theſe were ſoon followed to the grave by their eldeſt ſon the duke of Britany: ſo that none remained alive of the duke of Burgundy's children except the duke of Anjou, at this time a very ſickly infant. A ſeries of misfortunes like theſe muſt be extremely ſhocking to Lewis in his old age: and equally alarming to the queen of England, who ſaw that nothing but the precarious life of an unhealthy child could divide the two monarchies of France and Spain: an union ſhe was abſolutely determined to prevent. Gualtier was therefore ſent to Paris with a memorial, couched in the ſtrongeſt terms, repreſenting the danger to which the liberties of Europe muſt be inevitably expoſed, if Philip enjoyed both the crowns of France and Spain, and therefore demanding, that in conſequence of his pure, voluntary, and ſimple renunciation, his title to the crown of France might be transferred to his brother the duke of Berry: and that the latter ſhould renounce all title to the crown of Spain, provided he ſhould aſcend the throne of France.

Philip yielded to neceſſity; and having ratified the renunciation of all future pretenſions to the crown of France, the queen agreed to a ſuſpenſion of arms. Orders were immediately ſent to the duke of Ormond to put an end to hoſtilities. Her majeſty laid the plan of the treaty before both houſes; and notwithſtanding all the efforts of the whig party, they preſented ſeparate addreſſes, in which they thanked the queen for her great condeſcenſion in communicating theſe conditions to her parliament, and expreſſed an entire ſatisfaction of her conduct.

On the 21ſt of June the queen put an end to the ſeſſion by a ſpeech from the throne, wherein ſhe expreſſed her ſatisfaction at the addreſſes and ſupplies ſhe had received, and obſerved, that ſhould the treaty be broke off, the burdens of the war would be at leaſt continued, if not increaſed: that the preſent opportunity would be irrecoverably loſt, of Britain's eſtabliſhing a real balance of power in Europe, and improving her own commerce: and that if any of the allies ſhould gain ſomething by ſuch a proceeding, the reſt would ſuffer in the common calamity.

When the duke of Ormond abandoned the allies, prince Eugene undertook the ſiege of Queſnoy; but almoſt all the foreign troops in Engliſh pay refuſed to follow him. In the mean time Lewis agreed to give up Dunkirk as a pledge to the Engliſh for his engagements, and waited with impatience the events of a critical campaign. Eugene took Queſnoy, and beſieged Landreci; while detachments from his army ravaged the country, and the kingdom of France was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion. But the lines of Eugene were too much extended. Villars forced the entrenchments of general Albemarle, who was encamped at Denain, and the prince was unable to give him any aſſiſtance. He took Marchienes, where the magazines of the allies were formed; raiſed the ſiege of Landreci, retook Douay, Queſnoy, and Bouchain; and in one campaign became ſuperior to the conqueror, ſo long fluſhed with victory.

A. D. 1713. The ſucceſs of Villars greatly alarmed the allies; and they now began to perceive that all their efforts, without the aſſiſtance of England, would be in vain: they therefore came into the Engliſh meaſures, and the famous treaty of Utrecht was ſigned on the firſt of April.

By this treaty the French king acknowledged the proteſtant ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover to the crown of Great Britain; and engaged for himſelf, his heirs and ſucceſſors, not to ſuffer the Pretender to return into France, nor any way to ſuccour or aſſiſt him.

“ That the crowns of France and Spain ſhould never be united under one head; that renunciations ſhould be made by both ſides in due form; and that they ſhould never be united under any pretence whatſoever.

“ That the trade between France and Spain ſhall be on the ſame footing as in the time of Charles II.

“ That the fortifications of Dunkirk ſhould be demoliſhed, and the harbour filled up, never to be repaired. That the bay and ſtreights of Hudſon ſhould be reſtored, and ſatisfaction be made to the company for the damages they had ſuſtained.

“ That the whole iſland of St. Chriſtopher ſhould be hereafter poſſeſſed by the Engliſh, and alſo Nova Scotia or Acadia, with the port now called Annapolis Royal.

“ That the iſland of Newfoundland ſhould belong wholly to Great Britain; the French having only huts for drying their fiſh, and liberty to fiſh only from Cape Bona Viſta to the northern point of that iſland, and ſo down the weſtern ſide as far port Roche. But the French were to retain Cape Breton, and other iſlands in the mouth of the river St. Lawrence.

“ That the French in Canada ſhould not moleſt the five nations of Indians ſubject to Great Britain; nor the ſubjects of Great Britain moleſt the Indians under the protection of France.

“ That all letters of marque, counter-marque, and repriſal, be annulled.

“ That juſtice ſhall be done to the Hamilton family with regard to the duchy of Chatelrault; to the duke of Richmond concerning ſuch requeſts as he had to make in France; and to Charles Douglas, with regard to certain lands to be reclaimed by him.”

A treaty of navigation and commerce was at the ſame time concluded; whereby a free trade was eſtabliſhed according to the tariff of 1664, except in a few commodities, which in 1699 were ſubjected to new regulations. It was agreed that the duties impoſed upon the productions of France imported into England ſhould not exceed thoſe laid on the ſame commodities from other countries; and that commiſſioners ſhould meet at London to adjuſt all matters relating to commerce.

It was alſo ſtipulated, that the emperor ſhould poſſeſs the kingdom of Naples, and the duchy of Milan in the Spaniſh Netherlands: that the duke of Savoy ſhould enjoy Sicily with the title of king: that the ſame title with the iſland of Sardinia ſhould be given to the elector of Bavaria, to indemnify him for the loſſes he had ſuſtained: that the ſtates-general ſhould reſtore Liſle and its dependencies; and that Namur, Charleroy, Luxemburgh, Ypres, and Newport ſhould be added to the other places they already poſſeſſed in Flanders: that the king of Pruſſia ſhould have Upper Gueldres in exchange for Orange, and the other eſtates belonging to that family in Franche Compté. The king of Portugal declared himſelf ſatisfied with the treaty, but the emperor poſtponed giving his anſwer till the firſt of July.

The parliament met on the 9th of April, when the queen, in her ſpeech, informed both houſes, that the treaty of peace was ſigned, and that in a few days the ratifications would be exchanged: ſhe expreſſed her hopes that what ſhe had done for the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and the perfect friendſhip that ſubſiſted between her and the houſe of Hanover, might convince ſuch who wiſhed well to both, and had the quiet and ſafety of their country at heart, how vain all attempts were to divide them. Then, addreſſing herſelf to the commons, ſhe obſerved, that ſhe left it entirely to them to determine what force might be neceſſary for the ſecurity of trade by ſea, and for guards and garriſons; and then proceeded in the following manner: “ Make yourſelves eaſy and I ſhall be ſatisfied: next to the protection of divine providence I depend upon the affection and loyalty of my people; I want no other guarantee.” Then again directing herſelf to both houſes, ſhe ſaid, “ ſhe hoped they would concert proper meaſures for eaſing the foreign trade of the kingdom: for improving and encouraging manufactures and the fiſhery: for employing the hands of idle people: for ſuppreſſing the ſcandalous and ſeditious libels that were every day publiſhed; and for putting a ſtop to the impious practice of duelling.” She concluded her ſpeech with this pathetic exhortation; “ Now we are entering upon peace abroad, let me conjure you all to uſe your utmoſt endeavours for calming mens minds at home, that the arts of peace may be cultivated. Let no groundleſs jealouſies, contrived by a faction, and fomented by party-rage, effect that which our enemies could not. I pray God to direct all your conſultations for his glory and the welfare of my people.”

Addreſſes of thanks and congratulations were immediately preſented by both houſes of parliament, and their example was followed by the houſes of convocation, and all the principal corporations in the kingdom.

The ratifications of the treaty between Great Britain and France being exchanged, on the 5th of May the peace was proclaimed in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, with the uſual ſolemnities.

On the 16th of July her majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which ſhe thanked both houſes for the good ſervice they had done the public; recommended to them the making her ſubjects truly ſenſible of what they had gained by the peace; and endeavour to diſſipate thoſe groundleſs jealouſies which had been ſo induſtriouſly fomented among the people, that unhappy diviſions might not weaken, and in ſome meaſure endanger, the advantage which had been gained. By her majeſty's command the lord chancellor now prorogued the parliament to the 28th of Auguſt, but it never ſat more; for on the 8th of Auguſt, a proclamation was iſſued for diſſolving the preſent parliament, and declaring her majeſty's intention of calling a new one. Accordingly, on the 18th of the ſame month, writs were iſſued in due form, and the new parliament appointed to meet on the 12th of November.

About this time the magiſtracy of Dunkirk ſent a deputation with an addreſs to the queen, humbly imploring her majeſty to ſpare the port and harbour of that town, and repreſenting that they might be uſeful to her own ſubjects. To this addreſs lord Bolingbroke, by her majeſty's order, returned the following anſwer, "that the queen had read with attention the addreſs he had preſented to her in the name of the magiſtrates of the town of Dunkirk; and ſhe had commanded him to tell them, that ſhe beheld with ſorrow the damages which the inhabitants of that town would ſuſtain by the demolition of its ramparts and harbours, but that ſhe did not think it convenient to make any alteration in a thing agreed on and determined by a treaty." Hereupon M. Tugge, the principal deputy, preſented a ſecond addreſs or memorial to her majeſty on the ſame ſubject, which he cauſed to be printed and publiſhed. The arguments it contained were, however, refuted by Addiſon, Steele and Mainwaring: and commiſſioners were ſent to ſee the fortifications of Dunkirk entirely demoliſhed. They were acccordingly razed to the ground, and the harbour filled up.

In the mean time the tories took care to manage the elections in ſuch a manner as to retain the legiſlative power in their own hands; but the queen's ill ſtate of health, and the conteſt among her miniſters, delayed for ſome time the meeting of the parliament. Oxford and Bolingbroke were at once competitors for power, and rivals in reputation for abilities; they were both aſpiring and ambitious, began to form ſeparate cabals, and adopt different principles. Senſibly affected by their diſſentions, the queen interpoſed both her advice and authority; but though an exterior accommodation was effected, their mutual animoſity continued to increaſe. Bolingbroke was powerfully ſupported by Sir Simon Harcourt, the chancellor, Sir William Windham, and Mr. Secretary Bromley: while Oxford, perceiving his authority began to decline, formed a deſign of retiring from public buſineſs.

On the 24th of December, her majeſty, who had ſome time before repaired to Windſor, was ſeized with an inflammatory fever. This accident revived the hopes of the jacobites; the public funds fell immediately, and ſo great a run was made on the bank, that the directors ſent one of their members to repreſent to the treaſurer the danger that threatened the public credit. The recovery of the queen, however, which happened in two or three days after, baniſhed the fears that had ſeized the principal perſons in the nation.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the emperor Charles VI. having rejected the terms of peace, propoſed to carry on the war, at his own expence, by the aſſiſtance of the empire; but his forces on the Rhine, commanded by prince Eugene, were ſo inferior in number to thoſe under Villars, that the prince could not prevent the French general from making himſelf maſter of the two important fortreſſes of Landau and Friberg. His imperial majeſty, however, ſtill flattered himſelf, that ſome fortunate event might cauſe an alteration in the affairs of Europe, favourable to his intereſt; and depended on the great abilities of prince Eugene for gaining ſome remarkable advantage over the forces of the enemy. But finding himſelf diſappointed in all his expectations, and, at the ſame time, unable to ſupport the expences of another campaign, he liſtened to the overtures of peace made by the electors of Cologn and Palatine; and the treaty was ſoon after ſigned by Eugene and Villars. Lewis, by this treaty, ceded to the emperor, Old Briſac and all its dependencies, Friberg, the forts in the Briſgau and the Black Foreſt, and fort Kehl. He alſo engaged to demoliſh the fortifications, oppoſite to Huningen, the caſtle at Sellingen, and all the works between that place and Fort Louis. On the other hand, the town and fortreſs of Landau were ceded to the king of France, who acknowledged the elector of Hanover; reſtored the electors of Bavaria and Cologn to all their dignities and dominions, and put the emperor into immediate poſſeſſion of the Spaniſh Netherlands.

A. D. 1714. The new parliament met on the 16th of February, and was opened by commiſſion, (the queen not being ſufficiently well to attend) when Sir Thomas Hanmer was choſen ſpeaker; after which they adjourned till the ſecond of March.

During this adjournment the ratifications of the treaty of commerce between Great Britain and Spain were brought over to England, and peace was proclaimed on the 1ſt of March. The principal articles of this treaty were the following: "That the crowns of France and Spain ſhould never be united: that the proteſtant ſucceſſion ſhould be acknowledged, and never be oppoſed on any pretence: that navigation and commerce ſhould be on the ſame footing as in the treaty of 1667: that no licence ſhould be given to the French, or other nations, to introduce negroes, or any merchandiſes, into the Spaniſh dominions in America, except what might be agreed on by the treaty of commerce, and the privilege granted by the aſſiento of negroes; except alſo what ſhould be granted by the catholic king, after the aſſiento ſhould be determined: that the American dominions ſhould not be alienated from the crown of Spain, to France, or any other nation: that Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca ſhould be given up to England for ever: that no Moors were to come thither but on account of traffic: that all the Spaniſh inhabitants ſhould enjoy their eſtates and religion, or have liberty to ſell their eſtates, and retire: that the South-ſea company ſhould have the privilege of introducing negroes into ſeveral parts of America for thirty years, commencing with the year 1713, in the ſame manner as enjoyed by the French: that the Catalans ſhould have a full and free pardon, with the poſſeſſion of all their eſtates and honours, and enjoy the ſame privileges with the inhabitants of both Caſtiles: that Sicily ſhould be yielded to the duke of Savoy; but in caſe of his dying without heirs, the kingdom ſhould return to Spain. By two ſeparate articles, the queen promiſed to perſiſt in the meaſures, by which ſhe had taken care, that no other part of the Spaniſh monarchy ſhould be torn from it; and obliged herſelf to procure the princeſs Urſini to be put into poſſeſſion of Limburg, or ſome other country in the Netherlands, which ſhould produce 30,000 crowns a year, purſuant to a grant made her by king Philip in the year 1711."

The day after peace was proclaimed with Spain, the parliament met, according to adjournment; when the queen went to the houſe of peers, and made a ſpeech to both houſes; in which ſhe told them, that ſhe had obtained an honourable and advantageous peace for her own people, and for the greater part of the allies; and was perſuaded, with their hearty concurrence, her interpoſition might prove effectual to complete the ſettlement of Europe: that the ſituation of theſe kingdoms pointed out their true intereſt; for as this country can only flouriſh by trade, ſo it will be moſt formidable by a right application of its naval force. She complained, that effectual care had not been taken to ſuppreſs thoſe ſeditious papers and factious rumours by which deſigning men had been able to ſink credit, and cauſe the innocent to ſuffer. She obſerved, that ſome had arrived to that height of malice as to inſinuate, that the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover was in danger under her government; but that ſuch perſons, who could thus diſtract the minds of men with imaginary dangers, could only mean to diſturb the preſent tranquillity, and to bring real evils upon the public. She added, that after all ſhe had done to ſecure the religion and liberties of her people, and to tranſmit both ſafe to poſterity, ſhe could not mention theſe proceedings without ſome degree of warmth, and hoped the parliament would agree with her, that attempts to weaken her authority, or to render the poſſeſſion of the crown uneaſy, could never be proper means to ſtrengthen the proteſtant ſucceſſion. "I have done," ſaid ſhe, "and ſhall continue to do my beſt for the good of my ſubjects. Let it be your endeavour, as it ſhall be mine, to unite our differences; not by relaxing from the ſtricteſt adherence to our conſtitution in church and ſtate, but by obſerving the laws yourſelves, and inforcing a due obedience in others."

This ſpeech produced ſome debates in both houſes; but addreſſes of thanks were voted both by the lords and commons; and the queen, after thanking the lords for their affectionate addreſs, added, "That they who were neareſt the throne would, firſt of her ſubjects, feel the evil conſequences of any diminution of the regal authority: that it was a comfort to her ſhe had the aſſurance of their ſupport; and they might depend upon it, ſhe would never give way to the leaſt attempt on the juſt authorities of the crown, or any of their rights and privileges."

The next day the convocation complimented the queen in a joint addreſs "on her recovery and happy return to her royal city in health and ſafety;" concluding with their wiſhes, "That after a long and happy reign, ſhe might be able to tranſmit the protection of the church and ſtate to a proteſtant ſucceſſor in the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, which her majeſty, to the great ſatisfaction and comfort of all her faithful and good ſubjects, had ſo often declared to be at her royal heart."

Notwithſtanding theſe affectionate addreſſes, the gall of party ſtill ſubſiſted, and the minds of the people were daily inflamed by pamphlets and papers. Addiſon, Steele, and Hallifax headed the whig party, and Swift was the champion of the tories. In the month of March a complaint was made in the houſe of commons of ſeveral ſcandalous papers lately publiſhed, under the name of Richard Steele, eſq; a member of that houſe. Sir William Wyndham declared, that theſe papers contained inſolent, injurious reflections on the queen herſelf, and could only be dictated by the ſpirit of rebellion. A day being appointed for his trial, Steele was ordered to attend in his place, when he owned the writings, and entered into a circumſtantial defence. Mr. Addiſon, general Stanhope, and Mr. Walpole were his principal defenders; and his opponents Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Foley, and the attorney-general. Nothing, however, which could be alledged in his favour, had the leaſt weight with the majority, who were determined to condemn him; and accordingly two pamphlets intitled, "The Engliſhman," and "The Criſis," written by Richard Steele, eſq; were voted ſcandalous and ſeditious libels, and that the author ſhould be expelled the houſe of commons.

The lords taking into conſideration the ſtate of the kingdom, the leaders of the whigs repreſented the danger that threatened the proteſtant ſucceſſion, on account of the pretender's not being yet removed from Lorrain, and the ill condition the affairs of Europe were left in by the late treaties of peace, and moved, that addreſſes be preſented to the queen; "Firſt, for an account of what ſteps had been taken for removing the pretender from the dominions of the duke of Lorrain, and what anſwers had been given by that duke. Secondly, an account of the negotiations of peace: what meaſures had been taken to render the peace univerſal: and what obſtructions her majeſty had met with. Thirdly, an account of the monies granted ſince the year 1710, for carrying on the war in Spain and Portugal."

Theſe addreſſes were preſented without oppoſition. But the miniſtry perceiving that the whigs were forming ſeveral other motions which could not fail of greatly embarraſſing their meaſures, the lord-treaſurer moved to adjourn the houſe till the 31ſt of March, which was carried by a ſmall majority.

Though the miniſtry had increaſed their party during the receſs of parliament, yet the debates were carried on with great vehemence. No ſatisfactory account had been yet given with reſpect to the preſent reſidence of the pretender, who, it was aſſerted, ſtill continued in Lorrain. The earl of Sunderland ſaid, "that notwithſtanding the earneſt application made laſt ſeſſion by both houſes to her majeſty, to uſe her utmoſt endeavours to get him removed from thence, yet he was aſſured by baron Foſtner, the duke of Lorrain's miniſter, ſome weeks before his departure, that, to his certain knowledge, no inſtances had yet been made to his maſter for that purpoſe." To this lord Bolingbroke anſwered, "He wondered baron Foſtner could make ſuch a declaration, ſince he himſelf had made thoſe declarations to him in the queen's name." But lord Hallifax confirmed what the earl of Sunderland had advanced, by ſaying, "That baron Foſtner had told him as much but four days before; ſo that lord Bolingbroke muſt be miſtaken, at leaſt in point of chronology."

This debate brought on a motion of more conſequence; the queſtion was "whether the proteſtant ſucceſſion be in danger under the preſent adminiſtration?" This queſtion gave riſe to a very warm debate, which continued for near ſeven hours, during which time many warm ſpeeches were made againſt the miniſtry. That of the earl of Angleſea was remarkable. He ſaid, among other things, "That when he came into the houſe, he thought indeed the proteſtant ſucceſſion to be ſtill in danger on the part of France, whoſe intereſt it was to reſtore the pretender: but that after he had heard what ſo many noble members of that auguſt aſſembly, perſons of undoubted honour and probity, had alledged againſt the miniſters, and no anſwer offered to confute it, either by the miniſters themſelves or their friends, he could not believe the ſucceſſion to be in danger." He afterwards endeavoured to clear himſelf with regard to the ſhare he had in ſome late tranſactions. "I own," ſaid he, "I gave my aſſent to the ceſſation of arms, for which I take ſhame to myſelf, and aſk God, my country, and my conſcience pardon. But, however, this fault I did not commit, till that noble lord (turning towards the lord-treaſurer) had aſſured the council, that the peace would be glorious and advantageous both to her majeſty and her allies." Adding, "That, as the honour of his country, and the good of his ſovereign, formed the rule of his actions, ſo he had no reſpect of perſons; and if he found himſelf impoſed upon, he durſt purſue an evil miniſter from the queen's cloſet to the Tower, and from the Tower to the ſcaffold."

The lord-treaſurer, againſt whom the latter part of this ſpeech was levelled, ſaid, "That the peace was as glorious and advantageous as could be expected, conſidering the neceſſity of affairs, and the oppoſition the queen's miniſters had met with, both at home and abroad." Several lords replied, that no miniſters ever had it in their power to make ſo honourable and advantageous a peace as the queen's miniſters had. The duke of Argyle added, "That he had lately croſſed the kingdom of France, both in going to and returning from Minorca. That it was indeed one of the fineſt countries in the univerſe, but that there were marks of general deſolation in all the places through which he paſſed. That he had rid forty miles together without meeting a man fit to carry arms: that the reſt of the people were in the utmoſt miſery and diſtreſs; and, therefore, he could not apprehend what neceſſity there was to conclude a peace ſo precipitately with a prince whoſe dominions were ſo greatly exhauſted of men, of money, and of proviſions." With regard to the queſtion in debate, he ſaid, "That he firmly believed the ſucceſſion of the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover to be in danger from the preſent miniſters, whom he durſt charge with mal-adminiſtration both within doors and without: that he knew, and offered to prove, that the lord-treaſurer had yearly remitted 4000l. to the highland clans in Scotland, who were known to be devoted to the Pretender, in order to keep them under diſcipline, and ready for any attempt: that, on the other hand, the new-modelling of the army, by diſbanding ſome regiments out of their turn, and by removing from their employments a vaſt number of officers merely on account of their known affection for the houſe of Hanover, were clear indications of the deſigns in hand: that it was a diſgrace to the nation to ſee men who had never looked an enemy in the face, advanced to the poſts of ſeveral brave officers, who, after they had often expoſed their lives for their country, were now ſtarving in priſon for want of their pay." The lord-treaſurer now roſe, and, laying his hand upon his breaſt, ſaid, "I have, on ſo many occaſions, given ſuch ſignal proofs of my affection to the proteſtant ſucceſſion, that I am ſure no member of this auguſt aſſembly could call it in queſtion. At the ſame time I own I have remitted to Scotland, for two or three years paſt, 3800l. to the highland clans; but I hope the houſe will give me an opportunity of clearing my conduct with regard to that point. As for the reformed officers, I have given orders they ſhall be paid directly."

After ſeveral other ſpeeches, the queſtion was put, and carried in the negative by 12 voices only. But though the proteſtant religion was thus voted not to be in danger, lord Hallifax, in order to put their profeſſions of affection for the houſe of Hanover to the teſt, moved, "That an addreſs be preſented to the queen, that ſhe would renew her inſtances for the ſpeedy removing the Pretender out of Lorrain; and that ſhe would, in conjunction with the ſtates-general, enter into the guaranty of the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover; and alſo with ſuch other princes as ſhe ſhould think proper." He was ſeconded by the earl of Wharton, who moved likewiſe, that, in the addreſs, "Her majeſty might be deſired to iſſue a proclamation, promiſing a reward to any perſon who ſhould bring the Pretender dead or alive:" this motion was ſeconded by the duke of Bolton, who alſo moved, that the reward might be ſuitable to the importance of that ſervice. Nothing was ſaid in oppoſition to the motions: but it being late, ſome members expreſſed their deſire that the houſe ſhould adjourn. But the other ſide calling for the queſtion, it was unanimouſly reſolved that the addreſs ſhould be preſented.

When the addreſs againſt the Pretender was reported by the committee appointed to draw it up, the lord North and Grey made a long ſpeech, wherein he endeavoured to ſhew the barbarity of ſetting a reward upon any man's head; which, he ſaid, was nothing leſs than giving encouragement to murder and aſſaſſination; and how repugnant ſuch a practice was to the laws of chriſtianity, the law of nature, and of all civilized nations. He repreſented in particular, "How inconſiſtent ſuch a proceeding was with the honour and dignity of ſo auguſt an aſſembly in a nation and government famed for lenity and clemency." He concluded with ſaying, "No man either had more reſpect for the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, or would do more to ſecure them than himſelf; but that they muſt excuſe him if he would not incur perdition for them." He was ſupported by lord Trevor, who ſaid, "What that noble peer had ſpoke was ſufficient to ſhew how inconſiſtent ſuch a proceeding was with chriſtianity and the civil law; and, therefore, he would confine himſelf to the laws of England; and, if he knew or underſtood any thing of theſe, he was confident they were no leſs oppoſite to ſuch proceedings than the civil law. He knew he did not ſpeak there as a lawyer or judge, but as a peer: but he was ſo fully convinced of our law diſcountenancing all ſuch proceedings, that if ever ſuch a caſe ſhould come before him as a judge, he ſhould think himſelf bound in juſtice, honour, and conſcience, to condemn ſuch an action as murder; and, therefore, he hoped the ſupreme court of judicature in England, and the moſt auguſt tribunal in the univerſe, would not make a precedent for encouraging aſſaſſination;" and, therefore, he moved, "that the reward ſhould be for apprehending and bringing the Pretender to public juſtice, in caſe he ſhould land, or attempt to land, either in Great Britain or Ireland: and that her majeſty ſhould iſſue her royal proclamation, whenever in her great wiſdom ſhe ſhould judge it neceſſary." To this it was anſwered, "That however contrary ſuch a proceeding might be to the precepts of chriſtianity, it was warranted by the practice of the old Romans, of the moſt civilized nations in Europe, and of our own nation in particular. For, without recurring to remoter inſtances, we have the example of James II. who ſet a price on the head of his own nephew, the duke of Monmouth." But theſe reaſonings were not well ſupported, and the motion was agreed to by a majority of ten voices. When the addreſs was preſented to the queen, ſhe returned the following anſwer:

"My lords,

"It would be a real ſtrengthening to the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover, as well as ſupport to my government, that an end were put to theſe groundleſs fears and jealouſies, which have been ſo induſtriouſly promoted. I do not, at this time, ſee any occaſion for ſuch a proclamation. Whenever I judge it to be neceſſary, I ſhall give my orders for having one iſſued. As for the other particulars in this addreſs, I will give proper directions therein."

The whig party were not a little diſſatisfied with this anſwer; and in order to give the queen all the mortification poſſible, the earl of Wharton propoſed this queſtion in the houſe of lords, "Whether the proteſtant ſucceſſion was in danger under the preſent adminiſtration?" A warm debate enſued, but at length the ſucceſſion was voted out of danger, by a great majority.

On the very ſame day the above addreſs was preſented an incident happened which threw the miniſtry into the utmoſt confuſion. Moſt of the whig lords had held a conſultation at the houſe of lord Halifax, to which baron Schutz, envoy from the elector of Hanover, was admitted. In this meeting it was reſolved, that the baron ſhould take the firſt opportunity of demanding a writ for the electoral prince to ſit in the houſe of peers, as duke of Cambridge. Accordingly, Schutz made a viſit to the chancellor, and among other civilities acknowledged the affection he had ſhewn on ſeveral occaſions to the houſe of Hanover. The chancellor told him "he was extremely ſenſible of the honour he did him by this viſit and compliment; and deſired him to aſſure the elector of his entire devotion and ſervice; hoping that his highneſs gave no credit to the falſe reports that were induſtriouſly ſpread, in order to give him jealouſies of her majeſty's miniſters." The baron anſwered that he would not fail to diſcharge ſo agreeable a commiſſion; but he had a favour to aſk of him in the name of the electoral prince, that his lordſhip would be pleaſed to make out a writ for his ſitting in the houſe of peers as duke of Cambridge. Surprized at this unexpected demand, the chancellor told the baron, "That though it was unuſual to make out writs for peers who were not in the kingdom, yet he would immediately apply to her majeſty for direction." The baron anſwered, "he did not doubt the chancellor's performing the duties of his office. But, with regard to the objection of the duke's being out of the kingdom, he could aſſure him his electoral highneſs propoſed coming over very ſpeedily, and might, perhaps, be landed before the writ was made out." The baron now took his leave, and the chancellor deſired him to remember, "That he did not refuſe his demand, but thought proper to acquaint the queen of it, which he would do immediately." A council was directly held in the queen's preſence; and after very long debates it was reſolved, that the chancellor ſhould make out a writ for the duke of Cambridge. The queen was, however, ſo highly offended at the baron's making his application to the chancellor, before he had informed her of his intentions, that ſhe forbade him the court.

But though the writ was ordered to be made out for the duke of Cambridge, the miniſtry was determined he ſhould not viſit England; and a report prevailing that the princeſs Sophia intended to deſire the queen's approbation for the duke of Cambridge's coming into England, her majeſty, with the advice of her cabinet council, wrote that princeſs the following letter:

"Madam, Siſter, Aunt,

"Since the right of ſucceſſion to my kingdom has been declared to belong to you and your family, there have always been diſaffected perſons, who, by particular views of their own intereſt, have entered into meaſures to fix a prince of your blood in my dominions, even while I am living. I never thought till now, that this project would have gone ſo far as to have made the leaſt impreſſion on your mind. But, as I lately perceived by public rumours, which are induſtriouſly ſpread, that your electoral highneſs is come into this ſentiment, it is of importance, with reſpect to the ſucceſſion of your family, that I ſhould tell you ſuch a proceeding will infallibly draw along with it ſome conſequences that will be dangerous to that ſucceſſion itſelf, which is not ſafe any other way, than as the prince, who actually wears the crown, maintains her prerogative. There are here (ſuch are our misfortunes) a great many people that are ſeditiouſly diſpoſed. So I leave you to judge what tumults they may be able to raiſe, if they ſhould have a pretext to begin a commotion. I perſuade myſelf, therefore, you will never conſent that the leaſt thing ſhould be done that may diſturb the repoſe of me and my ſubjects.

"Open yourſelf to me with the ſame freedom I do to you, and propoſe whatever you think may contribute to the ſecurity of the ſucceſſion, I will come into it with zeal, provided it do not derogate from my dignity, which I am reſolved to maintain. I am, with a great deal of affection, &c."

At the ſame time her majeſty wrote the following letter to the duke of Cambridge:

"Couſin,

"An accident which has happened in my lord Paget's family, having hindered him from ſetting forward ſo ſoon as he thought to have done, I cannot defer any longer letting you know my thoughts with reſpect to the deſign you have formed of coming into my kingdoms. As the opening of this matter ought to have been firſt to me; ſo I expected you would not have given ear to it without knowing my thoughts about it. However, this is what I owe to my own dignity, the friendſhip I have for you, and the electoral houſe to which you belong; and the true deſire I have that it may ſucceed to my kingdom: and this requires of me that I ſhould tell you, that nothing can be more dangerous to the tranquillity of my dominions, and the right of ſucceſſion in your line, and conſequently more diſagreeable to me, than ſuch a proceeding at this juncture.

"I am, &c."

The princeſs Sophia (who was now in the 84th year of her age) was ſo affected on the receipt of theſe letters, that the very day after ſhe was ſeized with an apoplectic fit, as ſhe was walking in the gardens of Herenhauſen, and died in the arms of the electoral princeſs, before phyſicians could come to her aſſiſtance. She was the fourth and youngeſt daughter of Frederick, king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth of England, only daughter of James I. This princeſs was of a ſtrong and healthy conſtitution, and a perfect miſtreſs of moſt of the modern languages; her genius was equally turned for converſation or buſineſs, and hence ſhe became at once the ornament and delight of her court; her turns of wit were ſprightly and ſurprizing; her judgment ſolid and penetrating. Nothing could exceed the beauties and advantages of her converſation, but her letters; both were eaſy, entertaining and uſeful. She enjoyed a fund of happineſs within herſelf, which gave a reliſh to her retirements: but her care in government, and œconomy, ſhewed the juſt ſenſe ſhe entertained of being born for the good of others. Her piety was exemplary without affectation; and her ſentiments of religion juſt and noble. She lived beloved, and her hearſe was bedewed with the tears of the good and the virtuous.

The leaders of the tory party, at the head of whom was lord Bolingbroke, determined, if poſſible, to defeat the proteſtant ſucceſſion; they, therefore, brought in the famous ſchiſm bill, it being thought neceſſary, for accompliſhing their ſcheme, to ruin the diſſenters. It was preſented to the houſe of commons by Sir William Wyndham, and ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the whole power of the whig party; but at length paſſed the houſe by a conſiderable majority.

It was ſtrongly ſupported in the houſe of peers by lord Bolingbroke, who, on its being read the firſt time, ſaid, "It was a bill of the laſt importance, ſince it concerned the ſecurity of the church of England, the beſt and firmeſt ſupport of the church and monarchy; both which all good men, and particularly that auguſt aſſembly, who derive their luſtre from, and are near the throne, ought to have moſt at heart, and, therefore, he moved that it ſhould be read a ſecond time." Lord Cowper replied, "That no man was more ready than himſelf to do every thing that ſhould appear neceſſary to attain the ſeeming intention of this bill, the preventing the growth of ſchiſm, and the further ſecuring the church of England. But that the enacting part would be ſo far from anſwering the title of it, that, in his opinion, it would have a quite contrary effect, and prove equally pernicious to church and ſtate. That inſtead of preventing ſchiſm, and enlarging the pale of the church, this bill tended to introduce ignorance, and its inſeparable attendants, ſuperſtition and irreligion. That in many country towns, reading, writing, and grammar ſchools were chiefly ſupported by the diſſenters, not only for the inſtruction and benefit of their own children, but likewiſe thoſe of poor churchmen; ſo that the ſuppreſſing thoſe ſchools would, in ſome places, ſuppreſs the reading of the Holy Scriptures."* On the other hand he obſerved, "that this bill ſtruck at the antient rights and prerogative of the houſe of peers; which, by the conſtitution, is the ſupreme court of judicature, and the dernier reſort in all cauſes; whereas, by this bill, the juſtices of the peace were impowered to hear and finally determine the offences againſt the ſame. I would, my lords, added he, rather enlarge than abridge the power of juſtices of the peace, were it only to encourage gentlemen to take upon them an office ſo troubleſome, and ſo unprofitable, unleſs it be, perhaps, in the county of Middleſex. But, at the ſame time, my lords, I ſhall never conſent to give up the birth-right and ancient privileges of this auguſt aſſembly, of which I have the honour to be a member."

The earl of Wharton attacked the ſupporter of the bill with the moſt poignant irony. "I am, ſaid he, agreeably ſurprized to ſee ſome men of pleaſure become on a ſudden ſo religious as to ſet up for patrons of the church. But I am aſtoniſhed that perſons who have been educated in diſſenting academies, whom I could point out, and whoſe tutors I could name, ſhould appear the moſt forward in oppreſſing them. This is ſurely but an indifferent return for the benefit the public has received from thoſe ſchools, which have bred theſe great men, who have made ſo glorious a peace, and treaties that have executed themſelves. I can, therefore, ſee no reaſon for ſuppreſſing theſe academies, unleſs it be from an apprehenſion, that they may produce ſtill greater geniuſes, that may drown the merits and abilities of theſe great men. To be ſerious, my lords, it is no leſs melancholy than ſurprizing, that at a time when the court of France proſecutes the deſign they have long ſince formed to extirpate our holy religion; when not only ſecret practices are uſed to impoſe a popiſh Pretender on theſe realms, but men are publickly inliſted for his ſervice: it is, I ſay, melancholy and ſurprizing, that at this very time a bill ſhould be brought in, which muſt tend to divide the proteſtants; and conſequently to weaken their intereſt, and haſten their ruin. But the wonder will ceaſe when we conſider, that madmen were the contrivers and promoters of this bill." He declaimed particularly againſt the word ſchiſm, with which the frontiſpiece of the bill was decorated, and ſaid, "It is ſomething ſtrange that they ſhould call ſchiſm in England, what is the eſtabliſhed religion in Scotland; and, therefore, if the lords who repreſented the nobility of that part of Great Britain, were for this bill, he hoped, that in order to be even with us, and conſiſtent with themſelves, they would move for bringing in another bill to promote the growth of ſchiſm in their own country." He added, "That both in the bill itſelf, and alſo in the ſpeeches of thoſe who had declared for it, ſeveral laws were recited and alledged, but there was a law which had not yet been mentioned, it is the law of the goſpel, To do unto others as we would be done unto."

Some other very ſarcaſtical ſpeeches were made on this remarkable bill, and ſeveral amendments were made to it, which rendered it very different from what it appeared in its original ſtate. With theſe amendments it was carried in the houſe of peers by a majority of five voices, and afterwards received the royal aſſent: but the queen dying before it took place, the act was rendered ineffectual.

It now appeared ſufficiently evident that the lords were determined to cenſure the conduct of lord Bolingbroke; but the queen, in order to prevent the conſequences that might enſue, went to the houſe of peers, on the 9th of July, and put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The progreſs which has been made in public buſineſs, and the ſeaſon of the year, render it both convenient and neceſſary, that I ſhould put an end to this ſeſſion.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I return you my hearty thanks for all your good ſervices to me and to your country, and particularly for the ſupplies you have given me, as well to defray the expences of the current year, as towards the diſcharging of the national debt. In our preſent circumſtances it could not be expected, that a full proviſion ſhould be made on both theſe heads. What you have granted ſhall be laid out with the beſt huſbandry, and to the greateſt advantage.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I hope early in the winter to meet you again, and to find you in ſuch a temper as is neceſſary for the real improvement of our commerce, and of all the other advantages of peace. My chief concern is to preſerve to you, and to your poſterity, our holy religion, and the liberty of my ſubjects, and to procure the preſent and future tranquillity of my kingdom. But I muſt tell you plainly, that theſe deſirable ends can never be attained, unleſs you bring the ſame diſpoſitions on your parts; unleſs all groundleſs jealouſies, which create and foment diviſions among you, be laid aſide: and unleſs you ſhew the ſame regard for my prerogative, and for the honour of my government, as I have always expreſſed for the rights of my people."

This was the laſt ſpeech the queen ever made to her parliament: her conſtitution was now quite broken; one fit of ſickneſs ſucceeded another; and what completed the ruin of her health, was the diſcords that prevailed among her miniſters. While the parliament continued ſitting, they maintained ſome appearance at leaſt of unity, fearing an attack from that branch of the legiſlature; but their fears being now over, they laid no reſtraint upon their paſſions. Their diſputes became intolerable; they ſo far forgot their duty to her majeſty, and regard for their country, that whenever Oxford and Bolingbroke met in council, they ſtudied rather to oppoſe each other than to ſettle or purſue any regular plan of government. And their jealouſies arrived at laſt to ſuch a ſhameful height, that it is believed a quarrel that happened between them in the queen's preſence haſtened her death. It is certain that the ſevereſt reproaches paſſed between theſe miniſters on the 27th of July, when Oxford was deprived of the white ſtaff. He imputed his diſgrace to Bolingbroke, lady Maſham, and the chancellor, and told them, in the queen's preſence, "That he had been wronged and abuſed by lies and miſrepreſentations; but he ſhould be revenged, and leave ſome people as low as he found them."

Such confuſions, and the fatigue of attending a long cabinet-council on this event, had ſo violent an effect on the queen's ſpirits, that, on the 29th of July, ſhe was ſeized with a lethargic diſorder, and the next day, about ſeven in the morning, was ſtruck with an apoplexy. She, however, recovered, in ſome degree, the uſe of her ſenſes, and during that interval gave the white ſtaff to the duke of Shrewſbury, bidding him uſe it for the good of her people.

This was the laſt act of her government; for the council now took upon themſelves the direction of public affairs. Their firſt conſideration was the ſecurity of the kingdom, and orders were immediately iſſued to the four regiments of horſe and dragoons, quartered in the neighbouring counties, to march with all expedition into the neighbourhood of London. At the ſame time, ſeven of the ten Britiſh battalions in the Netherlands were directed to embark, with the greateſt expedition, at Oſtend, for England. An embargo was laid upon all ſhipping, and directions given for equipping all the ſhips of war that were in a condition for immediate ſervice. Nor was the elector of Brunſwick forgot: a letter was written to that prince, informing him of the dangerous condition of the queen's life; and deſiring him to repair to Holland with all convenient ſpeed, where a Britiſh ſquadron would attend to convoy him ſafe to England, in caſe of her majeſty's deceaſe. The miniſtry alſo took care to ſecure the ſea-ports, to over-awe all the jacobites in Scotland, and to prevent the friends of the pretender from aſſembling in England.

In the mean time every effort was uſed for the recovery of the queen; but the violence of her diſorder rendered the power of medicine ineffectual. After having dozed in a lethargic inſenſibility for near thirty-ſix hours, ſhe paid the great debt of nature, on the firſt of Auguſt, about ſeven in the morning, in the 50th year of her age, and the 13th of her reign.

Queen Anne was in her perſon of the middle ſize, and well proportioned, her hair of a dark brown, her complexion ruddy, her aſpect rather comely than majeſtic, her voice clear and melodious, and her preſence engaging.

During the reign of this princeſs juſtice flowed in an impartial and uninterrupted courſe; and both the church and ſtate experienced a profuſion of royal bounty. While her ſubjects laboured under the burden of an expenſive war, ſhe generouſly aſſiſted them with a very conſiderable part of her own revenue. She piouſly applied the firſt-fruits and tenths, one of the choiceſt flowers of the crown, to the maintenance of the poor clergy. She always expreſſed the greateſt concern for the advancement of religion, and with the pureſt zeal promoted the deſign of erecting churches to her Saviour's honour. She gave every encouragement to charity ſchools for the ſupport of the indigent youth of her populous capital, that the ſeeds of religion and virtue might be early ſown in their tender minds, and even the univerſities, thoſe celebrated ſeats of learning, always found her an indulgent patroneſs. She always ſhared in the joys and ſorrows of her ſubjects, nor ever concealed herſelf from their diſtreſs. She was a pattern of conjugal affection and fidelity; a tender mother, a warm friend, and an indulgent miſtreſs. In a word, if ſhe was not the greateſt, ſhe was, at leaſt, one of the beſt ſovereigns that ever adorned the throne of England.

Queen Anne had ſix children, but none ſurvived her. The duke of Glouceſter only reached his 12th year, all the reſt died in their infancy.

The only remarkable occurrence that happened during this queen's reign was the following:

On the 26th of September, 1703, about eleven o'clock at night, there aroſe the moſt dreadful tempeſt that had ever been known in the memory of man, attended with ſuch flaſhes of lightening and peals of thunder as filled every mind with terror and conſternation. The houſes in London ſhook from their foundations, and ſeveral of them falling, overwhelmed the inhabitants in their ruins. The Thames overflowed ſeveral ſtreets, and roſe to a conſiderable height in Weſtminſter-hall. London-bridge was almoſt choaked up with the wreck of veſſels that were beat to pieces in the river. Thirteen men of war were deſtroyed on the Engliſh coaſts, beſides a great number of merchant ſhips; and upwards of 1500 ſeamen periſhed. The loſs ſuſtained by the capital alone was eſtimated at near two millions, and the city of Briſtol ſuffered to the amount of 200,000l.

The greateſt improvements were made in learning and the polite arts during this queen's reign, which put her court, at leaſt, on a footing with that of Lewis XIV. in its moſt ſplendid days. Many of the great men, who had figured in the reigns of the Stuarts and William were ſtill alive, and in the full exerciſe of their faculties, when a new race ſprung up in the republic of learning and the arts. Addiſon, Prior, Pope, Swift, lord Bolingbroke, lord Shafteſbury, Arbuthnot, Congreve, Steele, Rowe, and many other excellent writers, both in proſe and verſe, need but be mentioned to be admired, and the Engliſh were as triumphant in literature as in war. Natural and moral philoſophy kept pace with the polite arts, and even religious and political diſputes contributed to the advancement of learning, by the unbounded liberty which the laws of England allow in ſpeculative matters.

BOOK XV.

From the Acceſſion of GEORGE I. to the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle.

GEORGE I.

AS ſoon as the late queen's death was made known, orders were immediately iſſued by the council for proclaiming George, * elector of Brunſwick, king of England; which was accordingly done on the very ſame day, at the uſual places, and with the accuſtomed ceremonies. The earl of Dorſet was at the ſame time appointed to carry the news of his majeſty's acceſſion, and to attend him in his voyage to England.

---

* This prince, when he acceded to the throne of England, s in the 55th year of age. He was endowed by nature with extenſive genius, cultivated by an excellent education; ich, together with his experience, rendered him perfectly able of ſupporting the weight of a crown, to which he was now called by the voice of the people. He had long been known to the Engliſh, having commanded a body of troops in the allied army, where his valour and conduct had gained him univerſal eſteem.

In the mean time the greateſt precautions were taken by the lords of the regency for guarding againſt a ſurprize. They diſpatched ſuch officers of the army as they knew they could truſt to their reſpective poſts; gave orders to reinforce the garriſon at Portſmouth, and ſent veſſels out to view the harbours of France, and diſcover whether any preparations were making for an invaſion of this kingdom. They choſe Mr. Joſeph Addiſon for their ſecretary, and ordered all letters and diſpatches directed to the ſecretary of ſtate to be ſent to him. This was a mortifying circumſtance to lord Bolingbroke, who was now obliged to ſtand at the door of the council chamber, with his bag and papers, and to receive orders from thoſe whom, but a few days before, he expected to command.

The parliament, in conformity to the act of ſucceſſion, met at Weſtminſter on the very day the queen died. On the 5th of Auguſt the lords-juſtices went to the houſe of peers, and the lord-chancellor, in the name of the reſt, made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein he acquainted them, "that nothing had been omitted, ſince her majeſty's death, which might contribute to the ſafety of theſe realms: that they had, in conjunction with the council, proclaimed our lawful and rightful ſovereign king George; that ſeveral branches of the public revenue being expired by the queen's demiſe, he recommended to them to make ſuch proviſions as might be requiſite to ſupport the honour and dignity of the crown." He then, with the utmoſt earneſtneſs, exhorted them to a perfect unanimity and firm adherence to their ſovereign's intereſt, as the only means to continue the preſent tranquillity.

Both houſes immediately agreed upon an addreſs of condolance for the death of the queen, and congratulations for his majeſty's happy acceſſion; promiſing to ſupport his right to the imperial crown of theſe realms, againſt the Pretender, and all perſons whatſoever, and deſiring his preſence among them. Theſe addreſſes being tranſmitted to his majeſty, were moſt graciouſly received, and he was pleaſed to return the following anſwer.

"I take this firſt opportunity of returning you my moſt hearty thanks for your addreſs, and the aſſurances you have given me therein. The zeal and unanimity you have ſhewn upon my acceſſion to the crown, are great encouragements to me, and I ſhall always eſteem the continuance of them as one of the greateſt bleſſings to my reign. No one can be more truly ſenſible than I am of the loſs ſuſtained by the death of the late queen, whoſe piety and virtues ſo much endeared her to her people, and for whoſe memory I ſhall always have a particular regard. My beſt endeavours ſhall never be wanting to repair this loſs to the nation. I will make it my conſtant care to preſerve our religion, laws and liberties inviolable, and to advance the honour and proſperity of my kingdoms. I am haſtening to you, according to your deſire, ſo affectionately expreſſed in your addreſs."

The parliament were ſo well pleaſed with this anſwer, that theyimmediately voted an addreſs of thanks; after which they granted the yearly ſum of 116,573l. during the term of thirty-two years, for the ſupport of his majeſty's houſhold, and the dignity of the crown.

Having diſpatched the other matters that lay before them, the lord's juſtices, on the 21ſt of Auguſt, went to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent to the bills for the ſupport of the king's houſhold, for rectifying miſtakes in commiſſioners names for the land-tax, and for enabling perſons, reſiding in Great Britain, to qualify themſelves there for continuing in their reſpective employments in Ireland. The two houſes now adjourned to the 25th of Auguſt*, and were then, by his majeſty's command, prorogued to the 23d of September.

The court of France was greatly confounded on receiving the news of the late queen's death. They found it was impoſſible for them to oppoſe the proteſtant ſucceſſion to the crown, and therefore they acknowledged George, elector of Hanover, king of Great Britain. The pretender, who had been flattered with the hopes of aſſuming the Engliſh throne, both by the miniſters of France and England, no ſooner heard that the queen was either dead, or paſt all hopes of recovery, than he poſted immediately to Verſailles; but before he reached the palace, he was met by the marquis de Torcy, who told him, "That his moſt chriſtian majeſty was ſurprized at his being returned into his dominions, knowing the engagements he was under with regard to the ſucceſſion of the crown of Great Britain in the houſe of Hanover; and therefore deſired him to quit his territories immediately." This unexpected reception greatly aſtoniſhed the pretender, who immediately departed, and again returned to the court of Lorrain.

On the 28th of Auguſt Mr. Murray arrived with expreſſes from Hanover, informing the regency that his majeſty had deferred his departure for ſome days, and ordered the lords-juſtice to remove lord Bolingbroke from his office of ſecretary of ſtate. This was accordingly done on the 31ſt, and not without particular marks of the royal diſpleaſure; for the ſeals were not only taken from him, but the doors of his office were locked and ſealed.

During theſe tranſactions the duke of Marlborough arrived in England; he landed at Dover the very day the queen paid the debt of nature. His grace had been invited over, firſt by the lord treaſurer Oxford, when he had formed a deſign of ingratiating himſelf with the whigs; and afterwards by lord Bolingbroke, who found it neceſſary to acquire a colleague to ſupport him in power, ſo that it is no wonder he made large promiſes to the duke. His grace ſeemed indeed ſo elated with returning greatneſs, that he for once loſt ſight of that prudence, which had hitherto been the invariable guide of his conduct. He endeavoured to make a public entry; and accordingly about 200 of the inhabitants of Southwark, with their member at their head, reſolved to attend him through the Borough. He was alſo eſcorted through the city by a like number on horſeback; but the populace, who had been poiſoned by the reports of the tories, did not receive him in the manner he expected.

On the 16th of September the king embarked for England, and on the 18th landed at Greenwich, where he was received by the duke of Northumberland, captain of the life-guard, and the lord-chancellor at the head of the lords of the regency. His majeſty choſe to walk to his houſe in the park, accompanied by moſt of the nobility, and great numbers of the principal gentry, through an infinite croud of perſons of all conditions.

* On the 24th of Auguſt the remains of her late majeſty were depoſited with the uſual ſolemnities in Weſtminſter abbey. She was interred in the ſame vault with her late conſort prince George of Denmark.

The king made his public entry into London on the 20th of September, with great pomp and magnificence. Above 200 coaches belonging to the nobility and gentry, all drawn by ſix horſes, preceded the king's. He was met at St. Margaret's-hill in Southwark, by the lord-mayor, aldermen, recorder, ſheriffs and officers of the city of London, in whoſe name Sir Peter King, the recorder, made a congratulatory ſpeech. The lord-mayor delivered the city ſword to the king, who returned it, and he bore it in the proceſſion. The number of people aſſembled on this occaſion was amazing, all of whom teſtified their ſatisfaction by the loudeſt acclamations.

Few princes ever mounted a throne with greater eclat than did George the Firſt; notwithſtanding which his reign commenced with troubles. The animoſity that at this time ſubſiſted between the Whigs and Tories was much higher than ever. The whigs, who had been in diſgrace during the four laſt years of the late reign, were filled with reſentment at the uſage they had received from the tories, and hoped to have full ſatisfaction under a reign, the commencement of which they conſidered as the end of their humiliation. The tories were apprehenſive of a fall, and this had engaged ſeveral of their leaders in practices not only dangerous, but directly oppoſite to meaſures for maintaining the proteſtant ſucceſſion.

The king, highly eſteemed for his prudence, ſeemed capable of diſtinguiſhing the heats of faction, or at leaſt of turning them to the public good. Poſſibly he might have ſucceeded had he maintained an equal balance between the two parties, and endeavoured to unite them by a proper conduct and addreſs; but whether he thought it impoſſible to reconcile the turbulent paſſions of the two parties, or whether the prejudice he had conceived againſt the tories carried him beyond proper bounds, he gave all his confidence to their adverſaries.

Theſe meaſures tended only to widen the breach, and increaſe the number of enemies to the principles of the revolution. Not only the papiſts eſpouſed the intereſt of the abdicated family, but alſo great numbers of thoſe who profeſſed the tenets of the church of England; and it was feared they would join with the catholics, to dethrone a prince whom they conſidered as a foreigner. Neither the famous diſtinction between a king de jure and a king de facto, nor the doctrine of paſſive obedience, was yet forgot; and hence ſeveral refuſed to take the oaths of allegiance and abjuration.

The changes that enſued were a farther proof that the tories were to expect no favour from the new king. Bolingbroke had been diſmiſſed before his arrival, and lord Townſend appointed ſecretary of ſtate in his room. The command of the army was taken from the duke of Ormond, and reſtored to the duke of Marlborough. The lord Cowper was made lord-chancellor; the earl of Wharton, lord privy-ſeal; and the earl of Sunderland, lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke of Devonſhire was appointed ſteward of the houſhold, in the room of earl Paulet; and Mr. James Stanhope, ſecretary of ſtate in the room of Mr. Bromley. The duke of Somerſet was made maſter of the horſe, the duke of St. Albans captain of the band of penſioners, and the duke of Argyle commander in chief of the forces in Scotland. Mr. William Pulteney was made ſecretary at war, and Mr. Robert Walpole receiver and paymaſter-general of all the forces in Great Britain, and paymaſter to Chelſea hoſpital. This revolution extended to other public employments, and the whigs triumphed with as high a hand on this occaſion, as they had before been humbled and diſgraced.

Theſe changes being made in the government, his majeſty aſſembled his council, whom he addreſſed to the following effect: " That he was reſolved to maintain the churches of England and Scotland as by law eſtabliſhed; that he hoped to ſucceed without infringing that toleration granted to the proteſtant nonconformiſts, a toleration ſo advantageous to commerce and the public welfare; and that he would be particularly careful to ſecure property, that precious right of the ſubject, which eſſentially conſtitutes the happineſs of the nation.

On the 15th of October the king was crowned at Weſtminſter. There was never ſo great an appearance of lords ſpiritual and temporal, as on this occaſion; no leſs than ſeventeen archbiſhops and biſhops attended; all the dukes in and about London, except the duke of Buckingham; ſeventy earls and viſcounts, and among them the earl of Oxford and viſcount Bolingbroke, and as many barons. The demonſtrations of joy throughout the kingdom ſeemed to be general on this happy event, ſome few places excepted, where the populace ſhewed their hatred to the proteſtant ſucceſſion by riots and outrages.

The demolition of Dunkirk having been repreſented as not going on with that vigour as had been ſtipulated by the late treaty of peace, the Engliſh reſident at Paris was ordered to preſent a memorial to haſten the work, as alſo to prevent the canal of Mardyke from being finiſhed. Lewis having returned an equivocal anſwer, Mr. Prior was recalled, and the earl of Stair appointed ambaſſador to the French court, where he proſecuted the affair with great vigour. And as the barrier, now on the carpet between the emperor and the ſtates-general, was of great conſequence to the trade of this nation, general Cadogan was ſent to Antwerp to aſſiſt at the conferences.

During theſe tranſactions the number of mal-contents in England was conſiderably increaſed; the old clamour of the danger the church was in was revived; ſeditious libels were diſperſed among the people; and terrible tumults raiſed in different parts of the kingdom, particularly at Birmingham, Briſtol, Norwich, and Reading. The party cry was, " Down with the whigs! Sacheverel for ever!" The pretender, who went by the title of the chevalier de St. George, attempted to avail himſelf of this juncture, by publiſhing a manifeſto, wherein he complained that a foreign prince had been proclaimed contrary to the fundamental and inconteſtable law of hereditary right; obſerving that no act of parliament could ſet aſide that law, and that his ſubjects, by violating it, were no leſs injurious to themſelves than to him.

A. D. 1715. The preſent parliament conſiſting chiefly of tory members, it was judged altogether improper to continue it any longer at this critical juncture. Accordingly, on the 5th of January, a proclamation was publiſhed for diſſolving it, and a new one was appointed to meet on the 17th of March. This proclamation was filled with complaints againſt thoſe who had ſhewed themſelves diſaffected to the eſtabliſhed government. It was added, " that his majeſty hoped ſuch perſons only would be elected as were capable of putting an end to the preſent diſorders, and that particular attention would be paid to ſuch as had ſupported the proteſtant ſucceſſion when in danger." Nothing could be more clearly pointed out to the whigs, nor mark more ſtrongly on which ſide he wiſhed the votes to fall. A very ſtrong oppoſition was, however, made by the tory party; but the influence of the court, and the ſpirit of liberty among the people, produced the deſired effect: a large majority were on the ſide of the revolution.

The new parliament met on the day appointed; and the commons having elected Mr. Spencer Compton ton for their ſpeaker, the ſeſſion was opened on the 21ſt, with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"This being the firſt opportunity I have had of meeting my people in parliament, ſince it pleaſed God to call me to the throne of my anceſtors, I moſt gladly make uſe of it, to thank my faithful and loving ſubjects for that zeal and firmneſs, which hath been ſhewn in defence of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, againſt all the open and ſecret practices that have been uſed to defeat it; and I ſhall never forget the obligation I have to thoſe, who have diſtinguiſhed themſelves upon this occaſion.

"It were to be wiſhed that the unparelleled ſucceſſes of a war, which was ſo wiſely and chearfully ſupported by this nation, in order to procure a good peace, had been attended with a ſuitable concluſion; but it is with concern I muſt tell you, that ſome conditions, even of this peace, eſſential to the ſecurity and trade of Great Britain, are not yet duly executed, and the performance of the whole may be looked upon as precarious until we have formed defenſive alliances, to guaranty the preſent treaty.

"The pretender, who ſtill reſides in Lorrain, threatens to diſturb us, and boaſts of the aſſiſtance which he ſtill expects here, to repair his former diſappointments.

"A great part of our trade is rendered impracticable. This, if not retrieved, muſt deſtroy our manufactures, and ruin our navigation.

"The public debts are very great, and ſurprizingly increaſed, ever ſince the fatal ceſſation of arms. My firſt care was to prevent a farther increaſe of thoſe debts, by paying off forthwith a great number of ſhips, which had been kept in pay, when there was no occaſion for continuing ſuch an expence.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I rely upon you for ſuch ſupplies as the preſent circumſtances of our affairs require for this year's ſervice, and for the ſupport of the public faith. The proper eſtimates ſhall be laid before you, that you may conſider of them, and what you ſhall judge neceſſary for your ſafety, I ſhall think ſufficient for mine.

"I doubt not but you will concur with me in opinion, that nothing can contribute more to the ſupport of the credit of the nation, than a ſpirited obſervance of all parliamentary engagements.

"The branches of the revenue, formerly granted for the ſupport of the civil government, are ſo far encumbered and alienated, that the produce of the funds which remain and have been granted to me, will fall greatly ſhort of what was at firſt deſigned for maintaining the honour and dignity of the crown. And ſince it is my happineſs, as I am confident you think it yours, to ſee a prince of Wales, who may, in due time ſucceed me on the throne, and to ſee him bleſſed with many children, the beſt and moſt valuable pledges of our care and concern for your poſterity, this muſt occaſion an expence, to which the nation has not for many years been accuſtomed, but ſuch as ſurely no man will grudge, and therefore I do not doubt but you will think of it with that affection which I have reaſon to hope from you.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The eyes of all Europe are upon you, waiting the iſſue of this firſt ſeſſion. Let no unhappy diviſions of parties here at home divert you from purſuing the common intereſt of your country. Let no wicked inſinuations diſquiet the minds of my ſubjects. The eſtabliſhed conſtitution in church and ſtate ſhall be the rule of my government. The happineſs, eaſe and proſperity of my people ſhall be the chief care of my life. Thoſe who aſſiſt me in carrying on theſe meaſures I ſhall always eſteem my beſt friends; and I doubt not but I ſhall be able, with your aſſiſtance, to diſappoint the deſigns of thoſe who would deprive me of that bleſſing which I moſt value, the affection of my people."

As ſoon as his majeſty left the houſe, the lords took the royal ſpeech into conſideration, and immediately voted an addreſs, the concluſive part of which was to the following effect: "that they would take ſuch meaſures as would preſerve the public credit, reſtore our trade, extinguiſh the very hopes of the pretender, and recover the reputation of the kingdom in foreign parts; the loſs of which they hoped to convince the world by their actions, is by no means to be imputed to the nation in general." This gave occaſion to a very warm debate. The tories alledged, "that it was injurious to the late queen's memory, and claſhed with that part of his majeſty's ſpeech, which recommended to both houſes, the avoiding the unhappy diviſions of parties, and that it was unjuſt to condemn perſons without hearing them." Lord Bolingbroke, in particular, was very warm on this ſubject, and moved that part of the clauſe might be omitted. But it was carried againſt him, and the addreſs was preſented in its original.

The whigs now determined to enquire into the late negotiations, and a ſecret committee was appointed for that purpoſe. The famous Sir Robert Walpole was appointed chairman; who, after delivering the report, impeached lord Bolingbroke of high-treaſon, as the author of a particular treaty concluded with Lewis XIV. Lord Coningſby immediately roſe, and ſaid, "The worthy chairman has impeached the hand; I impeach the head: he has impeached the clerk; I the judge: he the ſcholar; I the maſter. I impeach Robert Harley, earl of Oxford, of high-treaſon, and other crimes and miſdemeanors. Mr. Harley, the earl of Oxford's brother, ſpoke in his defence. He alledged, "that the miniſter had done nothing but by the immediate order of the queen; that the peace of Utrecht was an advantageous peace, and, as ſuch, it had been approved by two parliaments."

On the 21ſt of June Mr. ſecretary Stanhope impeached James duke of Ormond of high-treaſon, and other high crimes and miſdemeanors. The duke was defended by ſeveral members. Sir Joſeph Jekyll in particular ſaid, "That if there was room for mercy, he hoped it would be ſhewn to that noble, generous, and courageous peer, who had, in a courſe of many years, exerted thoſe great accompliſhments for the good and honour of his country: that as the ſtatute of Edward III. on which the charge of high-treaſon againſt him was founded, had been mitigated by ſubſequent acts, the houſe ought not, in his opinion, to take advantage of that act againſt the duke, but only to impeach him of high crimes and miſdemeanors." This occaſioned a long and warm debate; but the queſtion being put, it was carried for his impeachment. The duke perceiving he was already pre-judged by his enemies, who were determined to carry on the impeachment with the whole force of their party, conſulted his own ſafety, by withdrawing himſelf from the kingdom.

Articles of impeachment were alſo drawn up by the commons, againſt Robert earl of Oxford, which being agreed to, lord Coningſby went up to the lords, and, at the bar of the houſe, impeached the ſaid earl of high-treaſon; demanding, at the ſame time, that he might be ſequeſtered from parliament, and committed to ſafe cuſtody. The earl, after proteſting his innocence, obſerved, that if miniſters of ſtate, who only executed the orders of their ſovereign, were reſponſible for their conduct, every member of that houſe might one day be expoſed to the ſame misfortunes. He added, "My lords, I am about to take my leave of your lordſhips and this honourable houſe, perhaps for ever. I ſhall lay down my life with pleaſure, in a cauſe favoured by my dear royal miſtreſs. When I conſider that I am to be judged by the juſtice, honour, and virtue of my peers, I ſhall acquieſce, and retire with great content: and, my lords, God's will be done." He was ſuffered to return to his own houſe, in cuſtody of the Black Rod, in conſequence of his being ill of the gravel. The next day he was brought to the bar of the houſe, where he received a copy of the articles, and was allowed a month to prepare his anſwer. But he was ordered immediately to the Tower, notwithſtanding his bad ſtate of health.

Theſe proceedings greatly contributed to increaſe the popular ferments. Tumults were raiſed in various parts of the kingdom againſt the friends and adherents of the new miniſtry. A general ſpirit of diſcontent, ſo openly maniſeſted, filled them with terror for their own ſafety, and the houſe of commons throught proper to addreſs the king to put the laws againſt rioters vigorouſly in force. A new law, called, "The Proclamation, or Riot-act," was prepared, and ſoon after received the royal aſſent, decreeing, that if any perſons, to the number of twelve, unlawfully aſſembled, ſhould continue together one hour after having been required in his majeſty's name to diſperſe, by a juſtice of the peace, or other officer, and heard the proclamation againſt riots read in public, they ſhould be deemed guilty of felony without benefit of clergy.

On the 20th of July the king went to the houſe of peers, and having ſent for the commons he acquainted them that he had received certain advices of an attempt preparing abroad in favour of the pretender; and that a rebellion was actually begun at home: he therefore expected that the commons would not leave the kingdom in a defenceleſs condition, but enable him to take ſuch meaſures as ſhould be neceſſary for the public ſafety. The commons immediately drew up an addreſs, in which they aſſured his majeſty, they would ſupport him, with their lives and fortunes, againſt all his open and ſecret enemies, and deſired him to raiſe ſufficient forces, as ſoon as poſſible, for the ſecurity of the kingdom; and the next day, the lords addreſſed him to the ſame effect.

The Habeas Corpus act was now ſuſpended, and orders were iſſued to arreſt all ſuſpected perſons. A reward of 100,000l. was offered to any one who ſhould take the pretender, dead or alive. Troops were raiſed, a fleet was equipped, and every neceſſary preparation made for the ſecurity of the kingdom.

On the 5th of Auguſt the articles of impeachment againſt the duke of Ormond were read in the houſe of lords, upon which warm debates enſued, but the ſeveral articles were at laſt agreed to by a great majority. The firſt of theſe articles charged the duke, with correſponding with the marſhal Villars, the French general, while he commanded the Britiſh army in Flanders. The ſecond, that he wickedly promiſed and engaged, that he would not attack the French army, nor engage in any ſiege againſt France. The third, that he did falſely, maliciouſly, wickedly, and traiterouſly adhere to the French king, and in purſuance of a promiſe he had ſecretly made to the marſhal Villars, he endeavoured to perſuade the general of the confederate army to raiſe the ſiege of Queſnoy, and, when he could not prevail, marched off with the queen's troops, and gave the general of the enemy advice of it. All the reſt of the articles conſiſted of the duke's conduct in Flanders reduced into a charge; and both he and the lord Bolingbroke being fled from juſtice, bills were brought in to ſummon them to ſurrender themſelves by the 10th of September, and, in default thereof, to attaint them of high treaſon, which paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent. Theſe noblemen having neglected to ſurrender themſelves within the time limited by this proclamation, the houſe of lords ordered the earl marſhal to raze their names and armorial bearings out of the liſt of peers; inventories were taken of their perſonal eſtates; and the duke's atchievement, as knight of the garter, was taken from St. George's chapel at Windſor.

The alarm of an intended invaſion was not without foundation. The tories had held a correſpondence abroad, and the pretender relied on the promiſes of Lewis XIV. but that prince dying on the firſt of September, the face of affairs in that kingdom was totally changed. The regency devolved to the duke of Orleans, who had neither the power nor inclination to ſacrifice the treaſures of the ſtate he governed to ſupport the intereſt of a wretched exile, who had very ſmall hopes of obtaining the crown he claimed as his birth-right.

The jacobites, however, had proceeded too far to think of retreating; and the earl of Mar erected the pretender's ſtandard on Brae-Mar on the 25th of September. He afterwards cauſed him to be proclaimed at Caſtletown, Perth, Aberdeen, Dundee, and ſeveral other places. Several ſuſpected perſons were ſeized, and committed to the caſtle of Edinburgh. Two veſſels found means to elude the vigilance of the Engliſh fleet, and landed ſeveral officers, together with a conſiderable quantity of arms and ammunition, in Scotland. This was, however, the only aſſiſtance the pretender received from France. The regent found it his intereſt to cultivate a friendſhip with the Engliſh miniſtry. The rebels now publiſhed a maniſeſto, in which they gave their reaſons for taking up arms; enumerated the grievances of the nation, and promiſed to redreſs them.

The duke of Argyle, who had been appointed commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, ſet out on the 9th of September, for that kingdom; and about the ſame time the earl of Sunderland offered his ſervice to go and raiſe the highland clans in the moſt northern counties of Scotland, which was readily accepted, and the Queenborough man of war was appointed to carry him thither. Several other Scottiſh peers, particularly the duke of Roxburgh, the marquiſſes of Anandale and Tweedale, the earls of Selkirk and Loudon, Roſs, Haddington, Forfar, &c. readily embraced this opportunity of ſhewing their loyalty to their king, and zeal for their country.

A dangerous conſpiracy was about this time diſcovered and rendered abortive in England. On the 2d of September lieutenant-colonel Paul, who had a company in the firſt regiment of foot-guards, was ſecured, and the next day ſent priſoner to the Gatehouſe. He was charged with enliſting men for the pretender's ſervice, and other treaſonable practices. The titular duke of Powis, a Roman catholic, was committed to the Tower for high-treaſon; and the lords Landſdown and Tuplin were alſo taken into cuſtody, and a warrant iſſued for apprehending the earl of Jerſey. At the ſame time, Mr. ſecretary Stanhope acquainted the commons, "that he was commanded by the king to communicate to them, that his majeſty, having juſt cauſe to ſuſpect that Sir William Windham, Sir John Packington, Mr. Edward Hervey, ſen. of Combe, Mr. Thomas Foſter, jun. Mr. John Anſtis, and Mr. Corbet Kynaſton, were engaged in a deſign to ſupport the intended invaſion of this kingdom, had given orders for apprehending them, and deſired the conſent of the houſe, to his cauſing them to be committed and detained, if he ſhould judge it neceſſary." This was unanimouſly agreed to and an addreſs preſented to his majeſty for that purpoſe.

The conſent of the houſe being thus obtained, warrants were immediately iſſued for apprehending the ſix members, two of whom, Hervey and Anſtis, being then in town, were immediately ſecured. Mr. Hervey, ſome few days after, ſtabbed himſelf with a knife, in two or three places of his breaſt; but the wounds did not prove mortal. Mr. Foſter bid defiance to juſtice, and with the aſſiſtance of two Romiſh lords, raiſed a rebellion in Northumberland. Sir John Packington was brought up to town from Worceſterſhire, and after being examined before the council, was honourably diſcharged. Mr. Kynaſton made his eſcape, and colonel Huſke, a captain in the foot guards was ſent down with a meſſenger to apprehend Sir William Windham, in Somerſetſhire. On their arrival, which was about five in the morning, they deſired to ſee Sir William immediately; but the porter told them he was in bed and could not yet be ſpoke with. The colonel told him he came expreſs, and that the perſon with him had a packet of letters of ſuch conſequence, that it was abſolutely neceſſary for him to inform his maſter of their arrival immediately. This alarmed the porter, and Sir William immediately leaped out of bed, and came in his gown to the colonel, who told him he was his priſoner, the meſſenger at the ſame time ſhewing him the badge of his office. Sir William ſaid he readily ſubmitted; but deſired no noiſe might be made to frighten his lady, who was then with child. They now entered a chamber, where the colonel, ſeeing Sir William's coat and waiſtcoat lie, told him he had orders to ſeize all his papers, and that he muſt take leave to ſearch his pockets, where he found a bundle of papers, which he ſecured. Sir William would have diverted him by offering him the keys of his eſcrutore in order to ſearch for more; but the colonel had now ſecured thoſe of the utmoſt importance. Sir William deſired the colonel would ſtay till ſeven o'clock, when he would order his carriage to be ready; adding, he would only retire and put on his clothes, and take leave of his lady. This was granted; but the colonel ſoon found he had been too complaiſant; Sir William inſtead of retiring made his eſcape. On the colonel's return a proclamation was iſſued, promiſing 1000l. reward to any perſon who ſhould apprehend Sir William.

Finding it would be in vain any longer to ſecrete himſelf, Sir William repaired to London, and ſurrendered himſelf to the earl of Hertford, captain of one of the troops of life-guards. After a ſtrict examination before the council, he was committed to the Tower, notwithſtanding the duke of Somerſet offered to bail him. This refuſal ſo irritated the duke that he immediately reſigned all his employments.

On the 21ſt of September the king went to the houſe of peers, and after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, put an end to the ſeſſion.

The deſigned inſurrection in the weſtern counties was ſo well concerted, and the the conſpirators ſo powerful and numerous, that the jacobites at Bath, depending on their majority, openly aſſerted, that the affair of Scotland was only a diverſion to draw the king's troops that way; but that the effectual attempt would ſoon be made in the weſt. The government, however, having received information of the ſecret proceedings of the malcontents, took ſuch meaſures as rendered all their deſigns abortive. Their firſt attempt was intended to be againſt Briſtol, which they propoſed to make a place of arms. This was prevented by the earl of Berkley, lord-lieutenant of the county, and governor of that city, who repaired thither immediately, and took the neceſſary precautions for ſecuring that important place. Several perſons were apprehended, and among the reſt Mr. Hart, a merchant, who was charged with having collected a vaſt quantity of warlike ſtores for the uſe of the conſpirators.

About the ſame time lord Windſor's regiment of horſe, under the command of major-general Wade, marched to Bath, which was both the rendezvous and one of the arſenals of the conſpirators. Upon a ſtrict ſearch the king's officers diſcovered and ſeized eleven cheſts of fire-arms, a hogſhead filled with baſket hilted ſwords, and another of cartouches, three pieces of cannon and one mortar, which had been buried under ground. About 200 horſes were ſeized, and eight of the principal leaders were committed to priſon.

The diſaffected in the north of England were more ſucceſsful than their brethren in the weſt. Meaſures had been concerted at London by the Pretender's friends, ſome time before the inſurrection broke out in Northumberland. The inſurgents received great aſſiſtance from captain John Shaftoe, a half-pay officer, and captain John Hunter, in North Tyne, who had a commiſſion from queen Anne to raiſe an independent company. Beſides theſe was captain Robert Talbot, an Iriſh papiſt, who had been in the French ſervice. He carried an account of the reſolutions formed in London, and by his advice every neceſſary precaution was taken for preventing any part of their ſcheme from tranſpiring.

The firſt appearance of their riſing in arms was about the latter end of September, when the earl of Derwentwater was informed that a warrant was iſſued by the ſecretary of ſtate for apprehending him, and that the meſſengers were already in the neighbourhood of Durham. This ſufficiently alarmed the whole party, and a meeting of all the chiefs was held, where it was reſolved to throw off the maſque, and openly declare their intentions. The Pretender was accordingly proclaimed in ſeveral towns with the uſual formalities. They did not doubt of being received very willingly into Newcaſtle; but on approaching the town, they were ſurpriſed to find the gates ſhut againſt them. They marched immediately to Hexham, where they ſeized all the arms and horſes they could meet with, and proclaimed the Pretender. Here they received advice, that the lord Kenmure, the earls of Nithſdale, Carnwath and Wintoun, who had taken up arms in the weſt of Scotland, had entered England to join them and advanced as far as Rothbury. They accordingly left Hexham on the 19th of October, and, after a long march, joined the Scots at night. They all marched the next day to Woller, where they received advice that the highlanders, who had croſſed the Forth under Mackintoſh were marching to join them, upon which they continued ther route to Kelſo in Scotland.

The miniſtry being informed of theſe proceedings, it was thought proper to demand from the ſtates-general, the 6000 men ſtipulated by the late treaty. The demand was immediately complied with, and the neceſſary preparations were made for their embarkation. But as it would be ſome time before the Dutch could land in England, Pitt's regiment of horſe, and three regiments of foot, had been ſent for from Ireland, and landed at Cheſter, the beginning of October. Aſſociations were alſo entered into throughout the kingdom for the defence of his majeſty's perſon and government; and the lords-lieutenants of the counties were impowered to form into troops or companies ſuch as ſhould be willing to aſſociate, and to grant them commiſſions in the king's name.

In the mean time orders were ſent to lieutenant-general Carpenter, (now at Newcaſtle,) to march immediately againſt the inſurgents. He accordingly left that place on the 25th of October, and advanced at the head of one regiment of foot and three of dragoons, towards Kelſo, where the rebels ſtill continued. A council of war was immediately called in their camp, and it was reſolved to march directly to Jedburgh. They did not long continue in that place; but by marches and countermarches gave general Carpenter the ſlip, and paſſed into England, reaching Lancaſter on the ſeventh of November. On their approach colonel Chartres, who commanded a few troops in that place, propoſed to blow up a fine bridge over which they were to paſs, in order to obſtruct their entry; but the inhabitants oppoſed this propoſition. The colonel, therefore, thought it adviſeable to leave the town, after having ordered ſome barrels of powder to be thrown into a well, in order to prevent their falling into the hands of the rebels.

The inſurgents, having entered Lancaſter, performed the uſual ceremony of proclaiming the Pretender, and levying the public revenues. Though the town could eaſily have been made tenable againſt a much greater number of forces than the government could at that time ſend againſt them, and though they expected ſuccours from different quarters, yet they continued no longer in Lancaſter than the ninth, when they left the place, carrying with them ſix pieces of cannon which they found in the town. They directed their march to Preſton, where the horſe arrived the ſame night, but the foot halted about mid-way. They entered the town without oppoſition, Stanhope's regiment of horſe, and a regiment of militia, having thought proper to retire on their approach.

As ſoon as general Carpenter was informed that the rebels were in full march towards Lancaſter, he reſolved to purſue them with the dragoons only; perſuaded he ſhould be joined by the king's troops in the weſt. He was not miſtaken, and his troops being joined by a conſiderable body under general Willes, they marched to Ribble bridge, fully reſolved to attack the inſurgents in Preſton. The very morning of their arrival general Forſter gave orders for the rebel army to march, not in the leaſt ſuſpecting the king's troops were ſo near. He had depended for intelligence from the gentlemen of Lancaſter, who had promiſed that no party of the king's troops ſhould advance within forty miles of Preſton without his knowledge. He was accordingly ſurpriſed when he received advice that general Willes was within ſight of the town. He advanced, however, at the head of a party of horſe to view the poſture of the royal forces; and perceiving they were in full march towards him, he immediately returned.

The intelligence of the king's troops being ſo near did not in the leaſt intimidate the rebels, who with the greateſt expedition, made the neceſſary preparations for their defence. They barricadoed the avenues, and poſted detachments in the ſtreets, bye-lanes, and ſuch houſes as were moſt proper for galling their enemies. The gentlemen volunteers were poſted in the church-yard, under the command of the earls of Derwentwater, Wintoun, Nithſdale, and Kenmure. General Forſter formed four grand barriers; the firſt a little below the church, commanded by brigadier Mackintoſh, and ſupported by the gentlemen volunteers in the church-yard. The ſecond was ſituated at the head of a lane leading to the fields, and commanded by Charles Murray. The third was near a windmill, and commanded by the laird of Mackintoſh. And the fourth in the ſtreet leading to Liverpool, commanded by major Millar, and Mr. Douglas. They threw up ſeveral intrenchments in an inſtant, and did every thing in their power to make a ſtout reſiſtance; but were guilty of one capital error, which ſufficiently diſcovered their ignorance, or rather infatuation. For in the morning, upon the firſt intelligence of general Willes's approach, they had detached Macpherſon, at the head of 100 men, to take poſſeſſion of Ribble-bridge, which was the only paſs by which the royaliſts could march to Preſton; the river being fordable only in two places, one below, and the other above the bridge, both which could eaſily have been rendered impaſſable. (The bridge terminates a long narrow lane, where Oliver Cromwell met with a ſtout reſiſtance from the king's forces.) But Mr. Forſter, inſtead of taking advantage of this paſs, which he might have eaſily done to the deſtruction of the royal forces, ordered his detachment to return to the town, and by that means gave them a free paſſage.

General Willes expected to have met with great oppoſition in forcing the paſs, and made all the neceſſary preparations for that purpoſe; but was greatly ſurpriſed to find it abandoned. He even ſuſpected there was ſome ambuſcade laid for him, and, therefore, reſolved to proceed with great caution. After viewing the hedges, and laying the way open for the cavalry to enter, he perceived not the leaſt appearance of an enemy. He, therefore, concluded they had abandoned the town, and were endeavouring by long marches to return to Scotland; but in this he was alſo miſtaken; for, on his advancing near the town, he perceived them in a proper poſture to give him a warm reception, though in a place where he could attack them with more eaſe than at Ribble-bridge. He immediately prepared for an attack, and diſpoſed his troops in ſuch a manner as he might beſt annoy them in the town, and prevent their eſcape.

After viewing the diſpoſition of the inſurgents, and finding all the avenues leading to the town ſtrongly barricadoed, with two pieces of cannon planted on each, he reſolved to make two attacks at the ſame time. Accordingly, a captain and fifty dragoons were drawn out of each of the five regiments, and ordered to attack the avenue leading to Wigan. Another large detachment were ordered to attack the avenue leading to Lancaſter.

The firſt attack was upon that barricade below the church, where old brigadier Mackintoſh commanded. He received the king's troops very gallantly, and with a terrible fire, both from the barricade and the tops of the houſes, obliged them to retire to the end of the town. At the ſame time lord Forreſter, who commanded the other detachment, entered the avenue of Wigan, and took poſſeſſion of two large houſes within fifty yards of the barricade, where he poſted his men, finding it impracticable to force the barricade; but from theſe houſes, which overlooked the whole town, he greatly annoyed the enemy; and from thoſe houſes they received the greater part of the damage they ſuſtained during the action. Theſe houſes had been poſſeſſed by the highlanders, when the barricade was commanded by Mackintoſh, but they were called off to ſupport the barricade. This gave the king's troops an opportunity of ſeizing them, and perhaps ſaved the remains of that detachment, which ſuffered very greatly in this bold attack. The other barricades were attacked with great reſolution, but without ſucceſs; the king's troops being obliged to retire to the extremities of the town, and remain ſatisfied till the next day, night now hindering their farther approaches.

Hitherto the rebels appeared to have acted with courage and intrepidity, and to have the advantage, ſince they repulſed the enemy in every attack, with very little loſs. But they did not long continue in their reſolution to defend themſelves to extremity; for being informed next morning that general Carpenter was arrived with a reinforcement of troops to ſurround them, their courage failed them; and from that moment they acted with great irreſolution, and deſpaired of ſucceſs.

About ten in the morning general Carpenter, accompanied by the earl of Carliſle, lord Lumley, and colonel Darcy, arrived at Preſton, and marched himſelf to the Mancheſter ſide. He found that the rebels had been attacked the day before without ſucceſs, and that moſt part of the king's horſe and dragoons were crouded together in a deep narrow lane near the end of the town, in ſo incommodious a manner, that it was impoſſible to draw up above three or four in front; and on viewing the ground towards the river, he ſaw that there were no troops poſted at the end of Fiſher-gate-ſtreet, to block up that part of the town, where ſeveral of the rebels were ſaid to have eſcaped the night before. This ſtreet leads to a marſh or meadow, which joins to that part of the river Ribble, where there were two good fords, being the high road towards Liverpool; and towards the end of the ſame ſtreet there was another barricade mounted with two pieces of cannon. General Carpenter, therefore, ordered colonel Pitt to poſt his two ſquadrons on that marſh; and going back to the end of the town, he ordered a communication to be made for the troops to aſſiſt each other, in caſe of a ſally from the rebels. Inveſted on all ſides, and ſenſible, when too late, of their condition, the inſurgents began to conſider what was to be done. The highlanders were for ſallying out upon the king's forces, and dying like men of honour, ſword in hand; but they were over-ruled, and not allowed to make any ſally. The motion was not indeed communicated to the whole body; a capitulation having been propoſed by general Forſter, as it was expected good terms might be obtained from the king's officers. Colonel Oxburgh offered to go to the head quarters of the royaliſts and treat for a ſurrender. He accordingly repaired to general Willes, and offered to lay down their arms and ſubmit, on his promiſing to recommend them to his majeſty's mercy. The general told the colonel he could not treat with rebels; for as they had killed ſeveral of the king's ſubjects, they muſt expect to ſuffer the ſame fate. The colonel replied, that he hoped, as he was a man of honour and an officer, he would not put perſons to death who were willing to ſubmit. Willes anſwered, all he could do for them was, that if they laid down their arms and ſubmitted themſelves priſoners at diſcretion, he would prevent the ſoldiers from cutting them in pieces, till he had received farther orders; adding, that he would give them no more than an hour to come to a final reſolution. Oxburgh returned into the town to acquaint Mr. Forſter of the general's anſwer. The Scots were very unwilling to accept of ſuch conditions, and Willes conſented to allow them a longer time to give their anſwer. At laſt they agreed to ſurrender themſelves priſoners at diſcretion.

In the above action about 130 men of the royaliſts were killed; but the loſs ſuſtained by the rebels was never known. Upwards of 1400 were taken priſoners, among whom were general Forſter, the earl of Derwentwater, lord Widdrington, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction: the earls of Nithſdale, Wintoun, Carnwath and Kenmure, lord Nairn, and other Scottiſh noblemen and gentlemen, to the number of 143, beſides ſeveral vaſſals and ſervants. All the noblemen and leaders were ſecured. Major Nairn, captain Lockhart, captain Shaftoe, and enſign Erſkine, were tried by a court martial as deſerters, and executed. Lord Charles Murray, ſon to the duke of Athol, was alſo condemned for the ſame crime, but reprieved. The common men were confined at Liverpool and Cheſter; the noblemen and moſt conſiderable officers were ſent to London, conveyed through the ſtreets pinioned like malefactors, and ſome of them committed to the Tower, and others to Newgate.

The very day on which the rebels were ſubdued at Preſton, a battle was fought at Dumblain, between the earl of Mar, who commanded the inſurgents, and the duke of Argyle, commander in chief of the royal army. The duke's forces, amounting to 3.500 men, were drawn up upon the heights above Dumblain, having that town at about a mile and a half on his left, and a wet boggy moraſs, called Sheriff-moor, on his right. The earl of Mar's army, amounting to about 9,000 men, were drawn up oppoſite the royal army. Mar, who knew his number was much greater than Argyle's, extended his lines as far as poſſible, in order to take him in flank, and in this diſpoſition advanced to the attack.

Argyle, who till now ſuppoſed that Sheriff-moor was impaſſable, ſaw that two or three nights froſt had rendered it capable of bearing. At the ſame time he perceived the rebels coming down the moor with an intent to flank him, having their right extended a conſiderable diſtance beyond the point of his left. He found himſelf therefore obliged to alter the diſpoſition of his front, to prevent his being ſurrounded; which, on account of the ſcarcity of general officers, was not ſo eaſily done. The battle was very obſtinate and very bloody; different accounts were given of it, and both ſides claimed the victory. But from the conſequences, it appeared that it was really on the ſide of the royaliſts. The earl of Mar retreated to Perth, and abandoned the deſign he had formed of croſſing the Forth and joining his ſouthern neighbours; nor was it ever after attempted. About 800 of the rebels were ſlain on the field of battle, and 82 taken priſoners, among whom were ſeveral perſons of diſtinction.

The rebels received another conſiderable ſhock in the loſs of Inverneſs, from which Sir John Mackenzie was driven by Symon Fraſer, lord Lovat, who had hitherto adhered to the pretender's intereſt, but now declared in favour of the government. A free communication was, by this means, opened with the north of Scotland, where the earl of Sunderland had raiſed a ſtrong body of his vaſſals. The marquis of Huntley and the earl of Seaforth ſoon quitted the rebel army, and ſubmitted to the king. A conſiderable number of the clan of the Fraſers followed the example of lord Lovat, their chief, and declared againſt the pretender. The marquis of Tullibardine likewiſe withdrew from the army, to defend his own country; and the clans, ſeeing no likelihood of another action, returned to their reſpective habitations.

On the 15th of November general Cadogan, with the Dutch troops, arrived in England, and marched immediately to Edinburgh, a reſolution having been taken to diſlodge the rebels from Perth. A conſiderable train of artillery was alſo ſhipped at the Tower, and ſent to Scotland, for the uſe of the army.

In the mean time the Pretender, notwithſtanding the deſperate ſituation of his affairs in Scotland, reſolved to viſit that kingdom; he therefore poſted through France in diſguiſe, embarked on board a ſmall veſſel at Dunkirk; and, on the end of December, landed at Peterhead, with ſix perſons only in his retinue, among whom was the marquis of Tinmouth, ſon to the duke of Berwick. He paſſed through Aberdeen, incog. to Fetteroſſe, where he was met and complimented by the earls of Mar and Mareſchal, general Hamilton, and others of his adherents. From Fetteroſſe he repaired to Dundee, and thence to Perth, into which he made his public entry, and was proclaimed with great ſolemnity. Here he publiſhed ſeveral proclamations, and the ſoldiers were employed in fortifying the town; but on the approach of the Engliſh and Dutch forces, he abandoned Perth, retired to Dundee, and afterwards to Montroſe.

The inſurgents, having loſt all hopes of receiving any aſſiſtance from France, and finding themſelves cloſely purſued by the king's forces, began to be greatly diſcouraged. They called a council of war, in which it was reſolved that the Pretender ſhould retire in the evening. It happened fortunately for him, that there was then a ſmall ſhip in the harbour, deſigned for a gentleman whom the chevalier intended to ſend as ambaſſador to a foreign court. This ſhip was now ordered to convey the Pretender, with ſome of his particular friends, to the continent. Theſe were the earls of Mar and Milfort, the lord Drummond, and ſome other chiefs. Nine Engliſh ſhips of war were at that time actually cruiſing at a ſmall diſtance from the coaſt, but the night proved ſo remarkably dark, that the pretender's ſhip eſcaped the vigilance of the enemy, and landed him ſafely at Graveline in France.

The rebels no ſooner found that their prince had deſerted them, than they deſpiſed all order, diſbanded themſelves, and retired.

Such was the iſſue of a rebellion that had proved fatal to many noble families; and which, inſtead of promoting the intereſt of the Stuart family, ſerved only to ſtrengthen the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover.

During theſe tranſactions the barrier-treaty, after many difficulties and delays, which gave reaſon to ſuſpect that the imperial court never intended to conclude it, was finally adjuſted and ſigned at Antwerp by the plenipotentiaries of the emperor, the ſtates-general, and the king of Great Britain. By this treaty, the bounds of the imperial dominions in the Netherlands, as alſo thoſe of the ſtates-general, were finally determined; and the emperor became guarantee of the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover to the throne of Great Britain, as the ſtates were before the ſigning of the treaty.

A. D. 1716. The parliament met on the 9th of January, when the king made a ſpeech to both houſes; in which he congratulated them on the ſucceſs of the army in ſuppreſſing the rebellion; upon the concluſion of the barrier-treaty between the emperor and the ſtates-general; alſo, on a convention with Spain, that would free the merchants of England trading to that kingdom from the impoſitions and hardſhips under which they had long laboured in conſequence of the late treaties: he likewiſe gave them to underſtand, that a treaty for renewing all former alliances between Great-Britain and the ſtates-general was now nearly concluded; and aſſured the commons, that he would freely give up all the eſtates that ſhould become forfeited to the crown, in conſequence of the late rebellion, towards defraying the extraordinary expences incurred on the ſucceſſion.

To this ſpeech addreſſes of thanks were ſeverally preſented by both houſes. The commons, in theirs, declared, they thought themſelves obliged, in juſtice to their injured country, to proſecute in the moſt vigorous and impartial manner, the authors of thoſe deſtructive councils, which had drawn down ſuch miſeries on the nation. Their proceedings were fully conformable to this declaration. They expelled Mr. Forſter, general of the Northumbrian rebels, and impeached the earls of Derwentwater, Nithſdale, Wintoun and Carnwath, and the lords Widdrington, Kenmure and Nairne, of high-treaſon. They likewiſe brought in a bill of attainder againſt the earl of Mar, William Murray, ſtiled the marquis of Tullibardine, the earl of Linlithgow, and John lord Drummond.

The impeached lords all pleaded guilty, (except the earl of Wintoun, who petitioned for time to prepare for his defence) and on the 9th of February ſentence of death was paſſed on them by the lord-chancellor Cowper, who was created lord high ſteward on the occaſion.

The greateſt intereſt was made to ſave the lives of theſe noblemen. Their unhappy wives begged with tears the interceſſion of parliament. The houſe of lords preſented an addreſs, praying his majeſty to reprieve ſuch of the condemned lords as ſhould deſerve his clemency. The king anſwered very coldly, that he would do what he thought moſt conſiſtent with the dignity of his crown and the ſecurity of his ſubjects. The earl of Derwentwater and Kenmure were beheaded on Tower-hill on the 24th of February. The earl of Carnwath, and the lords Widdrington and Nairn were reprieved. The earl of Nithſdale was to have ſuffered with Derwentwater and Kenmure; but his mother ſaved him by a generous artifice: ſhe obtained permiſſion to take her laſt leave of him, ran to embrace him in priſon, and they inſtantly changed dreſſes. By this means he eſcaped, and ſhe continued in priſon. On being interrogated at the bar of the houſe of lords concerning the place of the earl's retreat, ſhe obſerved a profound ſilence. At laſt, in juſtice to her generous affections and virtues, ſhe was diſcharged. Wintoun alſo afterwards made his eſcape, as did Forſter and Mackintoſh out of Newgate. Twenty-two of the rebels were hanged in the country, and ſeveral at Tyburn; particularly colonel Oxburgh, Mr. Paul a clergyman, and Mr. Hall, a juſtice of peace.

This rigour exerciſed againſt the delinquents rendered the miniſtry odious to the people. The court was alarmed, and it was determined to take the moſt proper meaſures for preventing the effect. The preſent parliament was at the devotion of a miniſtry; but it was greatly feared a new one might not be ſo; they might poſſibly return upon the miniſtry the rigour they had exerciſed upon the people. The act of triennial parliaments, that bulwark of the national liberty, was juſtly alarming to a miniſtry, evidently inclined to deſpotiſm. It was indeed dangerous to attack a law of this importance, but the juncture was extremely favourable. It was therefore determined to repeal this act, though juſtly conſidered as the principal defence of the people againſt the attempts of arbitrary power. A motion was accordingly made in the houſe of peers for effecting this purpoſe. It was ſaid, that too frequent elections kept up the ſpirit and activity of parties, fomented family diſcords, brought on ruinous expences, and gave occaſion to the cabals and intrigues of foreign powers; that in the preſent ſtate of affairs it was neceſſary to remedy the evil; and that there was no better method of extinguiſhing the flames of rebellion, which were always ready to break out anew, than by bringing in a bill for extending the duration of parliaments. Theſe arguments were ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by ſeveral of the peers. "The fundamental laws of the kingdom," they ſaid "required frequent parliaments. They were eſtabliſhed by the cuſtom of many ages; they were particularly intereſting to the liberty and glory of the ſubject. What confidence could foreigners repoſe in a nation that would idly ſacrifice its moſt precious rights? The expence of elections, the cabals they might occaſion would be ſo far from weakening the new and dangerous ſyſtem, that they would promote it by the intereſt individuals would have in procuring ſeats in a long parliament. The miniſtry would find ſtronger means and motives to corrupt the members. And might not the ſame parliament that had effected its prolongation, effect alſo its perpetuity, which alone was wanting to deſtroy the privileges of the people, and the conſtitution itſelf?" Theſe arguments, however national, however forcible, were too weak to operate againſt the influence of the court. Diſputes and animoſities took place, but the two houſes paſſed the bill, and it ſoon after received the royal aſſent.

The king now intimated his deſire of viſiting his German dominions; but as there was a clauſe in the act of ſettlement which prevented him from leaving his realms without conſent of parliament, the clauſe was repealed by a new bill, which immediately paſſed both houſes. When this buſineſs was done, his majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion, declaring, that he had determined to viſit Germany, and had accordingly appointed his ſon, the prince of Wales, guardian of the kingdom during his abſence. He ſoon after embarked at Graveſend, and proceeded directly to Pyrmont, where he ſtaid ſome time to drink the waters for the benefit of his health.

The king had ſcarce left England, before the two parties that divided the nation, broke out into freſh animoſities; the diſorderly multitude are always ready to follow the example of their ſuperiors. The whigs had formed themſelves into ſocieties, and uſed to meet at different houſes in the city and ſuburbs, diſtinguiſhed by the name of Mug-houſes, from the veſſels they uſed to drink out of, where whiggiſh healths were toaſted. One of the moſt famous of theſe houſes was in Saliſbury-court, Fleet-ſtreet, and rendered ſo by the following circumſtance. The company aſſembled there having on ſome occaſion given extraordinary demonſtration of their hatred and animoſity to the leading men of the oppoſite party, by malicious healths and reflections, the tory mob being informed of it were ſo incenſed, that on the 20th of July they came and attacked the Mug-houſe, which was kept by one Read, with an intent to demoliſh it; but the company ſending for a reinforcement from another Mug-houſe in Taviſtock-ſtreet, they obliged the aſſailants to fly for the preſent, though many of them returned, and kept lurking about the houſe the two following days; and on the third one Vaughan, who had been a Bridewell boy, inſtigated the mob to go to the Mug-houſe, and revenge their late affront. Accordingly they followed him with loud huzzas of "High church and Ormond, down "with the Mug-houſe!" Mr. Read bid them keep off or he would fire among them, but they not regarding him, he diſcharged his piece, and killed Vaughan on the ſpot, for which he was afterwards tried and acquitted. The mob ſtill continuing their outrages, breaking the windows, pulling down the ſign, gutting the houſe, breaking and deſtroying the furniture, &c. the ſheriffs of London came, and ordered the proclamation againſt riots to be read, which proving of no effect, a party of the guards were ordered to march to the place, at whoſe appearance the mob diſperſed. Five of the rioters, however, were taken, who being tried and convicted, were hanged before the houſe; which exemplary puniſhment effectually ſuppreſſed theſe tumultuous proceedings.

During theſe tranſactions at home the king concluded a private treaty with the duke of Orleans, regent of France, and the ſtates-general. By this treaty, which was known by the name of the triple alliance, the duke of Orleans engaged that the pretender ſhould depart immediately from Avignon, where he then reſided, to the other ſide of the Alps, and never be ſuffered to return to Lorraine, or France on any pretence whatſoever: that no rebellious ſubjects of Great-Britain ſhould be allowed to reſide in that kingdom; and that the treaty of Utrecht, with reſpect to the demolition of Dunkirk, ſhould be fully executed to the ſatisfaction of his Britannic majeſty. This treaty alſo contained a mutual guarantee of all the places poſſeſſed by the contracting powers: of the proteſtant ſucceſſion on the throne of England as well as that of the duke of Orleans to the crown of France; and a defenſive alliance, ſtipulating the proportion of ſhips and forces, to be furniſhed to that power, which ſhould be diſturbed at home, or invaded from abroad. This treaty was no ſooner made public, than it excited great diſcontents both in France and England; but theſe clamours were little regarded by the king and the regent who had each ſecured the point he had chiefly at heart.

The king had materially ſtrengthened himſelf by theſe alliances; but while he was on the continent he diſcovered an inveterate enemy in the perſon of Charles XII. of Sweden. George had acquired the duchies of Bremen and Verden, of which Charles had been ſtripped by his enemies. The latter was therefore ſo incenſed againſt the former, that he determined, if poſſible, to ruin him; and accordingly undertook to head an invaſion in favour of the pretender. His ambaſſadors at London and the Hague ſecretly conſpired in this deſign. The meaſures were artfully taken, and every thing ſeemed to forebode ſucceſs.

Intimation of this intended conſpiracy being given to the king, he ſuddenly quitted Hanover, and returned to London. The next day after his arrival the Swediſh ambaſſador, count Gyllenbourg, was put under arreſt; and baron Gortz, the Swediſh reſident at the Hague, was alſo confined.

The plan of this intended invaſion was deeply concerted: a number of veſſels had been purchaſed, and were to repair under various pretences to Gottenburgh in Sweden, about the latter end of March, the ſeaſon when the eaſterly winds, which are fair for bringing ſhips from the Baltic to England, generally prevail. Eight thouſand foot, and 4000 horſe, all picked men, together with a formidable train of artillery, a large quantity of ammunition and proviſions, and arms ſufficient for 20,000 men, were to have been embarked on board theſe ſhips. The confederates were ſo ſure, of being joined by the diſcontented party in England, that the deſign had been intruſted to a very few perſons only; nor was there any formal treaty drawn up between the parties engaged in this affair; the mutual intereſt each had in the ſucceſs was thought more binding than the moſt ſolemn engagements.

In the mean time the arreſting the Swediſh ambaſſador, and ſeizing his papers, by which the whole plot was diſcovered, alarmed the other foreign miniſters reſiding at the court of London. They complained to the miniſtry of this outrage committed againſt the law of nations. The two ſecretaries of ſtate wrote circular letters to theſe reſidents, aſſuring them that in a few days they ſhould be made acquainted with the reaſons for this extraordinary proceeding. All, except the marquis de Monteleone, ambaſſador from Spain, were ſatisfied with this intimation. He replied, that he was extremely ſorry no other way could be found to preſerve the peace of the kingdom, than that of arreſting the perſon of a public miniſter, and ſeizing his papers, the ſacred repoſitories of his maſter's ſecrets; and that in whatever light thoſe two facts might ſeem to be underſtood, they very ſenſibly wounded the law of nations. This, however, was far from being true; the Engliſh monarch acted conſiſtently with the ſtricteſt principles of juſtice in impriſoning his enemy. Gyllenbourgh had violated the law of nations by conſpiring againſt the prince to whom he was ſent in a public character; and therefore the Engliſh had an undoubted right to diſpenſe with the obſervance of the ſame law, by arreſting his perſon.

A. D. 1717. The parliament met on the 20th of February, when the king, in a ſpeech from the throne, informed them, that the inveterate rancour of a faction which they ſtill poſſeſſed, had again prompted them to ſtir up foreign powers to diſturb the peace of their native country, inſomuch that they choſe rather to make Britain a ſcene of blood and confuſion, than give over their darling deſign of impoſing a popiſh pretender. The letters of baron Gortz and count Gyllenbourg were laid before the houſe, and ſoon after publiſhed by his majeſty's command. Both houſes addreſſed the king upon this occaſion, and, in ſuitable terms, expreſſed their reſentment. All commerce with Sweden was prohibited; and a ſquadron of thirty-two ſhips was immediately fitted out, which blocked up the Swediſh fleet in their own harbours, and prevented their putting in execution the deſign which they had been ſo long projecting. The king of Sweden, finding himſelf thus diſappointed, and in danger of feeling the reſentment of his Britannic majeſty, not only deſiſted from his enterprize, but alſo endeavoured to make a peace with him, which was ſoon after effected by the mediation of the regent of France.

On the 3d of April Mr. ſecretary Stanhope delivered a meſſage from his majeſty to the houſe of commons, informing them, that being deſirous, as far as poſſible, of ſecuring the kingdom againſt any future attempt of a foreign invaſion, he thought it neceſſary, that ſuch meaſures ſhould be early concerted with other princes and ſtates as might conduce moſt effectually to that end: and as this would require ſome expence, his majeſty hoped the commons would, by their aſſiſtance at this juncture, enable him to make good ſuch engagements as might eaſe his people of all future charge and apprehenſions on that account.

This meſſage produced great debates in the houſe: it was ſtrenuouſly urged, that to aſk money for alliances, without firſt acquainting them with the particulars, was no ways agreeable to the methods of parliament; and that new alliances ought not to be purchaſed with money. At length, however, it was propoſed to grant his majeſty a ſum not exceeding 250,000l. which after ſome debates was carried, though only by a ſmall majority. And thus Great Britain found herſelf engaged in continental connections, becauſe the reigning family poſſeſſed eſtates in Germany; an inconvenience which has more than once been felt, and which always muſt be felt whilſt a ſtanding army ſhall be thought neceſſary to the prince as it is uneaſy to the people.

The carrying this vote by ſo ſmall a majority alarmed the king, and a change in the miniſtry was thought neceſſary. Accordingly Sir Robert Walpole, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, and chancellor of the exchequer; Mr. Pulteney, ſecretary at war; Mr. Methuen, ſecretary of ſtate; the duke of Devonſhire, preſident of the council; and ſeveral others, reſigned their employments; ſo that the miniſtry underwent an almoſt total revolution. The earl of Sunderland and Mr. Addiſon were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate; Mr. Stanhope, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury and chancellor of the exchequer; Mr. Craggs ſecretary at war; the earl of Berkely firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty; the duke of Bolton lord-lieutenant of Ireland; and the duke of Newcaſtle lord-chamberlain.

The earl of Oxford, who had been confined about two years in the Tower, availed himſelf of this quarrel in the miniſtry, to demand his trial. The moſt violent diſputes happened between the two houſes concerning the manner of the proceſs. The lords inſiſted that the commons ſhould firſt proceed to make good the articles of high treaſon againſt the earl, before they attempted to prove thoſe relating only to high crimes and miſdemeanors. The commons refuſed to proceed only as they ſtood in the impeachment. The breach became wider between the two houſes, and the lords refuſed a conference which had been demanded by the commons. The accuſers were now ordered to appear and make good their charge againſt the earl of Oxford; but this they refuſed, and the noble priſoner was ſet at liberty.

The commons were greatly enraged at the eſcape of this nobleman, whom they had marked out for deſtruction; and, as a laſt effort of their malice, they reſolved on an addreſs, beſeeching his majeſty to except the earl of Oxford out of the act of grace, which was intended to be brought into the houſe. This addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to comply with, and alſo forbid the earl to appear at court.

The act of grace having paſſed the commons, was carried up to the lords, on the 15th of July, where it alſo paſſed without the leaſt oppoſition. In the afternoon of the ſame day the king went to the houſe, and having given the royal aſſent to that, and ſuch other bills as were ready, cloſed the ſeſſion.

The earl of Oxford, Simon lord Harcourt, Mr. Prior, Thomas Harley, Arthur Moore, and ſome others, were particularly excepted by name in the act of grace. By virtue of it the earl of Carnwath, and the lords Widdrington and Nairn were immediately diſcharged; but the lord Duffees was continued in priſon, with an allowance of 3l. per week. All thoſe who lay under ſentence of death in Newgate were diſmiſſed, as were thoſe that were detained, on account of the rebellion, in the Fleet, the Marſhalſea, and other priſons in the kingdom.

Soon after the act of indemnity was paſſed, count Gyllenbourg was diſcharged from his confinement, and an order was ſent to Holland to releaſe baron Gortz.

On the 2d of November the princeſs of Wales was ſafely delivered of a prince, who, on the 28th, was baptized by the name of George William. This affair was the unhappy cauſe of a diſpute between the king and the prince of Wales: for it ſeems his royal highneſs had intended the biſhop of Oſnaburg, his uncle, ſhould have ſtood god-father; but his majeſty, in compliance with the cuſtom which preſcribed that one of the principal lords of the court, commonly the lord chancellor for the time being, ſhould ſtand as ſecond god-father, had ordered the duke of Newcaſtle to ſtand. The prince, imagining the duke had officiouſly forced himſelf into this honour, expreſſed his reſentment in very warm terms to his grace; which his majeſty being informed of, looked on the prince's anger as expreſſed againſt himſelf, and ſent him immediate orders to leave St. James's; which he complied with, and took up his reſidence at Leiceſter-houſe, whither he was accompanied by the princeſs his conſort, though it was intimated to her that ſhe might remain at St. James's, as long as ſhe thought proper. This quarrel extended to the friends of each party, for as all in the king's ſervice were forbid to viſit the prince's court at Leiceſter-houſe, ſo moſt of his royal highneſs's ſervants forebore going to St. James's. After this affair, whenever his majeſty went abroad, he committed the adminiſtration to the lords juſtices.

The parliament met on the 21ſt of November, when the king made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he informed them, that he had reduced the army to very near one half, ſince the beginning of the laſt ſeſſion; and expreſſed his deſire, that all thoſe who were friends to the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, might unanimouſly concur in ſome proper method for the greater ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt, of which, as the church of England was unqueſtionably the main ſupport and bulwark, ſo would ſhe reap the principal benefit of every advantage accruing from the union and mutual charity of all proteſtants. Addreſſes of thanks were preſented by both houſes; and then the commons proceeded to take into conſideration the eſtimates and accounts, in order to ſettle the eſtabliſhment of the army, navy, and ordnance: 10,000 men were voted for the ſea ſervice, and the ſum of 224,857l. was granted for defraying the expence of the navy. The ſupply for the army next came under deliberation, when a very warm debate enſued upon the number of troops that ought to be maintained. Sir William Windham, Mr. Shippen, and Mr. Walpole, were for reſtricting them to 12000 men only; but the courtiers affirmed that 16,000 were abſolutely neceſſary. Mr. Shippen, among many other vehement expreſſions, ſaid, "that the "ſecond paragraph of the king's ſpeech, ſeemed "rather to be calculated for the Meridian of Ger"many than Great Britain; and that it was a great "misfortune that the king was a ſtranger to our lan"guage and conſtitution." Theſe words gave offence to ſeveral members, who affirmed this was a ſcandalous invective againſt the king's perſon and government, and moved that he ſhould be ſent to the Tower. Mr. Shippen refuſing to retract, or excuſe what he had ſaid, was voted to the Tower by a great majority, and the number of land forces was fixed at 16,347 effective men; for the maintenance of whom the ſum of 650,000l. was allotted.

Complaint being at this time made of the ſcarcity of ſilver coin in the nation, occaſioned by the gold being rated too high; by the advice of Sir Iſaac Newton, and the approbation of the houſe of commons, the value of guineas was reduced from twenty-one ſhillings and ſix-pence, to twenty-one ſhillings, by which means the ſilver coin, which had been before exported in exchange for gold, was in ſome meaſure kept at home.

A. D. 1718. This year commenced with a circumſtance of a very peculiar nature. One James Shepherd, a youth of eighteen, apprentice to a coach-maker, by frequenting Jacobite ſeminaries, and reading their books, had worked himſelf up to ſuch a height of enthuſiaſm, that he ardently wiſhed for an opportunity of aſſaſſinating the king, and actually wrote a letter to Mr. Leake, a non-juring clergyman, propoſing a ſcheme for effecting this horrid deſign, which he termed, "ſmiting the uſurper in his palace." Leake, terrified at ſuch a letter, immediately communicated the contents of it to Sir John Fryer, an alderman of London, who adviſed him to ſecure the author, when he called for an anſwer: this was accordingly done, and he was committed to Newgate. On his trial he was ſo far from repenting of his execrable deſign, that he openly avowed it, and declared that he thought it would have been a meritorious deed: thus his own confeſſion convicted him, and he was executed at Tyburn on the 17th of March*.

On the 21ſt of March the king went to the houſe of peers, and, after given the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, prorogued the parliament.

A ſhort time after the prorogation of the parliament, the famous treaty, called the Quadruple Alliance, was concluded between the emperor, France, England and Holland, the purpoſe of which was, to induce Philip V. of Spain to join in the alliance, and to make peace with the emperor Charles VI. with whom he had been ſome time at variance. But Philip proving refractory, the king of England prepared to ſupport his mediation by force of arms.

Philip, taking advantage of the emperor's being engaged in a war with the Turks, equipped a ſtrong armament, and gave the command of it to the marquis of Leda; who, in purſuance of his orders, ſailed from Barcelona, and, landing at Cagliari, the capital of the iſland of Sardinia, which belonged to his imperial majeſty, reduced the whole iſland. He then proceeded to Palermo and Meſſina, and laid ſiege to the citadel of the latter.

In the mean time a fleet of twenty-one ſail of the line, commanded by Sir George Byng, arrived at Naples, where it was agreed that 2000 German infantry ſhould be ſent to Meſſina, for the relief of the citadel, under the protection of the Britiſh fleet. Accordingly, on the 6th of Auguſt they embarked, and three days after diſcovered the Spaniſh ſquadron, conſiſting of twenty-ſeven ſail, in the Faro of Meſſina. The Spaniards, on ſight of the Engliſh ſquadron, ſtood away, but kept themſelves in order of battle. Sir George followed them all that day and the ſucceding night. The next morning eight of the Spaniſh men of war, with all the gallies, fire-ſhips, bomb-veſſels and ſtore-ſhips, ſeparated from the main fleet, and ſtood in for the Sicilian ſhore; upon which Sir George Byng detached captain Walton, with ſix ſhips of the line, in purſuit of them. The admiral himſelf continued to chaſe the main fleet, and about ten o'clock the battle began. The Spaniards made but a poor defence, and were ſoon totally defeated, and all taken, except three ſhips of the line and three frigates, which eſcaped to Malta.

Sir George Byng laid by for ſome days to refit the rigging of his ſhips, and to repair the damages the prizes had ſuſtained; during which he received a letter from captain Walton, informing him that he had taken four Spaniſh men of war, one of ſixty guns, commanded by rear-admiral Mari, one of fifty-four, one of forty, and one of twenty-four guns, with a bomb veſſel, and a ſhip laden with arms. That he had burnt four others; one of fifty-four, two of forty and one of thirty guns, together with a fire-ſhip and a bomb-veſſel. Notwithſtanding this victory, the Spaniſh army proſecuted the ſiege of Meſſina with ſuch vigour, that the governor was, on the 29th of September, obliged to ſurrender the place by capitulation.

Philip was ſo enraged at the loſs of his fleet, that he immediately meditated revenge. On the 1ſt of September rear-admiral Guevara, with ſome ſhips under his command, entered the port of Cadiz, and made a ſeizure of all the Engliſh ſhips that were there. The ſame ſteps were taken in all the other ports of Spain, which was no ſooner known than repriſals were made on the part of the Engliſh.

The parliament met on the 11th of November, when his majeſty informed them of the treaties he had concluded, and added that the court of Spain had rejected all his amicable propoſals, had broke through their moſt ſolemn engagements for the ſecurity of the Britiſh commerce; and that his catholic majeſty had given orders to all the ports of Spain, and in the

* On the ſame day the marquis de Paleotti, an Italian, and brother to the dutcheſs of Shrewſbury, ſuffered the like fate, having been convicted and condemned for the murder of his own ſervant in a tranſport of paſſion. Great interceſſion was made for him by his ſiſter, had ſeveral foreign miniſters; but his character was ſo deteſtable, that all the favour he could obtain was, to be executed by himſelf.

Weſt Indies to fit out privateers againſt the Engliſh. He ſaid, that he was perſuaded a Britiſh parliament would enable him to reſent ſuch treatment. He then recommended to them to conſider of proper methods for preventing frauds and abuſes in the revenue.

As ſoon as the king left the houſe, lord Carteret moved for an addreſs of congratulation to his majeſty on the ſucceſs of his arms. This motion produced very warm debates: the defeat of the Spaniſh fleet was thought by many to be an action contrary to the rules of good faith, and conſequently diſhonourable to England; while others extolled it as one of the nobleſt exploits which had been performed ſince the revolution. The addreſs, therefore, was warmly oppoſed by ſeveral members in both houſes, but without effect; for being carried in the affirmative by a great majority, it was preſented to his majeſty. The parliament therein declared their entire ſatiſfaction of thoſe meaſures which the king had already taken for ſtrengthening the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and eſtabliſhing a laſting tranquillity in Europe; particularly in relation to the crown of Spain, and their reſolution to enable him, in concurrence with his allies, not only to reſent the injuries that crown had already done to our commerce, in breach of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two nations, but to ſupport him in the moſt effectual manner in ſuch farther meaſures as he ſhould judge neceſſary to complete the public tranquillity in Europe, and to check the growth of that naval power, which muſt otherwiſe prove dangerous to the trade of this kingdom.

A bill which was brought in this ſeſſion, for ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt in theſe kingdoms, and another for limiting the peerage, occaſioned very warm debates; the former, however, paſſed into a law, but the latter was poſtponed to a future period.

A rupture with Spain had for ſome time been conſidered as inevitable, and on the 17th of December, his majeſty put it paſt a doubt by ſending a meſſage to both houſes, informing them, that all his endeavours to procure redreſs for the injuries done to his ſubjects by the king of Spain proving ineffectual, he had found it neceſſary to declare war againſt that monarch. This meſſage being read, a motion was made for an addreſs to the king, aſſuring him that the commons would chearfully ſupport him in the proſecution of the war, till Spain ſhould be obliged to accept of reaſonable terms of peace, and agree to ſuch conditions of trade and commerce, as the Engliſh were entitled to expect.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the prince de Cellamare, ambaſſador from Philip V. to the court of Verſailles, acted the ſame part there as count Gyllenbourg had done at London, by caballing with the French mal-contents, who were numerous and powerful, againſt the duke of Orleans. A ſcheme was actually formed for ſeizing the perſon of the regent and that of the young king, and entirely changing the face of that government. Every thing was in readineſs for executing this plot, and the conſpirators only waited for their laſt orders, when intimation of it was given to our king, who immediately ſent advice of this tranſaction to the duke of Orleans, and ſuch meaſures were taken at the French court as ſoon brought the whole intrigue to light. The prince de Cellamare was put under arreſt, and cardinal Alberoni, the Spaniſh miniſter and firſt propoſer of this ſcheme, had the vexation to find that he had, without any advantage from his project, violently offended a power, whoſe reſentment could not but prove extremely prejudicial, not only to himſelf, but even to the whole Spaniſh monarchy. This, however, did not prevent his purſuing another ſcheme, which he had formed for placing the pretender on the throne of Great Britain. Conferences had been frequently held between him and the duke of Ormond, who at this time was in Spain, wherein it was agreed to give the chevalier an invitation to come to Madrid, to put himſelf at the head of a large body of auxiliary forces, which his catholic majeſty propoſed to lend him, in order to aſſert with ſucceſs his pretenſions to the Britiſh crown. Accordingly, the chevalier quitted the papal dominions, where he had taken refuge, and was received with great marks of friendſhip by Philip, who treated him as king of England. The earl of Stair, the Engliſh miniſter at the court of France, diſpatched the firſt intelligence of the deſigns of Spain. They propoſed ſending an armament of ten ſhips of war and tranſports, having on board 6,000 regular troops, with arms for 12,000 men, to be landed in the weſt of England, under the command of the duke of Ormond, with the title of captain general of his moſt catholic majeſty. He was provided with declarations in the name of that king, importing, that for many good reaſons he had ſent part of his troops, as auxiliaries to king James, to act for his intereſt in England and Scotland, and uſe their utmoſt endeavours for his reſtoration: and that the fear of ill ſucceſs might not deter any perſon from openly eſpouſing his intereſt, his moſt Catholic majeſty promiſed a ſafe retreat in his dominions to all ſuch as ſhould be obliged to leave their country on account of the ſhare they might take in this undertaking.

A. D. 1719. As ſoon as the Engliſh miniſtry received advice of this intended invaſion, the moſt effectual means were taken for rendering it abortive. A fleet was immediately ordered to be got ready: a proclamation was iſſued for apprehending James Butler, late duke of Ormond, with a promiſe of 5,000l. to the perſon who ſhould ſeize him; and an embargo was laid on all ſhipping.

On the 10th of March his majeſty went to the houſe, and acquainted the parliament that he had received certain intelligence of an intended invaſion from Spain, in favour of the pretender; whereupon both houſes agreed in an addreſs, promiſing to ſupport him againſt all his enemies; they deſired him to augment his forces both by ſea and land, aſſuring him they would make good the extraordinary expence.

In the mean time the orders which had been given for preparing a fleet were executed with ſuch diſpatch, that on the 5th of April, Sir John Norris ſailed from Spithead to the weſtward with nine men of war; and on the 29th lord Berkeley ſailed from St. Helen's with ſeven more ſhips to join him. The troops in the weſt of England, where it was ſuppoſed the Spaniards intended to land, were reinforced by ſeveral regiments. Neceſſary precautions were alſo taken to guard the other coaſts; four regiments were ſent for from Ireland, and five from Holland. At the ſame time the regent of France cauſed ſeveral regiments of horſe, foot and dragoons, to march towards the coaſts of Normandy and Picardy; and the governor of the Auſtrian Netherlands ordered German troops to file off towards Oſtend, to be in readineſs to ſail for Great Britain, purſuant to the treaties of guarantee of the proteſtant ſucceſſion.

The Spaniſh fleet, deſigned for the invaſion of England, ſailed from Cadiz on the 6th of March. It conſiſted of five ſhips of war and forty tranſports, having on board the duke of Ormond, and upwards of 5,000 men, a great quantity of ammunition, ſpare arms, and 1,000,000 of pieces of eight. On the eleventh they were overtaken by a violent ſtorm, which laſted forty-eight hours, and entirely diſperſed them. Their loſs could never be juſtly aſcertained; but ſeveral of their veſſels returned to Spain in a very ſhattered condition. A ſmall part of this embarkation, however, eſcaped; for the earls of Mareſchal and Seaforth, with the marquis of Tullibardine, and about 400 men, chiefly Spaniards, on board three frigates and five tranſports, landed in the ſhire of Roſs in Scotland, where they were joined by upwards of 1500 Scots. Here they remained for ſome time, giving out that their inſtructions were not to remove from thoſe parts till they heard of the duke of Ormond's landing in England, or ſhould receive further orders from him. They ſoon after took poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Donan, from whence they were driven by captain Boyle, commander of his majeſty's ſhip the Worceſter. On the 5th of June a body of forces, under the command of major-general Whitman, marched in purſuit of the rebels, and a few days after came up with them at the paſs of Glenſhiel, which they endeavoured reſolutely to defend, but on the near approach of the king's troops they deſerted it, and retired to another paſs called Strachel, where they were more advantageouſly poſted. The general took a view of their ſituation here, and being reſolved to attack them, diſpoſed his forces in a convenient manner for that purpoſe. The enemy had then about 300 Spaniards, 1,640 highlanders, beſides a ſecond body of highlanders, who were poſted on a hill, ſome diſtance off, with an intent to ſeize the baggage. His majeſty's forces did not much exceed 2,000 men. On the 10th they came to an engagement, but the rebels, after they had diſcharged their muſkets, ran away with great precipitation, and could not be brought to a regular battle. The general, however, drove them from rock to rock, and in that manner purſued them for three hours, when they got to the ſummit of the hill, after which they were ſoon diſperſed. The king's troops lay on their arms all the following night, and marched the next morning to Glenſhiel, where the remaining Spaniards, to the number of 274, ſurrendered priſoners at diſcretion, and were afterwards conveyed to Edinburgh caſtle. Seaforth, Mareſchal and Tullibardine, made their eſcape to the Lewis or Orkney Iſlands, leaving their followers to provide for themſelves.

During theſe tranſactions the king of Sweden ſat down with his army before Frederickſhal, where he was killed by a ſmall ſhot, as he was giving directions in the intrenchments for an attack againſt his enemies This ſudden and unexpected incident gave a turn to the affairs of Europe. Charles was ſucceeded by his youngeſt ſiſter Ulrica Eleonora, who, on her acceſſion, gave ſufficient reaſons to believe, that ſhe deſigned to live peaceably with her neighbours.

In the mean time the duke of Orleans declared war againſt Philip V. and the command of the army appointed to invade the territories of that monarch was given to the duke of Berwick. In the month of April the marquis de Cilly advanced to Port Paſſage, where he found ſix men of war juſt finiſhed upon the ſtocks; theſe he burnt, together with timber, maſts and naval ſtores, to the value of half a million ſterling, and ſoon after the duke of Berwick laid ſiege to Fontarabia.

On the 18th of April the king went to the houſe, and in his ſpeech thanked the lords and commons for the zeal and affection they had ſhewn to his perſon and government during the late projected invaſion; after which he prorogued the parliament.

His majeſty having appointed lord-juſtices to govern in his abſence, ſet out, on the 11th of May, for his German dominions, where being arrived he concluded a peace with Sweden; for the queen and her council, having conſented to make the ceſſion of Bremen and Verden to the elector of Hanover, all the difficulties which had hitherto retarded a pacification were removed. During his ſtay abroad, the king offered his mediation to bring about a peace between Sweden, the Danes, the Ruſſians and the Poles. The Czar, however, rejected his proffered ſervice, being reſolved to proſecute his ſchemes of conqueſt. He ſent his fleet to the Scheuron, or Batſes, of Sweden, where his troops landed to the number of 15,000 men, and committed the moſt ſhocking cruelties.

In order to protect the Swedes from theſe deſtroyers, Sir John Norris was ordered into the Baltic with a large ſquadron, which in the beginning of September joined the Swediſh fleet. This junction of the Engliſh and Swedes defeated all the deſigns of Peter, who fearing his fleet ſhould experience the ſame fate with that of Spain, in the ſtreights of Meſſina, thought proper to recall his ſhips, and, the winter coming on, Sir John Norris returned to England.

A ſcheme had been concerted by the miniſtry for making a conqueſt of Corunna and of Peru in South America; in conſequence of which, 4,000 men, under the command of lord Cobham, were embarked at the Iſle of Wight, and on the 21ſt of September ſailed, under the convoy of five ſhips of war, commanded by captain Mighels, who was to be joined by captain Johnſon, then cruiſing off Fontarabia. When the ſquadron arrived on the coaſt of Galicia, it kept cruizing three days in the ſtation appointed for Johnſon to join them; but he not appearing, and the danger of lying on the coaſt at this ſeaſon of the year with tranſports rendering it neceſſary to take ſome meaſures for acting without him, the wind juſt at this time offering fair for Vigo, lord Cobham reſolved to attempt the reduction of that place. This ſcheme was executed with very little difficulty; for on the fifth day after the ſiege began, the citadel capitulated on honourable terms. There were in the town about ſixty pieces of iron cannon; and in the citadel were forty-three pieces of cannon, of which fifteen were braſs, and two large mortars, beſides above 2,000 barrels of powder, and ſeveral cheſts of arms; ſeven ſhips were ſeized in the harbour, three of which were fitting up for privateers. Lord Cobham now ordered general Wade to embark with 1,000 men on board four tranſports, and to ſail to the upper end of the bay of Vigo; which he accordingly did, and having landed his men, marched to Ponta Vedra, which place ſurrendred without oppoſition; and on the 23d of October the general returned to Vigo. Lord Cobham finding it would be impoſſible to maintain his ground any longer in Spain, ordered the forces, cannon, &c. to be embarked, and on the 27th he ſailed for England, where he arrived about the middle of November.

In the mean time the French had made themſelves maſters of Fontarabia and Roſes, which being two of the principal keys to the kingdom of Spain, they threatened to carry their victorious arms even to its capital. In this dilemma, Philip, as the only expedient left him, had recourſe to peace, and for this purpoſe ſent orders to the duke de Boretti Landi, his miniſter at the Hague, to accede to the quadruple alliance. To compleat his humiliation, he was obliged to diſmiſs cardinal Alberoni from his ſervice, and even baniſh him the kingdom; the king of England and the regent of France, to whom that miniſter had rendered himſelf perſonally diſagreeable, refuſing to hearken to any propoſals while he continued in office.

On the 14th of November [*] the king returned to England, and on the 23d opened the ſeſſion of parliament

[*] On the 9th of this month one John Matthews, a printer in Little Britain, was executed at Tyburn, for printing and publiſhing a treaſonable libel, intituled, "Vox Populi Vox Dei, in which the Pretender's right to the crown of theſe realms was aſſerted, in breach of the ſtatute of the 4th of Queen Anne, which makes the aſſerting any ſuch thing in writing or printing high-treaſon.

liament with a ſpeech; in which he told them, that all Europe, as well as Great Britain, was on the point of being delivered from the calamities of war, by the influence of Britiſh arms and councils; that by their aſſiſtance he had hitherto ſurmounted all difficulties, and by the continuance of their help he doubted not of ſurmounting whatever might ariſe in future. Both houſes preſented addreſſes of thanks, which were filled with the warmeſt expreſſions of loyalty and affection.

A. D. 1720. We are now come to a period which will always be remarkable in Engliſh hiſtory for the deſtructive South-ſea ſcheme, when the inſatiable hand of avarice threw the whole kingdom into confuſion. At the opening of the ſeſſion of parliament, his majeſty had earneſtly recommended the conſideration of proper means for reducing the national debt, which amounted to more than fourteen millions. A ſcheme was accordingly formed for reducing all the public funds into one, in order to diſcharge the whole. This plan was laid by Sir John Blount, one of the directors of the South-ſea company, a perſon poſſeſſed of all the art, plauſibility and boldneſs neceſſary for ſuch an undertaking. This ſcheme he communicated to Mr. Aiſlebie, chancellor of the exchequer, and alſo to one of the ſecretaries of ſtate. It was conſidered by the miniſtry; and appearing to be very advantageous to the public, it was adopted.

It now remained to carry the plan into execution; and the South-ſea company laid a propoſal before the houſe of commons, offering to give 3,500,000l. for the privilege of taking in all the irredeemable debts, amounting to near 800,000l. per annum; and alſo the redeemable debts then at the bank and exchequer, moſtly bearing 5 per cent. intereſt, either by purchaſe from the proprietors, or by ſubſcriptions into their capital ſtock. This method of increaſing their capital was looked upon as a very valuable acquiſition, and excited the jealouſy of the bank of England, and, accordingly, the directors of that opulent body laid their propoſal before the commons. They offered to give above five millions for the ſame privilege. This rivalſhip proved the deſtruction of the whole. The South-ſea company made a ſecond propoſal: they offered no leſs than 7,500,000l. in caſe theſe debts ſhould be ſubſcribed, and in proportion for any part of them. They alſo propoſed to pay to the uſe of the public one year's purchaſe of all the irredeemable long annuities that ſhould be brought into their capital. The bank now made a ſecond propoſal, more advantageous, in ſeveral reſpects, to the public, than that of the South-ſea company. They obliged themſelves to give 1700l. bank ſtock for every 100l. irredeemable long annuities. But this offer was far from intimidating the South-ſea company. Determined, at any rate, to obtain the liberty of taking in the public debts, they offered to incorporate all the funds of the bank, Eaſt-India company, and exchequer into their own capital. It was not, indeed, thought proper to adopt this propoſal; but the very rumour of ſuch a ſcheme raiſed their ſtock to 120 per cent. They now offered 00,000l. more than the bank, and alſo four years and a half purchaſe upon all annuities they ſhould take into their capital; which, if all the annuities were taken in, the whole would amount to 3,567,503l. ſo that their whole offer was 7,567,500l. Beſides this, they not only offered to circulate one million of exchequer bills gratis, but to pay 3 per cent. for that million, and one year's purchaſe of ſuch annuities as ſhould be ſubſcribed into the company's capital in fourteen months.

This propoſal was adopted, and a bill was ordered to be brought into the houſe of commons for that purpoſe. While the bill was under conſideration, the company's ſtock roſe to near 400l. per cent. The bill paſſed both houſes, but not without great oppoſition in the houſe of lords, and ſoon after received the royal aſſent.

On the 11th of June the king put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he ſignified his intention of viſiting his German dominions; and for which he ſet out a few days after the prorogation of the parliament. Before his departure he was reconciled to the prince of Wales; which deſirable event was chiefly brought about by the mediation of the duke of Devonſhire and Mr. Robert Walpole.

At the time of the king's departure every thing ſeemed to promiſe domeſtic tranquillity: but the reſtleſs paſſion of avarice ſoon obliterated theſe pleaſing appearances, and threw the nation into the utmoſt diſtreſs. The South-ſea company finding their ſtock begin to ſink in its value, cauſed a notion to be propagated that Gibraltar and Port-Mahon would be given up to the Spaniards, in exchange for a large diſtrict in Peru, where the Engliſh trade to the South-ſea would be protected and enlarged. This rumour, diffuſed with great induſtry, inſpired the people with ſuch extravagant hopes, that two millions of original ſtock were ſubſcribed in leſs than five days after the cloſe of the ſeſſion of parliament. The ſtock of the company roſe to above 1000l. per cent. The Miſſiſippi ſcheme in France, which had juſt turned that kingdom upſide down, was better founded. But the paſſion for riches, like other paſſions, is ſometimes too blind to be directed by experience, and too deaf to liſten to the voice of reaſon. The deſire of acquiring large fortunes drew into the ſnare a multitude of unhappy people, who became the dupes of intereſted artifice. The rage of ſtock-jobbing filled every head, and ſwallowed up every other idea. Whigs, tories, jacobites, the nobility, the clergy, phyſicians, lawyers, merchants, and the very women themſelves, were all animated with the ſame ſpirit: all converted their money into paper; and all believed they ſhould grow rich by parting with their riches. But this charm was of no long duration. It was ſoon found, that the South-ſea commerce, the ruinous foundation of theſe enormous proceedings, was far from being ſufficient to anſwer the views of avarice. Stocks, therefore, fell prodigiouſly; and ſeveral projects, ſet on foot by the fraudulent induſtry of covetouſneſs, were totally rejected. No money appeared; payment of the dividends was ſtopped, and public credit vaniſhed. Families, without number, were reduced to beggary; and the intoxication of frivolous and ſenſeleſs hope was ſucceeded by the cries of deſpair.

Recourſe was now had to the bank for ſupporting the South-ſea company. That corporation entered into an agreement to take a quantity of the South-ſea ſtock at 400 per cent. in payment for 3,775,000l. redeemable debt, which the company was to repay at Lady-day and Michaelmas of the enſuing year. This was afterwards called the Bank-contract, the very rumour of which cauſed the South-ſea ſtock to riſe prodigiouſly. But this riſe did not continue long. It ſoon appeared that this ſuppoſed contract had no real foundation, being nothing more than a temporary expedient to quiet the clamours of the people.

The directors of the bank, finding their property to be in danger of being ſwept away by that portentous tide of ruin, which bore down every thing before it, renounced their agreement; and the South-ſea company, deprived of this ſupport, ſunk under its own weight.

In the mean time repeated expreſſes were diſpatched to Hanover, repreſenting the ſtate of affairs to his majeſty, and earneſtly beſeeching him to haſten his return. He, accordingly, ſhortened his ſtay in Germany, and in the month of November arrived in England.

The parliament met on the 8th of December, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"Since we laſt parted, the face of our affairs abroad is become more favourable. The peace in the ſouth wants only the form of a congreſs; and that of the north is brought much nearer to a concluſion. I ſhall, at a proper time, order the ſeveral treaties I have made to be laid before you; by which you will perceive the ſucceſs of our endeavours to eſtabliſh peace throughout Europe, and to ſecure and ſupport the proteſtant religion. At the ſame time, I can never ſufficiently expreſs my concern for the unhappy turn of affairs, which has ſo much affected the public credit at home.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I do moſt earneſtly recommend it to you, that you conſider of the moſt effectual and ſpeedy methods to reſtore the national credit, and fix it upon a laſting foundation. You will, I doubt not, be aſſiſted in ſo commendable and neceſſary a work, by every man that loves his country, and eſpecially by the ſeveral great ſocieties of this kingdom. I hope you will, on this occaſion, remember, that all your prudence, your temper and reſolution, are neceſſary to find out and apply the proper remedies to our misfortunes; which will, if you ſucceed, ſerve to increaſe that reputation you have ſo juſtly acquired; particularly, if you ſhall be able, notwithſtanding theſe difficulties, to diſcharge a part of the national debt. I have ordered the ſeveral eſtimates to be laid before you of the expence of the enſuing year, and deſire you to diſpatch the ſupplies neceſſary for them.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am glad to obſerve to you, that our trade appears to have been more extended this year than in the preceding. We have the moſt flouriſhing navy of any nation whatſoever to protect us; and I hope you will turn your thoughts to the beſt methods for the ſecuring and enlarging of our commerce. You may depend upon my hearty concurrence to all ſuch proviſions as ſhall appear to you neceſſary for the good of my people."

After the uſual addreſſes, Grey Neville, eſq; moved, that the directors of the South-ſea company ſhould lay before the commons an account of their proceedings; and, in conſequence of this motion, ſeveral orders were made by the houſe. Sir Joſeph Jekyll moved that a ſelect committee ſhould be appointed to examine the particulars of theſe tranſactions. A bill was brought in, and received the royal aſſent, for reſtraining the ſub-governor, deputy-governor, directors, treaſurer, under treaſurer, caſhier, ſecretary, and accomptants, from quitting the kingdom for the ſpace of one year; and for diſcovering their eſtates and effects, ſo as to prevent them from being tranſported or alienated: a committee of ſecrecy was likewiſe choſen by ballott, to examine all books, papers, and proceedings, relating to the South-ſea act. Soon after all the principal officers of the South-ſea company were examined at the bar of the houſe, when all of them were declared criminal, and ſeverely reprimanded for their illegal conduct. A bill was brought in to diſable them from enjoying any office in that company, in the Eaſt India company, or in the bank of England. Mr. Knight, the treaſurer, who had been intruſted with the ſecrets of the whole affair, thought it moſt prudent to leave the kingdom: upon which a proclamation was iſſued, promiſing a reward of 2000l. for apprehending him.

A. D. 1721. Several perſons concerned in theſe iniquitous proceedings were now taken into cuſtody. Knight was ſeized at Tirlemont, and confined in the citadel of Antwerp, the ſtates of which place refuſed to deliver him up, and while expreſſes paſſed to and fro, he found means once more to make his eſcape. A ſufficient diſcovery was, however, made to convince the world, that a ſcene of the deepeſt villiany had been tranſacted. In ſome of the books, falſe and fictitious entries had been made, in others, entries with blanks; in ſome, entries with razures and alterations, and in others leaves had been torn out. It alſo appeared that, before any ſubſcription could be made, a fictitious ſtock of 574,000l. had been diſpoſed of by the directors, to facilitate the paſſing the bill. The commons now came to ſeveral ſevere though juſt reſolutions, againſt the directors and officers of the South-ſea company; and a bill was prepared for the relief of the unhappy ſufferers out of the eſtates of the delinquents. The ſum of two millions fourteen thouſand pounds was, accordingly, confiſcated out of their joint eſtates, towards making good the damage ſuſtained by the company, after a certain allowance had been deducted from each, according to their conduct and circumſtances. This was done by an act of parliament, which received the royal aſſent on the 29th of July, and ſoon after his majeſty paſſed the bill for reſtoring public credit. Thus, by the timely and vigorous reſolutions of the parliament, the South-ſea company was ſoon in a condition to fulfil their engagements with the public, and the calamities of the people, which had been carried to the moſt outrageous height, were in a great meaſure appeaſed, and tranquillity reſtored to the nation.

During the debates, which this affair occaſioned in the houſe of lords, the duke of Wharton made ſuch ſevere reflections on the miniſtry, that the earl of Stanhope, conſidering himſelf perſonally levelled at, replied with ſuch vehemency as produced a violent head-ach, which obliged him to quit the houſe. The ſame night he was bled and cupped, and the next morning ſeemed much better; but in the evening he fell into a drowſineſs, which was ſucceeded by a ſuffocation, and he inſtantly expired. Mr. James Craggs, the other ſecretary, was, in a day or two after this accident, ſeized with the ſmall pox, of which he died on the 16th of February. Lord viſcount Townſhend was appointed to ſucceed earl Stanhope, and the lord Carteret, Mr. Craggs. Mr. Robert Walpole, who had endeared himſelf greatly to his ſovereign, by his diſtinguiſhed aſſiduity in trying to reſtore the credit of the nation, was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, and firſt lord of the treaſury.

On the 10th of Auguſt his majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he declared, that he entertained a moſt ſincere concern for the ſufferings of the innocent, and a juſt indignation againſt the guilty, in the affair of the South-ſea ſcheme: that he had already given his aſſent to ſuch bills as they preſented to him for puniſhing the authors of the late misfortunes, and for obtaining reſtitution and ſatisfaction to thoſe who had been injured by them in ſuch a notorious manner: that they could not fail to have obſerved the diſcontents occaſioned by this unhappy event, which had been induſtriouſly fomented and inflamed by wicked and ſeditious libels; but he doubted not but by their prudent conduct in their ſeveral counties, all the enemies of his goverment, who flattered themſelves with being able to blow up the preſent complaints into popular diſaffection, would be finally diſappointed in their deſigns and expectations.

Previous to the prorogation of the parliament a treaty of peace between Great Britain and Spain was ſigned at Madrid. At the ſame time a defenſive alliance was concluded between Great Britain, France and Spain. Peace was alſo reſtored to the north, by a treaty concluded between Ruſſia and Sweden; and a treaty was likewiſe agreed to between England and the Moors of Africa.

On the 19th of October the parliament again aſſembled, when the king acquainted them, that peace was thoroughly reſtored to the north, by the concluſion of the treaty between the Czar and the king of Sweden, and that a great number of Britiſh ſubjects were delivered from ſlavery, by the treaty lately concluded with the Moors; deſired them to improve this favourable opportunity, by extending the commerce of the nation, particularly with regard to naval ſtores: took notice of the unſpeakable miſery and deſolation occaſioned by the raging of the plague in ſeveral parts of Europe, and recommended to them the taking effectual methods for ſuppreſſing the abominable practice of running of goods, by which the contagion might be brought into the nation.

A. D. 1722. The parliament continued ſitting till the 7th of March, when the ſupplies being granted, and the buſineſs of the ſeſſion diſpatched, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills; after which he diſſolved the parliament, and ordered a new one to be choſen.

Soon after the diſſolution of the parliament, the great duke of Marlborough paid the debt of nature. His faculties had been for ſome time greatly impaired; he was no longer capable of ſhining either in the ſenate or the field. He was ſucceeded as maſter of the ordnance and colonel of the firſt regiment of foot guards, by the earl of Cadogan.

The new parliament met on the 9th of October, when Spencer Compton, eſq. was re-choſen ſpeaker. The ſeſſion was opened with a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty informed them of new deſigns againſt his government; and that the conſpirators had made, by their emiſſaries, the ſtrongeſt ſolicitations to foreign powers for aſſiſtance, but were diſappointed in their expectations; notwithſtanding which, confiding in their numbers, and not diſcouraged by their former ill ſucceſs, they reſolved once more upon their own ſtrength, to attempt the ſubverſion of the government; and that ſome of the conſpirators had been taken up and ſecured, and endeavours had been uſed for apprehending the others. Upon this it was moved, that the habeas corpus act ſhould be ſuſpended for a time, which, after ſome ſtruggle, was carried in the affirmative. The earl of Orrery, the lord North and Grey, and ſeveral other noblemen, were committed to the Tower for high-treaſon, and the duke of Norfolk, who had been ſeized by his majeſty's order, was, with the conſent of the houſe of peers, ſent to the ſame place.

On the 21ſt of November Chriſtopher Layer, eſq. was tried at the King's-bench, Weſtminſter, on account of the ſaid conſpiracy. His indictment ſet forth, "That he had been employed in forming a " moſt traiterous, horrid plot, and conſpiracy " againſt his majeſty and his government, by inliſting men for the pretender's ſervice, in order to ſtir " up a rebellion, and alſo that he had held a correſpondence with the pretender, by carrying letters " and treaſonable papers to him beyond the ſeas, " and from him to the diſaffected in this kingdom." After a trial of ſeventeen hours, he was brought in guilty by the jury, and received ſentence of death. He was reprieved from time to time, in hopes of his making diſcoveries, but he either could not or would not ſatisfy theſe expectations; and was at length drawn on a ſledge to Tyburn, and there hanged and quartered, his head being afterwards fixed upon Temple-bar.

A. D. 1723. But the principal perſon that felt the hand of power, on this occaſion, was the famous Francis Atterbury, biſhop of Rocheſter, a prelate of obſcure birth, but diſtinguiſhed merit, a friend to letters, and equally remarkable for his underſtanding and virtues. He was odious to the court becauſe he had not followed its principles; and odious to the whigs, becauſe he had not followed their ſentiments. Being impriſoned, he denied the juriſdiction of the houſe of commons, and declared he would produce his defence before the peers. The proofs againſt him were reduced to two letters, intercepted at the poſt-office, written in a very peculiar cypher, and, to all appearance, fabricated by his enemies. The commons paſſed a bill, whereby he was to be deprived of his office and benefice, baniſhed the kingdom, and be guilty of felony if he returned; and that it ſhould not be in the king's power to pardon him, without the conſent of parliament; but, nevertheleſs, he ſhould not forfeit his goods and chattels.

When this bill came before the lords, it met with a very ſtrong oppoſition. The duke of Wharton, earl Cowper, and the lords Bathurſt and Gower, ſpoke againſt it with great energy; they diſplayed the danger and injuſtice in departing, in ſo extraordinary a manner, from the fixed rules of evidence; that ſuch a practice muſt for ever ſully the luſtre and glory of that illuſtrious houſe: that the admitting the precarious and uncertain evidence of the clerks of the poſt-office was a very dangerous precedent, eſpecially as, in this caſe, it was taken for granted, that thoſe clerks might carry the ſimilitude of hands four months in their minds. They deſired to know from whom theſe clerks had received authority to intercept and open letters, eſpecially thoſe of a lord of parliament; and whether the clerks who copied theſe letters had themſelves intercepted the originals? or whether they had received them from any other perſon? "If ſuch proceedings as theſe (ſaid lord Bathurſt) are encouraged, we have no other part to take, but to retire into the country, and ſeek tranquillity and ſecurity, if we may find them, by our fire ſides. The leaſt correſpondence, the leaſt letter intercepted, may render us criminal." He inſiſted on the example of cardinal Mazarine, who ſaid, "That with two lines of a man's hand-writing, added to a ſmall number of circumſtances, proved by evidence, he ſhould be maſter of his life." Then turning himſelf towards the biſhops, who ſhewed very little favour to their brother, he expreſſed his indignation againſt the inveterate hatred of ſome perſons towards the biſhop of Rocheſter; "a hatred (added he) abſolutely inconceivable, unleſs they hold the ridiculous opinion of ſome ſavages, who believe they inherit not only the ſpoils, but the talents of an illuſtrious enemy, when they have ſlain him in battle." But notwithſtanding theſe and other powerful reaſons urged againſt the bill, it paſſed by a ſmall majority, and afterwards received the royal aſſent. Atterbury retired into France, where he met with repoſe, eſteem, and all the indulgencies that poliſhed ſociety can ſhew to men of ſuperior parts.

On the 27th of May the king cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he thanked the parliament for the repeated inſtances they had given of their zeal and affection for his perſon and government, and of their inviolable attachment to the intereſt and welfare of their country.

Lords-juſtices were now appointed to govern in his majeſty's abſence, he having reſolved to viſit his German dominions as ſoon as the parliament broke up.

Before

fore his departure he was pleaſed to raiſe the ſon of Mr. Robert Walpole to a peerage; an honour which the father had refuſed. Thomas Howard duke of Norfolk, William North, lord North and Grey, Dennis Kelly, and Thomas Cockran, eſqs; priſoners in the Tower; and David du Boyce priſoner in Newgate, were admitted to bail; and the royal pardon was granted to lord Bolingbroke, who owed this indulgence to the earneſt ſolicitation of lord Harcourt, though it was vehemently oppoſed at the council-board, by Mr. Walpole. On the third of June his majeſty embarked for Holland, and on the 11th of the ſame month arrived at Herenhauſen, being attended by both ſecretaries of ſtate.

Affairs now ſeemed to take a new turn on the continent. A congreſs had been held at Cambray, and another at Brunſwick, in order to ſettle the intereſts of the ſeveral princes of Europe, but affairs had been drawn out to ſuch a tedious length, that theſe princes entered into ſeparate negotiations to attain their ſeveral purpoſes. The Czar and the court of Sweden were on the point of concluding a treaty that ſeemed to threaten the loſs of Bremen and Verden, lately annexed to the electorate of Hanover. The regent of France and the king of Spain had adjuſted all their differences, and the reconciliation was cemented by a double marriage: Mademoiſelle de Montpelier, ſecond daughter to the duke of Orleans, being betrothed to the prince of Auſtrias, and another daughter to Don Carlos, eldeſt ſon of Philip V. Theſe two princes offered new treaties to England, more advantageous than thoſe already ſubſiſting, but at the ſame time peremptorily demanded the reſtitution of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon, and likewiſe deſired, that his Britannic majeſty would openly declare againſt the Oſtend company, which had been eſtabliſhed by the emperor Charles VI. King George was greatly at a loſs how to proceed amidſt ſuch jarring intereſts. He was fearful that if he diſguſted the emperor, he might join the Czar and the court of Sweden, and promote the deſigns they had formed in favour of the duke of Holſtein's pretenſions to Sleſwick, which our king had guaranteed to his Daniſh majeſty. All Italy at this time exclaimed againſt the proceedings of the congreſs of Cambray, and memorials were ſent from the pope, the king of Sardinia, the dukes of Tuſcany, Parma and Modena, whoſe claims upon the houſe of Auſtria were now ſupported by France. Thus circumſtanced, the king acquitted himſelf in a manner which ſurprized all Europe. By his prudent negotiations he prevented the diſagreeing powers from breaking into an open rupture; and though he could not ſo far prevail on the emperor as to make him relax in his diſputes with Spain, or give up the Oſtend company, yet he brought him to promiſe faithfully a ſtrict obſervance of the treaties he had concluded.

While his majeſty continued abroad, the duke of Orleans, regent of France, paid the debt of nature; which gave the king great concern, as a mutual eſteem had long prevailed between them. His majeſty being apprehenſive that this event might occaſion an alteration in the ſentiments of the French court, prejudicial to his intereſt, determined to return as ſoon as poſſible to England, but being detained ſome time at Helvoetſluys by contrary winds, he had, during his ſtay there, the ſatisfaction of receiving the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from France, of the great diſpoſition of that court to cultivate, and even improve, the union eſtabliſhed by the late duke of Orleans between the two crowns. The wind now being favourable, his majeſty ſailed for England, where he arrived on the 19th of December.

A. D. 1724. The parliament met on the 9th of January, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he congratulated them upon the ſucceſs of their endeavours laſt year for the ſafety, intereſt, and honour of the kingdom, and told them that the riſe of the public credit, the flouriſhing condition of our trade and manufactures, and the great tranquillity of the people, were the happy conſequences of their prudent reſolutions; and it was to be hoped, that the few examples which were made of ſome notorious offenders, would be ſufficient to deter the moſt diſaffected from engaging in the like deſperate and wicked practices; deſired them to make uſe of the opportunity their own conduct had put into their hands, of conſidering of ſuch further laws as might be wanting for the eaſe and encouragement of trade and navigation, for the employment of the poor, and for exciting and encouraging a ſpirit of induſtry in the nation. He concluded with exhorting them to join heartily in every thing that might tend to promote the mutual happineſs of the kingdom, and to extinguiſh the hopes of thoſe who had been long reſtleſs in their endeavours to ſubject this nation to the train of miſeries inſeparable from popery and arbitrary power.

The principal, and, indeed, almoſt the only debate, during this ſeſſion of parliament, was in the houſe of lords, on the affairs of the army. During the laſt year an addition of 4000 men had been made to the land forces, on account of the conſpiracy; and it was now propoſed to continue the ſame number. The commons had agreed to it, and paſſed the bill; but the continuance of theſe additional troops met with great oppoſition in the houſe of lords. The earl of Orrery, and the lords Trevor, North, Grey, and Bathurſt, ſpoke with great force againſt it. They were anſwered by lord Townſhend and the duke of Argyle. The latter obſerved, "That if he ſaw the nation unanimous in opinion, that our religion, laws, liberties and properties, entirely depend upon the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, and on the proteſtant ſucceſſion in his majeſty's royal family, he would readily give his vote for reducing the army; but he was very much afraid that ſome people ſo ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on diſbanding the additional troops, with no other deſign than that of weakening the government, and thereby have an opportunity of involving their country in new troubles. And therefore thoſe noble lords who ſpoke for the reduction of the army, would do well, when they went down into their ſeveral counties, to aſſure the people, with whom, no doubt, their reaſons would not fail of having great weight, that their liberties and properties were entirely ſafe under his majeſty's government." After a long debate, the motion for diſbanding the additional troops was rejected, and the bill paſſed as ſent up from the commons.

The parliament having provided the annual ſupplies, and diſcharged ſuch buſineſs as lay before them, his majeſty, on the 22d of April, went to the houſe of peers, and, after ſigning ſeveral uſeful acts, cloſed the ſeſſion.

On the 16th of May the king ſent the following circular letter to the univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge: "We being greatly deſirous to favour and encourage theſe ancient and laudable nurſeries of piety and learning, and to enable them more effectually to anſwer the end of their inſtitution, by ſending forth conſtant ſupplies of learned and able men to ſerve the public, both in church and ſtate; and having obſerved that no encouragement or proviſion has hitherto been made in either of the univerſities for the ſtudy of modern hiſtory, or modern languages, the knowledge of which is highly neceſſary towards gratifying the youth committed to their care, for ſeveral ſtations, both in church and ſtate, to which they may be called: and having ſeriouſly weighed the prejudice that has occurred to the univerſities from this defect, perſons of foreign nations being often employed in the education and tuition of youth, both at home and in their travels, and great numbers of the young nobility and gentry being either ſent directly abroad from ſchools, or taken away from the univerſities before the courſe of their ſtudies can be there completed, and opportunities frequently loſt to the crown of employing and encouraging members of the two univerſities, by conferring on them ſuch employments, both at home and abroad, as neceſſarily require a competent ſkill in writing and ſpeaking the modern languages; in order, therefore, to remedy theſe and the like inconveniences, we have determined to appoint two perſons of ſober converſation, and prudent conduct, of the degree of maſter of arts, or bachelor of laws, or of ſome higher degree, in one of the univerſities, ſkilled in modern hiſtory, and in the knowledge of modern languages, to be nominated by us to be our profeſſor of modern hiſtory, one for the univerſity of Cambridge, and the other for that of Oxford, who ſhall be obliged to read lectures in the public ſchools, at ſuch times as ſhall hereafter be appointed. And we have farther determined, that each of the profeſſors ſhall have a ſtipend of 400l. per annum, and out of the ſtipend ſhall be obliged to maintain with ſufficient ſalaries, in the univerſity where he ſhall be eſtabliſhed, two perſons at leaſt, well qualified to teach and inſtruct in writing and ſpeaking the languages, which teachers ſhall be under the direction of the profeſſors reſpectively, and ſhall be obliged to learn at leaſt two of the languages, both the profeſſors and teachers taking eſpecial care that the times and hours, for teaching and inſtructing the ſcholars, be ſo ordered as not to interfere with thoſe appointed for their academical ſtudies; which profeſſors and teachers ſhall be obliged once every year to give in an atteſted account of the progreſs made by each ſcholar committed to their care, to our principal ſecretaries of ſtate, to be laid before us, that we may encourage the diligence and application of ſuch among them as ſhall have qualified themſelves for our ſervice, by giving them ſuitable employments, either at home or abroad, as occaſion ſhall offer."

About this time Philip V. of Spain thought fit to abdicate his crown, and retire with his queen into the monaſtery of St. Ildefonſo. In a bigotted letter, which he ſent to his ſon Don Lewis, prince of Auſtrias, he ſays, " preſerve ever a great devotion for the moſt holy virgin, and put yourſelf, as well as your kingdom, under her protection, ſeeing you cannot, by any other means, better obtain what may be needful for you and for them." This curious letter was accompanied by a ſolemn renunciation of the crown, which was publiſhed throughout the whole Spaniſh monarchy; and the council reſolved, that Lewis, as acknowledged prince of Spain, might aſſume the reins of government, without aſſembling the cortes or eſtates of the kingdom.

The parliament met on the 11th of November, and the next day his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

" My lords and gentlemen,

" I am perſuaded you ſhare with me in the ſatisfaction I feel at the proſperous ſituation of affairs: peace with all powers abroad; and at home perfect tranquillity, plenty, and an uninterrupted enjoyment of all civil and religious rights, are moſt diſtinguiſhing marks of the favour and protection of the divine providence: and theſe, with all their happy conſequences, will, I doubt not, by the bleſſing of God upon our joint endeavours, be long continued to my people.

" The ſame proviſion by ſea and land, for the defence and ſafety of the nation, will continue to make us reſpected abroad, and, conſequently, ſecure at home. The ſame attention to the improvement of the public revenues, and to the eaſe and encouragement of trade and navigation, will eſtabliſh credit upon the ſtrongeſt baſis, and raiſe ſuch a ſpirit of induſtry, as will not only enable us gradually to diſcharge the national debt, but will likewiſe greatly increaſe the wealth, power, and influence of this kingdom.

" Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

" I have ordered the proper officers to prepare and lay before you the eſtimates of the expences of the enſuing year; and as they do not exceed what has been found, by experience, to be abſolutely neceſſary for the ſecurity of the kingdom, I make no queſtion but I ſhall have your ready concurrence in raiſing the ſupplies in ſuch a manner as ſhall be moſt eaſy to my people.

" There is one thing which I muſt mention to you as deſerving your particular conſideration. It is too manifeſt, that the funds eſtabliſhed for finiſhing the works at Greenwich hoſpital, and providing for a competent number of ſeamen there, cannot, in time of peace, be ſufficient to anſwer the expences of this great and neceſſary work. It is therefore very much to be wiſhed, that ſome method could be found out to make a farther proviſion for a comfortable ſupport to our ſeamen, worn out in the ſervice of their country, and labouring under old age and infirmities.

" My lords and gentlemen,

" You muſt all be ſenſible how much our preſent happineſs is owing to your union and ſteady conduct. It is, therefore, wholly unneceſſary to recommend to you unanimity and diſpatch in all your deliberations. The zeal and abilities you have on all occaſions ſhewn in ſupporting the intereſt of your country, even under the greateſt difficulties, leave me no room to doubt of my having your entire and effectual concurrence in every thing that may tend to the ſervice of the public, and to the good of my people."

The affairs of chief moment tranſacted this ſeſſion (excluſive of the uſual ſupplies) were, the regulating future elections in the city of London; an act to enable Henry St. John, late viſcount Bolingbroke, to enjoy his eſtates; and the trial of Thomas, earl of Macclesfield, againſt whom articles of impeachment for high crimes and miſdemeanors were lodged by the commons in the houſe of peers: the tenor whereof was, that he, during the time of his being lord high chancellor of Great Britain, received ſeveral exorbitant ſums of money, therein particularly ſpecified, of certain perſons, as a conſideration of their being admitted into the offices of maſters in chancery, though ſome of them were very unfit to be intruſted with ſuch employments; and that he had been negligent in ſecuring the effects of divers ſuitors of the ſaid court, which had been depoſited in the hands of the maſters, by which means ſeveral of the ſuitors had been very great loſers. The houſe of peers, after a long and full hearing, being ſatisfied of the proof of theſe crimes, gave the following judgement againſt him by their ſpeaker, Sir Peter King: " That " Thomas, earl of Macclesfield, be fined in the ſum " of thirty thouſand pounds, unto our ſovereign lord " the king; and that he be impriſoned in the Tower " of London, and there kept in ſafe cuſtody, until " he ſhall pay the ſaid fine." Accordingly he was committed, and detained a priſoner there till the 22d of July following; at which time having paid the fine impoſed upon him, he was diſcharged out of cuſtody.

A. D. 1725. This year was uſhered in with an inſurrection in Scotland. Ever ſince the union the Scots had unwillingly paid any of the taxes laid on the united kingdoms; and had behaved, on all occaſions, as if they thought themſelves injured, when they were obliged to contribute any thing towards the public expence. The enemies of the government failed not to cheriſh this diſpoſition in the people, and, under the maſk of a pretended zeal for the old conſtitution, to inſpire the populace with a hatred of that which was now eſtabliſhed. The malt-tax occaſioned the greateſt clamour; and it was foreſeen that it could not be collected without expoſing the officers of the revenue to the utmoſt danger. At Edinburgh, indeed, the exciſemen were ſuffered to take an account of the malſters ſtock in hand; but thoſe at Glaſgow were obliged to apply to the commiſſioners of the exciſe at Edinburgh for protection and aſſiſtance, their lives being threatened if they dared to viſit the malt-houſes.

Alarmed at theſe proceedings, the commiſſioners applied to general Wade, commander of the forces in Scotland, who, on the 23d of June, ſent captain Buſhel at the head of two companies of ſoldiers to Glaſgow. On entering the town they perceived a great number of people, who ſaluted them with the moſt abuſive language, and threw ſtones at them as they marched along the ſtreets, crying out, No malt-tax. The officer deſired them to forbear, for he meant them no harm. The provoſt gave him billets for quartering his men, but told him he could not put him in poſſeſſion of the guard-room, the populace having locked the door and carried away the key. Unwilling to exaſperate the rabble by breaking open the door, the officer ordered the guard to be kept at a public houſe, which he had hired for that purpoſe. Every thing continued quiet till about eleven at night, when ſeveral thouſands of the lower claſs of people aſſembled about the houſe of Mr. Daniel Campbell, repreſentative in parliament for Glaſgow, and threatened it with deſtruction. Captain Buſhel, deſirous of putting an end to the tumult, before the rioters had committed any diſorders, ſent a meſſage to the provoſt, informing him of the miſchief they threatened to commit, and that he was ready to give him any aſſiſtance. The provoſt anſwered, that he thought the number of his ſoldiers too ſmall to oppoſe the rabble, and therefore he thought it more prudent not to make uſe of them. Encouraged by the timidity of the magiſtrate, they proceeded to carry their threats into execution, forced into the houſe, and ſtripped it of every thing that was portable. The magiſtrates took no notice of the riot; and though ſeveral of them were found next morning drunk in the houſe, not one of them was ſent to priſon. The officers of exciſe concealed themſelves from the fury of the populace, who threatened to puniſh them in the moſt dreadful manner. About four in the afternoon, the cabal began to aſſemble again; and captain Buſhel, not knowing what their deſigns might be, ordered the ſoldiers to be ready at the guard-room, which the provoſt had now cauſed to be opened. The mob did not, however, long keep their ſecret, they advanced towards the guards, crying, "Drive the dogs out of town: we will cut them to pieces." The officer deſired them to deſiſt, told them they intended to do them no hurt; but if they continued to provoke the ſoldiers, it would not be in his power to prevent their firing. This had no effect upon the rabble, they continued throwing large ſtones in ſuch quantities, that ſome of the locks and bayonets of the ſoldiers were broken, and ſome of them wounded. The ſoldiers were now ordered to fire over their heads to intimidate them; but this had no effect; they continued to advance, and threw ſtones in ſtill greater quantities. Exaſperated at this uſage, the ſoldiers fired among them, and killed three or four. This had the deſired effect; they were terrified, and retired to ſome diſtance. The provoſt now deſired captain Buſhel to ſave himſelf and his men by retreating out of town, as the rioters were collecting all the arms they could find; and that a deſperate engagement muſt otherwiſe ſoon enſue. The captain followed his advice, and marched directly for Dumbarton; but was followed ſeveral miles by the mob, and obliged to face about and fire upon them ſeveral times in order to ſecure his retreat.

As ſoon as he reached Dumbarton, he diſpatched a meſſenger to general Wade, informing him of the riot, and deſiring inſtructions how to act in future. The general perceived the danger, and ſaw the neceſſity of enforcing the laws. He therefore ſet out from Edinburgh, accompanied by Duncan Forbes, lord-advocate, and the next day joined a body of forces that had been ordered to rendezvous on a moor within two miles of Glaſgow, conſiſting of two regiments of horſe, a detachment of dragoons, and about two regiments of foot. The general now informed the magiſtrates that he was preparing to march into Glaſgow, and the next day about two o'clock he entered the town. The troops advanced with ſilence and good order, and were diſtributed into quarters without any diſturbance. The next day the exciſemen proceeded to take an account of the maltſters ſtock in hand, and had quiet admittance. The terms of the act were complied with, and every thing continued in tranquillity.

On the 31ſt of May the king, after giving the royal aſſent to the bills that were ready, prorogued the parliament; and on the 3d of June ſet out for his German dominions.

While his majeſty was abroad, he entered into a treaty with France and Hanover. This tranſaction happened in conſequence of two treaties, one of peace, the other of commerce, concluded between the emperor and Philip V. who, on the demiſe of his ſon, had once more reſumed the ſovereign rule. There was nothing in the treaty of peace which could give offence to any of the powers in Europe, but the treaty of commerce was deemed highly prejudicial to the intereſt of Great-Britain, as the Oſtend company, which the emperor had eſtabliſhed, was to be ſupported by it; another probable conſequence of it was, the reſtitution of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon to the Spaniards; and it was even rumoured, that there were ſecret articles in favour of the pretender. The imperial forces were now conſiderably augmented, and other powers were ſolicited to engage in this alliance, to which the Czar actually acceded. Theſe proceedings alarmed the king of Great Britain, and in order to counteract the deſigns of the new allies, he projected a defenſive treaty between England, France and Pruſſia, and which was known by the name of the treaty of Hanover. This alliance was limited to the term of fifteen years, and contained a mutual guarantee of the dominions poſſeſſed by the contracting parties, their rights and privileges, thoſe of commerce in particular, with an agreement to procure ſatisfaction for the proteſtants of Thorn in Poland, who had been oppreſſed by the papiſts, contrary to the treaty of Olivia.

A. D. 1726.

Theſe negotiations being finiſhed, the king ſet out on his return to England in the middle of December, and came to Helvoetſluys, where Sir John Norris waited with the convoy and yatchts; and on the 1ſt of January, about one in the afternoon, his majeſty embarked. A little after ſeven in the evening there aroſe a moſt violent tempeſt, which continued ſo high, and the wind ſo boiſterous for near 36 hours, that the whole fleet was in the utmoſt danger; but on the fourth day his majeſty landed at Rye, from whence he proceeded by land to London.

The parliament met on the 20th of January, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he informed them, "that the diſtreſſed condition of ſome of their proteſtant brethren abroad, and the negotiations and engagements contracted by ſome foreign powers, which ſeemed to have laid the foundation of new troubles and diſturbances in Europe, and to threaten his ſubjects with the loſs of ſeveral of the moſt advantageous branches of their trade, had obliged them to concert with other powers ſuch meaſures as might give a check to the ambitious views of thoſe who were endeavouring to render themſelves formidable, and put a ſtop to the farther progreſs of ſuch dangerous deſigns: that the enemies to his government were already very buſy by their inſtruments and emiſſaries in thoſe courts, whoſe meaſures ſeemed moſt to favour their purpoſes, in ſoliciting and promoting the cauſe of the pretender; but he perſuaded himſelf, notwithſtanding the countenance and encouragement they might either have received, or expected to receive, that the proviſion made by his parliament for the ſafety and defence of his kingdoms, would effectually ſecure them from all danger of foreign invaſions, or domeſtic inſurrection: that when the world ſhould ſee, that they would not ſuffer the Britiſh crown and nation to be inſulted with impunity, thoſe who moſt envied the tranquillity and happineſs of this kingdom, and were endeavouring to make it ſubſervient to their ambitious projects, would have ſome regard to their own intereſt and circumſtances, before they preſumed to make any attempt upon ſo brave a people, ſtrengthened and ſupported by powerful alliances, and however deſirous of peace, able, and ready to defend themſelves againſt all aggreſſors: that ſuch reſolutions and ſuch meaſures, if timely taken, would, he was ſatisfied, be the moſt effectual means of preventing a war, and preſerving to his people the bleſſings of peace and proſperity."

The treaty of Hanover being laid before the houſe of commons, it occaſioned great debates. The members who oppoſed it alledged, that it would engage the Britiſh nation in a war for the defence of the king's German dominions, contrary to an expreſs proviſion made for the ſecuring our religion, laws and liberties, in the act for the further limitation and ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line. To this it was replied by the other ſide, that the true meaning and intent of that limitation was not wholly and for ever to deprive his majeſty's foreign dominions of any aſſiſtance from this nation, for in that reſpect the king would be in a worſe condition upon his acceſſion to the throne of Great Britain than he was before, but that it was only deſigned to reſtrain the ſovereign for the future from engaging the nation in a war for the defence of any dominions not pertaining to the Engliſh crown without the conſent of parliament, who were to determine whether a war was, or was not, neceſſary. Mr. Pelham obſerved, that, for his own part, he was of opinion, that if, in the preſent juncture of affairs, his majeſty's foreign dominions ſhould be attacked or inſulted, this nation ought to ſtand by and ſupport his majeſty againſt all his enemies; he therefore moved for an addreſs to the king, to return him thanks for communicating the treaty of Hanover to the Houſe, and to expreſs their juſt ſenſe of his majeſty's concern for the balance and peace of Europe, and to aſſure him, that in the juſtice and vindication of the honour and dignity of the Britiſh crown, the houſe would effectually ſtand by and ſupport his majeſty againſt all inſults and attacks that any prince or power, in reſentment of the juſt meaſures ſo wiſely taken by his majeſty, ſhould make upon any of his territories or dominions, though not immediately belonging to the crown of Great Britain. The oppoſition to this addreſs was ſo inconſiderable, that it was carried in the affirmative by a great majority: it was preſented on the 19th of February, to which his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following anſwer:

"Gentlemen,

"I return you my thanks for this particular mark of your duty, affection, and confidence in me: your aſſurances, not to ſuffer my foreign dominions to be expoſed or inſulted, on account of the meaſures I have taken for the intereſt of theſe kingdoms, will, I hope, be a means to preſerve the tranquillity of Europe. I have no view of ambition to gratify; I have no thought of aggrandizing myſelf, or extending any part of my dominions at the expence of the other; and as my honour is the common cauſe and concern of my ſubjects, their particular intereſt ſhall, upon all occaſions, be my conſtant care."

The houſe of lords preſented an addreſs to the ſame effect, and received a ſimilar anſwer.

On the 24th of March, Sir Paul Methuen, knight of the Bath, delivered the following meſſage from the king to the houſe of commons:

"His majeſty having nothing more at heart than an earneſt deſire to ſecure his own ſubjects the full and free enjoyment of their trade and navigation, and in the beſt manner to prevent and fruſtrate ſuch deſigns as have been formed againſt the particular intereſt of this nation, and the general peace of Europe, has found it neceſſary not only to augment his maritime force, but to concert ſuch other meaſures as may moſt effectually conduce to theſe deſirable ends: and as theſe ſervices will require ſome extraordinary expence, his majeſty hopes he ſhall be enabled, by the aſſiſtance of parliament, to increaſe the number of ſeamen already voted and granted for the ſervice of this year, and to enter into and make good ſuch engagements, as the circumſtances and exigency of affairs may require."

This meſſage occaſioned a long debate in the houſe of commons; but it was at laſt agreed to comply with it, and an addreſs was voted to his majeſty, informing him that his faithful commons would ſupport him, and had agreed to the required augmentation.

By ſome miſtake, this meſſage had not been communicated to the houſe of lords, though the king mentioned his hopes of being enabled, by the aſſiſtance of his parliament, to increaſe the number of ſeamen already voted. This omiſſion cauſed a very warm debate. The earl of Strafford aſſerted, "that the meſſage was unprecedented, and ſtruck at the ancient privileges of the houſe of peers, who are the grand ſtanding-council of the ſovereign, the hereditary and perpetual guardians of the liberties and properties of the people, and, next to the king, the principal part of the legiſlature, and who, therefore, have a right to be conſulted in all matters of public concern." He moved, therefore, "that an addreſs be preſented to know, who adviſed his majeſty not to ſend the ſame meſſage to the houſe of peers, as was ſent to the houſe of commons." The lord Trevor, in order to prevent diſagreeable debates, moved, that the conſideration of that matter might be put off for a month; but lord Lechmere repreſented, "that the ſubject was of great importance to his majeſty's ſervice, to the honour of that noble and illuſtrious aſſembly, to the ancient conſtitution of parliament, and to the proſperity and welfare of the kingdom; that it ought not to be poſtponed at all, much leſs for ſuch a length of time, as amounted to a laying it entirely aſide. That it muſt be for the ſervice and ſupport of the crown, upon all occaſions, to have the advice of both houſes of parliament; and as the meſſage was only ſent to the houſe of commons, and there had not yet been any communication with their lordſhips upon it, though it containted matters of the higheſt importance, it tended to undermine the foundation of the houſe of peers, and of the antient conſtitution of the kingdom. That the rights of the people of England were in ſome meaſure invaded, whenever they were deprived of the aſſiſtance of that houſe of parliament, without whom no aid can be given to the crown, nor any taxes laid upon the ſubjects. And, therefore, if this debate ſhould be adjourned to ſo long a day, it might be inferred, from ſuch a dilatory proceeding, that their lordſhips were not as jealous of their own privileges, and of the rights and properties of the people at this time, and as much determined to ſupport and defend both, as any of their anceſtors and predeceſſors had formerly been. That it was the unbounded, inherent, and fundamental right of the houſe of peers, to alter and amend all money bills which came from the commons; and though, in ſome late inſtances, the commons had diſputed that right, yet the lords had never failed to maintain and aſſert it. That, according to ancient uſuage, all demands of ſupply ſhould come from the throne in the houſe of peers; and, therefore, all other methods are unparliamentary, new, and dangerous to the conſtitution." He was anſwered by the lords Onſlow and Townſhend; and theſe were replied to by lord Bathurſt, who obſerved, "That the appellation of parliament being given to the commons, and ſeparately from the lords, was indeed new and unprecedented. That this was ſo far from being the language of former times, that though of late the commons took upon them to begin all money bills, yet there was a time when they were ſo inconſiderable, as to apply to the lords to deſire them to provide money for the public ſervice. That if, at this time, the lords ſuffered themſelves to be overlooked in this manner, they might at laſt come to be voted uſeleſs, as they had formerly been. And, therefore, leſt any miſtake at this time ſhould be attended with ſuch ill conſequences as to encourage any evil miniſters hereafter to a total neglect of the houſe of peers, he was of opinion, that proper notice ſhould be taken of it immediately, inſtead of deferring the further conſideration of it for a month." The earl of Scarborough ſaid, "He did not deny that the peers have a right to be adviſed with in all matters of importance, and to give their conſent to money-bills. But in the caſe before them it ſeemed needleſs to ſend the meſſage in queſtion to the houſe, becauſe their lordſhips had implicitly given their conſent to the augmenting the number of ſeamen, in their addreſs of thanks, wherein the augmentation was hinted at. As to what had been ſuggeſted, that formerly the commons applied to the lords to provide money for the public ſervice, the reaſon of it was, becauſe at that time none had any money to give but the lords, moſt of the lands being then in their hands; whereas ſince the reign of Henry VII. the caſe is very much altered; and, therefore, they ought not to conſider how things were formerly, but how they are at preſent, and act accordingly." Several other ſpeeches were made on this occaſion; but the adjournment took place, and the addreſs was afterwards rejected.

On the 24th of May his majeſty went to the houſe of peers; and having paſſed ſuch bills as were ready, prorogued the parliament.

During theſe tranſactions, Peter the Great, czar of Muſcovy, paid the debt of nature, and his empreſs Catharine ſucceeded him on the throne. This princeſs had conceived a diſtaſte to the Britiſh court, and, by the inſinuations of ſome Scottiſh people about her, had been brought to believe that it would prove no difficult matter to ſet up the ſon of the late king James II. and ſo overturn the government in Britain. This ſcheme was highly approved of by the Spaniſh court, who flattered themſelves that it would greatly facilitate their acquiſitions in Italy.

As ſoon as the Engliſh miniſtry were informed of the czarina's intentions, it was reſolved to ſend a fleet into the Baltic, the command of which was given to Sir Charles Wager, vice-admiral of the red, who had under him Sir George Walton, rear admiral of the blue. On the ſeventeenth of April they ſailed from the Nore, with twenty ſhips of the line, one frigate, and two fire-ſhips; and on the 23d of the ſame month the fleet came to an anchor in the road of Copenhagen. The next day Sir Charles preſented a letter to the king of Denmark from his Britannic majeſty; and ſoon after quitting Copenhagen, he anchored with his fleet near Stockholm. Having had an audience of his Swediſh majeſty, by whom he was moſt graciouſly received, he ſailed to the iſland of Narignan, within a few leagues of Revel. About the ſame time a ſquadron of Daniſh men of war ſailed from Copenhagen for the iſland of Bornholm, in order to join them.

The day after Sir Charles arrived at Narignan, he diſpatched lieutenant Burnet, in the Port-mahon, with a letter from the king to the czarina, incloſed in one to Pruxin. her admiral, who at this time was lying in the road of Cronſlot, with ſixteen Ruſſian men of war beſides gallies. In his letter to the czarina, the king had expoſtulated very freely with her majeſty on the ſubject of the armaments by ſea and land, which ſhe had been for ſome time preparing; and likewiſe on the intrigues which her miniſters had lately entered into with the agents of the Pretender. The Ruſſian court, enraged at the appearance of a Britiſh fleet upon their coaſts, was, at firſt, inclined to reſent it, but ſerious reflection convincing them that the Ruſſian fleet was in no condition to venture an engagement with that of Great Britain, it was reſolved in council to order the ſhips and gallies to be laid up, and the empreſs wrote an anſwer to his Britannic majeſty, wherein ſhe expreſſed her ſurprize that ſhe had not received his majeſty's letter until his fleet was at anchor in one of her ports, ſince it would have been more agreeable to the cuſtom eſtabliſhed among ſovereigns, and to the amity which had ſo long ſubſiſted between her kingdoms and the crown of Great Britain, to expoſtulate with her on her armaments, and expect her anſwer, before he had proceeded to ſuch an offenſive meaſure. She aſſured him that nothing was further from her thoughts than any deſign to trouble the peace of the north; and with regard to the Pretender, ſhe ſaid, it was a ſtale and frivolous accuſation, which had been frequently uſed as a pretext to cover all the unkind ſteps taken againſt the Ruſſian empire.

Sir Charles having tranſmitted the czarina's anſwer to his majeſty's letter, determined to continue in the ſame ſtation, till he ſhould receive farther orders. In the mean time the Britiſh merchants in thoſe parts were greatly alarmed, apprehending that their perſons and effects were in imminent danger: but the czarina was pleaſed ſoon after to publiſh a declaration, in which ſhe aſſured them, that whatever hoſtilities might be committed by the Britiſh ſquadron, the merchants ſhould not be injured in their perſons, goods, poſſeſſions, ſhips going or coming, nor in any other manner whatſoever; and that, as well for the preſent as the time to come, they might freely, and at their pleaſure and beſt advantage, without any fear or apprehenſion, carry on their traffic in her empire, equally with all other nations in friendſhip with the Ruſſians, and on all occaſions be unalterably aſſured of her gracious care and protection, provided that they, through no diſagreeable meaſures or forbidden proceedings, rendered themſelves obnoxious. Sir Charles Wager had alſo liberty to furniſh his ſquadron with freſh proviſions as often as he pleaſed. At length, it being judged that the czarina's affairs were not in a ſituation to make any conſiderable attempt this year, the Britiſh fleet left thoſe parts, and returned to England.

Two other ſquadrons were likewiſe fitted out this year; one of which was deſtined to the Weſt-Indies, under the command of admiral Hoſier: the other, conducted by Sir John Jennings, having on board a body of land forces, ſailed from St. Helen's on the 20th of July, entered the bay of St. Antonia, then viſited Liſbon, from whence he directed his courſe to the bay of Bulls, near Cadiz, and cruiſed off cape St. Mary's, ſo as to alarm the coaſt of Spain, and fill Madrid with conſternation, but no act of hoſtility was committed.

Admiral Hoſier had ſailed in April with ſeven ſhips of war. His orders were to block up the galleons in the Spaniſh ports; or ſhould they preſume to come out, ſeize, and bring them to England. Before his arrival at the Baſtimentos, near Porto Bello, the treaſure, conſiſting of above ſix millions ſterling, had been unloaded and carried back to Panama, in conſequence of an order ſent from Spain, by an advice boat, which had the ſtart of Hoſier. This admiral lay inactive on that ſtation till, from the terror, he became the jeſt of the Spaniards, when, a little before Chriſtmas, he ſailed to Jamaica, where he reinforced his crew, and then ſtood over to Carthagena. The Spaniards had by this time ſeized the Engliſh South-ſea ſhips at La Vera Cruz, together with all the veſſels and effects belonging to that company. Hoſier finding it in vain to demand reſtitution, took ſome Spaniſh ſhips by way of repriſal; after which he continued cruiſing in thoſe ſeas, until the greater part of his men periſhed by the diſeaſes of that unhealthy climate, and his ſhips were entirely ruined by the worms. This brave officer who was reſtricted by his orders from obeying the dictates of his courage, ſeeing his people daily ſwept off by an outrageous diſtemper, and his ſhips expoſed to inevitable deſtruction, is ſaid to have died of a broken heart; while the Engliſh nation juſtly clamoured againſt this unfortunate expedition, in which ſo many lives were thrown away, and ſo much money expended without the leaſt advantage to the nation.

A. D. 1727. The parliament met on the 17th of January, and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty, with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he told them, " That the ſudden conjunction between the emperor and the king of Spain, and the ſecret and offenſive alliances concluded between them, had laid the foundation of a moſt exorbitant and formidable power, ſo directly levelled againſt the moſt valuable and darling intereſts and privileges of this nation, that they muſt determine either tamely to ſubmit to the peremptory and unjuſt demands of the king of Spain, in giving up Gibraltar, and patiently acquieſce in the emperor's uſurped and extended exerciſe of trade and commerce, or reſolve to be in a condition to do themſelves juſtice, and defend their undoubted rights againſt theſe reciprocal engagements, entered into in defiance and violation of all national faith, and the moſt ſolemn treaties. He added, that he had likewiſe received information from different parts, on which he could entirely depend, that the placing the Pretender upon the throne of this kingdom was one of the articles of the ſecret engagements; and if time ſhould evince that the giving up the trade of this nation to one power, and Gibraltar and Port-Mahon to another, is made the price and reward of impoſing upon this kingdom a popiſh Pretender, what indignation muſt it raiſe in the breaſt of every proteſtant Briton? Nor were theſe fatal combinations confined to thoſe parts of the world alone: they even extended to Ruſſia; and had not the deſigns of that court againſt ſome of their neighbours been prevented by the ſeaſonable arrival of the Engliſh fleet in thoſe ſeas, a way had been opened for invading theſe kingdoms, and giving a powerful aſſiſtance to any attempt made from other quarters: that ſuch circumſtances would not ſuffer him and his allies to be idle ſpectators, and regardleſs of their own ſafety and the common cauſe of Europe; for which purpoſe his moſt Chriſtian majeſty had been at a great expence the laſt year in augmenting his forces; and the ſtates-general, ſenſible of the imminent danger, had not only acceded to the defenſive alliance concluded at Hanover, but came to ſtrong and ſeaſonable reſolutions for an extraordinary augmentation of their forces both by ſea and land. He further told them, that the Spaniards had actually aſſembled a great body of troops in the neighbourhood of Gibraltar, in order to attack and beſiege that place; but that he rather believed thoſe public and immenſe preparations were deſigned as an amuſement, and to diſguiſe the intended invaſion, which had been for ſome time agreed to be the firſt ſtep and beginning of the long premeditated rupture."

The circumſtances mentioned in this ſpeech raiſed the zeal and indignation of the commons to ſuch a height, that, in their addreſs, words ſeemed wanting to expreſs the deep reſentment at the inſults offered the king, at the invaſion of the moſt valuable branches of trade, at the deſigns formed againſt the nation, and to applaud the wiſe meaſures taken by the king to prevent the deſtructive deſigns formed againſt the liberties of Europe. They voted 46,000 men, together with a land-tax of 4s. in the pound.

The members of the upper houſe were not quite ſo complaiſant as thoſe of the lower. A violent debate at firſt ſeemed to promiſe a powerful oppoſition. Lord Bathurſt, after repreſenting the inconveniences of the war, obſerved, that conſiderable ſums had been diſtributed in different places to give ſucceſs to certain meaſures, and recommended it to the lords to make a ſtrict enquiry into an object of ſuch importance. " As to myſelf, (ſaid he,) I have never touched either Engliſh or Spaniſh gold; I am neither a Frenchman nor a Spaniard, but I ſhall always glory in being a true Engliſhman, and in ſpeaking and acting for the good of my country, while I ſhall have the honour of being a member of this houſe." The meaſures of the king were, however, voted to be honourable, juſt, and neceſſary.

The houſe of lords was not the only place where the king's ſpeech was examined. The court of Vienna was highly offended, and paſſed ſevere cenſures upon it. The count de Palms, ambaſſador from the emperor, had orders to preſent and publiſh a remonſtrance, wherein the king of England was charged with giving an imperfect, mutilated, or very groundleſs account of facts. It was inſiſted, that the article reſpecting the pretender was falſe; that there was no offenſive alliance between the emperor and Spain; that the treaty of Vienna was no infringement of the lawful rights of England; and laſtly, reparation for the injury done to his imperial majeſty by theſe calumnious imputations was required.

This memorial was highly reſented by the parliament. Both houſes joined in an addreſs, expreſſing their indignation at the affront offered to his majeſty by the memorial of the count de Palms, and at his inſolence in diſperſing the ſame throughout the kingdom; aſſuring his majeſty, that this audacious manner of appealing to the people, and turning a memorial into a ſeditious libel, was a proceeding that created in them the utmoſt abhorrence and deteſtation. "The endeavouring," ſaid they in their addreſs, "to inſtill into the minds of any of your faithful ſubjects the leaſt diſtruſt or diffidence of your majeſty's ſacred royal word, or to make a diſtinction between your majeſty and your people, is an attempt as vain as preſumptuous. If time has not effaced the memory of the glorious exploits, and important ſuccours (confeſſed to have been received from Great Britain) gratitude, affection, and eſteem for this nation, will be beſt manifeſted, by doing honour to the king, whom the people honour; and juſtice to the people, whoſe rights and privileges the beſt of kings is now defending, againſt the encroachments made upon them."

The ſecretary of ſtate wrote a letter to the count de Palms, ordering him to quit the kingdom immediately. The two powers attacked each other at the imperial diet, by writings replete with perſonal animoſities. Nothing leſs than a violent and obſtinate war was expected. The king entered into new negotiations with France, Sweden, Denmark, and the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel. Support was alſo procured in Germany, but not without being attended with a vaſt expence to England.

The miniſtry now determined, if poſſible, to obtain a power to diſpoſe of the ſupplies. Accordingly, a motion was made in the houſe of commons, by Mr. Scroope, ſecretary to the treaſury, for empowering the king to apply ſuch monies as he might find neceſſary to defray expences, and fulfil ſuch engagements as already were, or might be contracted before the end of the year. This motion occaſioned a long and very warm debate. It was ſaid by the miniſterial party, "That his majeſty was ſo unwilling to put his ſubjects to any extraordinary expences, that he had demanded no more ſupplies this ſeſſion than what he thought abſolutely neceſſary for the ſervice of the year. But, in the preſent poſture of affairs, ſome unforeſeen accidents might require a farther expence, for which no eſtimate could now be made, becauſe ſome treaties his majeſty had thought proper to enter into were not as yet finiſhed; and, therefore, that the parliament ought to enable him to anſwer ſuch contingencies: that the houſe had ſeveral times repoſed the ſame confidence in him, which he had never abuſed, eſpecially as it was now aſked only for a ſhort time." To this it was anſwered, "That the wiſdom of parliament had always taken precautions againſt the improper employment of the public money; that a power ſo unlimited, and of ſuch dangerous conſequence, could not be admitted under a free government; that it was eſſential to the welfare of the ſtate to preſerve the forms of parliament, to grant ſupplies upon eſtimates, and to apply the monies granted to the purpoſes publicly avowed and acknowledged as neceſſary; in ſhort, that if parliament ſhould diſpenſe with eſtabliſhed cuſtoms and principles, ſuch examples would become frequent, the crown would acquire an abſolute power of levying taxes, and the conſtitution of England would ſoon be annihilated. But notwithſtanding theſe reaſons, the court party prevailed, and the bill paſſed both houſes by a conſiderable majority.

The parliament having diſpatched all the buſineſs before them, his majeſty, after paſſing the bills that were ready, put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I acquainted you at the opening of this ſeſſion with the dangers that threatened this kingdom, and the peace and liberties of Europe. I am now to return you my thanks for the zeal and diſpatch with which you have proceeded on the ſeveral points I then recommended to your care; for the confidence you have repoſed in me, and for the aſſurances you have given me of your ſupport and aſſiſtance, in vindication of my honour, and in the maintenance and defence of the undoubted rights and privileges of this nation, ſo openly and notoriouſly invaded and attacked.

"The ſiege of Gibraltar proves, beyond all diſpute, the end and deſign of the engagements entered into by the emperor and the king of Spain; but the preparations I have made for the defence of that place, and the bravery of my troops, will, I doubt not, convince them of the raſhneſs and folly of that undertaking. However, the love of peace has hitherto prevailed upon me, even under this high provocation, to ſuſpend in ſome meaſure my reſentment; and inſtead of having immediate recourſe to arms, and demanding of my allies that aſſiſtance which they are engaged and ready to give me, I have conferred with the moſt Chriſtian king and the ſtates-general, in making ſuch overtures of accommodation as muſt convince all the world of the uprightneſs of our intentions, and of our ſincere diſpoſitions to peace, and demonſtrate to whoſe ambition and thirſt of power the calamities of a war are to be imputed, if theſe juſt and reaſonable propoſitions are rejected. In the mean time, I have the pleaſure to acquaint you, that the crown of Sweden has acceded to the treaty of Hanover; and that the convention between his moſt Chriſtian majeſty and the king of Denmark is actually ſigned."

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"The vigour and chearfulneſs you have ſhewn in raiſing ſo effectually, and upon ſuch eaſy terms, the neceſſary ſupplies for the ſervice of the current year, are not only inſtances of your zeal and affection to me, but demonſtrate the eſtabliſhed credit, power, and ſtrength of this kingdom."

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It would have been a great ſatisfaction to me if, before your ſeparation, I had been able to ſpeak to you more poſitively, and with greater certainty, upon the preſent poſture of affairs; but as you have now diſpatched the public buſineſs, and the ſeaſon of the year requires your going into your reſpective counties, I choſe rather to put an end to the ſeſſion, than to keep you any longer together unneceſſarily. The proviſion you have made, and the union and harmony between me and my allies, will, I hope, enable me, by the divine aſſiſtance, either to withſtand and defeat the deſigns of our enemies, if their conduct ſhould bring upon us the neceſſity of a war; or to improve the bleſſings of peace, if peace can with any juſtice, honour, and ſecurity be obtained."

In the mean time the Spaniards laid ſiege to Gibraltar with an army of 20,000 men, well provided with artillery, ammunition, and warlike ſtores. Colonel Clayton, lieutenant-governor of the place, had troops and neceſſaries ſufficient for making a brave defence, till ſupplies could arrive from England, for which preparations had been made. But there was little to be feared from the attempts of the Spaniards; their meaſures were ill planned and worſe executed: ſo that, after lying four months before the place, and loſing half their army by ſlaughter, ſickneſs, and deſertion, they were obliged to abandon the enterprize.

The hoſtile powers, notwithſtanding their reſentment, had not that paſſion for war which prolongs the miſeries of mankind. France effectually employed her mediation to reſtore the tranquillity of Europe. Preliminaries were ſigned, whereby it was agreed, that hoſtilities ſhould immediately ceaſe; that the Oſtend company ſhould be ſuſpended for ſeven years; and that a congreſs ſhould be held within that period for finally determining all differences.

Two years had now elapſed ſince his majeſty laſt viſited his German dominions; and he reſolved to embrace the preſent opportunity of enjoying that pleaſure. Accordingly, having eſtabliſhed a regency, he embarked at Greenwich on the 3d of June, and on the 7th landed at Vaert in Holland. The next day he ſet out for Hanover; and the following evening, between ten and eleven o'clock arrived in apparent good health at Delden. He ſupped heartily, reſted well, and proceeded on his journey about four the next morning. Between eight and nine o'clock he ordered the coach to ſtop, and finding one of his hands motionleſs, he ſaid, "I cannot move this hand." A ſhort time after this, his eyes began to move with great emotion, his mouth was diſtorted, and his tongue ſwelled, ſo that he was deprived of the power of ſpeech. He continued in this ſtate but a ſhort time before he was ſeized with a violent fit of the palſy; and though he recovered a little by the opening of a vein, he ſoon after became lethargic, and was conveyed in a ſtate of inſenſibility to Oſnaburg, where he expired on Sunday the 11th of June, in his brother's palace, in the 68th year of his age, and the 13th of his reign. His remains were interred at Hanover among thoſe of his anceſtors.

George I. was plain and open in his addreſs, grave and compoſed in his deportment, though eaſy, familiar, and facetious in his hours of relaxation. Before he aſcended the Britiſh throne, he had acquired the character of a circumſpect general; a juſt and merciful prince, and a wiſe politician, who perfectly underſtood and ſteadily purſued his own intereſt. With theſe qualities it cannot be doubted but that he came to England extremely well diſpoſed to govern his new ſubjects according to the maxims of the Britiſh conſtitution, and the genius of the people. And if he ever ſeemed to deviate from theſe principles, we may be aſſured, that he was miſled by the venal ſuggeſtions of a miniſtry, whoſe power and influence were both founded on corruption.

He married the princeſs Sophia Dorothy, daughter and heireſs to the duke of Zell, by whom he had one ſon, who ſucceeded him in the throne; and a daughter married to the late king of Pruſſia.

The moſt remarkable occurrences that happened during this king's reign were the following:

On the 22d of April, in the year after his acceſſion, there happened the greateſt eclipſe of the ſun that had ever been known in the memory of man. It began about 7 minutes after 8 o'clock in the morning, and ended about 20 minutes after 10. The ſun, for near four minutes, was ſo totally darkened, that the moon and ſtars were as viſible as in the cleareſt evening; and the beaſts and birds were ſo confuſed, that they retired to their reſpective places of reſt with the greateſt precipitation. Two French mathematicians, by direction of the royal academy of Sciences, came over to obſerve it, and were entertained with great reſpect by the Royal Society of London, with whom they joined in making their obſervations on this ſingular phænomenon.

On the 13th of December, 1718, the ſtream of the river Thames was reduced ſo low by the dryneſs of the ſeaſon, and a ſtrong weſterly wind, that the people walked acroſs it in different parts, as alſo through moſt of the arches of London-bridge.

In the 7th year of this king's reign, inoculating for the ſmall pox was firſt introduced into England from Turkey. The importing of it is attributed to Lady Mary Wortley Montague, who reſided ſome time with her huſband at the Ottoman court, where ſhe had an opportunity of ſeeing the Turkiſh method of performing the operation; a deſcription of which is given in the letters publiſhed under her name. The experiment was firſt tried with ſucceſs on ſeven condemned criminals, which was immediately followed by the inoculation of prince Frederick, the two princeſſes Amelia and Caroline, the duke of Bedford and his ſiſters, with many other perſons of diſtinction, who underwent the operation with great ſucceſs. But notwithſtanding the method of inoculation received ſuch a diſtinguiſhed ſanction, the practice of it was greatly diſapproved of till about the year 1760, ſince which time it has generally prevailed, not only in England, but moſt parts of Europe; and ſeveral public hoſpitals have been erected for the benefit of the indigent.

In the month of April, 1724, died Doctor Henry Sacheverel, who bequeathed a legacy of 500l. to his friend and patron, the baniſhed biſhop of Rocheſter.

In the following year Orator Henley, the ſon of a worthy Divine, ſet up a new ſect, under the title of an Oratory: to promote which, he informed the public, that on the 3d of July the oratory would be opened; that the fundamental authority of this inſtitution, conſidered as a church, would be the ſame with that of all the modern churches; that is, "a legal liberty of private judgment in religion, which is the very principle of the reformation, the baſis of all the proteſtant intereſt, and the moſt valuable branch of the freedom of our conſtitution." At the ſame time, in order to prevent any diſturbance that might ariſe on account of his ſeparation from the church, in which he had been ordained a prieſt, he reſolved to ſhelter himſelf under the canon of the toleration act; for which purpoſe he took the oaths of abjuration and allegiance before the bench of juſtices at Hicks's-hall. The place he firſt adapted for his oratory was no leſs ſingular than the novelty of its inſtitution, being a ſort of wooden booth built over the ſhambles in Newport-market, near Leiceſter-fields, formerly uſed for a temporary meeting-houſe of a Calviniſtical congregation: after which he moved near the weſt entrance into Clare-market. Notwithſtanding his private fortune was greatly increaſed by money paid for admiſſion into his oratory for upwards of 35 years, yet he could never form an eſtabliſhed congregation; nor did it appear that his religion gained him one proſelyte; his whole ſyſtem and conduct for that time exhibiting nothing more than ſatire, burleſque and grimace.

SECT. II.

GEORGE II.

AS the late king died abroad, his death was not known in England till the 14th of June, four days after the event happened, when Sir Robert Walpole received an expreſs with the melancholy news. At this time the prince and princeſs of Wales were at Richmond, whither Sir Robert immediately repaired with the important intelligence; on the receipt of which they haſtened to Leiceſter-houſe, where they had for ſome time kept their court. On their arrival there, they were received by a number of the lords of the privy-council, and other diſtinguiſhed perſonages, who ſigned an inſtrument for proclaiming his royal highneſs king of theſe realms; and the next morning the ceremony was performed at the uſual places and with the accuſtomed ſolemnities.

George II. was in the 44th year of his age when he acceded to the throne of England; at which time the ſituation of affairs was particularly favourable. The nation was in a very flouriſhing condition. Commerce, the great idol of the Engliſh, was every day improving, and riches flowed in from every quarter. The navy was on a very reſpectable footing; near 200 ſhips of war were either cruiſing in different parts, or ready to ſail, on the ſhorteſt warning, to protect our trade, or annoy the enemy. Several regiments of well-diſciplined troops were quartered in different parts of the three kingdoms, ſo as to overawe the diſaffected, and ſecure the peace and tranquillity of the whole; while they ſtrengthened the hands of government, and gave the new ſovereign an aſcendancy, which for many years had been unknown to his predeceſſors.

The parliament aſſembled immediately on receiving the news of the late king's death, purſuant to an act made for that purpoſe in the reign of queen Anne; but on the ſame day it was prorogued, by commiſſion, till the 27th of the ſame month.

In the mean time the king cauſed all the privy-counſellors, who compoſed the council of his father, to form that of his own. The ſyſtem of politics eſtabliſhed in the late reign was ſtrictly adhered to: Sir Robert Walpole kept poſſeſſion of the treaſury, and all the great officers of ſtate were continued in their reſpective places.

On the 27th of June the parliament met, agreeable to the royal proclamation, and his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he declared, that it ſhould be his conſtant care to preſerve the conſtitution in church and ſtate inviolable in all its parts, and to ſecure to all his ſubjects the free enjoyment of their religious and civil rights: he promiſed to leſſen the public expence as ſoon as the circumſtances of affairs would permit: he obſerved to the commons, that the grant of the greateſt part of the civil liſt revenues was now determined, and that it would be neceſſary for them to make a new proviſion for the ſupport of him and his family; and he recommended it to both houſes to diſpatch the buſineſs that ſhould be neceſſarily before them, as the ſeaſon of the year and the circumſtances of time required their preſence in the country.

Both houſes preſented addreſſes of condolance and congratulation; immediately after which the commons, in a committee of the whole houſe, took into conſideration a motion for a ſupply to his majeſty. Sir Robert Walpole having obſerved, that the annual ſum of 700,000 l. granted to and ſettled upon king George I. had fallen ſhort every year, and that his majeſty's expences were likely to increaſe by reaſon of the largeneſs of his family, moved, that the entire revenues of the civil liſt, which produced about 800,000 l. per annum, ſhould be ſettled on the king during his life. Mr. Shippen, an avowed enemy to the reigning miniſtry, and a ſhrewd ſarcaſtic ſpeaker, oppoſed this motion, as inconſiſtent with the truſt repoſed in them as repreſentatives of the people, who ought to be very frugal in exerciſing the right of giving away the public money. He ſaid, the ſum of 700,000 l. was not obtained for king George I. without a long and ſolemn debate, and every member who contended for it at this time allowed it to be an ample royal revenue: although his majeſty's family ſhould be enlarged, a circumſtance which had been urged as one reaſon for the motion, he preſumed the appointments of prince Frederick would be much inferior to thoſe ſettled on his majeſty when prince of Wales; beſides, it was to be hoped that many perſonal, many particular expences in the late reign, eſpecially thoſe for frequent journies to Hanover, would be diſcontinued, and entirely ceaſe. He propoſed, that inſtead of granting an addition to the civil liſt, they ſhould reſtrict that revenue to a certain ſum, by concluding the queſtion with theſe words, "In like manner as they were granted to "George I. ſo as to make up the clear yearly ſum "of 700,000 l." To theſe particulars, which were indeed unanſwerable, no reply was made, even this mark of decency was laid aſide as idle and ſuperfluous. The queſtion was put. The houſe agreed to Sir Robert's motion, and a bill was brought in upon the following reſolutions: "Firſt, That towards the ſupply granted to his majeſty for the ſupport of his houſhold, the ſame revenues which were payable to his late majeſty during his life, be granted and continued to his preſent majeſty during his life. Secondly, That the ſame revenues be continued from the death of his late majeſty."

The commons having received a meſſage from the king, recommending the making further proviſion for the queen, in caſe of his majeſty's demiſe, it was taken into conſideration by a grand committee of that houſe, when they reſolved, "firſt, that a proviſion be made for the queen, in caſe ſhe ſhould ſurvive his majeſty, of 100,000 l. per annum during her life, together with his majeſty's palace of Somerſet-houſe, and the lodge and lands at Richmond Old Park. Secondly, that his majeſty be enabled to charge the ſaid 100,000l. on all or any of the duties and revenues for the better ſupport of her majeſty's houſhold, &c. which ſhall ſubſiſt after his majeſty's deceaſe."

In conſequence of theſe reſolutions bills were brought in, which paſſed both houſes, and on the 17th of July received the royal aſſent. The ſame day his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he thanked the commons for the the proviſion they had made for the ſupport of his family and the civil government, and for the ample proviſion they had made for the queen. Then addreſſing himſelf to both houſes, he added, "It is a great happineſs to me to ſee the nation in ſo proſperous and flouriſhing a condition, at the higheſt pitch of glory and reputation, of great weight in holding the balance of Europe, defending themſelves in their juſt privileges and poſſeſſions, and vindicating the honour of the crown of Great Britain."

After his majeſty had concluded his ſpeech, he prorogued the parliament to the 29th of Auguſt; but before that time it was diſſolved by proclamation, and writs were iſſued for chuſing a new one.

On the 11th of October the ceremony of their majeſty's coronation was performed at Weſtminſter-abbey with great ſplendor and ſolemnity: the biſhop of Oxford preached on the occaſion, and the day was celebrated with the moſt extraordinary rejoicings in all parts of the kingdom.

Before the concluſion of this year a treaty or convention was concluded at Weſtminſter, between his Britannic majeſty and the duke of Brunſwic Lunenburgh Wolfenbuttle; by which the duke engaged to guarantee all his majeſty's dominions in Great Britain, Ireland, and Germany; and likewiſe to furniſh a body of 5000 men, for which his Britannic majeſty engaged to pay him a yearly ſubſidy of 25,000l. for four years. By a ſeparate article in this convention it was ſtipulated that the duke's troops were not to be obliged to paſs over to Great Britain or Ireland, but ſhould be employed either in the replacing troops that might be drawn from his majeſty's dominions, or be put into the garriſons of the ſtates-general, in caſe any of their troops ſhould be ſent over to Great Britain.

A. D. 1728. The new parliament met at Weſtminſter on the 23d of January, when the commons unanimouſly choſe for their ſpeaker Arthur Onſlow, eſq. knight of the ſhire for the county of Surry; a gentleman of extenſive knowledge, approved integrity, and abilities every way equal to the diſcharge of that important office, which he afterwards fully juſtified in a longer ſeries of public and irreprehenſible ſervices in that ſtation than had ever been diſcharged by any of his predeceſſors.

The ſpeech with which his majeſty opened the firſt ſeſſion of this parliament breathed an air of frankneſs and ſincerity. He told them, that he was very ſenſible of the diſagreeable and uneaſy ſituation in which their affairs were at preſent placed, and had been greatly concerned to ſee many of the inconveniences of a war attending his ſubjects, without any opportunity of reſenting the injuries they had ſuſtained, or gaining, in return, any of thoſe advantages which the vigorous proſecution of ſo juſt a cauſe, and the ſucceſs of his arms, might probably have ſecured to them: that many difficulties had occurred to impede the execution of the preliminaries; and though there was great reaſon to believe that the congreſs would ſoon be opened, and all obſtructions removed, yet it was abſolutely neceſſary to continue their warlike preparations, which had hitherto prevented a general rupture in Europe, and procured to the Engliſh nation many advantages, which would be entirely loſt through a diſcontinuance of their armaments: that he was extremely deſirous of reducing the national expences, and would not fail to ſet about this neceſſary and important work, as ſoon as the intereſt of his people would permit. He earneſtly recommended to their conſideration the increaſe and encouragement of ſeamen in general, that they might be invited, rather than compelled, to enter into the ſervice of their country; a conſideration, he ſaid, well worthy the repreſentatives of a people great and flouriſhing in trade and commerce: that he hoped they would make an addition to the fund of Greenwich hoſpital, and proceed in all their deliberations with ſuch unanimity, zeal and diſpatch, as to convince the world that none of them could be induced, from any views or motives whatever, to wiſh the diſtreſs of their country, or give occaſion, from the proſpect of diviſions, that might be excited and fomented at home, to interrupt or diſappoint their expectations from abroad.

This ſpeech produced the deſired effect: the commons voted 15,000 ſeamen for the ſervice of the current year, and 22,955 land forces. The laſt vote was not, however, carried without a warm debate on the general topics of ſaving to the nation; the danger of the conſtitution from a numerous ſtanding army, and the little effect which the augmentation of troops raiſed laſt year produced, or was likely to produce, in favour of Great-Britain, and which ought therefore now to be reduced.

The next conſiderable debate aroſe from the money voted for the maintenance of the Heſſian troops in Britiſh pay. The ſum amounted to 230,933l. for 12,000 men, horſe, dragoons, and foot. Theſe troops had been engaged by the earneſt requeſt of the late king, and to anſwer the ends of the treaty of Hanover. This was explained by Mr. Horatio Walpole, the miniſter's brother, who ſaid, that the tranquillity of Europe being ſtill precarious, the original reaſon which had been approved by the parliament for taking theſe troops into Britiſh pay, ſtill ſubſiſted. He was anſwered by Sir William Wyndham, who endeavoured to ſhew, "that the demand was prepoſterous, becauſe, by the treaty of Hanover, the contracting parties were to furniſh their contingencies either in troops, ſhipping, or money, within two months after demand made by the party attacked." To this it was replied, "that though the treaty did leave it in the option of the party called upon, not to furniſh his contingencies ſooner than two months after requiſition; yet the ſtate of affairs in Europe rendered it prudent for his late majeſty to have in readineſs, at all events, the troops ſtipulated, which were cheaper to the nation, and more convenient for the common cauſe, than any Britiſh forces that could be employed: that the differences which, ſince the ſigning of the treaty of Hanover, had ariſen between the courts of Great-Britain and Pruſſia, (one of the three principal contracting parties in the treaty of Hanover) having occaſioned a material and unforeſeen diſappointment in the carrying the purpoſes of that treaty into execution, the reaſon for hiring and continuing the Heſſian troops in Britiſh pay became indiſpenſable: that experience had evinced the method to be wiſe and proper, becauſe it had preſerved the tranquillity of Germany, an object highly meriting the attention of the Britiſh nation; and that, upon the whole, not only prudence, but neceſſity required it ſhould be continued till the event of the approaching congreſs at Cambray ſhould be known."

It was eaſily ſeen, from the very beginning of the debate, that the queſtion would be carried by the miniſtry; but the oppoſition, probably for no other reaſon than that of knowing the ſtrength of their party, called for a diviſion, when it appeared that 280 were for the queſtion, and 84 againſt it.

Extraordinary ſupplies being neceſſary for the ſervice of the enſuing year, a propoſition, in conſequence of a motion in the houſe of commons, was made by the lords of the treaſury, to the directors of the bank. This propoſal was, that the bank might advance 1,750,000l. for the purchaſe of 70,000l. per annum of the duty upon coals, to be converted into annuities; and that the bank be impowered to ſell or diſpoſe of thoſe annuities, at ſuch times and in ſuch proportions as they ſhould judge proper; and that the ſinking fund ſhould be applied to pay off 1,000,000 at the bank.

This propoſal was very readily agreed to by the directors of the bank; but the city of London thought proper to preſent a petition to the houſe of commons with regard to the coal tax. They repreſented that the duties already laid on coals and culm, brought into the port of London only, conſiderably affected their trade; and that the inequality of that burden was a great diſcouragement to the manufactures, as well as a great hardſhip upon the whole trading people in and about the city of London. They therefore prayed the houſe to take theſe reaſons into conſideration, and grant them ſuch relief as they ſhould think meet. This petition was ſupported by the anti-miniſterial party, but was rejected by a great majority.

On the 26th of February, the whole ſupply, amounting to near 4,000,000 was voted; and the particulars of the diſtribution of the money granted laſt year had been laid before them. But in this account 250,000l not being particularly ſpecified, they addreſſed his majeſty for a particular and diſtinct account of that ſum. In anſwer to this addreſs, Sir Paul Methuen, by his majeſty's command, acquainted the houſe, that the late king, his majeſty's royal father, having, on the like occaſion, received from the laſt parliament the moſt dutiful acknowledgments of his great care and wiſdom, in taking ſuch ſteps, and entering into ſuch engagements as he thought would beſt conduce to the ſecurity of this kingdom and the preſervation of the peace of Europe; and, at the ſame time, the ſtrongeſt aſſurance of their future ſupport in all ſuch farther meaſures as he ſhould find neceſſary and expedient for preventing a rupture, and for the honour and advantage of theſe kingdoms: and a power being accordingly given by parliament to his late majeſty, for iſſuing and applying ſuch ſums of money as he ſhould find neceſſary, for anſwering and defraying ſuch expences and engagements as had been, or ſhould be made for theſe great and neceſſary purpoſes; ſome part of the money mentioned in this addreſs had been iſſued and diſburſed by his late majeſty; and the remaining part had been applied by his majeſty for carrying on the ſame neceſſary ſervices, for ſtrengthening his alliances, in fulfilling engagements of the utmoſt importance to theſe kingdoms, and to the general tranquillity of Europe, and which required the greateſt ſecrecy. His majeſty therefore hopes, that this houſe will repoſe the ſame confidence in him, and be aſſured that the money has been neceſſarily expended, purſuant to the power given by act of parliament, and for the uſes and purpoſes therein directed; and that a particular account thereof cannot be given, without manifeſt prejudice to the public."

Though this anſwer was not without a precedent, yet it was far from being conformable to the conſtitution of parliament. The oppoſition would not let ſlip ſo fair an advantage; they attacked the miniſtry with all the power of reaſon and eloquence. They repreſented, that the anſwer was unparliamentary; that if ſuch were accepted, the parliament muſt give up their moſt valuable privileges, thoſe of enquiring into the diſpoſal of public money, and the conduct of corrupted and corrupting miniſters, to thoſe very miniſters who ought to be the objects of their cenſure. It was added, "That the anſwer was vague and frivolous, and might be made with equal propriety upon all occaſions of enquiry into the diſpoſal of public money." On the other hand, it was urged, "That this anſwer was conformable to an anſwer returned in the late reign, upon a ſimilar addreſs; that there was no more reaſon for diſtruſting his preſent majeſty, than there was for diſtruſting his father; and the houſe of commons was ſo well ſatisfied on that occaſion, that inſtead of expreſſing any ſymptoms of diſſatisfaction, they had returned the crown an addreſs of thanks for that anſwer." Sir Robert Walpole added, "That it was impoſſible the public ſervice, alluded to, conſidering the various complication of intereſts on the continent, could be carried on if every ſhilling expended for the intereſt of the common cauſe, and for maintaining the balance of Europe, was known to all the world." Theſe reaſons appeared ſatisfactory; for, on the queſtion's being put, it was carried by a very conſiderable majority.

On the 4th of March, the commons took into conſideration the ſtate of the national debt. The houſe having reſolved itſelf into a grand committee, examined the accounts, and interrogated the proper officers, when a court member moved for the following reſolution, "That it appears to this houſe that the monies already iſſued, and applied towards diſcharging the the national debts, incurred before Chriſtmas 1716, together with the ſum of 655,000l. to be iſſued at Lady-Day next, amount to 6,000,645l. 5s. and 1d-¼." The intent of this motion was evidently to appeaſe the clamour which had been raiſed by an aſſertion of Mr. William Pulteney's, that the public debts had increaſed ſince the eſtabliſhment of the ſinking fund. The anti-miniſterial party on the other hand, exerted all their abilities to expoſe the fallacy of this motion. Mr. Daniel Pulteney, whoſe great knowledge of public buſineſs and foreign tranſactions, was univerſally allowed, put himſelf at the head of the debate upon this occaſion. He was ſupported by his relation Mr. W. Pulteney, Mr. Shippen, and many more of the principal men in the oppoſition.

Mr. Daniel Pulteney was a cool but weighty ſpeaker; and though other members in the oppoſition had brighter parts, none of them poſſeſſed ſuperior abilities. Mr. W. Pulteney had by ſtudy carefully improved an excellent natural underſtanding; he was perfectly ſkilled in the knowledge of the Britiſh conſtituion, maſter of a rapid and perſuaſive eloquence, and ſpoke with great freedom and courage. Mr. Shippen was calm, intrepid, ſhrewd and ſarcaſtic. Sir William Wyndham was nervous, manly, and full of ſenatorial dignity. Theſe great men, in the warmeſt terms, declaimed upon the profuſe miſmanagement of the public money. They inſiſted, that notwithſtanding the very liberal grants which had been made by parliament, during the laſt and preſent reign, notwithſtanding the eſtabliſhment of the late ſinking fund, the national debt was annually encreaſing, and that too in a time of profound peace, a circumſtance which yielded a very melancholy proſpect, ſince at this rate the public debts muſt increaſe farther in caſe of a foreign war, or domeſtic commotion; ſo that the heavy and numerous taxes, under which the people at preſent laboured, ſeemed likely to be entailed on them to the lateſt poſterity. Several arguments were made uſe of to ſupport theſe aſſertions, notwithſtanding which the miniſterial party carried their point, and the motion was agreed to without a diviſion.

Though Sir Robert Walpole was ſenſible that he had greatly the ſuperiority of numbers in the houſe in his favour, yet he now reſolved to eſtabliſh his credit with the nation. He knew that the writers for the oppoſition had by numbers and calculations perſuaded the people, that the ſinking fund, which had been extolled as a growing treaſure, ſacred to the diſcharge of national incumbrances, had, by a ſhameful miſapplication, proved of little or no ſervice to the purpoſe for which it was originally intended. Such a notion prevailing among the public could by no means be favourable to the adminiſtration. In order, therefore, to retrieve his character, the miniſter made a ſolemn appeal to the tribunal of majeſty itſelf, by cauſing a repreſentation to be drawn up, containing a particular detail of the national debts diſcharged and incurred ſince the 25th day of December, 1716, with the ſtate of the ſinking fund, and of the public credit.

This repreſentation, being approved of by the houſe, was preſented to his majeſty, who returned a very favourable anſwer; wherein he obſerved, "that he was highly pleaſed with a performance which could not fail to give general ſatisfaction to all his people, by removing thoſe groundleſs jealouſies and apprehenſions which had been propagated and diſperſed through the kingdom: that the happy effects of the flouriſhing ſtate of the public credit were too ſenſibly felt and ſeen, not to be confeſſed and acknowledged by every impartial perſon: that the proviſion made for gradually diſcharging the national debt was now become ſo certain and conſiderable, that nothing (but ſome unforeſeen event) could alter or diminiſh it; a circumſtance that afforded the faireſt proſpect of ſeeing the old debts diſcharged without the neceſſity of incurring new incumbrances; and that they might be well aſſured, that it ſhould ever be his particular care and ſtudy to maintain and preſerve the public credit, and improve the ſinking fund, and to avoid all occaſions of laying new burdens upon his people."

This anſwer, fraught with ſo many expreſſions of tenderneſs for his ſubjects, paved the way for a meſſage from his majeſty to the houſe of commons, which was delivered on the 4th of May by Sir P. Methuen, and conſiſted in a demand of a vote of credit, to fulfil certain engagements concerted and entered into, with the advice and concurrence of the laſt parliament, for ſecuring the trade and navigation of the kingdom, and for reſtoring and preſerving the peace of Europe. This meſſage was productive of a long and violent debate; but notwithſtanding all the efforts of the oppoſition, it was carried by 237 againſt 101, that his majeſty's requeſt ſhould be granted. This compleated the triumph of the miniſter, who now ſeemed to have ſet his foot upon the necks of his adverſaries.

The attention of the parliament, during the remainder of this ſeſſion, was greatly engaged in examining copies of ſeveral treaties and alliances which the king had laid before them. They likewiſe made an attempt to amend the ſtatute of limitations, which in the ſequel, however, did not ſucceed. They paſſed the mutiny bill, together with thoſe relating to the public ſupplies, and ſome others of a private nature. Theſe having received the royal aſſent on the 28th day of May, his majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion, having thanked the commons for the effectual ſupplies they had raiſed, and in particular for having impowered him to borrow 500,000l. for the diſcharge of wages due to the ſeamen employed in the navy.

Soon after the breaking up of the parliament, ſignior Como, agent from the duke of Parma, was ordered to depart the kingdom in two days, his maſter having offered a great inſult to king George, by inviting the Pretender to reſide in his dominions, and receiving him with the honours due to the king of Great Britain.

In the beginning of December, the nation was agreeably ſurprized by the ſudden and unexpected arrival in England of his royal highneſs prince Frederick, the king's eldeſt ſon, who ſet out from Herenhauſen on the 24th of November, attended by the marquis de la Foreſt, his lord-chamberlain, and lieutenant-colonel Delaunay, of the Hanoverian guards, who had been ſent by his majeſty, they being then at the Engliſh court, to bring over his royal highneſs, ſome doubts having been urged in the privy-council concerning the non-reſidence of a prince of Wales in Great Britain. The marquis paſſed for an Engliſh gentlemen by the name of Compton, and the prince for his ſon. Arriving in this manner incognito at Helvoetſluys, they went on board a packet then ready to ſail for Harwich, where his royal highneſs arrived on the third of December, lodged at Colcheſter that night, arrived at Whitechapel the next evening about ſeven, and from thence proceeded in a hackney coach to St. James's. The next day he was introduced to the privy-council, and created prince of Wales. There was a brilliant and numerous court to congratulate his royal highneſs on his ſafe arrival, who was ſoon after addreſſed on the ſame occaſion from all parts of the kingdom.

During theſe tranſactions in England, a congreſs was opened at Soiſſons on the 29th of June. The Britiſh miniſters were William Stanhope, eſq; Horatio Walpole, eſq; and Stephen Poyntz, eſq. Thoſe of the emperor were the counts Zinzendorf and Windiſgratz, and the baron Pentendreedter. Thoſe of the French court were the cardinal de Fleury, the marquis de Fenelon, and the count de Brancas. From Spain were ſent the duke de Bournonville, the marquis de Santa Cruz, and don Ignatio de Bernachea. The Dutch, the Swedes, the Danes, the Ruſſians, the Poles, the dukes of Holſtein, Parma, Bavaria, and the count Palatine, had likewiſe their ſeveral ambaſſadors there. But this numerous train of plenipotentiaries did little more than aſſemble in form, and produce their credentials, for after ſix months ſpent in ceremonies and diverſions they broke up, and ſeparated without adjuſting any one material point in diſpute.

A. D. 1729. The parliament met on the 21ſt of January, when his majeſty, in a ſpeech to both houſes, acquainted them, "that the plan of a proviſional treaty had been approved by him and his allies, but that no ſatisfactory anſwer had as yet been returned by the courts of Vienna and Madrid: that this circumſtance created a ſtate of uncertainty which gave him great uneaſineſs: but he hoped they would believe, that nothing but a regard for the eaſe and intereſt of his people could have prevailed upon him rather to ſuffer ſome temporary inconveniences, with the daily proſpect of a ſafe and honourable peace, than precipitately kindle a war in Europe, and to plunge the nation into greater and ſtill more enormous expences: that he was ſorry to find that the ſtate of affairs obliged him to continue the public expences, in order to enable him, as events might require, to act with vigour, and in concert with his allies, who had all of them reſolved to make the ſame preparations, and to keep on foot all their extraordinary forces: that he had ſome reaſon to believe that the courts of Vienna and Madrid had been encouraged in their dilatory proceedings by the hopes which were given them from hence of creating diſcontents and diviſions among his people; but he was perſuaded that their known affection for him, and a juſt regard for their own honour, and for the intereſt and ſecurity of the nation, would determine them effectually to diſcourage the unnatural and pernicious practices of ſome few, who ſuggeſted the means of diſtreſſing this country, and afterwards clamoured at the inconveniences which they themſelves had occaſioned."

The commons, after voting an addreſs to his majeſty, immediately proceeded to examine the eſtimates, mates, and 15,000 ſeamen were voted for the enſuing year. But a motion being made for continuing the ſame number of land-forces which had been allowed in the preceding year, and which amounted to near 23,000 men, a warm debate enſued, in which Mr. William Pulteney and Mr. Shippen particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves. They endeavoured, from hiſtory and experience, to prove the dangers into which a ſtanding army brought the conſtitution. They urged that the court of Vienna having readily agreed to the preliminaries for a general pacification, there ought to be a reduction of that augmentation of the army, which the differences lately ſubſiſting with the houſe of Auſtria had induced the parliament to agree to. Theſe arguments were treated as abſurd by Mr. Horatio Walpole, and other firm adherents of the miniſter, who ſaid, that as no definitive reſolution in favour of peace had been made by the courts of Vienna and Madrid, the reduction of our national troops, during ſuch a ſtate of indeciſion, would only encourage the powers with whom we were then at variance, to inſiſt upon higher terms. The queſtion was now put for continuing the army upon the ſame footing as the preceding year, which paſſed by a great majority.

In the mean time great depredations were made by the Spaniards on our ſhips and ſettlements in America, which ſo greatly exaſperated the Engliſh, that they were deſirous of immediately repelling their inſults: but the miniſtry, who were entirely devoted to peace, urged, that as ſomething deciſive muſt ſhortly happen, it was moſt eligible, as the nation had waited ſo long, to wait a little longer before it broke out into open hoſtilities. Taking advantage of the popular ſentiments, the oppoſition improved every opportunity of reviling and expoſing the government, who for the ſake of one man ſacrificed the honour and intereſt of their country. In order to counteract theſe attempts, Sir George Oxendon made a motion in the lower houſe for an addreſs to his majeſty, in anſwer to his ſpeech from the throne, to acknowledge his majeſty's great goodneſs and wiſdom in endeavouring to avoid all difficulties and delays, by concerting the moſt expeditious methods of bringing the negotiations at Soiſſons to a ſpeedy and favourable concluſion, expreſſing their grateful ſenſe of his majeſty's watchful care for the eaſe and intereſt of his people, in declining to plunge the nation into an expenſive war, as long as there was any proſpect of obtaining a ſafe and honourable peace; and finally aſſuring him that the houſe, in an entire confidence of his majeſty's tender regard for his own honour and that of the nation, reſted fully ſatisfied, that as ſoon as neceſſity required, he would not fail to take the firſt opportunity of doing juſtice to himſelf and the nation, in ſecuring the trade and commerce of the kingdom.

The oppoſition, however, took care to prevent this ſcheme from ſucceeding, and even to return it back upon the miniſtry, by rendering them obnoxious to the trading part of the kingdom. In order to this they moved for an amendment in Sir George's propoſed addreſs, and that the word "reſtore" ſhould be ſubſtituted in the room of "ſecure" the commerce of the kingdom. This, it muſt be owned, was nothing more than a play upon words; but it anſwered the intention of the propoſers, by giving riſe to a warm debate on a point the miniſterial party were unable to defend, their paſſive behaviour with regard to the inſults of the Spaniards. Sir William Yonge, a frequent and florid ſpeaker, but whoſe private life had been ſuch as had created him many powerful enemies, and the prepoſſeſſion which prevailed againſt him had extended itſelf to his parliamentary and miniſterial character, exerted all his abilities on this occaſion to refute the arguments brought by oppoſition for the amendment. He ſaid, that the difference between reſtoring and ſecuring commerce was a diſtinction without a difference; becauſe ſuppoſing, which he would not by any means admit, the Britiſh commerce was ruined, it muſt be reſtored before it could be ſecured. He obſerved, that whatever was juſt in the outcry againſt the Spaniſh depredations was, in a great meaſure, owing to the intolerable avarice of ſome Engliſh interlopers, who carried on an unlawful traffic with the ſubjects of Spain in America, in defiance of treaties, and the law of nations, as well as to the manifeſt prejudice of the fair Britiſh trader.

After various other debates on this occaſion, the queſtion was at length put, whether the addreſs ſhould ſtand in its original form; which was carried by a great majority.

This victory of the miniſtry was, however, of very little conſequence; for the Spaniards, about this time, having ſeized ſome of our ſhips engaged in a lawful trade, the indignation of the public could not be any longer reſtrained. Petitions were delivered to the commons by the merchants of London, Liverpool, and Briſtol, complaining of the interruption they had ſuffered in their trade for ſeveral years, from the depredations of the Spaniards in the Weſt Indies. The houſe having conſidered theſe petitions, preſented an addreſs to the king, requeſting his majeſty to uſe his utmoſt endeavours for preventing ſuch depredations, procuring juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction, and ſecuring to his ſubjects the free exerciſe of commerce, &c. navigation to and from the Britiſh colonies in America. His majeſty aſſured them, that nothing ſhould be wanting on his part to anſwer the deſires and expectations of his people in an affair of ſuch diſtinguiſhed importance.

During theſe debates in the houſe of commons, the lords had taken into conſideration the ſtate of the kingdom, particularly the poſitive demand made by the court of Spain, for the reſtitution of Gibraltar, founded on a letter written by the late king to his Catholic majeſty, a copy of which was laid before the houſe. The lords engaged in the oppoſition took occaſion from this letter to declaim violently againſt the miniſtry, and moved to reſolve, "That for the honour of his majeſty, and the preſervation and ſecurity of the trade and commerce of this kingdom, effectual care ſhould be taken in the treaty now depending, that the king of Spain do renounce all claim and pretenſions to Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca, in the plaineſt and ſtrongeſt manner."

This motion, however, was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the court party. They inſiſted, in the firſt place, that the pretenſions of the court of Madrid were in themſelves abſurd and frivolous, ſince it appeared from the copy of the letter before them, his majeſty had only ſaid, he would take the firſt opportunity to regulate the article of the reſtitution of Gibraltar with the conſent of his parliament. The promiſe was therefore nothing more than conditional, and could not, in any ſenſe, be binding to his Britannic majeſty, unleſs his parliament ſhould give their conſent. They ſaid further, that, in their opinion, Great Britain had a much better right, by the treaty of Utrecht, to Gibraltar and Minorca, than ſhe poſſibly could have, by any perſonal act or renunciation of his Catholic majeſty. The deſiring therefore any ſuch act would, in ſome meaſure, imply a kind of invalidity of the right by which theſe poſſeſſions were already held. They ſaid, it was not to be doubted, that the king and kingdom of Spain would readily embrace the firſt opportunity of recovering theſe places; nor would any renunciation, however ſtrong and peremptory, prevent their ſeizing ſuch an opportunity, whenever it ſhould offer. Beſides, ſhould his Catholic majeſty, as there was reaſon to believe he would, refuſe to grant any ſuch renunciation as was now propoſed, all Europe would be apt to think that Great Britain held theſe conqueſts by a very weak and invalid title. Many other like arguments were made uſe of, after which the queſtion was put, and a negative paſſed upon the motion. The court party, however, did not think it prudent to ſuffer a matter of ſo much importance to paſs wholly neglected. A meſſage was ſent to the commons, inviting them to a free conference in the painted chamber, relating to the ſubject in debate, which being complied with by that houſe, the lords deſired their concurrence to the following reſolution, "that they do entirely rely upon his majeſty that he will, for maintaining the honour, and ſecuring the trade of this kingdom, take effectual care in the preſent treaty to preſerve his undoubted right to Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca." The oppoſition in the lower houſe were not, however, to be moved from their firſt principles: they inſiſted ſtrenuouſly upon a ſpecifical renunciation of thoſe places on the part of Spain; and the excellency of the arguments they made uſe of on this occaſion brought over many members from the court party, ſo that when the queſtion was put, the miniſtry carried their point by a great majority.

The commons thus agreeing with the peers in their reſolution, a joint addreſs was preſented to the king, from both houſes, on the 25th of March; in anſwer to which his majeſty declared, "that he would take care to ſupport his undoubted right to Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca."

A grant of 115,000l. being voted to make good the deficiency in the civil liſt, it met with a warm oppoſition in both houſes. It was alledged, "that inſtead of a deficiency in the civil liſt revenues, there was a conſiderable ſurplus: that this was a new grant, and a new burden on the people: that the nation was loaded, not to complete, but to augment the ſum deſigned for the civil liſt; and this at a time when the public debts were increaſed, and when the taxes were heavily felt in all parts of the country." They obſerved, "that if the produce of the civil liſt revenue ſhould not amount to the yearly ſum of 800,000l. the deficiency muſt be made good by the public; whereas no proviſion was made, by which, if the produce of thoſe revenues ſhould exceed that ſum, the ſurplus ſhould accrue to the benefit of the public: that by this precedent, not only real deficiencies, but alſo ſupplies were to be given for arrears ſtanding out at the end of every year, which ſhould come on before the ſupplies could be granted, though the ſupply given to make good arrears in one year would certainly increaſe the ſurpluſages in another: that the revenues of the civil liſt were variable in their own nature; and even when there is no deficiency in the produce, there might be arrears in the receipt: theſe might eaſily be increaſed by the management of deſigning miniſters, by private directions to receivers, and by artful methods of ſtating accounts." All theſe arguments were, however, of no avail; every motion made by the minority was rejected, while thoſe of the moſt deſpotic nature, propoſed by the court-party, were carried by an amazing majority.

The complicated buſineſs of this ſeſſion had been attended with ſuch warm arguments, that altercation was now out of breath; and no material matter remaining to be adjuſted, each party wiſhed to retire from the buſtle of buſineſs; the one to enjoy its triumph, the other to brood over its diſcontent. On the 14th of May his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and, after ſigning ſeveral bills, cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he ſignified his intention of viſiting his German dominions; and on the 20th day of the ſame month he ſet out for Hanover.

In the month of September this year, Victor Amadeus II. King of Sardinia and duke of Savoy, reſigning his crown to his ſon Charles Emanuel, prince of Piedmont, and reſerving to himſelf a revenue of 100,000l. per annum, retired to the caſtle of Chambetry. In October, Peter II. czar of Muſcovy, and grandſon of Peter I. died in the 15th year of his age at Muſcovy, and was ſucceeded on the throne by the princeſs Ann Ivanowna, ſecond daughter of Ivan Alexowitz, elder brother of the firſt Peter. In November, died Pope Benedict XIII. Cardinal Laurentio Corſini was raiſed to the pontificate in his room, and aſſumed the name of Clement XII.

All this time the negotiations at Soiſſons ſeemed at a total ſtand: but at length it was agreed to open conferences at Seville between the plenipotentiaries of England, France and Spain. The earl of Harrington, who, previous to this, had been appointed ambaſſador extraordinary to his catholic majeſty, had the management of this treaty on the part of Great Britain, in conjunction with Mr. Keene, the Engliſh plenipotentiary at the court of Madrid.

No material obſtacle ariſing, the treaty was ſigned on the 9th of November; by which it was ſtipulated, "that all former treaties and conventions between the crowns of Great Britain and Spain, ſhould be as amply confirmed as if they had been expreſsly repeated: that their Britannic and Catholic majeſties ſhould guarantee to each other their reſpective dominions; and in caſe either of them ſhould be attacked, the other ſhould furniſh to the party ſo invaded a body of 12,000 men: that all ſuch engagements contracted by his Britannic majeſty, in conſequence of the treaty of Vienna, as were conſiſtent with the treaties ſubſiſting between the crowns of England and Spain, antecedent to the year 1725, ſhould be rendered void and invalid: that the commerce of the Engliſh and French nations, both in Europe and the Indies, ſhould be reſtored to its former footing, and orders ſhould be inſtantly diſpatched on all ſides for that purpoſe: that his Catholic majeſty ſhould make reparation for all the damages that had been done by his ſubjects to thoſe of the other two parties: that commiſſaries ſhould be nominated with ſufficient powers, on the part of their Britannic and Catholic majeſties, who ſhould aſſemble at the court of Spain, within the ſpace of four months after the ratification or ſooner, if poſſible, to decide whatever concerned the ſhips and effects taken on either ſide: that the ſaid commiſſioners ſhould likewiſe examine and decide, according to treaties, the reſpective pretenſions which relate to the abuſes that were ſaid to have been committed in commerce, as well in the Indies as in Europe, and all other reſpective pretenſions in America founded on treaties, whether with reſpect to the limits or otherwiſe: that the ſaid commiſſioners ſhould likewiſe diſcuſs and decide the pretenſions which his Catholic majeſty might have by the treaty of 1721, to the reſtitution of the ſhips taken by the Engliſh fleet in 1718: that the ſaid commiſſioners, after having examined, diſcuſſed and decided the above-mentioned claims and pretenſions, ſhould make a report of their proceedings to their Britannic and Catholic majeſties, who by the preſent treaty promiſed, that in the ſpace of ſix months after making the ſaid report, they would cauſe to be executed punctually and exactly what ſhould have been ſo decided by the ſaid commiſſioners. His Catholic majeſty engages to ſend 6,000 of his troops, without loſs of time, to garriſon Leghorn, Porto, Ferraro, Parma and Placentia, for the better ſecuring and preſerving the ſucceſſion of thoſe ſtates in favour of Don Carlos, and to be ready to withſtand any enterprize and oppoſition that might be formed to the prejudice of what had been already regulated touching the ſucceſſion. The contracting powers alſo promiſe to take the ſofteſt and moſt effectual means of perſuading the dukes of Tuſcany and Parma to admit theſe garriſons, upon their promiſing to take an oath to be faithful to the reigning powers in every thing that ſhould not be contrary to the right of ſucceſſion reſerved to the infant Don Carlos; and upon their engaging not to meddle directly nor indirectly in the government of the places where they ſhould be garriſoned, and to pay to the dukes of Tuſcany and Parma, all the honours due to ſovereigns in their own dominions; and as ſoon as the ſucceſſion of theſe territories ſhould be quietly ſettled in the perſon of Don Carlos, his Catholic majeſty engaged to withdraw his troops from the ſaid garriſons: the contracting princes agree, on their parts, to become guarantees to Don Carlos for the quiet poſſeſſion and enjoyment of the ſaid ſtates of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, after he ſhall have once obtained them. By the thirteenth article of this treaty, the kings of England and France promiſe to ratify and guarantee all the particular regulations that ſhall be concerted between his Catholic majeſty and the dukes of Tuſcany and Parma, relating to the aforeſaid garriſons. The fourteenth and laſt article ſtipulates, that the ſtates-general of the United Provinces ſhall be invited to accede to the treaty, the ratifications of which were to be diſpatched within the ſpace of ſix weeks at fartheſt."

Such were the contents of the famous treaty of Seville, which, by the concurrence of other events, afterwards produced a material alteration in the ſyſtem of Europe.

A. D. 1730. The parliament met on the 3d of January, when his majeſty (who had been ſome time returned from his German dominions) opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he informed both houſes, that he had concluded an abſolute peace with Spain, and thereby prevented the miſeries and calamities inſeparable from a war. He aſſured them that the peace was agreeable to the purport and intention of former treaties, and calculated to render effectual the ſtipulations of the quadruple alliance: that ſufficient proviſion had been made for the indemmification and future ſecurity of the trading intereſt; and that he had given orders for making an immediate reduction both of his land and ſea forces. He then concluded with recommending to their conſideration the ſtate of public credit, and the hardſhips of poor artificers and manufacturers.

The commons were no ſooner returned to their houſe, than Sir Robert Walpole laid before them the treaty of Seville; and one of his friends moved for a particular and loyal addreſs to the throne, almoſt in the very words of the ſpeech. This motion was oppoſed by the country party, who were for ſaying no more than, "To aſſure his majeſty of the ſteady and zealous attachment of the houſe to his royal perſon, government and family; and that the houſe would effectually ſupport his majeſty in all meaſures neceſſary for the honour and dignity of his crown, and the intereſts and welfare of his people."

In ſupport of this alteration and omiſſion, many ſevere things were ſaid of the treaty, which had been publiſhed ſome time. Sir John Hind Cotton ſaid, that the miniſtry had impoſed upon his majeſty in calling the peace an abſolute one, becauſe the moſt important intereſts of Great-Britain were left to a future diſcuſſion. On the contrary, the miniſter maintained, that the peace was abſolute, and that no difference could happen in the execution of it, unleſs the Spaniards and other powers were encouraged to raiſe them by the diſſention that might happen at home. Several other ſpeeches were made on both ſides, but the motion for the omiſſion was rejected by a great majority.

The debates in the houſe of lords, when the treaty of Seville came before them, were of great importance, and carried to a conſiderable length. It was urged, that his imperial majeſty would certainly detach himſelf from a people whoſe miniſters had concluded a treaty ſo eſſentially different from the quadruple alliance. To this it was replied, that there never was, nor could be, any eſſential difference, if the emperor was ſincerely reſolved to fulfil the terms of the quadruple alliance with regard to the eventual ſucceſſion to the duchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia; and that introducing Spaniſh, inſtead of neutral troops, into the garriſons of theſe dominions, could make no material difference, eſpecially as the treaty had, in the ſtrongeſt manner, ſtipulated, that the troops ſhould be withdrawn as ſoon as the ſucceſſion to theſe duchies, which was a principal object of the quadruple alliance, ſhould be ſecured. It was farther urged, that though there was an immaterial difference, which might give umbrage to the court of Vienna, between the treaty in queſtion, and the quadruple alliance; yet the preſervation of the tranquillity of Europe, and the obtaining ſatiſfaction and ſecurity to our commerce, were conſiderations that ought infinitely to outweigh any appreheníion from a reſentment that could be founded only upon pride and ambition.

Great exceptions were alſo taken by the lords in the oppoſition at the ſixth article, whereby the merchants, and others, who had ſuffered greatly by the Spaniſh depredations, were obliged to repair to the court of Spain, in order to make proof of their loſſes. This was repreſented as not only a diſcouragement to the ſufferers, but derogatory to the honour of the nation. This was, however, conſidered as an unreaſonable objection, ſince it was neceſſary for the merchants to apply where only they could have redreſs. The commiſſaries were to meet at the court of Spain; they could not properly meet elſewhere, becauſe the validity or invalidity of the captures complained of muſt be diſcuſſed in thoſe courts where the proofs remained; and the law of nations eſtabliſhes the ſentence of the court of admiralty of that nation where the capture is made, and to be final in all caſes, and in all parts. Had the Spaniards been the complainants, the cauſes muſt have been tried in Great Britain.

After a very tedious debate, objections being made to almoſt every article, the treaty was approved by a very conſiderable majority. It muſt, indeed, be acknowledged, that the miniſtry, in concluding it, were chiefly deſirous of preſerving the public tranquillity, by which England was every day making immenſe acquiſitions of wealth, and improvments in commerce. But this was totally deſtructive of the views of the oppoſition, who well knew that the power of the miniſtry could only be ſhaken in a time of war and commotion. On the other hand, the miniſtry treated the oppoſition they met with too ſuperciliouſly within doors, and too incautiouſly without. Secure of their own numbers in the houſe of commons, and perſuaded that the oppoſition proceeded only from views of intereſt and ambition, they did not enter into that length and ſolemnity of debate that was neceſſary either for the conviction or converſion of the few who oppoſed their meaſures from principle only. They carried their meaſures rather by dividing than debating. Many noblemen and gentlemen of independent fortunes were provoked at this method of proceeding, and reſented it by voting againſt the miniſtry. This gave the public ſuch unfavourable impreſſions of his majeſty's meaſures, that nothing either ſpoken or wrote on the ſide of the miniſtry received the leaſt countenance.

In the mean time his imperial majeſty was not quite ſo paſſive as the Britiſh miniſter and his friends had repreſented him; ſo far from looking upon the introduction of Spaniſh garriſons into Tuſcany and Parma as a trifling variation from the quadruple alliance, he reſented both the matter and the manner of it in the ſtrongeſt terms, as a downright infraction of treaties, derogatory to his honour, and dangerous to his intereſts, as well as to the rights of the empire. Neither did he ſeem diſpoſed to expreſs his reſentment by words only; for he made actual preparations for ſending a number of forces into Italy, with orders to oppoſe the execution of the treaty of Seville; but being in want of money, he ſet a negotiation on foot in England, the only country where he could raiſe it, for a loan of 400,000l. Such a proceeding greatly alarmed our miniſtry: they reſolved, if poſſible, to prevent the ſucceſs of this negotiation; and for this purpoſe a bill was brought into the houſe of commons, to prohibit his majeſty's ſubjects to lend any ſum of money to any foreign prince, ſtate, or potentate, without licence firſt obtained from his majeſty, under his privy-ſeal, or ſome greater authority. This, however, was not to extend to prohibit any ſubſcription to the public funds or trading companies of foreign kingdoms.

When this bill was read a ſecond time, Mr. Daniel Pulteney oppoſed it in very ſtrong terms. He obſerved, "that it would make Holland the market of Europe, and the mart of money to the nations on the continent: that the article of lending money was ſo advantageous, that the Dutch, when engaged themſelves in a war with the Spaniards, who treated them as rebels, lent money, arms, and ammunition to the enemy: that this bill would diſable the Britiſh merchants from lending money to the king of Portugal, a reſtriction that might be attended with very bad conſequences to the nation: that the act, in any event, armed the miniſtry with too great and extenſive a power; and that while the licenſing power remained in the crown, the licences would be iſſued through the hands of the miniſter, who by that means might put many thouſands a year into his pocket: that while this bill reſtrained the merchants from aſſiſting the princes and powers of Europe, it permitted the ſtock-jobbers to trade in their funds without interruption: that it was well known for whoſe benefit this complaiſance was deſigned; but that jobbing in the ſtocks of foreign nations, ſo far from being encouraged, ought to be principally prohibited; this kingdom having ſuffered ſeverely by that means already, without being able to obtain the leaſt relief or aſſiſtance from the miniſtry."

Mr. Barnard poſitively declared he would never conſent to a bill which he deemed a violation of our fundamental laws, and a grievous hardſhip on individuals. He then propoſed an exception by which the prohibition ſhould be reſtricted to the emperor alone, without extending to other powers. But the bill, which was vindicated by Sir Robert Walpole, Mr. Pelham, and Sir Philip Yorke, attorney-generl, and ſupported by the whole weight of miniſterial influence, not only paſſed through the houſe, but was afterwards enacted into a law.

The commons, having examined the eſtimates for the enſuing year, voted 17,709 men for the land ſervice: they continued the ſubſidies to the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, and the duke of Brunſwic Wolfenbuttle; and in order to defray theſe and other neceſſary expences they granted the ſum of 2,280,000l. Theſe meaſures were ſtrongly oppoſed by the anticourtiers, who made ſeveral motions, which they were certain, if agreed to, would render the miniſter uneaſy; and if rejected, would make him unpopular. The two following of theſe were the principal: firſt, "that an addreſs be delivered to his majeſty, humbly to repreſent, that the houſe having, in conſideration of the preſent ſtate of affairs, voted ſuch a number of land forces for the current ſervice of the year, aſſured themſelves that his majeſty, from his juſt regard to the conſtitution of the kingdom, as well as his earneſt deſire to eaſe his people of every charge not abſolutely neceſſary, will take the firſt opportunity to make a farther reduction of thoſe forces, if the ſtate of affairs will admit, before the concluſion of this or the beginning of next ſeſſion of parliament." The ſecond motion was, to bring in a bill "for making more effectual the laws in being for diſabling perſons from being choſen members of parliament who had any penſion during pleaſure, or for any number of years, or any office held in truſt for them from the crown."

The firſt of theſe motions was rejected by the houſe of commons without a diviſion; but the queſtion was carried in favour of the ſecond by a very great majority; notwithſtanding which, after great debates, it was thrown out by the houſe of lords, and in conſequence of this proceeding, a proteſt was entered by twenty-ſix peers.

During this ſeſſion ſeveral acts were paſſed in favour of the ſubjects; among which were the following: an act for appropriating one million of the ſurpluſage ariſing from the ſinking fund, towards the diſcharge of the national debt. An act for extinguiſhing the duties upon ſalt. A third, for the better regulation of juries; and a fourth for explaining and amending an act made in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, entitled, "An act for the relief of debtors, with reſpect to the impriſonment of their perſons."

The national buſineſs being finiſhed, on the 15th of May his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, the concluſive part of which ran thus:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am very glad that, for the general ſatisfaction, you entered into the ſtate of the nation; and it is a great happineſs to ſee, after ſo many unjuſt and unreaſonable clamours, raiſed with all poſſible art, induſtry, and malice, that upon mature deliberation, and the moſt ſolemn debates, you were ſo far from finding any thing worthy of blame or cenſure, that all matters which came under your cognizance met with your approbation.

"This muſt inſpire all mankind with a juſt deteſtation of thoſe incendiaries who, from a ſpirit of envy and diſcontent, continually labour, by ſcandalous libels, to alienate the affections of my people, and to fill their minds with groundleſs jealouſies and unjuſt complaints, in diſhonour of me and my government, and in defiance of the ſenſe of both houſes of parliament.

"But I entirely rely upon your prudence and your concern for the peace and happineſs of your country, to diſcountenance all ſuch ſeditious practices, and to make my people ſenſible, that theſe wicked proceedings have no other view and end than to create confuſion and diſtraction amongſt us."

Soon after the prorogation of the parliament ſeven chiefs of the Cherokee nation of Indians in America arrived in England. They were brought by Sir Alexander Cummin, and introduced to the king, at whoſe feet they laid their crown and regalia, and by an authentic deed acknowledged themſelves ſubject to his dominion, in the name of all their countrymen, who had veſted them with full powers for this purpoſe. They gave their aſſent in the moſt ſolemn manner to articles of friendſhip and commerce propoſed to them by the government; and being loaded with preſents ſuited to their taſte and inclination, were re-conveyed to their own country.

A great remiſſneſs of government prevailed at this time in England. Peace, both at home and abroad, continued to be the great object of the miniſter. Proſperity in commerce introduced luxury; hence neceſſities were created, and theſe drove the lower claſs of people into the moſt abandoned wickedneſs. Averſe to all penal and ſanguinary meaſures, the miniſter gave not that encouragement to the ordinary magiſtrates that would enable them to give an effectual check to vice among the multitude. This produced a very pernicious effect among the higher claſs; ſo that an almoſt univerſal degeneracy of manners prevailed. It was not ſafe to travel the roads or walk the ſtreets; and often the civil officers themſelves dared neither to repel the violences, nor puniſh the crimes that were committed. A ſpecies of villains now ſtarted up, unknown to former times, who made it their buſineſs to write letters to men of ſubſtance, threatening to ſet fire to their houſes, in caſe they refuſed their demands; and ſometimes their threats were carried into execution. In ſhort, the peculiar depravity of the times became at length ſo alarming, that the government was obliged to interpoſe, and a conſiderable reward was offered for diſcovering the ruffians concerned in ſuch execrable practices.

A. D. 1731. The parliament met on the 21ſt of January, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne. It was generally ſuppoſed that the obſtinacy of the emperor would occaſion a war, he having given orders for a large body of troops to march into Italy, to oppoſe the introduction of Spaniſh garriſons, ſtipulated by the treaty of Seville. The king hinted at this in his ſpeech; and almoſt the whole of it conſiſted of earneſt exhortations to his parliament to enable him to be ready to carry the treaty into execution by arms, if force ſhould be found neceſſary.

As ſoon as the commons returned to their houſe, a very loyal addreſs, in anſwer to the king's ſpeech, was moved for by Mr. Campbell; but the oppoſite party made a motion that all the complimentary part of it ſhould be left out, and only promiſe to concur with ſuch means as ſhould be abſolutely neſſary to procure the ſatisfaction due to the allies, and provide for the intereſts of the people; and then to inſert the following words: "aſſuring ourſelves, that his majeſty will take effectual care to prevent the breaking out of war upon the Rhine, or in the Auſtrian Netherlands; the preſervation of which, in the hands they now are, is of the greateſt importance to theſe kingdoms, and the maintenance whereof has coſt the nation ſo much blood and treaſure."

The principal ſpeakers, in ſupport of this motion, were Sir William Wyndham, and Meſſrs. Daniel and William Pulteney, who enjoyed the infinite advantage of having on their ſide all the popular topics, which experience has ſince evinced, in many caſes, to have been mere ſounds; and yet, at that time, were of ſuch force, that the court party durſt not diſpute them. The power of France was repreſented as threatening the liberties both of England and Europe. Evidence was again offered to be produced of their having cleared and repaired the harbour of Dunkirk, contrary to the treaty of Utrecht. Great complaints were made of their encroachments upon us in the Weſt-Indies; and all was aſcribed to the pernicious connections we had lately run into with them. It was farther repreſented, that, for England to join with France in any attempts againſt the emperor, either in Flanders, or upon the Rhine, would be acting againſt the moſt eſtabliſhed maxim of the late glorious confederacy, that had humbled the power of France under the duke of Marlborough; and that it would undo the balance of power, which had been ſo happily eſtabliſhed, and was the chief acquiſition which England or Europe had obtained by that confederacy. Some obſervations were likewiſe made on the danger and inexpediency of the houſe promiſing indiſcriminately the firſt day of the ſeſſion, to ſupport all his majeſty's meaſures and engagements, before they knew what they were; and that, in fact, ſuch an aſſurance rendered all their future deliberations, for that ſeſſion, totally uſeleſs.

Several of the miniſterial members were in ſome degree ſtagnated at the forcibility of theſe arguments, particularly Sir Robert Walpole and his brother, lord Hervey, and Sir William Young. Being profeſſed whigs, they could not, with conſiſtency, deny, that it would be very dangerous for public liberty, ſhould England co-operate with the French upon the Rhine, or in Flanders, againſt the emperor; and yet nothing could be more plain, than that the amendment propoſed was impolitic in itſelf, and diſreſpectful to his majeſty. In the courſe of the debate, they publicly declared their ſentiments on this head; obſerving, "That if the amendment was agreed to, it would be attended by the worſt of conſequences, both at home and abroad, and appear as if his majeſty had intended any thing that was not abſolutely neceſſary for the intereſt of England, and ſtrictly agreeable to the principles of public liberty: that ſuch an inſinuation could only tend to diſcourage the friends of the proteſtant ſucceſſion at home, and animate their enemies abroad; and therefore they ought to truſt to his majeſty's wonted prudence; and, that the putting ſuch words in the addreſs would look like an incroachment upon the prerogative of the crown, and directing the operations of the future war." Lord Hervey obſerved, "That the houſe of Auſtria, as well as the houſe of Bourbon, might, by its ambition, deſtroy that balance of power, ſo juſtly dear to England: that as the conduct of the French court upon the continent could give no juſt umbrage, the deſtroying the houſe of Bourbon, only to enable the houſe of Auſtria to riſe on its ruins, was highly abſurd: that he did not doubt but his majeſty had ſufficient intereſt with his allies, to concert meaſures which would prevent every bad conſequence apprehended, and, that to agree to the propoſed alteration, would be making proclamation to all Europe, that the emperor might act as he pleaſed, ſince he was invulnerable at preſent in Italy, by the ſituation of his dominions, and the great number of troops he had there: if, therefore, the allies ſhould agree, that he was not to be attacked on the Rhine, or in the Netherlands, his majeſty and his allies had nothing to do, but meekly ſubmit to laws impoſed by the court of Vienna."

Theſe arguments being admitted by the houſe, and the propoſed alteration on the point of being rejected, one of the members moved, that it ſhould be inſerted in the addreſs, "that they would ſupport his majeſty's engagements, ſo far as they related to the intereſts of Great Britain." But the amendment being ſubject to the very ſame, if not greater objections than the former, they were both rejected, and the addreſs, as moved for, was voted without any diviſion.

This matter being adjuſted, the anti-courtiers reſolved once more to revive the penſion-bill, which had been rejected in the laſt ſeſſion. The motion was introduced with great ſolemnity; and after paſſing, with very little oppoſition through the houſe of commons, was ſent to the houſe of peers, where it was thrown out. A remarkable ſpeech was made on this occaſion by the biſhop of Bangor, wherein he plainly proved, that, under the maſk of popularity, this motion concealed the moſt dangerous tendency, and concluded in the following words: "Though this bill, at firſt ſight, ſeems to be a ſelf-denying bill, and to ſome particular members, may prove ſo; yet the commons, conſidered as an houſe of parliament, will find in it, no doubt, a great enlargement of power; and whatever tends to break the balance between the powers, eſſential to this conſtitution, muſt, ſooner or later, prove the ruin of the whole. An independent houſe of commons, or an independent houſe of lords, is as inconſiſtent with our conſtitution, as an independent, that is, an abſolute king; and whoever loves the liberties and laws of his country will no more deſire to ſee the one than the other. Let bribery be puniſhed; let corruption be puniſhed; but not by giving ſo much ſtrength to one power of this conſtitution, as ſhall make it able to overbear the reſt."

The anti-courtiers did not fail to repreſent this ſpeech in the moſt heinous light. They cauſed it to be circulated throughout the kingdom, with their own notes and commentaries upon it; wherein they endeavoured to prove, that his lordſhip only expreſſed the ſentiments of the miniſter, who had formed a deſign of ſubverting the conſtitution, by deſtroying the independency of the two houſes of parliament.

The miniſterial party carried every queſtion with ſuch facility, that the minority imputed it to the remiſſneſs of their friends in not attending the houſe; and having no compulſive power over them, they endeavoured to obtain one by the following method. A call of the houſe being ordered and held, two members, who were conſidered of the country party, were, by their friends, moved to be taken into cuſtody for non-attendance; but, on the interpoſition of the court party, they were held excuſed; which ſerving as a precedent, the ſame lenity was extended to ſuch as could plead excuſes of indiſpoſition, being on the road, or any other trivial cauſe. The majority, however, having afterwards taken this affair into conſideration, found that they had treated it with too little attention; and agreed, that certain days ſhould be appointed for the defaulters to attend; and, in caſe of diſobedience of theſe orders, they were to be taken into cuſtody by the ſerjeant at arms.

This great preparation, on the part of the minority, was intended to ſtrengthen a ſecond attack they meditated upon the eſtabliſhment of the Heſſians in Britiſh pay: for, after the houſe had been furniſhed with all neceſſary papers, a motion was made for referring the eſtimate of the 12,000 Heſſian troops in the pay of Great Britain, to the committee of ſupply. This motion occaſioned a very warm debate. Mr. Daniel Pulteney obſerved, "that wars had happened on the continent of Europe, of which, though foreign to the intereſt of England, ſhe had borne the expence." In reply to this, it was urged, "that commerce had connected England with the continent, though nature had disjoined her from it: that the Engliſh, by their influence on the affairs of the continent, had acquired many advantages in trade; and in order to maintain theſe, they were ſometimes obliged to interfere in foreign quarrels: that ſome countries of Europe, which conſumed a great number of Engliſh commodities, had ſo little communication with the ſea, that they were inacceſſible to our fleets; and, therefore, if they lay the trade of the Engliſh under any hardſhips or inconveniences, or offered them any inſults or indignities, the Engliſh had no other means of aſſerting their rights, or recovering their wrongs, than by employing ſome of the powerful ſtates upon the continent to ſupport their reſentment: that this had frequently been found a very uſeful expedient to England; but that ſhe could not any longer avail herſelf of it, than while ſhe, in her turn, was ready to perform as friendly offices for thoſe ſtates. They aſſerted, that it was upon this very principle that the treaty of Hanover was concluded, and the Heſſian troops were taken into Britiſh pay; and that thoſe two meaſures had prevented the fatal effects which might have attended the ambition and obſtinacy of the emperor: that upon the ſame principle likewiſe was founded the treaty of Seville, which, by our engaging for the introduction of 6,000 Spaniſh troops into Italy, had effectually detached Spain from the emperor: that the latter, however, had filled Italy with his armies, in order to prevent the introduction of thoſe garriſons. It was alſo obſerved, that the Heſſians, who were in Britiſh pay, were the only curbs the emperor had in Germany; conſequently, that the diſmiſſion of theſe forces would leave him at liberty to kindle a flame in Europe, which might coſt Great-Britain many millions to extinguiſh.

Theſe were the principal arguments made uſe of during the courſe of this debate, and by which the parliament was determined to continue the eſtabliſhment of the Heſſian troops. Arguments to the ſame purport were urged when the ſubſidy to the duke of Wolfenbuttle was brought upon the carpet. The minority affected to treat that prince with great contempt for his inſignificancy and indigence; and in order to protract the time, and expoſe the meaſure as much as poſſible, a motion was made, and agreed to, for reading the third ſection of an act paſſed in the reign of William III. for the further limitation of the crown; wich ſays, "In caſe the crown ſhall come to any perſon, not being a native of England, this nation ſhall not be obliged to go to war for defence of dominions not belonging to this crown." They likewiſe addreſſed for all the papers and treaties relative to the ſubſidy; but the ſame being referred to a committee of the whole houſe, by the majority of 194 againſt 112, the queſtion paſſed in the affirmative, and the prince ſubſidy was continued.

The anti-courtiers now ſuppoſing themſelves more conſiderable than ever, and knowing that the management of foreign affairs had created public murmurs againſt the miniſter, reſolved to diſtreſs him as much as poſſible on that ſubject, by making motions, which if carried in the negative, would heighten the ill impreſſions already conceived of him. They accordingly addreſſed for all the papers relative to the treaty of Seville; for an account of the progreſs of the commiſſaries appointed by his majeſty and the king of Spain in conſequence of that treaty, for adjuſting the demands and reparations due to the merchants of Great-Britain. The eſtabliſhment of a civil government at Gibraltar had been long a favourite point with the people; but being attended with great difficulties, it had not yet been put in execution: they therefore carried an addreſs for an account of all the proceedings that had been had on that account, and for declaring Gibraltar a free port, ſince the laſt application of the houſe to his majeſty on that head. Another cauſe for an addreſs, and which appeared too plauſible to be refuſed, was, the non-compliance of the Spaniards with the treaty of Seville in commercial points, and their continuing in a manner to block up Gibraltar. This addreſs was for copies of ſuch repreſentations as his majeſty had received from the governor of Gibraltar, and from his majeſty's miniſter at the court of Spain, in relation to any works carried on at Gibraltar by the Spaniards ſince the concluſion of the treaty of Seville; together with ſuch orders as had been given thereupon. All theſe papers were accordingly laid before the houſe, but very little uſe was made of them, except furniſhing the heads of the party with materials for pamphlet-writing, which now raged in England to an exceſſive height.

The buſineſs of the remaining part of this ſeſſion conſiſted chiefly of projecting means for relieving the ſubject from the abuſes of the law, and likewiſe from the exorbitant and unreaſonable rates exacted (by a Society called the Charitable Corporation) from the induſtrious poor, for money they ſupplied them with upon goods pledged, &c. This affair being referred to a committee, after proper examination of perſons and papers, it appeared that the corporation had taken, for large ſums they had lent, ten per cent. under colour and pretence of reaſonable coſts and charges: upon which a bill was brought into the houſe, and afterwards paſſed, for regulating the lending of money upon pledges, and for preventing uſury and extortion.

The national buſineſs being now finiſhed, his majeſty, on the 4th of May, went to the houſe of peers, and after ſigning ſuch bills as were ready for the royal aſſent, prorogued the parliament.

The diſputes which had happened in the execution of the treaty of Seville, by the haughtineſs and obſtinacy of the court of Spain, threw Europe, at this juncture, into a very extraordinary ſituation. The emperor alledged, that the treaty was an encroachment upon him, as head of the empire; and that Don Carlos ought to have been introduced into Italy, and the ſucceſſion of the dominions there ſecured to him, by his receiving the inveſtiture of them from the emperor, and by the conſent of the empire; both which were ready to be granted when demanded. He alſo aſſerted, that the ſucceſſion of Don Carlos to the duchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, was not the ultimate view of the court of Spain.

In the beginning of this year, the duke of Parma died ſuddenly, and the imperial troops took immediate poſſeſſion of his dominions; but the ducheſs of Parma, in order to retard the ſucceſſion of Don Carlos, was prevailed upon to declare herſelf with child; upon which the imperialiſts publicly avowed, that they had taken poſſeſſion of the duchies under the auſpices of the emperor, in the name of the infant Don Carlos, the heir, provided he did not come armed, but in a pacific manner; and a ſalvo was included for the iſſue of the pregnant ducheſs, if it ſhould prove a male.

The Spaniſh emiſſaries immediately informed that court of this tranſaction, and likewiſe that a negotiation was far advanced between the courts of Vienna and London; whereby it was agreed, that the contracting parties in the treaty of Seville ſhould guarantee the pragmatic ſanction, by which the emperor's female iſſue was to ſucceed to his hereditary dominions. This intelligence, added to the commercial diſputes which ſtill ſubſiſted between the courts of Great-Britain and Spain, ſo greatly exaſperated the latter, that the marquis de Caſtelar, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at Paris, ſigned a declaration to the miniſters of the allies of the treaty of Seville, in the name of the king his maſter, importing, "that his Catholic majeſty looked upon himſelf as entirely free from the obligations of the ſaid treaty."

On the 16th of May, a treaty was actually ſigned between his Britannic majeſty and the emperor. It conſiſted of nine articles, the ſubſtance of which was as follows:

By the firſt a mutual guarantee of all the territories belonging to the contracting powers is ſtipulated.

The ſecond ſtipulates a general guarantee of the pragmatic ſanction in favour of the emperor's female heirs.

By the third, his imperial majeſty conſents to the introduction of the Spaniſh troops into the duchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia; and binds himſelf to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to obtain the conſent of the empire for that purpoſe.

The fourth ſtipulates that all parts of the treaty ſhall be duly and truly executed.

The fifth entirely aboliſhes all navigation to the Auſtrian Netherlands, excepting the ſending, once only, two ſhips from Oſtend, and by this article alſo commiſſioners are to meet on the part of both powers at Antwerp, for ſettling a tariff between Great Britain and the Auſtrian Netherlands.

By the ſixth, it is agreed, that all points of difference amongſt the contracting powers, or any of their allies, ſhould be amicably adjuſted; and that the preſent treaty is not to derogate from the force of any of the former treaties ſubſiſting between either of the contracting parties, or their allies, excepting ſo far as they are inconſiſtent with the preſent treaty.

By the ſeventh, the Engliſh, touching their commerce in the kingdom of Sicily, are to be treated on the ſame footing as they were in the reign of Charles II. of Spain, and as it is uſual to treat a nation with which we are in ſtrict friendſhip.

The eighth fixes eight months after the ratification for the acceſſion of the other powers, who ſhall be invited into the treaty.

By the ninth, which is alſo the laſt article, ſix weeks are allowed for exchanging the letters of ratification.

Beſides theſe, there was a ſeperate article, which declared, "that the guarantee entered into by the contracting powers ſhould not extend to the emperor's dominions, which might be attacked by the Turks." At the ſame time, his Britannic majeſty declared authentically, "that notwithſtanding the introduction of Spaniſh garriſons into the ſtrong places of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, yet that he had no intention to depart from what had been ſettled by the fifth article of the quadruple alliance, either with regard to the rights of his imperial majeſty and the empire, or to the ſecurity of the kingdoms and ſtates, which his imperial majeſty actually poſſeſſes in Italy; or, laſtly, to the preſervation of the quiet and dignity of thoſe duchies; and therefore he renews to the emperor the guarantee of thoſe countries." But to take away all ſuſpicion of the emperor's trifling in this matter, he publiſhed a declaration, of the ſame force and date with the treaty, importing, "that if the pregnant ducheſs-dowager of Parma ſhould be delivered of a ſon, the introduction of the Spaniſh troops to that duchy ſhould ſtill take place; and that if ſhe ſhould be brought to bed of a daughter, Don Carlos was immediately to be put into poſſeſſion of the duchies of Parma and Placentia, by an eventual inveſtiture from the emperor and the empire." And his imperial majeſty farther declares, "that in caſe the ducheſs-dowager ſhould be delivered of a daughter, he will immediately withdraw his troops from the duchies of Parma and Placentia, to give way to the peaceable poſſeſſion of Don Carlos."

Though the ſtates-general appeared as one of the principal contracting parties in this treaty, yet it was pretended that the nature of their government required ſome time before they could formally accede to it: but the real fact was, that the ſtates, at the inſtigation of the French, who were greatly chagrined by this ſecond treaty of Vienna, reſented, at firſt, their being excluded from all the negotiations previous to a treaty in which they were inſerted as principal contracting parties. France had, at this time, ſuperior influence in their government, either to the emperor or Great-Britain, as ſeparate powers, but was not equal to them jointly: and the Dutch, after making ſeveral reſtrictions, acceded to the treaty.

France was highly offended at the guarantee of the pragmatic ſanction by Great-Britain and the ſtates-general; and it was even ſuppoſed that their reſentment had prompted them to attempt an immediate invaſion of this kingdom, a large body of troops being aſſembled at Dunkirk. To prevent any deſign of this kind from ſucceeding, the coaſts of Kent were covered with regiments of horſe and foot, who received orders to march thither from all parts of the kingdom.

Theſe apprehenſions being at length diſſipated, and news arriving that general Stampa, with the imperial forces, had taken formal poſſeſſion of Parma and Placentia, in conſequence of the ducheſs having declared herſelf not pregnant, Sir Charles Wager was diſpatched with a large ſquadron of Engliſh ſhips, to Spain, in order to attend Don Carlos with the Spaniſh troops to his new dominions. His Catholic majeſty, however, thought proper to diſcharge Sir Charles from the trouble of taking Don Carlos under his care, and only deſired him, in conjunction with his own admiral, to convoy the Spaniſh troops to Italy, which requeſt being complied with, the Britiſh ſquadron returned to England. In the mean time the young prince having travelled by land as far as Antibes, embarked at that place on board the Spaniſh gallies, and on the 27th of December landed at Leghorn, where he was received with all poſſible marks of joy and reſpect.

A. D. 1732. The parliament met on the 13th of January, when the king, in his ſpeech, informed them, "That the general tranquillity of Europe was now reſtored and eſtabliſhed, and all his expectations on that head fully anſwered; that ſhare of credit and influence which the crown of Great Britain had had in accompliſhing that difficult and diſagreeable work, and which redounded ſo much to the honour and intereſt of the nation, as it was univerſally confeſſed abroad, would, he was confident, be agreeable to his people, and acknowledged with gratitude by his parliament: that from the time of concluding the quadruple alliance, the ſeveral courts of Europe had been employed in finding means to execute the meaſures which the contracting powers had concerted for procuring the ſucceſſion of Tuſcany and Parma in favour of the infant of Spain; but the various jarring and contending intereſts, hard to be reconciled and united in effectuating a point of ſo much importance; the ambitious views and hopes of obtaining on every ſide farther advantages, and the natural jealouſies and ſuſpicions ariſing among the ſeveral powers concerned; all theſe oppoſite principles and purpoſes had kept in ſuſpenſe and unexecuted what the court of Spain had very much at heart, and had occaſioned ſuch troubles and diſturbances as embarraſſed the affairs of Europe for many years, and particularly affected the intereſt of the nation." He then concluded in the following manner: "This happy ſituation of affairs, I promiſe myſelf will inſpire you all with ſuch temper and unanimity, and ſuch ardent zeal for the public welfare, as becomes a parliament ſenſible of the great bleſſing they enjoy: the duty and affection of my ſubjects is all the return I deſire for my paternal care and concern for them: my government has no ſecurity but what is equally conducive to the happineſs and to the welfare of my people; and their happineſs has no foundation but in the defence and ſupport of my government; our ſafety is mutual, our intereſts inſeparable."

From this ſpeech it is ſufficiently evident, that his majeſty and his miniſters imagined the ſucceſs and wiſdom of their conduct had ſtopped the mouth of oppoſition, and given univerſal ſatisfaction to the people. But in this they were miſtaken; the oppoſition continued as ſtrong and violent as ever. The very motion for an addreſs was oppoſed, the miniſtry ridiculed for the inconſiſtency of their negotiations, and ſome of them perſonally attacked with the ſevereſt reflections.

The commons, however, immediately took the ſupply into conſideration, when Sir William Strickland, ſecretary at war, moved for 17,709 men for the ſervice of the current year. This motion occaſioned long and warm debates. Strong and powerful arguments were made uſe of by the oppoſition for a reduction; notwithſtanding which, when the queſtion was put, it was carried by a great majority, "that the ſtanding army ſhould be maintained without reduction."

Senſible of the acrimony with which all their meaſures, both at home and abroad, were repreſented, the miniſtry reſolved to make an eſſay towards recovering their popularity with the landed intereſt of England. This was no other than that of leſſening the land-tax by reviving the duty upon ſalt. Accordingly, when the houſe was reſolved into a committee, Sir Robert Walpole ſaid, "That in raiſing the ſupply voted, his majeſty was deſirous that the burden ſhould fall as equally as poſſible upon all his ſubjects: that it had long reſted upon the gentlemen of the landed intereſt; and that as no tax could be more general than that upon ſalt, though at the ſame time ſeverely felt by individuals, however poor, he moved, that, towards raiſing the ſupply granted to his majeſty, the ſeveral duties upon home-made ſalt, granted, by ſeveral acts of parliament, to king William, be revived, and granted to his majeſty for the term of three years. In order to ſupport this motion, he ſaid, he hoped the land-tax might be reduced one ſhilling in the pound; and obſerved how hard it bore upon antient Engliſh families, who had many children, and but ſmall eſtates to ſupport them; but the reducing the land-tax might reſtore them to their antient hoſpitality and figure in their ſeveral counties; both which, by the preſſure of that impoſition, were now greatly reduced."

This ſpeech, however, was not received with that pleaſure the miniſter ſeemed to expect. Mr. Plummer, in very ſtrong terms, endeavoured to prove, that the reaſons for taking off the ſalt duty was ſuch as muſt always ſubſiſt againſt ever reviving it; becauſe it was very juſtly conſidered as a tax that, of all others, was moſt burdenſome to the poor, and the moſt pernicious to the trade of this kingdom: that the very character of a right tax was wanting in this; for it was ſo far from taxing the luxuries of life, that it taxed the moſt ordinary neceſſaries: that the motion, if complied with, tended to diſtreſs the landed gentlemen more than the land-tax itſelf: becauſe, by diſabling manufacturers from carrying on their trade, it diſabled tenants from paying their rents; and that it was, beſides, highly impolitical, ſince the revival of it might tend to alienate the affections of the people from his majeſty. "I only deſire," continued, he, "every landed gentleman to conſider what he would make of his eſtate, if we had no trade, no manufactures, nor any number of populous towns in England. Who would be ſuch a fool as to deſire to be relieved of one ſhilling in the pound upon the land-tax, when he muſt pay as much for the ſalt made uſe of in his family; and when at the ſame time he diminiſhes the yearly income of his eſtate much more than one ſhilling in the pound, nay much more than any land-tax ever amounted to in England. The land-tax is but an annual diminution of a gentleman's eſtate; he may, perhaps, be free from a part of it the enſuing year; but if, by the decay of our trade, and the charge laid upon the poor farmer, he is obliged to lower the rents of his eſtate, that will be a diminution which, I fear, will endure for ever."

This oppoſition was not expected, and therefore the arguments were the more difficult to be anſwered; eſpecially as the oppoſition conſidered the tax in the moſt minute particulars. The bill, however, paſſed the houſe by a conſiderable majority. It was oppoſed with the ſame vigour in the houſe of peers; and when it paſſed near twenty lords entered their proteſts.

In the laſt ſeſſion ſome complaints had been made to the houſe of commons againſt the Society called, "The charitable corporation;" which affair now became very ſerious. This company was firſt erected in 1707, and their profeſſed intention was to lend money at legal intereſt to the poor upon ſmall pledges, and to perſons of better rank upon an indubitable ſecurity of goods. At firſt their capital was limited at 30,000l. but had been increaſed by licenſes from the crown to 60,000l. In the month of October George Robinſon, eſq; their caſhier, and John Thompſon, their warehouſe-keeper, diſappeared in one day. The proprietors, alarmed at this incident, held ſeveral general courts, and appointed a committee to examine the ſtate of their affairs, when it ſoon appeared that a moſt vile ſcene of villainy and corruption had been carried on, there being but 30,000l. left to anſwer a capital of 60,000l. the remainder having been embezzled by means which could not be diſcovered. Hereupon the proprietors preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, repreſenting, that by the moſt notorious breach of truſt in ſeveral perſons, to whom they had committed the management of their affairs, the corporation had been defrauded of the greateſt part of their capital, and many of the proprietors were reduced to abſolute beggary; they, therefore, humbly prayed, that as they were unable to detect the combinations of thoſe who had ruined them, or to bring the delinquents to condign puniſhment, without the aid and aſſiſtance of parliament, the houſe would be pleaſed to examine into the ſtate and condition of the corporation, and the conduct of the managers, and give ſuch relief to the petitioners as the houſe ſhould think proper.

As ſoon as this petition was read, a ſecret committee was immediately appointed to proceed on the enquiry. They ſoon diſcovered a moſt iniquitous ſcene of fraud, which had been acted by Robinſon and Thompſon, in concert with ſome of the directors for embezzling the capital and cheating the proprietors. Many perſons of rank and quality were concerned in this infamous conſpiracy: ſome of the firſt characters in the nation did not eſcape ſuſpicion and cenſure. Sir Robert Sutton, and Sir Archibald Grant, having had a conſiderable ſhare in theſe fraudulent practices, were expelled the houſe: and a bill was brought in to reſtrain them and other delinquents from leaving the kingdom, or alienating their effects.

In the mean time the committee received a letter from John Angelo Belloni, an eminent banker at Rome, informing them, that Thompſon was ſecured in that city, with all his papers, and confined in the caſtle of St. Angelo; that the papers had been tranſmitted to a perſon at Paris, who ſhould deliver them up on certain conditions ſtipulated in favour of the priſoner.

From ſeveral concurring circumſtances, and the characters of the perſons concerned in conducting this intelligence, the committee inferred, that it was no other than an artifice to inſinuate a favourable opinion of the Pretender, as if he had procured the arreſt of Thompſon, from his zeal for juſtice, and affection to the Engliſh nation: the propoſals contained in the letter were, therefore, rejected with diſdain, and both houſes concurred in an order, that the letter ſhould be burned by the hands of the common hangman, at the Royal Exchange: and the lower houſe came to the following reſolution: "That it was an inſolent, audacious libel, attempting, by falſe and inſidious inſinuations, to impoſe upon the parliament and people of Great Britain; and by ſpecious pretences, and profeſſions of eſteem, affection, and compaſſion, to amuſe the unhappy ſufferers of the Charitable Corporation with vain and deceitful hopes of relief: that the ſaid letter was, in itſelf, abſurd and contradictory, conceived, at the beginning, in terms, and in the ſtyle of power and authority, or as proceeding from ſome extraordinary intereſt and influence, but concluding in the perſon and character of a private banker at Rome, who agreed, upon certain conditions in behalf of John Thompſon, to deliver certain books and papers belonging to the ſaid Thompſon; that the conditions required and demanded in favour of Thompſon ſeemed, at the ſame time to be vague, evaſive, and uncertain, tending to procure advantages and indemnity to himſelf and his accomplices, without any proſpect of benefit to the corporation: and that the whole tranſaction appeared to be a ſcandalous artifice, calculated partly to delude the unhappy, and partly to diſguiſe and conceal the wicked practices of the profeſſed enemies to his majeſty's perſon, crown and dignity."

Another, but a more daring and barefaced inſtance of the abuſe of parliamentary confidence, happened to be diſcovered this ſeſſion, by the unwearied application of lord Gage. Certain commiſſioners had been appointed to ſell the Engliſh eſtates forfeited by the rebellion of the year 1715; and among others, the forfeited reverſion of one that had belonged to the Derwentwater family, which was adjudged worth 9,000l. a year: this reverſion had been ſold, in a clandeſtine manner, by two of the commiſſioners only, to one Mr. Smith, a friend of theirs, for the trifling ſum of 1,000l. This affair was no ſooner known abroad, than it made a very great noiſe, and, by the indefatigable pains which lord Gage took, the whole ſcene of iniquity was minutely detected; in conſequence of which a bill was prepared in the lower houſe, to make the ſale void. Dennis Bond, eſq. (one of thoſe concerned in the Charitable Corporation affair) and ſerjeant Birch, commiſſioners for the ſale of the forfeited eſtates, were declared guilty of a notorious breach of truſt, and expelled the houſe, of which they were members. During this ſeſſion, no leſs than five members of parliament were expelled for the moſt ſordid acts of knavery; a melancholy proof of national degeneracy.

The parliament having granted the neceſſary ſupplies, his majeſty, on the firſt of June, went to the houſe of peers, and after having ſigned ſuch bills as were ready, and informed both houſes that he intended to viſit his German dominions, cloſed the ſeſſion; a few days after which he ſet out for Hanover.

The private domeſtic occurrences of this year are not worth mentioning in a general hiſtory; but an oppoſition very dangerous to the miniſter was now fomenting in the nation. The debates about the revival of the ſalt-duty, and ſome other ſurmiſes, which had taken riſe from the complaints the officers of the revenue in general made of the collection of the duties on wine and tobacco, two capital branches of the revenue, impreſſed the public with a notion, that either a general exciſe, or an exciſe on theſe two articles, was intended by the miniſter. The whole nation was alarmed even before the miniſter had openly declared his intention.

A. D. 1733. The king being returned from his German dominions, the parliament met on the 16th of January, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſhort ſpeech from the throne; in which he adviſed them to raiſe the annual ſupplies in the leaſt burthenſome ſome manner they could project; and exhorted them to avoid heats and animoſities, and not to ſuffer themſelves to be diverted by any ſpecious pretences, from ſtedfaſtly purſuing the true intereſt of their country.

But however inoffenſive this ſpeech might appear, yet an addreſs, which was nothing more than its eccho, was ſtrongly oppoſed. Sir John Barnard opened the debate, and ſufficiently ſhewed by his ſpeech that he was no ſtranger to the ſcheme intended to be brought into the houſe by the miniſter, and that both himſelf and all his friends in the oppoſition were determined to exert all their power to render it abortive. He concluded with propoſing an amendment to the addreſs, implying, "that the manner of raiſing the ſupplies ſhould be conſiſtent with the trade, intereſt and liberty of the nation." Mr. Sandys ſeconded his motion; and Mr. Shippen moved for adding, "and ſuch as ſhall be conſiſtent with the honour and juſtice of parliament." The addreſs, with theſe amendments, being agreed to, was preſented to his majeſty, who was pleaſed to return a very gracious anſwer.

Among the number of debates which engaged the attention of the commons, that relating to the depredations of the Spaniards was the moſt intereſting. It was opened by Sir Wilford Lawſon, who made a motion to addreſs his majeſty, "that there be laid before the houſe copies of the reports made by his majeſty's commiſſioners in Spain, together with all letters and papers relating thereto, and what ſatisfaction had been made to the ſubjects of Great Britain for the loſſes they had ſuſtained by the depredations of the Spaniards in Europe or the Indies, purſuant to the ſecond ſeparate article of the peace concluded at Seville."

Sir Robert Walpole well knew that this motion was made merely to diſtreſs him; but he could not, without the utmoſt danger to himſelf, prevent its paſſing. The Britiſh reſident had preſented ſeveral memorials to the court of Spain, complaining that nothing had been done to prevent the depredations ſo long complained of in the American ſeas. At laſt, the following cedula was obtained from the king of Spain:

"Whereas the Britiſh miniſter reſiding at this court, has repreſented to me, that notwithſtanding the orders I have iſſued to hinder the Spaniſh privateers in America from committing hoſtilities againſt the Engliſh, and their ſhips frequenting thoſe ſeas; nevertheleſs not only ſuch perſons as have patents from ſome of the governors, or ſome of the ports in my dominions, but alſo ſome who have no patents at all, continue their hoſtilities, under a pretence of preventing an illicit commerce; while the governors refuſe to admit of the complaints given in by the Engliſh, who have experienced ſuch unjuſt moleſtations, or to indemnify them of the loſſes they may have ſuffered hereby. My reſolution is, that the orders already iſſued for that purpoſe ſhould be repeated: whereby I command by theſe preſents, all governors in any port or place of my dominions in America, not to ſuffer any of my ſubjects to moleſt or abuſe the Engliſh, or any of their ſhips that ſhall ſail in thoſe ſeas, as long as they keep in their proper diſtances, and are not concerned in any illicit trade; and that my governors take ſpecial care, that my ſaid ſubjects do conform exactly, and indiſpenſibly to the royal laws and ordinances which treat of thoſe matters; and if any of my ſubjects ſhould commit any exceſs, contrary to thoſe laws, I command my governors to puniſh them, with all the ſeverity that the offence they ſhall have committed requires; as alſo ſuch as, without patents, ſhall go to ſea in order to commit hoſtilities, and make unlawful prizes; that the ſaid governors do hearken to, and admit all complaints that ſhall be made to them, from the miniſters or chief commanders of Great Britain, either by word of mouth, or by writing; taking care to do them juſtice at all times; and to give them teſtimonies of all that ſhall be tranſacted, and that ſatisfaction be given them, for the loſſes they may have ſuſtained unjuſtly by the ſubjects, who may have occaſioned them, and who ought to make them good; for ſuch is my will: and the aforeſaid governors are to underſtand that they ſhall be made accountable for the exceſſes committed by the privateers; becauſe, before they grant them patents to go to ſea, they ought to examine them who the perſons are, and inſiſt upon proper ſecurities."

Theſe conceſſions were far from being ſatisfactory to the parliament. It was inſiſted upon by the oppoſition, that the expreſſion in the catholic king's cedula, of proper diſtances to be kept by Britiſh ſhips on the coaſts of America, was a fallacious condition, and tended to defeat the whole purpoſe which England ought to expect from the cedula. Becauſe it was impoſſible for ſhips, ſailing from one Britiſh colony to another, to be able to perform their voyages without being ſometimes forced by accidents of winds and tides to come within diſtances of the Spaniſh coaſts, which the Spaniards might judge to be improper diſtances, and therefore a ſufficient cauſe for capture, according to the ſecret orders they might have from the Spaniſh court.

After various other debates, the motion was at length carried; and the addreſs was preſented to his majeſty, who returned a moſt gracious anſwer.

During theſe diſputes, the ferment of the nation daily increaſed, from the expectation of a plan formed by Sir Robert Walpole, and generally known by the appellation of the Exciſe-ſcheme, which the miniſter had openly declared he intended to bring into the houſe. The nature of this ſcheme was ſtill a ſecret; yet it was confidently given out by the oppoſition to be nothing leſs than a general exciſe, tho' the miniſter had never entertained any thought of that kind. He added, that all he intended was to prevent the frauds committed in collecting the duties upon wine and tobacco. The 14th of March was appointed for laying the whole ſcheme before the houſe. In the mean time, ſeveral pamphlets and papers were publiſhed on the ſubject of exciſe, and the whole painted in the moſt horrid colours by the anti-miniſterial writers. Theſe writings produced the deſired effect; they raiſed an univerſal clamour againſt the miniſter, even before it had been offered to the parliament.

On the 14th of March Sir Robert, in a long ſtudied ſpeech, explained his ſcheme. He began with taking notice of the arts which had been uſed to prejudice the people againſt his propoſal, before it was known. He affirmed, that the clamours occaſioned by theſe prejudices had originally ariſen from ſmugglers and unfair traders, who had enriched themſelves by cheating the public; and that theſe had been ſtrenuouſly aſſiſted by another ſet of men, fond of every opportunity to ſtir up the people to mutiny and ſedition. He expatiated on the frauds daily committed in that branch of the revenue ariſing from tobacco; upon the hardſhips to which the American planters were ſubjected by the heavy duties payable on importation, as well as by the ill uſage they had met with from their factors and correſpondents in England, who, from being their ſervants, were now become their maſters; upon the injury done to the fair trader; and upon the loſs ſuſtained by the public in reſpect to the revenue. He aſſerted, that the ſcheme he was going to propoſe, would remove all theſe inconveniencies, prevent numberleſs frauds, perjuries, and falſe entries, and add 2 or 300,000l. a year to the revenue. He entered into a long detail of the frauds practiſed by the unfair dealers in thoſe commodities; he recited the ſeveral acts of parliament relating to the duties on wine and tobacco; he declared he had no intention to promote a general-exciſe; and he endeavoured to obviate ſome objections that might be made to his plan, which he now proceeded to explain. He propoſed to join the laws of exciſe to thoſe of the cuſtoms: that the former ſubſidy of three-farthings per pound, chargeable on imported tobacco, ſhould be ſtill levied at the cuſtom-houſe, and payable, as before, to his majeſty's civil liſt: that the tobacco ſhould then be lodged in warehouſes appointed for that purpoſe by the commiſſioners of exciſe: that the keeper of each warehouſe, appointed alſo by the commiſſioners, ſhould have one lock and key, and the merchant importer another; and that the tobacco ſhould be thus ſecured till the merchant ſhould find vent for it either for foreign or home conſumption; that the part deſigned for exportation ſhould be weighed at the cuſtom-houſe, diſcharged of the three farthings per pound, paid at its firſt importation, and then exported without any farther trouble: that the portion deſigned for home conſumption ſhould, in the preſence of the warehouſe-keeper, be delivered to the purchaſer, upon his paying the inland duty of four-pence per pound to the proper officer appointed to receive it; by which means the merchant would be eaſed of the inconveniency of paying the duty on importation, or of giving bond, and finding ſecurities for the payment before he found a market for the commodity: that all the penalties and forfeitures, ſo far as they formerly belonged to the crown, ſhould, for the future, be applied to the uſe of the public: that appeals in this, as well as in all other caſes relating to the exciſe, ſhould be heard and determined by two or three of the judges, to be named by his majeſty, and in the country by the judge of aſſize upon the next circuit, who ſhould hear and determine ſuch appeals in the moſt ſummary manner, without the formality of proceeding in courts of law and equity.

Such was the ſubſtance of the famous exciſe-ſcheme, the propoſing of which occaſioned the moſt intereſting debate that could happen in a Britiſh houſe of commons. It held till two o'clock the next morning, and was managed by the moſt able ſpeakers on both ſides of the queſtion. Thoſe who argued againſt the ſcheme, accuſed the miniſter of having miſrepreſented the frauds, and made falſe calculations with regard to the hardſhips under which the planters were ſaid to labour. They affirmed, that the planters had never thought of complaining till they were put upon it by letters and applications from London: that the ſcheme was ſo far from being calculated to relieve the planters, that the factors would be expoſed to ſuch grievous oppreſſions, as would render it impoſſible for them to continue the trade, whence the planters muſt be ruined; and that, after all, it would not prevent the frauds againſt which it was ſaid to be provided: that from the examination of the commiſſioners of the cuſtoms, it appeared that thoſe frauds did not exceed 40,000l. a year, and might, in a great meaſure, be aboliſhed by a due execution of the laws in being; conſequently, the ſcheme was unneceſſary, would be ineffectual in augmenting the revenue, deſtructive to trade, and dangerous to the liberties of the ſubject, as it tended to promote a general exciſe, which was in all countries conſidered as a very grievous oppreſſion. They ſuggeſted, that it would produce an additional ſwarm of officers and warehouſe-keepers appointed and paid by the treaſury, which could not fail of multiplying the dependents on the crown, and enable it ſtill farther to check the freedom of elections: that the traders would become ſlaves to exciſemen and warehouſe-keepers, as they would be debarred all acceſs to their own commodities, except at certain hours, when they were attended by theſe officers: that the merchant, for every pound of tobacco he ſhould ſell, would be obliged to make a journey, or ſend a meſſenger to the office for a permit, which could not be obtained without trouble, expence, and delay; and that if a law ſhould be enacted in favour of this ſcheme, it would, in all probability, be, ſome time or other, uſed as a precedent for introducing exciſe laws into every branch of the revenue; and whenever this happened, the boaſted liberties of England would be totally extinct.

But uotwithſtanding theſe, and other powerful reaſons, which were urged by the oppoſition, the queſtion being put, upon a motion made by the miniſter, that the preſent duties on wine and tobacco ſhould, from and after the 24th of June next, ceaſe and determine, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of ſixty-one. The other reſolutions ſubſequent to this, for altering the cuſtoms to an inland duty upon theſe commodities, and for appropriating this inland duty to the ſame uſes as the cuſtoms, were paſſed without a diviſion.

On the 16th the committee made their report, and a very long and warm debate enſued; but the queſtion being put, it was carried in the affirmative, and a bill was ordered to be brought in, purſuant to theſe reſolutions. It was accordingly preſented to the houſe on the 4th of April, and read the firſt time; and, after a very powerful oppoſition, ordered to be read a ſecond time.

The whole trading part of the nation was now alarmed; and the lord-mayor having procured a copy of the bill, laid it before the common-council, where it was unanimouſly reſolved to petition the houſe againſt it. The petition was immediately drawn up, and preſented to the houſe by the ſheriffs. As ſoon as it was read, Sir John Barnard roſe, and, in a very expreſſive manner, repreſented how much the city and citizens of London, as well as all the other trading cities and towns in the kingdom, would be affected by the bill for altering the method of raiſing the duties payable upon tobacco, and how juſt reaſon they had to inſiſt upon being heard by their council againſt it. He ſaid, that he would not entertain a ſuſpicion that the miniſtry wiſhed not to hear every thing that could, with reaſon, be advanced againſt the bill; and therefore moved, that the petitioners might be heard by their counſel againſt it.

This motion met with a ſtrong oppoſition: the miniſter and his friends inſiſted, that it had always been the practice of the houſe never to receive any petition, much leſs to admit counſel to be heard againſt any bill for impoſing taxes on the ſubject; becauſe it would then be impoſſible ever to paſs any ſuch bill, as the number of petitions preſented againſt it would, doubtleſs, be too great to examine during one ſeſſion of parliament; that no inconveniency could ariſe in refuſing to admit council to be heard againſt it, becauſe every man, and every body of men, had their repreſentatives in that houſe, who would certainly eſpouſe their cauſe, ſhould they think themſelves aggrieved by any particular hardſhip.

In anſwer to this it was obſerved, that the houſe had never pretended to any particular cuſtom of refuſing petitions, except againſt thoſe bills which were called money-bills; that is, ſuch as were brought in for raiſing money for the ſervice of the current year; and that even with a regard to them, there were precedents where the houſe had admitted the parties, whom they thought to be particularly intereſted, to be heard by their counſel againſt the paſſing ſuch bills; that the admitting counſel, even in ſuch caſes, could never prevent their paſſing, becauſe the houſe could order all perſons petitioning to be heard at one time; and give ſuch directions, that it could never take ake up many days to hear every thing that could be objected by every one of the petitioners: that tho' every part of the nation had their repreſentatives in that houſe, yet it was very well known, that ſpeaking in public was not the talent of every man; whence it might happen, that the particular perſons, or part of the nation that would be moſt aggrieved, might not have any ſuch members who could lay their caſe properly, clearly, and fully, before the houſe; and therefore it was proper, even with regard to money-bills, to admit parties to be heard by counſel againſt them, when it appeared that they were particularly intereſted in the tranſaction. But with regard to the caſe before them, there was not the leaſt pretence for refuſing the requeſt of the petition, becauſe the bill againſt which it was preſented was no money-bill; on the contrary, it was inſiſted on by the advocates for it, as one of the greateſt arguments in its favour, that there were no new duties to be impoſed; it was a bill intended only to alter the method of collecting the taxes already impoſed; and therefore it could never be pretended, that there was any practice or cuſtom of the houſe to refuſe parties intereſted to be heard againſt ſuch a bill: that if there had been ſuch a cuſtom introduced, it ought not to be obſerved, eſpecially when ſo conſiderable a body as the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, came with an humble petition to be heard againſt the bill, which they thought would not only be highly injurious to them in particular, but deſtructive to the trade and commerce of the whole nation. The motion was, however, rejected by a majority of ſeventeen only. The petition was therefore ordered to lie upon the table till the bill ſhould be read a ſecond time.

During the debates on this famous bill the minds of the people were wrought up to ſuch a pitch of fury and reſentment, as ſeemed to threaten nothing more than a rebellion. The houſe was ſurrounded with crouds of people; and moſt of the principal merchants in London attended in the court of requeſts and lobby of the houſe of commons. This exaſperated the miniſter, who, after declaring that he did not conſider the clamours without doors to be the voice of the people, concluded his ſpeech with the following incautious and inflammatory expreſſions: "Gentlemen may ſay what they pleaſe of the multitudes now at the door, and in the avenues leading to this houſe: they may call them a modeſt multitude, if they will; but whatever temper they were in when they came hither, it may be very much altered now, after having waited ſo long at our door: it may be a very eaſy matter for ſome deſigning, ſeditious perſon, to raiſe a tumult and diſorder among them; and when tumults are once begun, no man knows where they may end: he is a greater man than any I know in the nation, that could, with the ſame facility, appeaſe them. For this reaſon, I muſt think, that it was neither prudent nor regular to uſe any methods for bringing ſuch multitudes to this place, under any pretence whatever. Gentlemen may give them what name they think fit: it may be ſaid they came hither as humble ſupplicants; but I know whom the law calls ſturdy beggars; and thoſe who brought them hither could not be certain but that they might have behaved in the ſame manner."

This part of the miniſter's ſpeech threw the whole houſe into a flame; and it was ſome time before the temper of the members was ſettled ſufficiently to renew the debate. At laſt Sir John Barnard aroſe; and after making ſeveral obſervations on the beginning of the miniſter's ſpeech, ſaid, "that any ſet of gentlemen or merchants might take what method they pleaſed to ſolicit their friends and perſons of figure and character, to come down to the court of requeſts, and to our lobby, in order to petition their acquaintance againſt any ſcheme or project they think may be prejudicial to their intereſts. This is the undoubted right of the ſubject, and what has been always practiſed. The honourable gentleman talks of ſturdy beggars: I do not know what ſort of people may now be at our door, becauſe I have not lately been out of the houſe, but I believe they are the ſame ſort of people that were there when I came in; and then, I can aſſure you, that I ſaw none but ſuch as deſerved the name of ſturdy beggars as little as the honourable gentleman himſelf, or any gentleman whatever. It is well known, that the city of London was ſufficiently apprized of what was this day to come under our deliberation. Where they procured their information, I know not; but I am very certain they had a right notion of this ſcheme; and were ſo generally and zealouſly bent againſt it, that whatever methods may have been uſed to call them hither, I am ſure it would have been impoſſible to have found any legal method to have prevented their coming."

Notwithſtanding the miniſter had carried his point with regard both to the London petition, and the bill's being read a ſecond time, yet he thought it highly prudent not to puſh his ſcheme any farther. He could not hope that the majority ever would be greater, and a queſtion of ſuch importance to the public tranquillity, carried by a majority of only ſeventeen, was worſe than loſt. He, therefore, wiſely determined to let it drop; and, accordingly, when the day came for its being read a ſecond time, Sir Robert Walpole moved that it might be put off till the 12th of June next.

Such was the end of the famous exciſe ſcheme, a project which the populace were perſuaded threatened the entire deſtruction of their liberties; and the miſcarriage of which was celebrated with the greateſt rejoicings throughout the metropolis.

The national buſineſs being finiſhed, his majeſty, on the 11th of June, went to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he ſeverely reflected on the authors of the heats and animoſities that had been lately ſpread through the nation. "I cannot," ſaid he, "paſs by, unobſerved, the wicked endeavours that have been lately made uſe of to inflame the minds of the people, and, by the moſt unjuſt miſrepreſentations, to raiſe tumults and diſorders that almoſt threatened the peace of the kingdom; but I depend on the force of truth to remove the groundleſs jealouſies that have been raiſed of deſigns carrying on againſt the liberties of my people; and, upon your own fidelity to defeat and fruſtrate the expectations of ſuch as delight in confuſion. It is my inclination, and has always been my ſtudy, to preſerve both the religious and civil rights of all my ſubjects. Let it be your care to undeceive the deluded, and to make them ſenſible of their preſent happineſs, and the hazard they run of being unwarily drawn, by ſpecious pretences, into their own deſtruction."

During theſe tranſactions in England, Auguſtus II. king of Poland, paid the debt of nature. This event, which happened in the month of February, involved Europe in freſh troubles. Staniſlaus, father-in-law to the French king, and the elector of Saxony, ſon to the deceaſed king, were candidates for the Poliſh ſceptre. The former was ſupported by France, and the latter by the emperor, the czarina, and the king of Pruſſia. The Imperial and Ruſſian troops encamped on the frontiers of Poland, and the king of France ordered the duke of Berwick to aſſemble an army on the Rhine, in order to enter Germany, in caſe the Imperial forces made any attempt to diſturb the election at Warſaw.

On the 25th of June, the diet of the election was opened with the uſual ceremonies, and Staniſlaus, being unanimouſly choſen king, appeared in the electoral field, where he was received with the loudeſt acclamations. The Saxon party, however, ſoon increaſed to 10,000 men, proteſted againſt the election, and joined the Ruſſian army. Staniſlaus, finding himſelf unable to oppoſe ſuch powerful antagoniſts, retired to Dantzick, attended by the primate and French ambaſſador; and ſoon after the elector of Saxony was proclaimed king of Poland, by the biſhop of Cracow, under the name of Auguſtus III.

In the mean time, Lewis XV. having concluded a treaty with Spain and Sardinia, the duke of Berwick paſſed the Rhine, and undertook the ſiege of Kehl, which in a few days capitulated. The king of Sardinia declared war againſt the emperor, and, having joined a body of French forces commanded by marſhal Villars, drove the Imperialiſts out of the Milaneſe.

The emperor, dreading the effects of ſuch a powerful confederacy againſt him, offered to accommodate all differences with the crown of Spain, under the mediation of the king of England; and Mr. Keene, the Britiſh miniſter at the court of Madrid, made propoſals for that purpoſe. Philip expreſſed his acknowledgements to the king of England; but declared that the emperor's advances came too late, and that his own reſolutions were already taken. In the mean time he ſent a powerful army into Italy, under the command of the duke of Montemar, who reduced the whole kingdom of Naples, which was beſtowed upon the infant don Carlos, who had already been acknowledged hereditary prince of Tuſcany. Thus did the emperor, Charles VI. loſe almoſt all Italy by giving a king to Poland: and a ſon of the king of Spain obtained, in two campaigns, the Two Sicilies, which had been ſo often before taken and retaken, and had been the conſtant objects of the attention of the houſe of Auſtria for above two centuries. All this time the other potentates of Europe looked on without intermeddling: the Venetians declared they would take no ſhare in the war in Italy; the Dutch ſoon entered into a neutrality with France; and the Engliſh, in concert with thoſe ſtates, employed themſelves in mediations, inſtead of affording aſſiſtance, which had been ſtrongly ſolicited by the emperor.

A. D. 1734. Such was the ſtate of affairs on the continent, when the parliament met on the 17th of January. The ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty, among other particulars, told the two houſes, "That though he was no way concerned in the war which had broke out in Europe, except by the good offices he had employed among the contending powers, he could not remain an idle ſpectator of the preſent events, or be indifferent about the conſequences of a war undertaken and ſupported by ſuch a powerful confederacy: that he had thought proper to take time to examine the facts alledged on both ſides, and to wait the reſult of the councils of thoſe powers which were more immediately intereſted in the conſequences of the rupture. He declared he would concert with his allies, eſpecially with the ſtates-general of the united provinces, ſuch meaſures as ſhould be thought moſt adviſeable for the common ſafety, and for reſtoring the peace of Europe: that he would order the eſtimates to be laid before them, of ſuch ſervices as demanded their preſent and immediate care: that the augmentation that would be propoſed for the ſea-ſervice would be very conſiderable; but he was confident they would think it reaſonable and neceſſary; that he moſt particularly recommended to their care the debt of the navy, which had been every year laid before them; but, from the preſent circumſtances of the times, he believed they would be perſuaded that he now required ſome proviſion to be made for it; a thing that could not well be longer poſtponed, without manifeſt detriment to the public ſervice: that, as theſe extraordinary charges and expences were unavoidable, he made no doubt but they would effectually raiſe the ſupplies neceſſary for defraying them, with that readineſs and diſpatch, and with that juſt regard to the true intereſt of his people, which this parliament had hitherto ſhewn upon all occaſions: that he hoped they would proceed in all their deliberations with ſuch temper and unanimity, and ſuch expedition in the public buſineſs, as might give him the ſooner opportunity of conſulting a new parliament: that he flattered himſelf his preſent reſolutions would meet with their hearty concurrence and approbation; and whatever inſinuations might be thrown out againſt the conduct of the government, he was confident a little time would effectually remove all groundleſs jealouſies, and make it appear, that Great-Britain ought always to act that part which the honour and intereſt of the nation called upon it to undertake.

This ſpeech cauſed a violent debate in the lower houſe, though it muſt be owned, without any neceſſity, there being nothing in it that could be reaſonably exceptionable. The miniſterial party, however, prevailed, and an addreſs of thanks was voted to his majeſty.

Several other topics that came before the houſe occaſioned very warm debates, in which the ſpeeches generally abounded with perſonal ſatire, and often with very indecent reflections. But the ſubject that gave occaſion to the moſt violent debates between the two parties was a motion made by Mr. Bromley, for repealing the act for ſeptennial parliaments. In ſupport of this motion he alledged, that the reaſons for prolonging the ſitting of parliaments from three to ſeven years were now at an end: that the people in general looked upon ſeptennial parliaments as a grievance and innovation in the conſtitution: that he begged leave to remind the houſe of the act made in the 16th of Charles II. which wiſely provided againſt the too long continuance of one and the ſame parliament, by ordaining that a new parliament ſhould be called once in three years, and oftener, if need required: that this act was expreſſly confirmed by the bill of rights: that from the time of the revolution to the firſt year of the late king, no parliament had ſat above three years, and ſome only one ſeſſion: that he thought triennial parliaments were more grievous than annual ones, and, conſequently, ſeptennial parliaments muſt be doubly more grievous than thoſe which laſted only three years: that ſuppoſing he ſhould be miſtaken in this point, which, nevertheleſs, he could never admit without due conviction, the argument in the preamble to the ſeptennial bill was altogether inapplicable to the preſent times: that the act againſt bribery and corruption would neceſſarily remedy that evil, as it would prevent corruption in the elections; but nothing but the frequent returns of new parliaments could prevent it in the elected. In order, therefore, to effect this deſirable purpoſe, he moved, that leave be given to bring in a bill for repealing the ſeptennial, and for the more frequent meeting and calling of parliaments.

Mr. Bromley's motion was ſeconded by Sir John Aubin, knight of the ſhire for Cornwall. In his ſpeech upon this occaſion, he gave a kind of detail of the duration of parliaments from the time of Henry VIII. ſhewed how triennial parliaments came to be ſecured at the revolution, and how they came to be loſt again to the nation when the ſeptennial act took place. He was next at ſome pains to prove that ſeptennial parliaments are moſt proper for the purpoſes of a wicked miniſtry; but that the more frequent parliaments are, they are the more ſalutary both for the king and people; and, at the ſame time, throughout his whole ſpeech, he complained greatly of the increaſing influence of the crown. He was anſwered by Mr. Conduit, a relation of the great Sir Iſaac Newton. He endeavoured to ſhew, from Prynne's writings, that the prerogatives of the kings of England, and the liberties of the people, are very different from what they were in former days. He took notice, that the heavy complaints againſt Charles I. and his ſon James II. did not ariſe from continuing the ſame parliament too long, but for not calling, or not holding any parliament at all. He thought that miniſters could more eaſily manage a triennial than a ſeptennial parliament; and confirmed his obſervations by ſaying, that in ſeptennial parliaments it has been ſeen, that a ſmall minority againſt the miniſter at the beginning of the parliament has often been increaſed greatly, and even nearly to an equality before the end. He thought that the diſpoſal of poſts and places rather weakened than ſtrengthened the crown; becauſe every place having three or four candidates for it, when one only can ſucceed, the diſappointed candidates immediately become enemies to the court. He maintained that the reaſons for paſſing the ſeptennial act ſtill exiſted; that one of the reaſons was a ſpirit of jacobitiſm prevailing when the ſeptennial act paſſed; and he thought that the great diſcontents that had lately appeared in the nation, had a conſiderable mixture of jacobitiſm in their compoſition.

The next that ſpoke was Sir Thomas Robinſon, who maintained, that the expence of chuſing triennial parliaments muſt fall far heavier upon the public than that of chuſing triennial ones. He obſerved, that during the twenty-two years while triennial parliaments continued, they were found to be attended with great inconveniences; whereas, during the eighteen years in which ſeptennial parliaments had continued, many excellent laws had paſſed, and many wiſe inſtitutions had been formed for the good of the people. He took notice, that when gentlemen ſpeak of the whole conſtitution of England, they ſpeak in very vague terms; beccauſe the conſtitution of England was never fixed till the time of the revotion. He next examined the ſtate of parliaments under the reigns of Charles I. and Charles II. and maintained, that in the longeſt parliament that ever ſat in England, which happened under the latter, the longer they ſat, they were more and more averſe to the meaſures of the crown, notwithſtanding all the power of corruption employed to ſeduce them; and therefore, by parity of reaſoning, ſeptennial parliaments are more favourable to public liberty than triennial ones. In ſhort, he thought, that a deſire to revert back to the practice of remote antiquity in that reſpect, might be compared to a man in his full growth and ſtrength, deſiring to return back to his childhood. He obſerved, that if antiquity was to be the only rule, a ſeſſion of parliament ought ſeldom or never to continue above twenty days; for parliaments, in former times, had not buſineſs ſufficient to keep them any longer ſitting: but, in fact, the whole form of the conſtitution has been ſince altered, by the alterations that have, from time to time, happened in the modes of property, and the multiplication of buſineſs, through the increaſe of agriculture, arts, manufactures and commerce. He affirmed, that ſhould the motion be agreed to, it muſt have a very bad effect upon all foreign negociations, becauſe foreign miniſters, in their negotiations with Great Britain, and alſo with other courts, are chiefly determined by the ſentiments of a Britiſh parliament: but ſhould they have thoſe to conſult anew every three years, they would not be able to know how to determine with regard to many great and important points.

Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, who had acquired great experience in elections for members of parliament, ſpoke ſtrongly for the queſtion. He inſiſted upon it, that aman who could get an hundred guineas for his vote for a ſeptennial parliament, would not get fifteen for a triennial one; and that bribery and corruption are the natural conſequences of long parliaments. He was anſwered by Sir John Willes, attorney-general. He obſerved, that if any time was to be fixed upon for imitating the old conſtitution with regard to parliaments, "we are not ſurely," ſaid he, "to take the time when our conſtitution was weak, and in its infancy; we certainly ſhould chuſe that time when it had reached its full ſtrength and vigour, which, in my opinion, is the preſent. It is, indeed, ſaid, that, for the redreſs of grievances, and for amending, ſtrengthening and preſerving the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently; but it is not ſo much as inſinuated that every one of theſe ought to be a new parliament: and as to the frequency of parliaments, I am ſure there never was leſs reaſon for complaints than ſince the ſeptennial bill paſſed; for, ever ſince that time the ſeſſions have been regularly held, and all of them been allowed to ſit as long as it was neceſſary or proper they ſhould." He then obſerved, that the triennial act itſelf was not obtained upon principles of liberty, but in order to diſtreſs king William and the friends to the revolution. He was of opinion, that the tranſition of the conſtitution from triennial to ſeptennial parliaments, was, in itſelf, a right meaſure, and agreeable to the true principles of Engliſh government, independent of any temporary conſideration. He maintained, that it was owing to the inconveniences of triennial parliaments that king William was obliged to make ſo bad a peace with France, when he might have carried on the war in ſo advantageous a manner for the liberties of Europe.

An objection being ſtated by another ſpeaker, that the elected, during a long parliament, are apt to forget the dependence upon their conſtituents, which could not be the caſe if parliaments were annual. Sir John Willes made the following obſervation: "That we have all a dependence upon the people for our election, is what I readily grant; but after we are choſen, and have taken our ſeats in this houſe, we have no longer any dependence upon our electors, at leaſt ſo far as regards our behavior here. Their whole power is then devolved upon us; and we are, in every queſtion that comes before this houſe, to regard only the public good in general, and to determine according to our own judgements; if we do not, if we depend upon our conſtituents, and follow blindly the inſtructions they ſend us, we cannot be ſaid to act freely, nor can ſuch parliaments be called free parliaments; ſuch a dependence would be a moſt dangerous dependence; it would, in my opinion, be more dangerous, and of worſe conſequence than a dependence upon the crown; for in a dependence upon the crown I can ſee no danger, as long as the intereſt of the crown is made the ſame with that of the people, which every man muſt allow to be the caſe at preſent; whereas the people of any county, city, or borough, are very liable to be miſled, and may often be induced to give inſtructions directly contrary to the true intereſt of their country."

Sir John Barnard attacked this doctrine with all his power. "A learned and honourable gentleman," ſaid he, "has advanced a doctrine which I think altogether new; that we are to have no farther dependence on our electors, after we have taken our ſeats in this houſe; nay, that a dependence on them would be more dangerous than a dependence on the crown. This, Sir, is really, in my opinion, ſomething very new. Though that genleman may, perhaps, like the one better than the other, yet I ſhall always look upon a dependence on the people of England, or even on thoſe I repreſent, to be leſs dangerous, and more honourable, than a dependence on the crown; and I value myſelf more on the honour I have received in ſitting here for two parliaments, as one of the repreſentatives of the people of England, and by the free and uncorrupted choice of thoſe I repreſent, than I ſhould on the greateſt honours the crown can beſtow. If, indeed, I had obtained my ſeat here by bribery, or by the illegal and corrupt influence of any corrupt miniſter, I ſhould look upon it in a very different light; I ſhould look upon it as one of the moſt diſgraceful ſituations I could be in."

Sir William Yonge replied to theſe remarks of Sir John Barnard. "My learned friend," ſaid he, "happened to make an obſervation which I ſtill think a very juſt one. He ſaid, that after we were returned, and had taken our ſeats in this houſe, we ought not any longer to have a dependence on thoſe we repreſent. This the honourable gentleman laid hold of. He not only called it a new and very extraordinary doctrine, but dropt an expreſſion, ſuch as I think ought not to be made uſe of in this houſe. As to the obſervation made by my learned friend, he certainly meant, and I believe almoſt every gentleman underſtood him, that after we had taken our ſeats in this houſe, we ought every one of us to look upon ourſelves as one of the repreſentatives of the whole body of the commons of England, and ought not to have any particular bias for the county, city, or borough we repreſent. This, Sir, is ſo far from being a doctrine very extraordinary, or altogether new, that I wiſh every gentleman in this houſe would make it a ſtanding rule for his conduct; for I cannot help obſerving, that there are ſome in this aſſembly, who on many occaſions, confine their thoughts too much to the particular county, city, or borough they repreſent; but ſurely they muſt be ſenſible, that many things may happen in parliament which may be for the intereſt of the nation in general, though they may not, perhaps, quadrate ſo exactly with the particular intereſt of London, Briſtol, Liverpool, or other particular places; and, in ſuch a caſe, the gentleman himſelf muſt ſurely grant, that, as members of this houſe, they ought to drop, not only their dependence upon, but even their concern for, the particular city they repreſent, in order to concur with the reſt of the members of this houſe, in what they judge to be for the general intereſt of the nation."

Several other ſpeeches were made on this intereſting motion; but when the queſtion was put, it was carried in the negative by a great majority.

On the 14th of March the nuptial ceremony between the prince of Orange and the princeſs-royal of England was performed with great magnificence; on which occaſion the warmeſt congratulations were made by both houſes of parliament, the city of London, and moſt other public bodies throughout the kingdom.

On the 28th of the ſame month Sir Robert Walpole delivered a meſſage from the king to the houſe of commons, importing, "That as the war which "had lately broke out in Europe ſtill continued to "rage, his majeſty hoped he might be enabled to "augment his forces, if ſuch augmentation ſhould "be found neceſſary, between the diſſolution of this "parliament and the election of another." This meſſage was received with great ſurprize by the houſe, but all oppoſition was vain; for an addreſs was voted and preſented to his majeſty, ſignifying the compliance of his faithful commons with his royal requeſt. In conſequence of another meſſage the houſe prepared and paſſed a bill, impowering his majeſty to ſettle an annuity of 5,000l. for life on the princeſs-royal.

The buſineſs before the parliament being completed, his majeſty, on the 16th of April, went to the houſe of peers, and having ſigned ſuch bills as were ready, cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he expreſſed the warmeſt acknowledgements of their zeal, duty and affection.

A few days after the riſing of the parliament, it was diſſolved by proclamation, and writs were iſſued for calling a new one. The whole nation was immediately thrown into a ferment, and every means made uſe of to influence the electors in their choice of repreſentatives. The power of the miniſtry, however, prevailed; and the elections, in moſt parts of the kingdom, were carried in favour of the court.

During theſe tranſactions at home, the war was carried on with great vigour abroad, by the confederate powers againſt the emperor. The Ruſſian and Saxon armies inveſted the city of Dantzick, in order to ſecure the perſon of king Staniſlaus; but, when the city capitulated, that prince eſcaped in the diſguiſe of a peaſant to Marienwerder, in the Pruſſian territories. The Poliſh lords of Dantzick ſigned an act of ſubmiſſion to king Auguſtus, who arrived on the tenth of July at the convent of Oliva, and after proclaiming a general amneſty, returned to Dreſden.

In the mean time the French army on the Rhine, commanded by marſhal Belliſle, beſieged and took Traerbach, while the duke of Berwick, at the head of 60,000 men, inveſted Philipſburgh, where, in viſiting the trenches, he was killed by a cannon ball; and the command devolved on the marquis d'Asfeldt, who carried on the operations of the ſiege with equal vigour and capacity. Prince Eugene did every thing his great military talents could ſuggeſt, to relieve the beſieged: but finding it impoſſible to ſucceed, general Watgenau, the governor, capitulated, after having made a noble defence, and obtained the moſt honourable conditions. Eugene retired to Heidelberg, and the campaign ended in October.

The doubtful behaviour of ſome of the allies, at this juncture, induced the miniſtry to leave nothing omitted towards putting the nation in a poſture of defence. The court of Spain ſuffered the eldeſt ſon of the Pretender to ſerve in the army of Don Carlos, by whom he was treated with diſtinguiſhed marks of reſpect: and that prince did not ſcruple to declare, that, whenever the ſituation of his affairs would permit, he would ſupport, with all his power, the intereſt of the abdicated family.

The conduct of the French alſo, at this time, was ſuch as demonſtrated they had no very friendly ſentiments with reſpect to Great Britain. In the month of November an edict was publiſhed in Paris, which commanded all the Britiſh ſubjects in France, not actually in employment, from the age of eighteen to fifty, either to quit the kingdom in fifteen days, or inliſt in ſome of the Iriſh regiments, on pain of being ſent to the gallies. This edict, which was executed with the utmoſt rigour, filled the priſons of Paris with the ſubjects of England, who were denied all communication with their friends, and muſt have periſhed by cold and hunger, had they not been relieved by the charity of the Janſeniſts. A ſpirited memorial from our court on this occaſion was delivered by lord Waldegrave, the Engliſh ambaſſador, to the French council, who, finding us earneſt in the affair, though proper to excuſe themſelves by alledging, they only meant to execute their edict againſt Britiſh and Iriſh vagabonds, and ſuch as had no viſible means of ſubſiſtance.

In the month of June a treaty of commerce was concluded between the Engliſh court, and that of Ruſſia, greatly to the advantage of the Britiſh nation, as will appear from the following abſtract:

"By the fourth article of this treaty, it is ſtipulated, that the ſubjects of Great Britain may carry to Ruſſia all ſorts of merchandize, and may tranſport them by land from thence to Perſia, on paying a duty of three per cent, and may likewiſe bring back from Perſia through Ruſſia, all ſorts of merchandize, on again paying the ſaid duty, without being obliged to open their bales.

"By the ſeventh, it is declared, that in caſe of ſhipwreck, all manner of aſſiſtance ſhall be given, without offering the leaſt violence to the ſhip's company or effects.

"By the ninth, the Britiſh merchants in Ruſſia are exempted from being obliged to ſhew their books to any one whatſoever, except it be to prove ſomething in diſpute. And for the greater eaſe and encouragement of the Britiſh commerce, it is agreed, that for the future the Engliſh manufactures ſhould pay no greater duty on the importation than is ſpecified."

On the 19th of September a treaty was likewiſe concluded with the king of Denmark.

"The firſt and ſecond articles of this treaty are general profeſſions of friendſhip and renewals of all former treaties between the two nations.

"By the third article his Daniſh majeſty, at the deſire of our king, engages to hold in readineſs 1000 horſe, and 5000 foot for three years, to be tranſported over to England, in caſe his Britannic majeſty's dominions ſhould be threatened with an invaſion.

"By the fourth article, his Britannic majeſty engages to pay to the king of Denmark, for every horſeman eighty crowns, and for every foot ſoldier thirty crowns; one half to be paid on ſigning the treaty, and the other half when the troops ſhall be delivered; over and above which our king engages to pay to the king of Denmark an annual ſubſidy of 250,000 crowns during the time the treaty ſubſiſts: but if the troops ſhould paſs into the pay of the king of Great Britain, then his Daniſh majeſty is to receive a yearly ſubſidy of 150 crowns, while they are in his Britannic majeſty's ſervice.

"By the ſixth article the troops are not to be ſent to Italy, nor obliged to ſerve on board a fleet, nor to be tranſported beyond ſea, but to be employed for the defence of the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, in which event they are to have the ſame pay that Engliſh troops have.

"By the ſeventh article it is ſtipulated, that the ſaid troops ſhall be immediately ſent back to Denmark with a month's pay, in caſe the king of Denmark's dominions are attacked; and his Britannic majeſty engages in ſuch event to give his Daniſh majeſty all the aſſiſtance the caſe ſhall require by ſea and land: the king of Denmark alſo binds himſelf in the like engagement of aſſiſtance towards the king of Great Britain.

"By the eighth article it is determined in what caſe ſuch aſſiſtance may be demanded, and is to be given; viz. if either of the parties be actually attacked by force of arms, without that party having previouſly uſed open force againſt him who attacks."

This treaty was to be void at the end of three years, unleſs renewed; but that with Ruſſia was to be in force for fifteen years, from the time it was ſigned.

A. D. 1735. The new parliament met on the 14th of January, when the commons again made choice of Mr. Onſlow for their ſpeaker. On the 23d his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he informed the two houſes, "That having undertaken, in concert with the ſtates-general, to mediate between the belligerent powers, he had met with ſo much ſucceſs, that a plan would ſpeedily be offered to the conſideration of all parties engaged in the war, as a baſis for a negotiation for a general peace. He alſo acquainted them, that he had concluded a treaty with the crown of Denmark; a matter, he conceived, of great importance in the preſent conjuncture; and which, being attended with ſome expence, he would order it to be ſubmitted to the conſideration of the commons. At the ſame time, he put them in mind, that while a war was raging in Europe, it would be proper, at all events, though it might be attended with ſome expence, for Great Britain to keep her forces on a reſpectable footing."

After the commons had voted an addreſs to the king, they immediately went on the buſineſs of the ſupply. A motion being made for encreaſing the number of ſeamen to 30,000 effective men for the ſervice of the current year, the minority affirmed, that 20,000, which was the number employed the laſt year, was fully ſufficient: that the unneceſſary naval armaments of Great Britain during the laſt ſummer had occaſioned the ruin of Dantzick, inaſmuch as they prevented the French from ſailing in time to relieve it; for the Spaniards, from the apprehenſion that the Engliſh fleet was deſigned to act againſt them in the Mediterranean, had obliged the French miniſtry to keep their ſhips at Breſt, inſtead of ſending them to Dantzick, until they could diſcover the deſtination of the Engliſh ſquadron.

In anſwer to this, the miniſtry endeavoured to prove, that the French never had any ſerious intention either of relieving Dantzick, or aſſiſting Staniſlaus to mount the throne of Poland: that it was only a pretence made uſe of by the courts of Madrid and Verſailles for giving orders to fit out in their reſpective ports, all the ſhips that could poſſibly be got ready: that his majeſty having received private intelligence of theſe orders, had judged it indiſpenſably neceſſary to increaſe his ſea forces with the additional number of 7000 men; an expedient which, in all probability, had defeated the deſigns which France and Spain had formed againſt theſe kingdoms: that both theſe powers, far from relaxing their preparations, were at this very time ſtrengthening their marine with the utmoſt induſtry; ſo that the addition of 7000 men to the naval force of Great Britain muſt be thought by all impartial perſons a reaſonable augmentation; and that theſe meaſures would appear the more neceſſary when it was conſidered, that in a free country like ours, where there was no regiſter for ſeamen, by which the fleet might be inſtantly ſupplied with men, the government was obliged, on any ſudden emergency, to have recourſe to preſſing, which was certainly a moſt diſagreeable expedient. Many other arguments to the ſame effect were made uſe of, after which, the queſtion being put, was carried in the affirmative for 30,000 ſeamen, including the office of ordnance.

During this ſeſſion the mutiny-bill received a very material alteration. In all the preceding acts, the juſtice of peace had it in his power to commit a poor fellow to priſon, if, after receiving the inliſting money, he refuſed to take the oaths, even though he offered to return the money: but a clauſe was now inſerted, importing, that every officer who ſhould hereafter inliſt any man to ſerve in any regiment, ſhould, within a certain number of days, carry the perſon inliſted before one of the next juſtices of the peace, where the man ſhould be at liberty to declare his diſſent to ſuch an act, and his having repented of what he had done; and upon his doing this, and returning the officer the inliſting money, and paying the expences incurred in the progreſs of the affair, ſuch juſtice ſhould forthwith diſcharge him; and that an officer guilty of any failure or neglect in this particular, ſhould be liable to the ſame penalties as are inflicted on thoſe who ſhould be guilty of falſe muſters.

But an affair of a much more ſerious nature was now before the commons. The magiſtrates of the royal burgh of Haddington in Scotland had been ſeized and confined in a diſtant priſon, without the benefit of being admitted to bail, by a warrant from one of the Scottiſh judges. Another judge, however, had ventured to take bail, and ſet them at liberty. The injured party preſented a petition to the houſe of commons; and the caſe appeared ſo flagrant, that a motion was made to refer it to the conſideration of a committee of the whole houſe. This was, however, oppoſed by the miniſter and his friends, but from what motive is hard to ſay; and the motion was rejected.

Another incident that happened in Scotland greatly engaged the attention of parliament. This was, a petition to the houſe of lords, ſubſcribed by the dukes of Hamilton, Queenſbury, and Montroſe, by the earls of Dundonald, Marchmont, and Stair; repreſenting, that undue influence had been uſed in carrying on the election of the ſixteen peers of Scotland.

A day was appointed for taking this petition into conſideration; but the houſe ſeemed divided with regard to the manner in which they ought to proceed in this delicate and intereſting affair. The duke of Newcaſtle obſerved, that it was doubtful whether the houſe had even the power of receiving ſuch a petition, there being nothing in the articles of union that gave a Britiſh houſe of lords a right to interfere in the election of the Scottiſh peers; nor indeed had they otherwiſe any ſuch right, unleſs ſome particular charge was ſtated, and offered to be proved. On the other hand, the party that ſupported the petition urged, that it was general; that the facts contained in it were of a very dangerous complexion, and ſuch as ought to be puniſhed if they were proved. But as the real deſign of the petition ſeemed to be uncertain, it was agreed that the conſideration ſhould be adjourned for a little time, during which the petitioners ſhould be ordered to declare, "Whether they intended to controvert the election of the ſixteen peers, or the election of any, and which of them?"

The lord-chancellor having communicated this order to the petitioners, they, in a few days, delivered in a declaration, importing, "that they did not intend to oppoſe either the election, or return of the ſixteen Scottiſh peers; but they thought it their duty to lay before their lordſhips the evidence of ſuch facts and undue methods as appeared to them to be dangerous to the conſtitution, and might, in future elections, equally affect the right of the preſent ſixteen peers, as that of the other peers of Scotland, if not timely prevented by a proper remedy."

When this declaration was read in the houſe, it was objected to by the court-party, as unſatisfactory. The duke of Devonſhire therefore made a motion, "That the petitioners ſhould be ordered to lay before the houſe, in writing, inſtances of thoſe undue methods and illegal practices upon which they intended to proceed, and alſo the names of the perſons they ſuſpected to be guilty."

This motion was warmly oppoſed by the earls of Cheſterfield, Abingdon, and Strafford, and the lords Bathurſt and Carteret. Lord Cheſterfield concluded his ſpeech on this occaſion with the following remarkable expreſſions. "Suppoſing, my lords, we ſhould get information that ſeveral barrels of gunpowder had been placed under this houſe, in order to blow us up; would it not be very fooliſh to delay going to ſearch for and remove the gunpowder, till we ſhould be informed by what means, at what time, and by whom the powder was placed there? The caſe before us is the very ſame: there is a ſort of metaphorical gunpowder placed under this houſe, which will, in time, blow us up, if it be not removed; and, in ſuch a caſe, are we to trifle away our time in inquiries after the names of the perſons who placed it there, and the methods by which it was conveyed?" However beautiful and expreſſive this compariſon might be, it produced not the deſired effect; like the reaſonings of the other lords, it was overcome by the majority, who voted the declaration unſatisfactory; and the petitioners were ordered. in eight days, to lay their complaints before the houſe in writing.

In obedience to theſe orders, the petitioning noblemen preſented a remonſtrance to the lords on the day appointed, in which they obſerved, "That as they had no intention to become accuſers, they could not take upon them to name particular perſons, who might have been concerned in thoſe illegal practices; but who they were would undoubtedly appear to their lordſhips, upon their taking the proper examination: that, neverthele ſs, they begged leave to acquaint their lordſhips, that the petition was laid before them upon information that the liſt of the ſixteen peers for Scotland had been framed previous to the election, by perſons in high truſt under the crown: that this liſt was ſhewn to the peers, as a liſt approved by the crown, and was called the king's liſt, from which there was to be no variation, unleſs to make way for one or two particular peers, on condition of their conforming to certain meaſures: that peers were ſolicited to vote for this liſt, without the liberty of making any alteration: that endeavours were uſed to engage their ſuffrages for this liſt by the promiſe of penſions and offices, civil and military, to themſelves and relations, as well as by offers of money: that ſums of money were actually given for this purpoſe: that penſions, offices, and releaſes of debts owing to the crown, were granted to peers who concured in voting for this liſt, and to their relations: that on the day of election, a battalion of his majeſty's troops was drawn up in the Abbey-court, contrary to cuſtom, and without any other apparent cauſe than that of over-awing the electors: that theſe inſtances of undue practices would, they hoped, be abundantly ſufficient to ſatisfy their lordſhips, that they had juſt cauſe to pray the houſe to take this matter into their ſerious conſideration, and to provide ſuch remedy as might be effectual for preſerving the right and freedom of elections; ſuch right of electing being, the only right that now remained with the peers of Scotland, in lieu of a conſtant and hereditary ſeat in parliament."

When this remonſtrance was read, it gave riſe to a very warm debate. The holding under arms a battalion of ſoldiers was repreſented as a moſt ſcandalous, arbitrary, and flagrant infringement of the rights and liberties of the ſubject, and of that independency that ſhould ever be preſerved in all elections. The fact was acknowledged by the oppoſite party; but it was alledged that ſuch a ſtep was at once both legal and prudent: that the ſoldiers were drawn out by the authority of the civil magiſtrate, in order to prevent riots and tumults among the populace, who had been inflamed by the oppoſite party to a pitch of reſentment that threatened the moſt fatal conſequences ces, if not timely ſuppreſſed. Theſe reaſons prevailed with the majority, the petition was voted unſatisfactory, and the whole affair laid aſide.

The public buſineſs being at length finiſhed, his majeſty, on the 15th of May, cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he was pleaſed to acknowledge, that the plan of pacification he had formed with the ſtates-general had not yet proved effectual; but added, that he was ſtill determined to perſiſt in the ſame pacific meaſures, and to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to compoſe the troubles of Europe. He thanked the parliament for the power they had given him to augment his forces by ſea and land; acquainted them with his intention to viſit his German dominions, and that he ſhould conſtitute the queen regent during his abſence.

At this time the affairs of Europe were in a very delicate and critical ſituation. The emperor complained loudly of the tame and pacific conduct of the Engliſh court, which, from the treaties ſubſiſting between them, he expected would have eſpouſed his cauſe. His Britannic majeſty, however, gave the world an inſtance, that it was not from any perſonal diſlike to the emperor, that he took no part in his affairs, relative to the war now carrying on; for having received certain advice, that the French had formed a ſtrong party at the Ottoman court, who were labouring to perſuade the divan to declare war againſt his Imperial majeſty, he ſent orders immediately, in conjunction with the ſtates-general, to their reſpective miniſters at that court, to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to counteract the French in their deſign: and theſe miniſters laboured ſo effectually, that the grand ſignior was perſuaded to lay aſide all thoughts of attacking the emperor.

Nor was it in this inſtance only that the Engliſh court acted as mediator, in order to maintain the balance of power, which was now in the utmoſt danger. A miſunderſtanding had lately ariſen between the courts of Spain and Portugal, occaſioned by affronts mutually offered to their ambaſſadors at each court. This affair could not be amicably compromiſed; and the king of Spain began to make preparations for a war with Portugal; which ſo alarmed his moſt faithful majeſty, that he inſtantly made very preſſing applications to the Britiſh court, for protection againſt the deſigns of his enemies.

The Engliſh miniſtry readily promiſed the king of Portugal aſſiſtance; and it was reſolved, by a timely and powerful relief, to render the deſigns of the Spaniards abortive. Accordingly, Sir John Norris was diſpatched with twenty-eight ſhips of the line to the river Tagus, where he was received by the king of Portugal, and the inhabitants of Liſbon, as their guardian and deliverer.

Exaſperated at this proceeding of the Engliſh, the Spaniards inveighed in the moſt haughty terms againſt ſuch a powerful interpoſition; and threatened to pour a numerous army into Portugal. But when the firſt tranſports of their reſentment were ſubſided, they thought it more adviſeable, for their own intereſt, to lay aſide their hoſtile preparations.

In the mean time, the belligerent powers grew heartily tired of the war, though neither cared to acknowledge their real ſentiments. At laſt an armiſtice took place between the emperor and France, which gave occaſion to ſome preliminary articles, by which the latter offered to reſtore to the empire all the places ſhe had taken during the war. It was alſo ſtipulated, that the emperor ſhould poſſeſs the Mantuan, Parma, Placentia, and the Milaneſe. Don Carlos was to be acknowledged king of Naples and Sicily; the duchy of Tuſcany was aſſigned to the duke of Lorraine, who afterwards married Maria-Thereſa, eldeſt daughter to the emperor: the duchy of Lorraine was annexed to the crown of France, and the duchy of Bar given to Staniſlaus, king of Poland, who renounced that crown, but was to enjoy the title. By this plan of pacification, Leghorn was to be declared a free port; France was to guarantee the pragmatic ſanction; and England, Holland, Portugal and Vienna, were to be ſolicited to guarantee the preſent treaty, to which the kings of Spain and Sardinia were to be invited to accede.

A. D. 1736.

This treaty was concluded in the month of October, about which time the king returned from Hanover, and was received by his ſubjects with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy. On the 15th of January he opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he told them, that the plan of pacification between the French and imperial courts was nearly the ſame with that which had been concerted between him and the ſtates-general, though communicated as a new plan formed by the principal contracting powers. He told both houſes of parliament, "That he had agreed to the plan which had been communicated to the kings of Spain and Sardinia; and there were hopes of their agreeing to it, upon their obtaining reaſonable ſecurity, for their poſſeſſing the countries ſtipulated to them." His majeſty added, "That he had already given orders for a reduction of his forces both by ſea and land; but hoped they would agree to ſome extraordinary expence, till the peace of Europe was more fully ſettled;" and concluded with pathetically exhorting them, in imitation of the great powers of Europe, to peace and unanimity.

When his majeſty was retired, a motion was made in the upper houſe for an addreſs of thanks to the ſpeech, importing, that the houſe beheld with pleaſure, in their preſent ſituation, the happy effects of the extraordinary ſupplies granted of late years by parliament, together with their congratulations on the plan of pacification. But the earl of Strafford oppoſed this addreſs, ſaying, in his opinion, the peace was a very bad one for Europe, ſeeing it would leave France in poſſeſſion of Lorraine, by which means ſhe could at any time find an eaſy acceſſion into the very heart of Europe. After ſome altercation, however, the addreſs was voted, drawn up, preſented, and moſt graciouſly received. The example of the lords was followed by the commons, who met with the like favourable reception.

The ſupplies were voted without any remarkable debate, as were alſo 15,000 men for the ſervice of the enſuing year. But a ſubject of the greateſt importance to the ſafety of the nation ſoon after engaged the attention of parliament. The drinking of geneva, and other diſtilled ſpirituous liquors had, for ſome years paſt, encreaſed to a ſurprizing degree, eſpecially among the lower claſs of people, of whom thouſands had already periſhed by this abominable practice, and a much greater number were rendered wholly unfit for labour or ſervice. At the ſame time their morals had been ſo greatly debauched, that a general diſſoluteneſs had taken place among them. Theſe pernicious liquors, of which gin was principally drank, was not only ſold by diſtillers, but retailed in the ſmalleſt quantities in every petty chandler's ſhop and coal-ſhed in the metropolis; by which means, journeymen, apprentices and ſervants were drawn in to intoxicate themſelves with this bewitching fluid. In ſhort, there was the greateſt reaſon to apprehend, that the public welfare and ſafety, as well as the trade of the nation, would be greatly affected by this practice, which was ſo dangerous to the health, ſtrength, peace and morals, and even threatened the total extinction of the lower claſs of people. Induced by theſe melancholy conſiderations, the magiſtrates of Middleſex preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, in which they enumerated theſe evils, and prayed the houſe to take the matter into their ſerious conſideration, and apply ſuch remedy as they ſhould think proper.

After a thorough examination into this affair, a motion was made for levying a duty of two ſhillings per gallon upon all ſpirituous liquors, and that fifty ſhillings ſhould be paid to his majeſty for a licence, to be taken out yearly by every perſon who ſhould ſell any of whatever kind. This occaſioned a very warm debate. It was ſaid, that theſe duties amounted to a prohibition; and as they extended to rum, there was great reaſon to fear that it would prove of fatal conſequence to the Britiſh ſugar iſlands, which were already in a declining condition: that many thouſands depended for their livelihood on the Britiſh diſtillery; and that it was highly abſurd to argue againſt the uſe of a thing from the abuſe of it.

In anſwer to this, it was obſerved, that nothing but the extreme danger of the nation, from the exceſſive uſe of ſpirituous liquors, could have induced them to make ſuch a motion: that they were fully ſenſible of the difficulties to which great numbers of his majeſty's ſubjects would be reduced by the duties propoſed to be laid on ſuch liquors; but that the intereſt of individuals ought to give way to the general intereſt; and where the preſervation of the community was viſibly and ſo eſſentially concerned, the hardſhips of ſome few individuals muſt be overlooked: that with reſpect to rum and brandy, it was very certain thoſe liquors had often been drank to very great exceſs, notwithſtanding the high duties laid upon them, and were as pernicious both to the health and morals of the people as any home-made ſpirit: that if any ſorts of ſpirits were exempted from the duties now propoſed, the retailer would ſell the moſt pernicious ſtuff under that denomination; and the diſtiller would compound them in ſuch a manner, that it would be impoſſible to detect the impoſition. Theſe reaſons were thought ſufficient by the majority, and a bill was ordered in for impoſing the above duties.

While this bill was depending, ſeveral petitions were preſented to the houſe by the planters in the ſugar colonies, and the merchants of Briſtol and Liverpool, repreſenting the hardſhips to which they ſhould be expoſed, by a law which amounted to a prohibition of rum and ſpirits diſtilled from molaſſes. Theſe applications occaſioned a mitigating clauſe in favour of a compoſition known by the name of punch; and the diſtillers were permitted to exerciſe any other employment.

With theſe amendments the bill paſſed both houſes; and on the 5th of May received the royal aſſent.

On the 27th of April* his royal highneſs Frederic, prince of Wales, was married to the princeſs Auguſta of Saxagotha. This event filled the nation with joy. The two houſes of parliament, the city of London, and almoſt every county town and borough in England expreſſed their ſatisfaction in addreſſes to their majeſties and the princely pair.

Among other bills brought into the houſe of commons, during the preſent ſeſſion, was one for reſtraining lands from being diſpoſed of in Mortmain, whereby they became unalienable. This bill took its riſe from ſeveral incidents that had lately happened, by which heirs at law had ſuffered conſiderably by injudicious diſpoſals of their lands to charitable and other uſes: it was therefore thought proper to put a ſtop to ſo growing an evil. This bill alarmed the two univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge, and they, as well as the colleges of Eaton, Wincheſter and Weſtminſter, preſented petitions againſt it. The petition from the univerſity of Cambridge was very particular, ſetting forth, "That the univerſity and the colleges in it were founded and endowed for the maintaining fit perſons in the ſtudy of uſeful knowledge, and to bring up youth in learning, virtue and religion; that in general the intention of the founders had been anſwered. But the petitioners apprehended, that if the bill now depending paſſed without amendment, it would be attended both at preſent and in futurity, with very prejudicial conſequences, becauſe it would cut them off from donations to ſupply preſent and future deficiencies, or for any other wiſe or great purpoſes, how uſeful or neceſſary ſoever they might be thought; and that a conſiderable part of their revenue aroſe from annuities and other certain payments, iſſuing out of lands and other eſtates, and that many of thoſe payments having been fixed in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and ſtill continuing invariably the ſame, were then by the great fall of money ſince that time ſunk ſo far below their original value, as to be inſufficient to anſwer the purpoſes to which they were deſigned; and that ſeveral headſhips were under 120l. ſome under 100 a year, and that the ſalary of ſome profeſſorſhips were under fifty pounds a year; and others, as thoſe of botany, anatomy and chemiſtry had no endowment at all; and that the income of much the greater part of their fellowſhips was under ſixty pounds, of many under forty pounds, of ſome ſo low as thirty, twenty and fifteen pounds a year; and that many of their ſcholarſhips and exhibitions were even under thoſe ſmall ſums, and that many poor ſtudents had neither ſcholarſhip nor exhibition to help towards their maintenance; and that the number of advowſons in moſt colleges was very ſmall in proportion to the number of fellows; and therefore praying the houſe to except that univerſity and the ſeveral colleges therein out of the ſaid bill."

The requeſt of all theſe ſeats of learning was complied with; but the petitions of the hoſpitals, and other charitable ſocieties were rejected. Several other amendments were alſo made to the bill, both in the lower and upper houſe; after which it paſſed, and received the royal aſſent.

On the 20th of May his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and after ſigning ſeveral acts cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he acquainted both houſes, "That ſince the preliminary articles had been concluded between his moſt chriſtian majeſty and the emperor, a farther convention concerning the execution of them had been made and communicated to him by both thoſe courts, and that negotiations were carrying on by the ſeveral powers engaged in the late war, in order to ſettle the general pacification." His majeſty then expreſſed his concern with relation to the ſeeds of diſſenſion that had been ſown among his people; exhorted his parliament to cultivate unanimity, and promiſed impartial protection to all his ſubjects. He then acquainted them, "that being obliged that ſummer to viſit his German dominions, he hoped they would make the adminiſtration of the queen, whom he had reſolved to appoint regent in his abſence, as eaſy to her as her wiſe conduct would render her government agreeable to them."

During the king's abſence, the adminiſtration were ſo remiſs in their attention to the proper regulations of civil government, that licentiouſneſs raged uncontrouled throughout the kingdom, and the public peace was daily diſturbed by the moſt audacious riots and tumults. In the month of July, a deſperate riot happened among the weavers in Spitalfields, on account of ſeveral artiſts in that branch of buſineſs who had come over from Ireland, and by being more abſtemious in their living were enabled to underwork the Engliſh. This tumult continued for ſome days, when it was ſuppreſſed by the interpoſition of the civil power, aſſiſted by parties of horſe and foot-guards; but not without the loſs of ſeveral lives.

* About the middle of this month died at Vienna, in the 74th year of his age, the celebrated prince Eugene, leaving behind him the character of an invincible hero, and conſummate politician. Count Staremberg, who ranked next after the prince in military reputation, did not long ſurvive. About the ſame time lord chancellor Talbot, who was univerſally admired for his worth, probity, and acquired accompliſhments, paid the great debt of nature. He was ſucceeded in his important office by lord Hardwicke.

The riotous diſpoſition of the populace filled the government with great apprehenſions of the conſequences of the gin-act taking place on the 29th of September: on that day, therefore, a double guard mounted at Kenſington; the guards at St. James's and Whitehall were reinforced; a guard was placed at the Rolls (Sir Joſeph Jekyll, then maſter of the Rolls, having been the principal promoter of the bill;) a detachment of life-guards and horſe-grenadiers paraded in Covent-Garden; and every other imaginable method was taken to ſuppreſs any tumult that might happen on the occaſion: but, contrary to expectation, every thing remained very quiet, and the act took place without the leaſt diſorder.

A moſt daring inſult, however, was committed whilſt the courts of juſtice were ſitting in Weſtminſter-hall. The gin-act, mortmain-act, and an act for borrowing 600,000l. from the ſinking fund, incloſed in a brown paper parcel, were blown up with gun-powder in the great hall, and partly burnt; for which fact one Nixon, a non-juring clergyman, was apprehended, and being fully convicted thereof, was ſentenced to pay 200 marks, to be impriſoned for five years, and to give ſecurity for his good behaviour for five years after; and to be brought up to the ſeveral courts then ſitting, with a label on his breaſt denoting his crime.

During theſe tranſactions, an incident happened in Scotland, which was attended with very ſerious conſequences. One Wilſon, a bold reſolute fellow, had been tried and condemned to be hanged at Edinburgh, for robbing one of the officers of the revenue; and for having afterwards been guilty of one of the moſt daring actions ever attempted, that of reſcuing out of the hands of juſtice his brother-convict in the time of divine ſervice, when ſurrounded by the guards. So deſperate an offender filled the city of Edinburgh with terror, and the magiſtrates redoubled their uſual precautions for cauſing the ſentence pronounced againſt this deſperate criminal to be executed. This had the deſired effect, and Wilſon ſuffered without any diſturbance being raiſed by his friends; but while the executioner was cutting him down from the gallows, he was pelted with dirt and ſtones by the rabble. Some of the ſtones happening to ſtrike captain Porteous, who commanded the city guards, he gave way to his paſſion, and ordered his ſoldiers to fire among the populace. They readily obeyed, and ſeveral perſons were killed, and others wounded. As this was done without any order from the magiſtrates, Porteous was tried for murder, convicted on full evidence, and ſentenced to be hanged on the 8th of September. The jury, however, by whom he was tried, found in their verdict, "that he and his guards had been attacked and pelted with ſtones of a conſiderable ſize, thrown by the multitude, whereby ſeveral of the ſoldiers were bruiſed and wounded."

This paliating circumſtance, together with the daring inſolence of the ſmugglers, of whom Wilſon was the chief, and who were then very numerous at Edinburgh, induced the queen, who was then regent, to indulge Porteous with a reſpite for ſix weeks, that a more particular enquiry might be made into the whole tranſaction. The reſpite occaſioned a very tragical cataſtrophe. The common people reſented, in the moſt outrageous manner, this lenity ſhewn to a perſon who was the object of their deteſtation: they conſidered it as an attempt to ſanctify oppreſſion. The relations and friends of thoſe who had been killed took every method in their power to increaſe this hatred in the populace; and a reſolution was formed to execute the criminal, and on the very day fixed by the judges for that purpoſe. Accordingly, about ten o'clock at night, on the 7th of September, a party of men from the adjacent country, entered Edinburgh, ſurprized the city guard, ſeized all their fire arms, locked up the gates, and gave the alarm that they were come to revenge innocent blood. They were immediately joined by ſeveral thouſands of the populace, and repaired directly to the priſon where Porteous was confined. After ſeveral fruitleſs attempts to force open the door, they ſet it on fire, dragged the criminal from his apartment, and hanged him upon a dyer's pole near the graſs-market. From the boldneſs, ſecrecy and ſucceſs of this daring enterprize, it was univerſally believed, that ſome perſons, much above the rank of the vulgar, were concerned in it; eſpecially as they left the arms and drums of the city guard on the ſpot where they found them, as ſoon as the execution was over, and departed quietly without offering the leaſt violence to any other perſon.

The queen highly reſented this inſult offered to the government; and on enquiry it appeared, that the magiſtrates of Edinburgh had received intimation the day before of what was to happen, but had neglected to take the neceſſary precautions to render the attempt abortive. Her majeſty complained of this want of reſpect to her government, and a reſolution was taken to make a ſtrict enquiry into the whole proceeding, and to puniſh the guilty with the utmoſt ſeverity.

About this period a very extraordinary perſon ſtarted up in Europe, and for ſome time created great ſpeculation and diſcourſe. The republic of Genoa held the ſovereignty of the iſland and kingdom of Corſica, but had exerciſed their authority with ſo much tyranny, that the inhabitants had thrown off their yoke, and taking up arms, had defeated ſeveral parties of troops their quondam maſters had ſent to reduce them. In this conjuncture Theodore Baron Stein, a man of a bold and enterpriſing genius, aſſiſted by ſome perſons in England, landed in the iſland of Corſica in an Engliſh ſhip, where he was received with open arms by the inſurgents, who were prepoſſeſſed in favour of his appearance, which was very commanding and reſpectable; and in a little time he prevailed ſo far with the Corſicans, that having engaged all the credit he had or could procure for arms and ammunition, which were landed in Corſica, the inhabitants proceeded to elect him their ſovereign; and he was regularly crowned king of Corſica in an open plain, by the name of Theodore the Firſt, king of Corſica; and ſome ſmall pieces of money with that inſcription were actually coined. But all theſe promiſing appearances were ſoon after blaſted: he had been ſo extremely laviſh of his firſt ſuccours both of men and money, that month after month elapſed, and no other ſuccours appeared. His new ſubjects began to ſuſpect him of having impoſed upon their too ready belief. Some of the principal of them took the liberty to expoſtulate with him upon this head. Incenſed at their preſumption, Theodore ordered them to be tried and executed by the ſentence of a court-martial of his own appointing. This proved the ſentence of his own degradation: he ſoon found the affection of his new ſubjects began to cool towards him. The Corſicans are noted for never forgetting or forgiving an injury. Theodore, troubled for the conſequences of their reſentment, prudently choſe to leave the iſland; but this was not to be done without the ſafeguard of ſome plauſible pretext: he therefore feigned an invitation from ſome foreign powers with whom he was to hold a conference, and promiſing to return with large ſupplies of arms and money, which, he ſaid, his preſence was neceſſary to procure, he abandoned his kingdom, and never ſet foot in it again*.

A. D. 1737. The parliament met on the 1ſt of February, and the ſeſſion was opened by commiſſion, his majeſty being greatly indiſpoſed by the fatigue he had undergone in a tempeſtuous paſſage from Holland. The lord-chancellor, in his majeſty's name, made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he informed them, that a farther convention with regard to the execution of the preliminary articles had been communicated to his majeſty by the French and Imperial courts, and that negotiations were then carrying on by the ſeveral powers engaged in the late war, in order to ſettle a general pacification. He added, "That the reſpective acts of ceſſion being exchanged, and orders iſſued for the evacution and poſſeſſion of the ſeveral countries and places by the powers concerned, according to the allotment and diſpoſition of the preliminary articles, the great work of re-eſtabliſhing the general tranquillity was greatly advanced. But that his majeſty was of opinion, that great attention ought to be paid to the final concluſion of the new ſettlement which was to diſpoſe of ſuch conſiderable parts of Europe. That though there was the moſt promiſing appearance of a general and laſting tranquillity, yet common prudence called upon the Britiſh nation to avoid an indolent ſecurity and too great a diſregard to future events. In ſhort, that ſhe might be provided againſt all attempts that might be made againſt her peace by her enemies." He next acquainted the commons, "That his majeſty had, as ſoon as circumſtances would admit, made ſuch a reduction of the expences, as was conſiſtent with the peace and ſafety of his kingdoms, the ſecurity of commerce, and the honour and intereſt of the nation." In the remainder of the ſpeech, the late diſturbance at Edinburgh was mentioned in the following manner, "His majeſty cannot but obſerve, that it muſt be matter of the utmoſt ſurprize and concern to every true lover of his country, to ſee the many contrivances and attempts carried on in various ſhapes, and in various parts of the nation, tumultuouſly to reſiſt and obſtruct the execution of the laws, and to violate the peace of the kingdom. The diſturbers of the public repoſe, conſcious that the intereſt of his majeſty and his people are the ſame, and of the good harmony which ſubſiſts between him and his parliament, have levelled their ſedition againſt both, and, in their late outrages, have either directly oppoſed, or, at leaſt, attempted to render ineffectual, ſome acts of the whole legiſlature. His majeſty, in his great wiſdom, thinks it affords a melancholy proſpect to conſider to what height thoſe audacious proceedings may riſe."

This ſpeech was anſwered by very loyal addreſſes from both houſes of parliament. The lords, as forming the ſupreme court of judicature in the kingdom, took particular notice of that part of his majeſty's ſpeech, relating to tumults and riots. Lord Carteret obſerved, that notwithſtanding the power with which the civil magiſtrate was inveſted, the military force had been employed in ſupporting the late diſturbances, none of which, he ſaid, had proceeded from any diſaffection to the government, but from very different cauſes. He repreſented the murder which had been committed by the populace of Edinburgh, as a crime of the moſt atrocious nature; adding, that the conſpiracy by which it had been effected was the more alarming, as it had not been attended with any of thoſe diſorders ſo common to the tumults of a headſtrong and riotous populace; which afforded the greateſt reaſon to believe, that it had been framed and conducted by perſons of rank and conſequence. His lordſhip was therefore of opinion, that the houſe ought to make the moſt diligent inquiſition into this affair, in order to diſcover the delinquents, and bring them to condign puniſhment; and even to puniſh the city of Edinburgh, if it ſhould appear that the inhabitants and magiſtrates had not exerted their utmoſt endeavours to ſuppreſs the inſurrection. He then moved, "That the provoſt and bailies of Edinburgh, in the year 1736; the perſon commanding the city guard at the time of the riot, in which captain Porteous was murdered; and the commander in chief of his majeſty's forces in Scotland at the time of the ſaid riot, ſhould all of them be ordered to attend the houſe on a day appointed; and that an humble addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, deſiring that the different accounts and papers relating to the murder of captain Porteous might be ſubmitted to their inſpection.

This motion was agreed to; and the gentlemen being arrived from Scotland, the houſe entered, with great alacrity, into the enquiry. The perſons were all ſeperately examined, but their evidence was confuſed and unſatisfactory. The houſe was, however, ſatisfied from the whole, that the magiſtrates of Edinburgh had not done their duty in ſuppreſſing the riot, though they had no legal evidence to convict them. A bill was therefore brought in for diſabling Alexander Wilſon, the provoſt of Edinburgh, from taking, holding, and enjoying any office or place of magiſtracy in that city, or elſewhere in Great Britain; and for impoſing a fine of 2000l. upon the corporation of Edinburgh, for the benefit of the widow of Porteous. This bill occaſioned very violent debates in both houſes, but was at laſt paſſed by a ſmall majority; and afterwards received the royal aſſent.

On the 22d of February the following motion was made in the houſe of commons by Mr. Pulteney, viz. "That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to expreſs the juſt ſenſe of this houſe of his majeſty's great goodneſs and tender regard for the laſting welfare and happineſs of his royal highneſs the prince of Wales; and as this houſe cannot omit any opportunity of ſhewing their zeal and regard for his majeſty's honour, and the proſperity of his family, humbly to beſeech his majeſty, that in conſideration of the high rank and dignity of their royal highneſſes, the prince and princeſs of Wales, and their many eminent virtues and merits, he would be graciouſly pleaſed to ſettle 100,000l. a year on the prince of Wales, out of the revenues chearfully granted to his majeſty, for the expences of his civil government, and better ſupporting the dignity of the crown, and for enabling his majeſty to make an honourable proviſion for his royal family, in the ſame manner his majeſty enjoyed it before his happy acceſſion to the throne: and alſo humbly to beſeech his majeſty to ſettle the like jointure upon her royal highneſs the princeſs of Wales, as her majeſty had when ſhe was princeſs of Wales: and to aſſure his majeſty, that this houſe will enable him effectually to perform the ſame, as nothing will more conduce to the ſtrengthening of his majeſty's government, than honourably ſupporting the dignity of their royal highneſſes, from whom we hope to ſee a numerous iſſue, to deliver down the bleſſings of their reign to the lateſt poſterity."

* When Theodore, king of Corſica, abandoned his kingdom, he took ſhelter in England, where, after a variety of romantic adventures, he finiſhed his exiſtence. In 1750 he was caſt in an action for debt of 100l. and confined in the King's-bench priſon, from whence, in 1756, he was releaſed by an act of inſolvency, when he regiſtered his kingdom for the benefit of his creditors. He died the following year in an obſcure lodging in St. Anne's, Soho, and was buried in the church of St. Giles in the Fields.

This motion was ſeconded by Sir John Barnard, who produced a great variety of inſtances from the Engliſh hiſtory, in order to prove that the heirs apparent of the crown had always been provided for in a very ample and independent manner.

Sir Robert Walpole well knew that ſhould this motion be countenanced, it muſt occaſion a breach in the royal family; at the ſame time he was not inſenſible how materially his own intereſt was concerned to keep up a good correſpondence with the heir apparent. He therefore did every thing in his power to prevent the motion taking place; but his royal highneſs rejected all terms of accommodation, except ſuch as ſhould be made by the parliament.

In conſequence of this Sir Robert entered into the debate with great decency and firmneſs, by endeavouring to ſhew, that his majeſty could not, out of his preſent revenue, ſpare a greater allowance than he did to his royal highneſs: after which he told the houſe,

" That he was commanded by his majeſty to acquaint them, that his majeſty yeſterday ſent a meſſage to his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, by the lord chancellor, lord preſident, lord ſteward, lord chamberlain, duke of Richmond, duke of Argyle, duke of Newcaſtle, earl of Pembroke, earl of Scarborough, and lord Harrington." Which meſſage, ſo ſent by theſe lords, being in writing, was as follows:

" His majeſty has commanded us to acquaint your royal highneſs, in his name, that, upon your royal highneſs's marriage, he immediately took into his royal conſideration the ſettling a proper jointure upon the princeſs of Wales; but his ſudden going abroad, and his indiſpoſition ſince his return, had hitherto retarded the execution of theſe his gracious intentions; from which ſhort delay his majeſty did not apprehend any inconvenience could ariſe, eſpecially ſince no application had in any manner been made to him upon this ſubject by your royal highneſs; and that his majeſty hath now given orders for ſettling a jointure upon the princeſs of Wales, as far as he is enabled by law, ſuitable to her high rank and dignity; which he will, in proper time, lay before his parliament, in order to be rendered certain, and effectually for the benefit of her royal highneſs."

" The king hath farther commanded us to acquaint your royal highneſs, that although your royal highneſs has not thought fit, by any application to his majeſty, to deſire that your allowance of 50,000l. per annum, which is now paid you by monthly payments, at the choice of your royal highneſs, preferably to quarterly payments, by his majeſty's farther grace and favour, be rendered leſs precarious; his majeſty, to prevent the bad conſequences, which he apprehends may follow from the undutiful meaſures, which his majeſty is informed your royal highneſs has been adviſed to purſue, will grant to your royal highneſs, for his majeſty's life, the ſaid 50,000l. per annum, to be iſſued out of his majeſty's civil liſt revenues, over and above your royal highneſs's revenues ariſing from the duchy of Cornwall; which his majeſty thinks a very competent allowance, conſidering his numerous iſſue, and the great expences which do, and muſt neceſſarily attend, an honourable proviſion for his royal family."

And that to this meſſage his royal highneſs the prince returned a verbal anſwer; which, according to the beſt recollection and remembrance of the lords, was in ſubſtance as follows:

" That his royal highneſs deſired the lords to lay him, with all humility, at his majeſty's feet; and to aſſure his majeſty, that he had, and ever ſhould retain the utmoſt duty for his royal perſon; that his royal highneſs was very thankful for any inſtance of his majeſty's goodneſs to him or the princeſs, and particularly for his majeſty's gracious intentions of ſettling a jointure upon her royal highneſs; but that as to the meſſage, the affair was now out of his hands, and therefore he could give no anſwer to it."

After which, his royal highneſs uſed many dutiful expreſſions towards his majeſty; and then added, " Indeed, my lords, it is in other hands: I am ſorry for it;" or to that effect.

This meſſage made various impreſſions upon the houſe, and the oppoſition affected to treat the whole as a wretched artifice of the miniſter to divide the royal family, the better to ſupport his own power. The beſt ſpeakers in the houſe intereſted themſelves in this debate; but the queſtion being called for, a negative was put upon it by a great majority.

On the 25th of February the ſame motion was made in the houſe of peers by lord Carteret; and the duke of Newcaſtle preſented from his majeſty the ſame meſſage that Sir Robert Walpole had delivered to the commons, and a like debate followed; but a negative was put upon the motion by a majority of 79 peers preſent, and 24 proxies, againſt 28 peers preſent, and 12 proxies; upon which a proteſt was entered by 14 peers.

The houſe of commons having reſolved itſelf into a committee to conſider of the national debt, a ſtate thereof was delivered in on the 18th of March, when it was found to amount to 47,855,948l. 3s. 3d½. Several of the Members thinking that the intereſt paid for this debt was too great, Sir John Barnard moved, " That his majeſty be enabled to raiſe money, either by ſale of annuities for years or lives, at ſuch rates as ſhould be preſcribed, or by borrowing at an intereſt not exceeding 3 per cent. to be applied towards redeeming old and new South-ſea annuities; and that ſuch of the annuitants as ſhould be inclined to ſubſcribe their reſpective annuities, ſhould be preferred to all others."

Though this motion appeared evidently calculated for public utility, yet it met with a ſtrong oppoſition from the miniſter and his friends: but the excellent patriot who propoſed it enforced his plan with ſuch ſtrong and unanſwerable arguments, that they were obliged for the preſent to yield to the motion; and, accordingly, on the 30th of March Sir Charles Turner reported from the committee, " That it was their opinion, that all the public funds redeemable by law, which carried an intereſt of 4 per cent. ſhould be reduced according to the reſpective proviſos or clauſes of redemption contained in the acts of parliament for that purpoſe, or with conſent of the proprietors ſhould be converted into an intereſt or annuity not exceeding 3 per cent. nor redeemable till after fourteen years; and that his majeſty ſhould be enabled to borrow from individuals, or public bodies, any ſum of money, at an intereſt not exceeding 3 per cent. to be applied towards reducing the national debt. Several reſolutions were founded on this report, and a bill was immediately prepared, and read a firſt and ſecond time; but a motion being made for having it committed, this was overborne by miniſterial influence, and the bill miſcarried.

A long debate, as uſual, happened on the number of land forces to be kept up; but little new matter was offered on either ſide, excepting that the oppoſition charged the diſorders and tumults, that had lately happened, to the diſlike the people had conceived againſt the numerous army that was kept up, and the great load of taxes they were obliged to pay for maintaining them. The miniſterial party, on the other hand, endeavoured to throw all the blame upon the ſeditious practices of their oppoſers; and maintained, there was then no ſafety for any well-wiſher to his majeſty, but in the neighbourhood of the army, or part of it. The number propoſed was, however, at length agreed to by a great majority.

During this ſeſſion an act paſſed for reſtraining the number of play-houſes; and for ſubjecting all dramatic performances, exhibited on the ſtage, to a licence from the lord-chamberlain of his majeſty's houſhold, before they could be acted.

The parliamentary buſineſs being finiſhed, his majeſty, on the 21ſt of June, put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, wherein he mentioned the licentiouſneſs of the times, "which, (ſaid he) under the colour and diſguiſe of liberty, you cannot be inſenſible what ſcandal and offence it gives to all honeſt and ſober men, and how abſolutely neceſſary it is to reſtrain this exceſſive abuſe by a due and vigorous execution of the laws. Defiance of all authority, contempt of magiſtracy, and even reſiſtance of the laws, are become too general, although equally prejudicial to the prerogative of the crown and the liberties of the people; the ſupport of the one being inſeparable from the protection of the other. I have," continued he, "made the laws of the land the conſtant rule of my actions; and I do, with reaſon, expect in return all that ſubmiſſion to my government and authority which the ſame laws have made the duty, and ſhall always be the intereſt of my ſubjects."

The attempt made by the leaders of the oppoſition, with the tacit conſent at leaſt of the prince of Wales, to obtain an addition to his royal highneſs's income, had diſguſted the king, and occaſioned a viſible coolneſs between them: but an affair of a very intereſting and delicate nature happened ſoon after the cloſe of the ſeſſion, which increaſed the former miſunderſtanding to an open breach between his majeſty and the prince. The particulars of this remarkable affair were as follow:

The princeſs of Wales, who was advanced to the very laſt month of her pregnancy, but not thought to be ſo near her time as ſhe really was, being with their majeſties and the reſt of the royal family at Hampton-court, but without any midwife attending her, ſhe was, on the 31ſt of July, ſeized with the pains of child-birth, which increaſed ſo violently, that the prince, who was with her, was obliged to bring her to London, and ſhe was that night delivered of a daughter, the princeſs Auguſta. His majeſty, on being acquainted with this unlooked-for event, ſent a meſſage, by the earl of Eſſex, to the prince, congratulating him upon the birth of the princeſs; but at the ſame time expreſſing his diſpleaſure at his royal highneſs's conduct in carrying away the princeſs from Hampton-court under the immediate pains of child-birth, to the hazard and danger both of the princeſs and her child, without acquainting his majeſty or the queen with the circumſtances the princeſs was in, or giving them the leaſt notice of his departure. This was looked upon by his majeſty to be ſuch an indignity offered to himſelf and the queen, that he reſented it to the higheſt degree. His royal highneſs endeavoured to clear himſelf by repreſenting the neceſſity of leaving Hampton-court without delay, conſidering the condition the princeſs was in; this he did in two letters, one addreſſed to his majeſty, and the other to the queen, both wrote in a very dutiful ſtrain. He repeated his importunity for a reconciliation, in a very humble meſſage he ſent next day by the marquis of Carnarvon, one of the lords of his bed-chamber; to neither of which he received any anſwer.

The king then ſent a meſſage by the earl of Dunmore to the prince of Wales, to acquaint him that it was his majeſty's pleaſure the baptiſm of the young princeſs ſhould be performed on the 29th, and that he would ſend his lord-chamberlain to ſtand as godfather in his place; that the queen's lady of the bedchamber would ſtand for her majeſty as godmother; and deſired the princeſs to appoint one of the ladies of her bed-chamber to repreſent the dutcheſs-dowager of Saxe-Gotha, as the other godmother; the ceremony to be performed by the arch-biſhop of Canterbury. This meſſage encouraged the prince to repeat again his application for a reconciliation with more earneſtneſs than ever, both to the king and queen; but on the 10th of September following, he received, by the duke of Grafton, a very ſevere meſſage from the king, reproaching him with his paſt conduct, and concluding with the following expreſſions:

"The whole of your conduct, for a conſiderable time, has been ſo entirely void of all real duty to me, that I have long had reaſon to be highly offended with you: and until you withdraw your regard and confidence from thoſe by whoſe inſtigation and advice you are directed and encouraged in your unwarrantable behavior to me and the queen, and until you return to your duty, you ſhall not reſide in my palace, which I will not ſuffer to be made the reſort of them who, under the appearance of an attachment to you, foment the diviſion which you have made in my family, and thereby weaken the common intereſt of the whole.

"In this ſituation, I will receive no reply; but when your actions manifeſt a juſt ſenſe of your duty and ſubmiſſion, that may induce me to pardon what, at preſent, I moſt juſtly reſent. In the mean time, it is my pleaſure that you leave St. James's with all your family, when it can be done without prejudice or inconvenience to the princeſs. I ſhall, for the preſent, leave to the princeſs the care of my grand-daughter, until a proper time calls upon me to conſider of her education."

The prince of Wales paid due obedience to this meſſage, and retired to Kew. He made ſeveral new efforts to regain his majeſty's favour, but they all proved ineffectual. He ordered lord Baltimore, one of his domeſtics, to apply to lord Grantham, chamberlain to the queen, to know whether her majeſty would receive a letter from him, in mitigation of his conduct: but her majeſty declined that. The princeſs then wrote an humble letter to the king, which was delivered by the earl of Pembroke. This his majeſty anſwered in terms full of affection and civility to the princeſs; but it appeared plainly, that his diſpleaſure towards the prince was rather increaſed than abated. The guards were now taken off from their attendance on the prince and princeſs; and thoſe who paid their court to them were not ſuffered to come into his majeſty's preſence.

The letters which paſſed between the royal family were printed by authority, and made various impreſſions on the minds of the people. All the prince's ſervants ſoon after joined the oppoſition to miniſtry.

During theſe tranſactions a deputation of the merchants of London waited on his majeſty at Hampton-court, with a petition in behalf of themſelves and others trading to, and intereſted in the Britiſh colonies in America, complaining, that the free and lawful trade to the Engliſh plantations in America had been greatly interrupted for many years paſt, not only by their ſhips being ſeized on the high ſeas, by Spaniſh ſhips fitted out to cruize under the plauſible pretence of guarding their own coaſt; but the commanders of theſe ſhips had been far from conforming themſelves to theſe orders: they had ſeized ſeveral

Engliſh ſhips, and carried them into ſome of the Spaniſh ports, where they were condemned, with their cargoes; in manifeſt violation of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns, &c. And, therefore, praying that his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to procure them ſpeedy and ſufficient ſatiſfaction for the loſſes they had ſuſtained. His majeſty returned a moſt gracious anſwer to this petition, and the ſecretary of ſtate ſent orders to Mr. Keene, at Madrid, to repeat his inſtances at the court of Spain for their relief. In the mean time a committee of the privy-council ſat at Whitehall to receive proofs of the loſſes which the merchants had ſuffered by the depredations of the Spaniards.

The nation now ſuſtained an irreparable loſs in the death of her majeſty queen Caroline, who paid the debt of nature on the 20th of November, about ſeven o'clock in the evening, in the 55th year of her age. She had been for ſome time indiſpoſed, and had taken medicines for the gout in her ſtomach, but her diſorder proved to be a concealed rupture. The virtues which adorned this princeſs were various and numerous; her conjugal affection was exemplary: the king always found in her a wiſe and faithful counſellor; and when ſhe was entruſted, as ſhe frequently was, with the reins of government, the public were happy under her adminiſtration. Her natural ſagacity and talents were improved by reading and converſing with the moſt eminent philoſophers and authors of the age; and ſhe had made ſo great a progreſs in literature, that ſhe became an umpire in one of the moſt abſtruſe points of metaphyſical reaſoning, the doctrine of free-will and fatality, as diſputed between Mr. Leibnitz and Dr. Clarke. The ingenious were always ſure of a patronage in this amiable princeſs; and the bench of biſhops, through her means, was filled with prelates eminent for their learning.

The king was prodigiouſly afflicted for a length of time, at his irreparable loſs; and the public likewiſe ſhewed every mark of concern they could teſtify on this melancholy occaſion.

Though the foreign events of this year were very little intereſting to Great Britain, yet it may not be improper to preſerve a ſummary account of them.

During the ſummer a rupture happened between the Turks and the Ruſſians, which laſt reduced the city of Aſoph on the Black Sea, and over-ran the greateſt part of Crim-Tartary. The czarina declared war againſt the Ottoman Porte, becauſe the Tartars of the Crimea had made incurſions upon her frontiers; and when ſhe had complained of thoſe diſorders to the vizir, ſhe had received no ſatiſfaction. Beſides, a large body of Tartars had, by order of that miniſter, marched through the Ruſſian provinces in deſpite of the empreſs, and committed horrid havock in their route. The emperor was obliged to engage as a party in this war, by a treaty offenſive and defenſive, which he had many years before concluded with the Ruſſian crown. Before he declared himſelf, however, he joined the maratime powers in offering his mediation to the ſultan, who was very well diſpoſed to peace; but the czarina inſiſted upon retaining Aſoph, which her forces had reduced; and this preliminary article being rejected, as diſhonourable to the Ottoman empire, no accommodation could be effected, and the troops of the belligerent powers were therefore diſtributed into winter quarters. The duke of Lorraine had now ſucceeded to the duchy of Tuſcany, on the death of the laſt of the Medicis family; and the French were by this event relieved from the burden of a great annuity, which they had obliged themſelves to pay him till he ſhould ſucceed to Tuſcany. The king of Spain's troops evacuated that duchy, and the provinces of Italy now yielded to the houſe of Auſtria.

A. D. 1738. In this ſituation were the affairs of Europe, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the 24th of January. His ſpeech was remarkably ſhort, and concluded with recommending the diſpatch of public buſineſs with prudence and unanimity. Each houſe preſented an addreſs of condolance on the death of the queen; with which the king appeared to be deeply affected.

The firſt buſineſs of importance the parliament went upon, (and which, indeed, chiefly engaged their attention during this ſeſſion) was the ſtate of affairs between Great Britain and Spain. His majeſty had referred the examination of the complaints of the Britiſh merchants to a committee of the privy-council, where they attempted to make good their allegations. Having no one to oppoſe them, the public unanimouſly took their part, and every day brought freſh accounts of depredations committed upon Britiſh ſubjects, not only in the American, but in the European ſeas. The court of Spain did not, indeed, directly juſtify all thoſe captures, and to give its proceedings an air of moderation, the crews of three Engliſh ſhips which had, upon frivolous pretexts, been taken in the Mediterranean, and impriſoned in Spain, were ordered to be releaſed; and in ſome flagrant caſes in the Weſt Indies, the ſhips that had been taken were releaſed, upon the owners giving ſecurity for the value, if they ſhould be adjudged to be lawful prizes.

On the third of March a petition was preſented to the houſe of commons from divers merchants, planters and others, trading to, and intereſted in the Britiſh plantations in America. After recapitulating all that had paſſed in conſequence of former applications of the ſame kind, the petitioners ſet forth, "That the Spaniards had paid ſo little regard to his majeſty's moſt gracious endeavours, (to obtain juſtice to his ſubjects) that they had continued their depredations, almoſt ever ſince the treaty of Seville, and more particularly, laſt year, had carried them to a greater height than ever; they having arbitrarily ſeized ſeveral ſhips with their effects, belonging to his majeſty's ſubjects on the high ſeas, in the deſtined courſe of their voyages to and from the Britiſh colonies, amounting to a very conſiderable value; and that the captains or maſters of the ſaid ſhips were, according to the laſt advices of the petitioners, and are, as the petitioners believe, at this time, confined by the Spaniards in the Weſt Indies, and the crews are now in ſlavery in Old Spain, where they are moſt inhumanly treated; and that cruel nation make it their practice to attack and board all Britiſh merchant-ſhips they meet with in the American ſeas, under pretence of ſearching for goods which they deem contraband, or not according to their own arbitrary will and pleaſure, contrary to the law of nations, and in manifeſt violation of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns. And that by theſe unjuſt and violent proceedings of the Spaniards, the trade and navigation to and from America is rendered very unſafe and precarious, inſomuch that the inſurance from Jamaica has greatly riſen on theſe accounts only: and that without ſome ſpeedy and effectual remedy, the American trade and navigation will be, together with the revenue of the crown ariſing therefrom, greatly diminiſhed, if not entirely loſt: and farther repreſenting to the houſe, that although his Catholic majeſty has ſtipulated, by the treaty of Seville, and by the declaration of 1732, relative thereto, to cauſe reparation to be forthwith made to the unhappy ſufferers, yet there is no inſtance of its having been done; ſo far from it, that whilſt the Britiſh ſubjects have been amuſed with vain and fruitleſs hopes of ſatisfaction, the Spaniards have committed farther inſults and depredations upon them, and ſtill continue the ſame unjuſt practices; and that the cedulas or orders given by the court of Spain to their governors in America, are only calculated, as the petitioners, by experience, have reaſon to apprehend, to evade giving ſatisfaction to the Britiſh ſubjects; for there has never been one of thoſe cedulas complied with, nor any governor recalled or puniſhed for his diſobedience, as the petitioners ever heard: and that for any nation to aſſume the power of detaining or rummaging the Britiſh ſhips, upon their lawful voyages on the American ſeas, is, in effect, the petitioners conceive, claiming and exerciſing the ſole ſovereignty of thoſe ſeas: and that if the Spaniards be ſuffered to act in this injurious manner, to inſult the perſons of his majeſty's ſubjects, or to plunder them of their property, the petitioners apprehend the ſame will be attended not only with a great obſtruction to this valuable branch of our commerce and navigation, but alſo with conſequences very fatal to Great Britain itſelf: and, therefore, as the meaſures hitherto purſued have proved ineffectual, praying the houſe to take the premiſes into their mature conſideration, and provide ſuch a timely and adequate remedy for putting an end to all inſults and depredations on the Britiſh ſubjects, as to the houſe ſhall ſeem meet, as well as procure ſuch relief for the unhappy ſufferers, as the nature of their loſs, and the juſtice of their cauſe, require; and that they may be heard by themſelves and council thereupon."

This petition was referred to a committee of the whole houſe, as was another petition to the ſame effect, preſented on behalf of the maſter, wardens, aſſiſtants, and commonalty of the ſociety of merchant adventurers within the city of Briſtol. On the ſame day, a petition upon a particular caſe was laid before the houſe, and made great noiſe: it was from the owner of the ſhip Ann Galley; which was taken in a time of profound peace, bound from Guinea to Jamaica. This capture, which the owner ſaid was in value 10,500l. was ſo flagitious, that the Spaniſh miniſtry frequently ordered reparation to be made to the petitioners, and they actually received upwards of 500l. from the Spaniſh cheſt at St. Jago, by way of compenſation. But that not being near the value of their damages, though the Spaniſh miniſtry had admitted the capture to be illegal, and had even ordered full ſatisfaction to be made to the owners, they, therefore, brought their petition for relief. Another petition of the ſame kind was preſented at the ſame time, and all of them were referred to the ſame committee.

A motion was now made, "to addreſs his majeſty for copies of the ſeveral petitions, repreſentations, and memorials, and all other papers relating to the Spaniſh depredations upon the Britiſh ſubjects, which had been preſented to his majeſty, or had been delivered to either of the ſecretaries of ſtate ſince the firſt of September laſt; with copies of ſuch repreſentations or memorials as had been made either to the king of Spain or his miniſters; and of the letters written to his majeſty's miniſter at Madrid; and the anſwers that have been given or received to ſuch memorials, repreſentations, and letters."

Though the miniſter did not oppoſe the ſubſtance of this motion, yet he thought that complying entirely with it might diſcover particulars of which a bad uſe might be made: he, therefore, inſiſted upon not addreſſing for the anſwers that had been given or received to ſuch memorials, repreſentations, and letters. This brought on a long debate, in which the cruelties of the Spaniards, and the tameneſs of the Engliſh miniſtry, were equally exaggerated. The chief ſpeakers on both ſides exerted themſelves upon this occaſion; but the miniſter adhered to his point, that as affairs were then ſituated, it would be imprudent to plunge the nation into a war, without trying whether it was poſſible to bring Spain to terms, of which there was then great probability. All that the oppoſition urged with any appearance of truth, was admitted of by the miniſter, who was more frank on this head than ſome of his friends; for they were apt to throw out reflections againſt the ſmuggling trade, which the ſubjects of Great Britain carried on in the Weſt Indies, contrary to treaties. The oppoſition immediately turned this into a reflection upon the whole body of the Britiſh merchants in America; and were always ready to give the moſt ſhocking inſtances of the cruelties of the Spaniards againſt the Engliſh; and that they were of ſuch a nature, as, in fact, admitted of no farther treaty.

Sir Robert Walpole owned, with great candour, that the laſt anſwer which had come from the Spaniſh miniſtry, was ſo far from being ſatisfactory, that if the houſe ſhould ſee it, and if (as it unavoidably muſt) it ſhould come to the knowledge of the public, very bad conſequences muſt follow. The parliament and nation, unacquainted with the reaſons which his majeſty and his miniſtry might have for avoiding a precipitate war, would preſs it; and his majeſty muſt either comply, contrary to the true intereſts of his people, or he muſt diſagreeably exerciſe that part of his prerogative which veſts him with the power of making war or peace. He intreated the gentlemen to conſider, that even though the preſent motion was carried without any amendment, it was in his majeſty's breaſt to comply, or not to comply with it; and if the houſe ſhould addreſs for a paper or papers which his majeſty and his miniſtry were conſcious ought not to be made public, they muſt lay his majeſty under the hardſhip of refuſing it. He acquainted them, that the Britiſh miniſtry, notwithſtanding the harſhneſs of the laſt anſwer from Spain, had ſent to that court ſome propoſitions which might ſoften them, and which, in all probability, would ſoon be anſwered. If they were not anſwered to the ſatisfaction of his majeſty, he himſelf would move, that every paper relating to Spain, even their laſt anſwer, ſhould be laid before the houſe; but that, till then, it would be highly improper to comply with the motion. He next made a recapitulation of the late treaties and tranſactions between England and Spain; and he endeavoured to prove, that the ſtiffneſs of the Spaniards was owing to the perplexed ſtate of affairs in Europe ſince the treaty of Seville, which did not admit of the meeting of the commiſſaries for adjuſting the pretenſions on both ſides, ſo as to make a final report of their commiſſion. He obſerved, that the ſentiments of certain gentlemen againſt the Spaniards, ſince that time were greatly altered; and that the claims which the Engliſh had upon them were far from being looked upon, either at home or abroad, to be ſo clear as they were then repreſented, which appears by their being referred to a congreſs. He next attempted to ſhew, that the Spaniards had hitherto done as much to ſatisfy the Engliſh ſufferers as could be well expected. The diſtance between Madrid and the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies, from whence the proofs muſt be brought, was very great. The Spaniſh governors were extremely inſolent, and, in ſome meaſure, arbitrary, and independent upon the miniſtry; ſo that it was no wonder if that court ſometimes found difficulty in bringing them to reaſon. He even gave inſtances of ſome Engliſh ſhips that had been abſolutely releaſed by the Spaniards; of others that had been releaſed, upon giving ſecurity to ſtand trial whether they had been engaged in an illicit trade or not: and he mentioned others, that the court of Madrid ſeemed very well diſpoſed towards ſatisfying their claims; and, to conclude, he was for amending the queſtion that had been moved for.

It was perceived by the members of the oppoſition, that the miniſter aimed at fixing the retroſpect of the Spaniſh depredations no farther back than the treaty of Seville; but they obſerved, that the cauſes of complaints had exiſted for theſe twenty years; and that little or no redreſs having yet been obtained, the houſe ought, for the honour and intereſt of the nation, to be informed of the reaſons, which they could not be, without complying with the motion in its full extent: that the public and ſufferers had a right to all the ſatisfaction which the houſe could give them; and if they could give them none upon the Spaniards, they ought at leaſt to know who were the authors of their calamities at home, by a timid, diſgraceful conduct, in ſo long delaying to repreſs force with force.

Notwithſtanding the miniſter was ſo ſtrongly attacked by the chiefs of the oppoſition, yet his ſpeech had ſuch an effect on the houſe, that he carried the queſtion by a conſiderable majority.

A bill was now brought in by Mr. Pulteney, "for the more effectually ſecuring and encouraging the trade of his majeſty's ſubjects to America." The intention of this propoſed act was, to give the property of all prizes taken from the Spaniards after the declaration of war, to the officers and ſailors preſent in the action; to allow to the ſailors the ſum of five pounds, by way of head money, for every Spaniard taken at ſea; and to veſt in the captors, by his majeſty's patent, the property of all the places conquered from the Spaniards.

The bill paſſed the firſt reading with very little oppoſition; but when a motion was made for a ſecond reading, it was ſtrongly oppoſed by the miniſter. He obſerved, that with regard to the firſt article, if hoſtilities were immediately to commence againſt Spain, and a ſquadron of Engliſh ſhips of war was to take the whole plate fleet or flotilla of the Spaniards, with all their regiſter ſhips, every ſhilling of it muſt become the property of the Engliſh ſeamen, though it was publicly known that not one fifth part of that treaſure belonged to the Spaniards, but was the property of the French, the Dutch, and other trading nations of Europe. As to the granting head-money for every Spaniard taken at open ſea, he approved of very much, as ſoon as war ſhould be declared. The third article he thought of a very dangerous nature; and that, if it paſſed into an act, it muſt effectually preclude the concluding any ſafe and honourable peace; becauſe, in all negotiations of peace, ſome places on both ſides are commonly given up to facilitate it, which could not be done, if his majeſty, by letters patent, ſhould part with the property to private owners.

He then urged, with great energy, that, ſhould the act in queſtion immediately take place, without being greatly amended, it muſt be attended with the abſolute ruin of the Britiſh commerce all over Europe. It muſt give an alarm to the French for their property, which is greater than that of the Spaniards themſelves on board their American fleets; and that the French court, in ſuch a caſe, would not heſitate to take part with Spain, and join her with all her naval force to convoy the Spaniſh plate fleet to Europe; beſides, moſt of the French, the Dutch and the Daniſh property at ſea, were inſured in England or Holland in time of peace, and therefore the loſs, in fact, muſt fall upon the Britiſh and Dutch inſurers, as they could have no pretext to indemnify the French and other nations for the loſſes they would ſuſtain; ſo that the bill, if paſſed into a law, might ruin the Dutch as well as the Britiſh inſurers. He deſired the houſe to conſider, in ſuch an event, what muſt be the caſe of the Britiſh merchants then reſiding in Spain, their perſons, their ſhips and their properties, all which the Spaniards would certainly ſequeſter. "What muſt the Dutch," ſaid he, "think of ſuch a bill? or what power in Europe can be our hearty friend, ſhould it, at this time, paſs into a law?"

It being inſinuated by ſome of the oppoſition, that he was afraid of a war, becauſe peace was his only ſafety, he ſaid, "It was but a mean excuſe for a miniſter when any wrong ſtep is made in government, that he is not accountable for the events of meaſures that never were adviſed by him, and in which he was over-ruled by his ſuperiors. I have always diſdained thoſe mean ſubterfuges; and with what face can I appear again in this houſe, if full and ample ſatisfaction is not made us, or, at leaſt, if we do not do our utmoſt to obtain it; either by fair and peaceable means, or by exerting all our ſtrength, in caſe a war becomes neceſſary. If my country ſhould call me to account, I would willingly take upon me the blame of every ſtep that has been made by the government, ſince I had the honour to enter into the adminiſtration. As to the common notion of a miniſter being afraid to enter upon a war, I do not underſtand upon what it can be grounded. For my part, I never could ſee any cauſe, either from reaſon or my own experience, to imagine a miniſter is not as ſafe in time of war as in time of peace. Nay, if we are to judge by reaſon alone, it is the intereſt of a miniſter, conſcious of any miſmanagement, that there ſhould be a war; becauſe by a war, the eyes of the public are diverted from examining into his conduct; nor is he accountable for the bad ſucceſs of a war, as he is for that of an adminiſtration."

During theſe diſputes, the miniſtry were endeavouring to get a deciſive anſwer from the court of Spain; but not being able to obtain one, the examinations and enquiries about depredations went on with more fury than ever. Mr. Pulteney at laſt brought into the houſe of commons, which he moved for in a ſpeech, the following ſet of reſolutions: "That it is the natural and undoubted right of the Britiſh ſubjects to ſail with their ſhips on any part of the ſeas of America, to and from any part of his majeſty's dominions; and that ſeizing and confiſcating ſuch ſhips as are not ſailing and trafficking in the ports and havens which have fortifications, caſtles, magazines, or warehouſes, or other places poſſeſſed by the king of Spain, is contrary to equity and juſtice, and a maniſeſt violation of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns. That it is the indiſputable right of the ſubjects of Great Britain to carry in their ſhips all ſorts of goods, merchandize or effects, from one part of the Britiſh dominions to any other part of the Britiſh dominions; and that no goods or merchandize being ſo carried are, by the laws of nations, or any treaty between the two crowns, to be deemed or taken as contraband goods; and that the ſearching of ſuch ſhips on the open ſeas, under pretence of finding contraband goods, is highly injurious to the trade of this kingdom, a violation of the law of nations, and an infraction of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns. That the ſubjects of Great Britain did hold and poſſeſs lands in the province of Jucantan in America, antecedent to, and at the time of the treaty of 1670; which treaty confirmed the right to each contracting party of ſuch lands or places as either did at that time hold and poſſeſs; and that the ſubjects of Great Britain then had, and have at all times ſince, claimed a right of cutting logwood in the bay of Campeachy, and enjoyed the ſame, without interruption, till of late years: which right ſeems further particularly ſecured to us by the manner in which the firſt article of the treaty of 1670, is expreſſed, namely, "Without prejudice to any liberty or power which the ſubjects of Great Britain enjoyed either through right, ſufferance, or indulgence." That the attacking a fleet of Britiſh ſhips gathering ſalt in the iſland of Tortugas, then under convoy of one of his majeſty's ſhips of war, by two men of war belonging to the king of Spain, was a notorious infraction of the convention ſigned at Madrid, December 14, 1715, and an high inſult on the honour due to the flag of Great Britain. That for many years laſt paſt, the liberty of navigation in the American ſeas hath been unjuſtly diſturbed by the Spaniards, under pretence of ſearching for, and finding, illicit trade; the Britiſh ſhips unlawfully ſeized, upon the open ſeas, plundered and confiſcated; the ſailors robbed, inhumanly tortured, impriſoned and made ſlaves, to the grievous loſs of the merchants, the obſtruction of the commerce, and the diſhonour of the nation. That, notwithſtanding the repeated application of parliament, the treaty of Seville, and the aſſurances ſo frequently given to merchants of procuring reparation for their loſſes and ill uſage; and notwithſtanding the expectation of the nation of receiving juſt and ample ſatisfaction for the cruelties exerciſed on its ſubjects, and the inſults offered to itſelf, nothing has in ſo many years been obtained from the court of Spain effectually to ſatisfy the loſſes, repair the injuries, or retrieve the honour of the nation; though the ſaid treaty of Seville, ſo advantageous to Spain, had been punctually executed on the part of Great Britain."

Sir Robert Walpole told the houſe, that he was very ready to agree to the firſt part of the reſolution, upon the natural and undoubted right which the ſubjects had to ſail with their ſhips in any part of the ſeas of America, to and from any part of his majeſty's dominions. He obſerved, that conſidering the ſtate of the negotiation between Spain and England at that time, it would be much more eligible to make the reſolutions the houſe agreed to not quite ſo peremptory and ſo particular. He therefore propoſed that the reſt of the reſolutions ſhould run as follow:

"That the freedom of navigation and commerce, which the ſubjects of Great Britain have an undoubted right to by the law of nations, and which is not in the leaſt reſtrained by any of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns of Great Britain and Spain, has been greatly interrupted by the Spaniards, under pretences altogether groundleſs and unjuſt. That before and ſince the execution of the treaty of Seville, that the declaration made by the crown of Spain purſuant thereto, for the ſatisfaction and ſecurity of the commerce of Great Britain, many unjuſt ſeizures and captures have been made, and great depredations committed by the Spaniards, which have been attended with many inſtances of unheard-of cruelty and barbarity. That the frequent application made to the court of Spain, for procuring juſtice and ſatisfaction to his majeſty's injured ſubjects, for bringing the offenders to condign puniſhment, and for preventing the like abuſes for the future, have proved vain and ineffectual; and the ſeveral orders or cedulas, granted by the king of Spain for reſtitution and reparation of the great loſſes ſuſtained, by the unlawful and unwarrantable ſeizures and captures made by the Spaniards, have been diſobeyed by the Spaniſh governors, or totally evaded and eluded. And that theſe violences and depredations have been carried on to the great loſs and damage of the ſubjects of Great Britain trading to America, and in direct violation of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns."

Theſe amendments occaſioned great debates, but the miniſter and his friends maintained, that the reſolutions moved by him contained all that could be reaſonably expected from Spain at that time; and with regard either to poſſeſſion or navigation, it could not be effected or weakened by the houſe agreeing to the amendment; which the houſe, after a long debate, complied with, upon a diviſion of 224 againſt 163; and an addreſs was unanimouſly voted to be preſented to his majeſty.

In the mean time the lords were no leſs anxious than the commons in their enquiries into theſe important affairs. The moſt diſtinguiſhed ſpeaker was lord Crateret, whoſe arguments againſt the Spaniſh depredations were ſo forcible, that the houſe agreed to preſent the following addreſs to the king:

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"We, your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, having taking into our ſerious conſideration the many unjuſt violences and depredations committed by the Spaniards, upon the perſons, ſhips and effects of your majeſty's ſubjects in America, have come to the following reſolutions, which we beg, in the humbleſt manner, to lay before your majeſty for your royal conſideration, viz.

I. "Reſolved, that the ſubjects of Great Britain have a clear and undoubted right to navigate in the American ſeas, to and from any part of his majeſty's dominions; and for carrying on ſuch trade and commerce, as they are juſtly entitled to in America; and alſo to carry all ſorts of goods, merchandizes, and effects from one part of his majeſty's dominions to any other part thereof; and that no goods being ſo carried, are, by any treaty ſubſiſting between the two crowns of Great Britain and Spain, to be deemed or taken as contraband or prohibited goods; and that the ſearching of ſuch ſhips on the open ſeas, under pretence of their carrying prohibited or contraband goods, is a violation and infraction of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns.

II. "Reſolved, that it appears to this houſe, as well before as ſince the treaty of Seville, on the part of Great Britain, divers ſhips and veſſels with their cargoes belonging to the Britiſh ſubjects, have been violently ſeized and confiſcated by the Spaniards, upon pretences altogether unjuſt and groundleſs; and that many of the ſailors on board ſuch ſhips have been injuriouſly and barbarouſly impriſoned and ill treated; and that thereby the liberty of navigation and commerce belonging to his majeſty's ſubjects, by the law of nations, and by virtue of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns of Great Britain and Spain, had been unwarrantably infringed and interrupted, to the great loſs and damage of our merchants, and in direct violation of the ſaid treaties.

III. "Reſolved, that it appears to this houſe, that frequent applications have been made on the part of his majeſty to the court of Spain, in a manner the moſt agreeable to treaties, and to the peace and friendſhip ſubſiſting between the two crowns, for redreſſing the notorious abuſes and grievances before-mentioned, and preventing the like for the future, and for obtaining adequate ſatisfaction to his injured ſubjects, which in the event have proved entirely fruitleſs and of no effect.

"We think it our duty, on this important occaſion, humbly to repreſent to your majeſty, that we are moſt ſenſibly affected with the many and grievous injuries and loſſes, ſuſtained by your majeſty's trading ſubjects, by means of theſe unwarrantable depredations and ſeizures; and to give your majeſty the ſtrongeſt and moſt ſincere aſſurances, that in caſe your friendly and powerful inſtances for procuring reſtitution and reparation to your injured ſubjects, and for the future ſecurity of their trade and navigation, ſhall fail of having their due effect and influence in the court of Spain, and ſhall not be able to obtain that great ſatisfaction and ſecurity which your majeſty may in juſtice expect; we will zealouſly and chearfully concur in all ſuch meaſures, as ſhall become neceſſary for the ſupport of your majeſty's honour; the preſervation of our navigation and commerce, and the common good of theſe kingdoms."

To this addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following anſwer:

"My lords,

"I am ſenſibly touched with the many hardſhips and injuries ſuſtained by my trading ſubjects in America, from the cruelties and unjuſt depredations of the Spaniards. You may be aſſured of my care to procure ſatisfaction and reparation for the loſſes they have already ſuffered, and ſecurity for the freedom of navigation for the future; and to maintain to my people the full enjoyment of all the rights to which they are entitled by treaty and the law of nations. I doubt not but I ſhall have your concurrence for the ſupport of ſuch meaſures, as may be neceſſary for that purpoſe."

This important enquiry had ſo entirely employed the attention of the public, that very little regard was paid to other affairs, which happened in the courſe of this ſeſſion, though ſome of them were of importance. Two millions were granted to his majeſty, for the ſervice of the current year, and for paying to the governor and company of the bank of England 1,000,000 for redeeming an annuity of 40,000l. payable to them. Another act of great importance that paſſed this ſeſſion was, for building a bridge croſs the river Thames, from the Woolſtaple, Weſtminſter, to the oppoſite ſhore in Surry. Some farther regulations were likewiſe made with regard to the drinking ſpirituous liquors, &c. Thoſe already made having been found ineffectual, and productive of many perjuries, a power had been granted to retail ſpirituous liquors with licences: but this had rather increaſed than diminiſhed the diſorder complained of; and an act paſſed this ſeſſion, by which a penalty was laid on all occupiers of houſes in which ſpirituous liquors were illegally ſold.

On the 20th of May his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he obſerved, "that, agreeable to what had appeared to the concurrent opinion of both houſes of parliament, he had given orders to repeat, in the ſtrongeſt and moſt preſſing manner, his inſtances at the court of Spain for obtaining ſatisfaction for the many injuries and loſſes ſuſtained by his trading ſubjects in America, and for effectually ſecuring their rights for the future; and he hoped, from the juſtice and equity of the Catholic king, to procure and eſtabliſh a free and uninterrupted exerciſe of trade between the ſubjects of the two crowns, agreeable to treaties and the law of nations."

Four days after the concluſion of the ſeſſion, viz. the 24th of May (ſince the alteration of the ſtyle the 4th of June) the princeſs of Wales was delivered of a ſon, who was baptized by the name of George, and is our preſent moſt auguſt ſovereign. Uncommon rejoicings were made on this event, and addreſſes of congratulation were preſented to the king by the two univerſities, and almoſt all the cities and communities of the kingdom. The prince of Wales, however, ſtill laboured under his majeſty's diſpleaſure; and an order was publiſhed in the Gazette, that no perſon who viſited the prince ſhould be admitted to the court of St. James's.

About the latter end of June rear-admiral Haddock ſailed with a ſtrong ſquadron for the Mediterranean to give weight to the negotiation of the Britiſh miniſter at the court of Madrid; but Spain, well acquainted with the pacific diſpoſition of our miniſtry, was arrived to ſuch a height of inſolence, that no agreement could be procured from that court till after the uſual time of convoking the parliament, which was prorogued in expectation of it, and afterwards adjourned, in order to get the articles ratified.

During the remainder of this year a ſpirit of riot and confuſion diſcovered itſelf among the lower claſs of people in different parts of the kingdom. The moſt dangerous of theſe tumults happened in the weſt of England, where a number of journeymen weavers roſe in a riotous manner, and committed the moſt terrible outrages on the properties and perſons of ſeveral maſters in that branch of trade, from a perſuaſion that they had uſed them ill. At length the affair grew ſo ſerious, that the government was obliged to quarter bodies of troops in ſeveral of the borough and market towns to prevent the ſedition from ſpreading. Nor was the metropolis itſelf free from tumults and diſorders: a moſt dangerous inſult was committed upon juſtice by a party of ſailors at Wapping, who cut down from the gibbet and brought to life, one Buchanan, who had been condemned for murder: and notwithſtanding the atrocious nature of the crime, and the danger of the example, the offenders were ſo highly favoured by the public, that not one of them could ever be diſcovered.

A. D. 1739. The parliament met on the firſt of February, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he informed both houſes, "That, ſupported by their joint advice, he had loſt no time to do himſelf and his people juſtice, if the court of Spain had laid him under that neceſſity; that he had, at the ſame time, in the ſtrongeſt terms, repeated his inſtances for obtaining ſuch reparation for the many injuries and loſſes already ſuſtained, and ſuch effectual ſecurity for the future, as might prevent the conſequences of an open rupture; that he had now the ſatisfaction to acquaint them, that the meaſures he had purſued had been ſo ſucceſsful, that a convention was concluded and ratified between him and the king of Spain, by which, after a ſtrict examination of the claims on both ſides, that prince had obliged himſelf to make reparation to the Britiſh ſubjects, by the payment of a certain ſtipulated ſum; that plenipotentiaries were likewiſe named and appointed, for regulating, within a limited time, all thoſe grievances and abuſes, which had ſo long interrupted the Britiſh commerce and navigation in the American ſeas; and for ſettling all matters in diſpute, in ſuch a manner, as might, for the future, prevent and remove all new cauſes and pretences of complaint, by a ſtrict obſervance of our mutual treaties, and a juſt regard to the rights and privileges belonging to each nation. He concluded with declaring, that he would order the convention to be laid before them.

The principal point now with the miniſtry was, to induce the two houſes of parliament to approve of the convention, and obtain an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for laying it before them; which would be conſidered as an approbation of their meaſures. The motion, however, met with great oppoſition; but was at laſt carried in the affirmative in both houſes. The ſubſtance of this convention was as follows;

1. "That immediately after the ſigning of this treaty, two plenipotentiaries on each ſide ſhould meet at Madrid, within ſix weeks after the day of exchanging the ratifications, there to confer and finally regulate the pretenſions of the two crowns.

2. "Until the limits of Florida and Carolina can be adjuſted, things ſhould remain there in their preſent ſituation.

3. "His Catholic majeſty ſhall cauſe to be paid to his Britannic majeſty, the ſum of 95,000l. ſterling, as a balance admitted to be due to the crown and ſubjects of Great Britain, after deduction made of the demands of the crown and ſubjects of Spain, to the end, that the above-mentioned ſum may be employed by his Britannic majeſty, for the ſatisfaction and payment of the demands of his ſubjects upon the crown of Spain. But this reciprocal diſcharge ſhall not relate nor extend to the differences ſubſiſting between the crown of Spain and the South-Sea company, nor to any particular or private contract between either of the two crowns, or their miniſters, with the ſubjects of the other; or between the ſubjects of the one crown, and thoſe of the other.

4. " If it ſhould happen, in conſequence of orders diſpatched by the court of Spain, that any part of the value of certain particular ſhips, mentioned in the convention, as taken from the Engliſh, and included in the 95,000l. be already paid, the ſame ſhall be deducted therefrom."

Beſides theſe there were two ſeparate articles; the firſt importing, that the above-mentioned ſum of 95,000l. was to be paid at London, within four months after the exchange of ratification.

By the ſecond, it was ſtipulated, that the third article of the above convention ſhould not extend to ſhips taken ſince the 10th of December laſt; in which caſe juſtice ſhall be done according to the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns, in the ſame manner as if the convention had not been made. It being, however, underſtood, that this relates only to the indemnification and ſatisfaction of the effects ſeized, or prizes taken: but that the deciſion of the caſes that may happen, in order to remove all pretenſions for diſpute, is to be referred to the plenipotentiaries, to be determined according to the treaties.

Such was the ſubſtance of a convention that made ſo much noiſe in Europe, and had nearly ruined the internal tranquillity of England. What gave the greateſt diſguſt was, the following proteſt and declaration of the king of Spain, which he inſiſted on, as a preliminary condition of his ratifying the above convention, viz.

That he reſerves to himſelf, in its full force, the right of ſuſpending the aſſiento for negroes, and diſpatching the neceſſary orders for the execution thereof, in caſe the South Sea company doth not ſubject itſelf to pay, within a ſhort time, the ſum of 68,000l. ſterling, confeſſed to be owing for the duty on negroes, &c. And farther declares, that under the validity of this proteſt, the ſigning of this convention may be proceeded on, and in no other manner.

The injuſtice of this previous demand on the company was ſo apparent, that they, ſoon after, at their general court, held on the firſt of March, reſolved not to pay the king of Spain's demand, without his firſt coming to a juſt account to them, for all the ſeizures and captures of their ſhips and merchandize, which he had engaged to refund to them.

On the 14th of June, the king went to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech; in which he earneſtly recommended unanimity among the members, and deſired them to tranſmit, by their example, peace throughout their different counties.

Notwithſtanding the parliamentary ſanction the convention had received, a war with Spain now appeared inevitable. The Spaniſh monarch not only ſuffered the four months to elapſe, during which interval he was to pay the ſtipulated ſum of 95,000l. but ordered ſeizures to be made of the ſhips and merchandize of the Britiſh ſubjects in his dominions wherever they could be found; and even commanded all the Britiſh ſubjects to leave his territories in a ſhorter time than was allowed by treaty. Theſe proceedings put a ſtop to the conferences carried on with that crown, and Mr. Keene (the Engliſh ambaſſador) preſented a ſpirited declaration to the court of Madrid, complaining of the conduct of their naval officers, and demanding reſtitution for ſuch goods as had been ſeized from the Britiſh ſubjects. This was followed with an order of council, dated July the 10th, for granting letters of marque and repriſals to the Engliſh merchants.

Great augmentations were now made to our land forces, by raiſing ten new regiments, and filling up ſuch as had been reduced. Nor was the navy neglected; for many ſhips that had been laid up were put in commiſſion, and there was an exceeding hot preſs for ſailors in all the ſea port towns in the kingdom. An embargo was laid on all merchant ſhips, and every other method was taken that ſeemed to give confidence to the earneſt hopes and expectations of the nation.

The ſources from whence the Spaniards derived their wealth became an object of national concern to Great Britain; and therefore it was propoſed that two ſquadrons ſhould be fitted out, one under the command of captain Cornwall, and another under captain Anſon. That under captain Cornwall was to ſail round Cape Horn into the South Seas, in order to attack ſuch of the Spaniſh ſettlements as lay near the coaſt; but if he found that impracticable, he was to ſail to the Manilla, one of the Phillippine iſlands. Captain Anſon was to ſail to Java-head, a promontory in the Eaſt Indies, where he was to take in freſh water, with ſuch other neceſſaries as his ſquadron ſhould want, and then to proceed on his voyage to meet captain Cornwall at Manilla. This ſcheme was ſo agreeable to all ranks of people in the nation, that harmony began to take place of diſcord, and all ſeemed united to contribute towards diſtreſſing the common enemy.

But ſtill it was neceſſary that a much more reſpectable ſquadron than either of thoſe already mentioned ſhould be fitted out; and accordingly nine ſhips of the line, with ſeveral ſmaller ones, were ordered to ſail to the Weſt Indies, in order to deſtroy the trade and ſettlements of the Spaniards. The command of this fleet was given to admiral Vernon, an officer of conſummate knowledge, undaunted courage and great prudence. This gentleman had rendered himſelf remarkable in the houſe of commons, by condemning the meaſures of the miniſtry; and in a debate on the Spaniſh depredations, he happened to affirm that Porto Bello, a ſtrong port on the Spaniſh main, might be eaſily taken, and even offered to undertake the reduction of it with ſix ſhips only. The miniſter gave him the command of this fleet, that he might have the opportunity of attempting the enterprize he had offered to undertake, in hopes of entirely getting rid of him, as the moſt imminent dangers, the greateſt difficulties, and a pernicious climate, all combined to render his return next to impoſſible.

Every preparation for war being now made, nothing was wanting but the form of a declaration, and that took place on the 19th of October. This meaſure was in its own nature abſolutely neceſſary; for both the honour and intereſt of the nation were at ſtake. Our merchants had been plundered of their moſt valuable goods, and ſo puſillanimous were our miniſtry, that the Britiſh flag ſeemed falling into diſgrace. Complaints, indeed, had been often made to the miniſtry, but the perſons injured were either refuſed redreſs, or diſmiſſed with ambiguous promiſes. But the declaration of war gave new hopes to the people, and although they knew it had not been done till abſolutely neceſſary, yet they began to have ſome confidence in the miniſtry.

Soon after the declaration of war, admiral Haddock took a rich Spaniſh ſhip; but the Spaniſh admiral, ral, who commanded the ſquadron, returning from the South Seas, having received notice, or rather ſuſpecting that ſome of our ſhips of war would attempt to intercept him off Cadiz, he ſailed round Ireland, and from thence coaſting by the Land's End of England, arrived ſafe in Spain, to the great mortification of the Engliſh ſailors, who flattered themſelves with acquiring an immenſe booty.

It was the opinion of the people in general, that the French would take part with the Spaniards, and ſuch was the conduct of the ſtates-general, that no confidence could be placed even in their moſt ſolemn proteſtations. Mr. Walpole, our ambaſſador at the Hague, endeavoured to perſuade them to take part with us, as their natural ally, but he received only evaſive anſwers; from which it ſeemed evident that they intended to remain neuter till their own territories ſhould be attacked. With reſpect to the Spaniards, they were filled with conſternation when they found what preparations we were making againſt them; for the timid behaviour of our miniſtry had induced them to look upon the people of England as diveſted of that courage for which they had been ſo long diſtinguiſhed.

During theſe tranſactions, the emperor Charles VI. in conſequence of ſome loſſes, found himſelf under the neceſſity of concluding a treaty of peace with the Turks, upon terms neither honourable nor advantageous. The empreſs of Ruſſia, whoſe forces acted in concert with thoſe of the emperor, was obliged to follow his example, and recall her army, without having obtained any ſingular advantages.

On the 15th of November the Britiſh parliament met, when the king, in his ſpeech, informed them, that, contrary to his own inclination, but conſiſtent with the dignity of his crown, and the intereſt of his ſubjects, he had declared war againſt Spain, not doubting but the commons would chearfully contribute ſuch ſums as were wanting to maintain the army and the navy. Both houſes were ſo well pleaſed with his majeſty's ſpeech, that very loyal addreſſes were preſented to him, and the commons declared that nothing ſhould be wanting to defray every neceſſary expence. And that a complete triumph might be obtained over the miniſtry, Sir William Wyndham moved, that an addreſs might be preſented to his majeſty, praying that no treaty of peace ſhould be entered into with Spain, till the Britiſh ſovereignty was acknowledged in America.

The miniſtry were ſo well convinced of the reaſonableneſs and popularity of the motion, that they made no oppoſition to it; and his majeſty, in anſwer to the commons, told them, that they might depend upon his ſteady perſeverance in rejecting all terms of a diſhonourable nature. Some very popular acts paſſed at this time, though not without oppoſition from the miniſtry, who ſeemed to have nothing ſo much at heart as that of croſſing every meaſure that appeared productive of public good. Great encouragement was given to foreign ſeamen to enter into our merchants ſervice; and ſome thouſands of the perſecuted proteſtants in Germany were invited by our government to ſettle in America.

A. D. 1740. The eſtimates for the current year having been ordered in, Sir Robert Walpole, as chancellor of the exchequer, preſented to the houſe a meſſage from his majeſty, importing, that having them under his royal conſideration certain meaſures that would be attended with ſome extraordinary expences, not comprehended in the eſtimates laid before the houſe, his majeſty hoped they would enable him to carry them on in the moſt effectual manner. This meſſage was referred, without one diſſenting voice, to the committee of ſupplies, who reſolved to grant his majeſty 200,000l. on account of carrying on the war, and 9,500l. for ſervices that year not provided for by parliament, which was agreed to by the houſe. A million was alſo granted out of the ſinking fund, and 200,000l. for the ordinary of the navy.

The next thing that engaged the attention of the houſe was a bill brought in by Sir Charles Wager, for taking an exact number of all ſeamen in the merchants ſervice, together with ſuch as plied on the river. But however neceſſary ſuch a ſtep might be, in order to know the internal ſtrength of the nation, yet the popular party treated it as a meaſure that would, in the end, enſlave the people, and therefore the bill was rejected by a very great majority.

The king ſent a meſſage to the houſe, informing them, that he intended to marry his daughter the princeſs Mary to the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel; and prayed that they would enable him to give her a portion ſuitable to her rank. The commons unanimouſly agreed to give the princeſs 40,000l.; and at the ſame time voted, that an addreſs of thanks ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, for having communicated to them his royal intention.

On the 29th of April his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and after ſigning the bills put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech; in which he thanked the commons for their readineſs in granting the ſupplies, and recommended unanimity as the only ſure means of making them formidable to their enemies. He concluded with expreſſing his hopes, that the preparations which he was making for carrying on the war, in the moſt vigorous and effectual manner, would be bleſſed with ſucceſs, equal to the juſtneſs of his cauſe. The parliament was then prorogued to the 3d of June, and by various prorogations afterwards to the 18th of November.

In the beginning of May his majeſty ſet out for Hanover, having previouſly appointed a regency during his abſence. A few days after his departure, the marriage of the princeſs Mary with the prince of Heſſe was ſolemnized by proxy, the duke of Cumberland ſtanding for that prince; and in June her highneſs ſailed for the continent.

Thus much for the common domeſtic occurences of this period. It is now neceſſary that we ſhould look back to the ſtate of the war.

Admiral Vernon, having ſailed from Portſmouth, arrived at Port Royal in Jamaica on the 12th of October 1739. He immediately ſent an account of his buſineſs to Mr. Trelawney, the governor, deſiring him to grant him all the aſſiſtance he could; and at the ſame time promiſing, that nothing ſhould be wanting on his part to diſcharge his duty according to the nature of his inſtructions. At Port-Royal the admiral was joined by commodore Brown, with one ſhip only; and having procured intelligence that the Spaniſh fleet intended ſailing towards Porto Bello, he reſolved, if poſſible, to be there before them. The fleet under admiral Vernon, with which he propoſed taking Porto Bello, conſiſted of ſix ſhips only, having on board 2,495 ſeamen, and 200 land forces.

Porto Bello is ſituated on the iſthmus of Darien, where a ſmall track of land divides North and South America from each other. It conſiſts of ſeveral ſtrong forts, and is the place to which all the riches of Mexico and Peru are annually brought. The Spaniards had been at a great expence in making additions to the fortifications, and they even imagined that it was impregnable. One battery of guns, level with the ſurface of the water, ſeemed to threaten deſtruction to every ſhip that approached; but abilities, courage, and perſeverance, overcome the greateſt difficulties.

On the 5th of November, admiral Vernon ſailed from Port-Royal, and ſteered for Porto-Bello, but by reaſon of contrary winds, it was the evening of the 20th before he could get ſight of the harbour; and then, leſt his ſquadron ſhould be driven to the eaſtward of the harbour, he made other ſignals for coming to an anchor about ſix leagues off the ſhore.

Early the next morning, (Nov. 21.) he drew up his ſhips in line of battle; but the wind being eaſterly, little could be done for ſome time, except bombarding the Iron Fort near the mouth of the harbour. At length, however, the grand attack was begun by commodore Brown, in the Hampton-Court, of ſeventy guns; and in the ſpace of twenty-five minutes, 400 ſhot were fired. Such an inceſſant fire, which was ſeconded by captain Mayne in the Worceſter, obliged many of the Spaniards to retire from different parts of the fort: upon which the admiral made the ſignal for the boats to come up, in order to land the marines, which was done with the loſs of three men only. As the courage of ſeamen and ſoldiers never ſhines with more luſtre than when oppoſed by the enemy, and expoſed to the greateſt dangers; ſo no ſooner had they landed, than they ſcaled the walls by one man's ſtanding on the ſhoulders of another. This ſtruck ſuch terror into the Spaniards, that both officers and men fled from the lower forts into the uppermoſt part of the citadel, where they hung out a white flag, as a ſignal that they would capitulate. The marines and ſeamen, who had firſt landed, were ſo impatient to obtain the victory, that ſtriking down the Spaniſh colours, they hoiſted thoſe of Britain; while ſuch of the Spaniſh ſoldiers as beheld their courage ſurrendered priſoners at diſcretion. Of theſe only five officers and thirty-five men remained out of 300, the reſt having been killed, wounded, or made their eſcape.

The next morning (being the 22d) the admiral went on board the Hampton Court, commodore Brown, in order to call a council of war, and give the neceſſary directions for warping the ſhips up in the night, to attack Gloria Caſtle, as it would have been impracticable to have attempted it in the day time. But in this he was prevented, by the enemy hoiſting a white flag, and ſending a boat with a flag of truce to the admiral, and the conditions ſigned on which they deſired to capitulate; which were, "That the governor would deliver up all the fortifications, provided the garriſon might be allowed to march out with the honours of war; have an indemnity for themſelves, the town, and the inhabitants; and be permitted to keep all the ſhips in the harbour." This laſt article could not by any means be admitted, the admiral being reſolved to have thoſe ſhips which had done the Engliſh merchants all the damages they complained of on theſe coaſts. Accordingly, he drew up the articles on which he was willing to treat, and ſent them back to the governor, allowing him only a few hours to take his reſolution: but within the time limited the conditions offered were accepted; in conſequence of which the admiral ſent captain Newton, who commanded the detachment of ſoldiers from Jamaica, with about 120 men, to take poſſeſſion of Gloria caſtle and Jeronymo Fort, being the two fortreſſes which defended the harbour, the one above, the other below the town.

In the harbour were two Spaniſh men of war of twenty guns each, together with a ſnow; the crews of which, upon ſeeing the regular and bold attack made on the Iron Fort, and deſpairing of being able to defend themſelves, fell to plundering the town in the night of the 21ſt, and committed ſhocking outrages on the inhabitants. Our admiral being now maſter of the place, proceeded to blow up the fortifications, ſpiked up above 80 iron cannon, and brought off, on board his own fleet, a great number of braſs ordnance, and a great quantity of ammunition, leaving the harbour quite open and defenceleſs. Thus was this place totally deſtroyed; and though the admiral, for want of land forces, was not able to puſh his conqueſts farther up the country, yet the national advantage ariſing from what he had already done was very conſiderable, particularly with regard to the traders of Jamaica, who had now a fair opportunity of opening an extenſive commerce with the Spaniards, who were fond of clandeſtinely conveying away their money from Panama over the Iſthmus.

During admiral Vernon's ſtay at Porto Bello, he ſent a letter to the preſident of Panama, demanding a ſpeedy releaſement of the factors and ſervants belonging to the South Sea company, whom the Spaniards had confined in that place; together with the reſtitution of their own perſonal effects, as well as thoſe of the aforeſaid company. In conſequence of this meſſage, the preſident ſent an officer, with Dr. Humphreys and Dr. Wright, factors; and alſo with the ſervants of the company, who were delivered to the admiral on board his own ſhip.

On the 13th of December, the admiral ſailed with his ſquadron from Porto Bello, on his return to Jamaica. In the paſſage the ſquadron met with hard gales, by which it was diſperſed, and ſeveral of the ſhips received damage in their maſts and rigging. Nevertheleſs, they at laſt all joined the admiral in Port Royal, where we ſhall leave him meditating future conqueſts, and return to England.

No ſooner was the ſucceſs of the Britiſh admiral made known to the people at home, than a profuſion of rejoicings overſpread the united kingdoms and Ireland. Bonfires blazed in every ſtreet, and the houſes were illuminated: the ſhouts of "Vernon for "ever!" were heard from every tongue; both houſes of parliament, the city of London, and all the conſiderable corporations in the kingdom, addreſſed his majeſty upon the occaſion. The houſe of commons ſent the admiral their thanks; the city voted him its freedom. In ſhort, a Roman conſul, after reducing a province, never received greater marks of public applauſe from his country than admiral Vernon did upon his demolition of Porto Bello.

While Vernon was ſupporting the honour and intereſt of his country in the Weſt-Indies, admiral Haddock, after cruiſing ſome time in the Mediterranean, blocked up the Spaniſh fleet in the harbour of Cadiz. But here admiral Haddock was led into a ſnare; for another Spaniſh fleet, under the command of admiral Pintado, made a feint as if they intended ſailing towards Minorca; and Haddock leaving his ſtation to oppoſe them, the Spaniſh fleet got out of the harbour of Cadiz, and joined another ſquadron then lying in the harbour of Ferrol.

The French, who had hitherto concealed their intentions, began to pull off the maſk; for they fitted out a ſtrong ſquadron, under the command of the marquis D'Antin, which ſailed to Martinico, with poſitive orders to act offenſively againſt the Engliſh. Indeed our valuable ſettlements in America had long been an object of envy to our haughty neighbours; and therefore it was reſolved that, in concert with Spain, we ſhould be deprived of all the benefits of trade in that part of the world.

The Engliſh miniſtry, who had little ſuſpected any ſuch behaviour from France, were thunderſtruck when they heard of this proceeding; while the voice of the people called loudly for proſecuting the war with the utmoſt vigour. In order to quiet the diſcontents of the people, the miniſtry ordered a large ſquadron of ſhips of the line to rendezvous at Spithead, under the command of Sir John Norris, who hoiſted his flag on board the Victory, a ſhip carrying 110 guns. The late duke of Cumberland went as a volunteer along with the admiral, and great hopes were formed by the people concerning the ſucceſs of this armament, but all in vain: for after cruiſing ſome time, and meeting with ſtorms, Sir John came to an anchor at Spithead, without having done any thing, beſides amuſing the people, who had ſo generouſly ſubmitted to very heavy taxes towards ſupporting the war.

This was the moſt unpopular circumſtance that could have happened; and the miniſtry were now at a loſs what meaſures to purſue, in order to ſmother the encreaſing diſcontents of the people. At length, however, they reſolved to fit out a ſmall ſquadron under the command of commodore Anſon. This ſquadron conſiſted of the following ſhips, namely, the Centurion, of 60 guns; the Severn and Glouceſter, of 50 guns each; the Pearl, of 40; and the Wager, of 28; with the Trial ſloop, carrying eight guns; and two victualling veſſels.

The deſtination of this ſquadron was well projected; and although it did not, in every thing, anſwer the hopes that had been formed of it, yet, in the end, the commodore received immortal honour, and riches were brought into the nation. His orders were to ſail to the South-ſeas, and diſtreſs the Spaniards in their remote ſettlements, ſo as to prevent them from oppoſing admiral Vernon, who ſtill remained as commander in chief in the Weſt-Indies.

The ſquadron did not arrive at Madeira till the 25th of October, where they watered and took in refreſhments of ſeveral kinds. On the fourth of November Anſon iſſued orders to the captains, appointing their rendezvous, in caſe of ſeparation, at the iſland of St. Catharine's on the coaſt of Brazil in South America; and the ſame day the ſquadron weighing anchor, ſteered their courſe for St. Catherine's, where they arrived on the 21ſt of December, having in their paſſage loſt a great number of their men, by the intemperature of the warm climates. The commodore made all poſſible diſpatch for Cape Horn, but was detained by unavoidable accidents till the 18th of January, when the ſquadron, after burying many of their men, and ſickneſs ſtill encreaſing, left the iſland, and ſailed to Port St. Julian, on the coaſt of Patagonia.

In the mean time admiral Torres, who commanded the Spaniſh fleet in the bay of Ferrol, ſailed for America, with 2000 land forces on board; which ſtruck ſuch a panic into the Engliſh miniſtry, that they ſaw no appearance of keeping their ground, unleſs a fleet was ſent to reinforce the ſquadron under admiral Vernon. That brave commander, upon his return to Port-Royal, having refitted his ſhips, and taken in freſh proviſions, ſailed for Carthagena, which he bombarded, and did conſiderable damage to the place; but not having ſufficient force, and many of the men being ſickly, he was obliged to return to Porto Bello, where having again refitted, he attacked fort Chagre, and obliged the garriſon to capitulate. In the letters ſent to the miniſtry by admiral Vernon, he complained that neceſſary reinforcements had not been ſent him in proper time, ſo that no beneficial conſequences could ariſe from his victories; and however ſecret theſe letters were kept, yet the contents of them tranſpired, and the nation was again filled with diſcontent.

This induced, or rather forced, the miniſtry to ſend over to the admiral ſix regiments of marines, with two of foot, the whole under the command of lord Cathcart, a nobleman of great courage and reſolution. Sir Chaloner Ogle was ordered to ſail from Spithead, with twenty-one ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and fire-ſhips, having on board 12,000 ſeamen furniſhed with every thing neceſſary to diſtreſs the enemy. But notwithſtanding all theſe preparations, carried on at a great expence, yet the fleet did not ſail till October; by which means the Spaniards had time to ſtrengthen their ſettlements in the Weſt-Indies, and put themſelves in a condition of making a vigorous reſiſtance wherever they ſhould be attacked in that quarter of the world.

This year Charles VI. emperor of Germany, paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded by his daughter Maria Thereſa, who had ſome years before married the grand duke of Tuſcany, of the houſe of Lorrain. The king of Pruſſia died much about the ſame time, and his death was ſucceeded by that of the czarina Anne Iwanowna, empreſs of Ruſſia. The death of theſe ſovereigns could not fail of being attended with ſuch conſequences as muſt always happen on ſimilar occaſions, namely, that of lighting up the flames of civil war. The young king of Pruſſia laid claim to the province of Sileſia, belonging to the houſe of Auſtria; and a revolution took place in Ruſſia, by which Elizabeth, the late Empreſs, was placed on the throne, amidſt the united acclamations of the people.

In the beginning of September his majeſty returned from Hanover; and on the 18th of November following opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which, among other things, he obſerved, "That the court of Spain having already felt ſome effects of the reſentment of the Engliſh, began to be ſenſible that they ſhould be no longer able, by their own ſtrength, to defend themſelves againſt the efforts of the Britiſh nation; that if any other powers, agreeable to ſome late extraordinary proceedings, ſhould interpoſe, and attempt to preſcribe or limit the operations of the war againſt his declared enemies, the honour and intereſt of his crown and kingdoms muſt call upon his parliament to loſe no time in putting the nation in ſuch a condition as might enable him to repel any inſults, and fruſtrate any deſigns formed againſt him, in violation of the faith of treaties; and he hoped any ſuch unprecedented ſteps, under what colour or pretence ſoever they might be taken, would inſpire his allies with a true ſenſe of the common danger, and would unite them in the ſupport and defence of the common cauſe: that the great and unhappy event of the death of the late emperor opened a new ſcene in the ſtate of affairs in Europe, in which all the principal powers might be immediately or remotely concerned: that it was impoſſible to determine with any degree of certainty what courſe the policy, intereſt, or ambition of the ſeveral courts might lead them to purſue in this critical conjuncture; but that it ſhould be his care ſtrictly to obſerve and watch their motions; to adhere to the engagements which he had formerly contracted for maintaining the balance of power, and the liberties of Europe; and, in concert with ſuch powers as were under the ſame obligations, to act ſuch a part as might beſt contribute to avert the danger that threatened the tranquillity of Europe."

As ſoon as his majeſty had left the houſe, and the commons were returned to their own houſe, John, duke of Argyle, moved, that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to congratulate him upon his ſafe return, and to aſſure him that the peers would not only ſtand by him with their lives and fortunes, but that they would exert thoſe inherent privileges enjoyed by them as the higheſt tribunal in the nation, by promoting the honour, intereſt, and happineſs of his majeſty and the kingdom. His grace, in his ſpeech, in order to enforce the motion, arraigned the conduct of the miniſtry, in not attending to the intereſt of the nation; and, in expreſs terms, accuſed them with having given private orders that none of our ſhips ſhould attack any of the Spaniſh forts. He charged them with neglecting to give orders for the fleet to ſail; and intimated, it would have ſtill remained at Spithead, had not his majeſty returned to England.

The attention of thoſe peers, who were not attached to the miniſtry, was greatly attracted by the nervous eloquence of the duke; and great debates enſued. The earl of Holderneſs obſerved, that the duke's motion was couched under vague, uncertain terms; and therefore moved, that in the addreſs his majeſty ſhould be thanked for his gracious care of his people; and that his faithful lords would ſupport him with their lives and fortunes in the execution of every treaty that he had entered into with any of the German princes. This debate was carried on with great ſtrength of argument, and in language that would have done honour to a Roman ſenate, by lord-chancellor Hardwicke, lord Harvey, lord Cholmondeley, and the earl of Holderneſs, for the miniſtry; and againſt them, by the duke of Argyle, the earl of Cheſterfield, lord Carteret, and lord Talbot. At laſt the queſtion being put it was carried in favour of the court addreſs; ſo that the miniſtry once more triumphed over thoſe who wiſhed well to the nation.

After long debates in the houſe of commons, an addreſs was drawn up in very general terms; and, indeed, too general, when it was conſidered in what ſtate the nation then was.

That the commons might know in what condition the navy was, they moved for an addreſs to be preſented to his majeſty, deſiring that all letters, or other papers ſent from admiral Vernon, ſhould be laid before them: and although it was the intereſt of the miniſter to have concealed theſe from the public, yet by an unaccountable inadvertency, he ſuffered the motion to paſs, and the addreſs was preſented. When the letters came to be read, they were found to contain heavy complaints againſt the miniſtry, for not ſending him proper reinforcements; and that the ſhips under his command were in ſo ſhattered a condition that they were not fit for action.

A. D. 1741. The peremptory manner in which the court-party over-ruled every motion that was made againſt them only ſerved to increaſe the unpopularity of the miniſter, who was now ſo univerſally odious that his name was hardly ever mentioned with decency. The country party, though inferior in number, were, in both houſes, the moſt reſpectable characters, and moſt juſtly celebrated for their eloquence, integrity, and diſintereſtedneſs. During the month of January this year the minority in both houſes had frequent conſultations together, and at laſt it was reſolved to impeach the miniſter. Mr. Sandys was to manage this buſineſs in the lower houſe; and accordingly, on Friday the 13th of February, he ſtood up in his place, ſpoke long and ſenſibly of the many errors committed by Sir Robert, and traced his conduct as far back as the year 1720. He accuſed him with having adviſed his majeſty to do ſome things inconſiſtent with his dignity; and boldly charged him with concealing from the people the real ſtate of the nation. He took notice, that the people expected no redreſs of their grievances at home, nor ſucceſs to their arms abroad, unleſs the miniſter was for ever removed from his majeſty's councils, as well as all thoſe connected with him. He therefore moved, that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, requeſting that the right honourable Sir Robert Walpole, knight of the moſt noble order of the garter, firſt lord commiſſioner of the treaſury, and one of his majeſty's moſt honourable privy-council, be removed from his majeſty's councils and preſence for ever.

Mr. Pitt ſpoke long and forcibly in favour of the motion; and he was ſupported by Sir John Barnard, Mr. Pulteney, Sir John Hynde Cotton, lord Limerick, and Mr. Gibſon, gentlemen of the greateſt abilities and integrity. Theſe celebrated ſtateſmen charged the miniſter with the moſt barefaced acts of corruption, in order to ſupport his own intereſt: and that he had, in the moſt unneceſſary manner, raiſed a ſtanding army, which was ſupported at a vaſt expence, while the navy, the real ſtrength and ſecurity of the nation, had been neglected. They concluded by aſſerting, that he had impoſed on his majeſty with reſpect to the ſtate of Europe in general; and that he had concealed from him the complaints of his people.

Such was the nature of the charge exhibited againſt the miniſter, and it muſt be acknowledged, that it was not ill founded. He had long acted on a ſyſtem of policy inconſiſtent with the intereſt of a free people; and corruption was, by his influence, carried to an enormous height.

Mr. Pelham, brother to the late duke of Newcaſtle, attempted to vindicate the whole conduct of the miniſter, and to refute the charges brought againſt him. He took notice, that all the treaties entered into by advice of the miniſter, were in conſequence of ſome defects in former ones; and the ſtate of the nation required that his majeſty ſhould form the moſt powerful connection with the princes on the continent. He added, that the corruption with which the miniſter was charged could not be proved; and that the whole of the charge was the effect of envy, becauſe his majeſty had diſtinguiſhed him with particular marks of his confidence and favour. In a word, Mr. Pelham did all he could to vindicate the miniſter, whoſe friend he had long been, and who continued firm to his intereſt, even to the laſt.

During the debate, which laſted till three o'clock in the morning, the miniſter ſaid not one word; but when the ſpeakers had exhauſted themſelves, he ſtood up, and ſpoke in his own defence in the moſt maſterly and eloquent manner. Although conſcious that one half of the ſeats in the houſe had been given by him to ſuch needy wretches as ſubſiſted by the wages of corruption, yet ſo little was he afraid that they would expoſe his character, that he boldly charged the whole houſe to produce one inſtance of his having bribed one member, either directly or indirectly. He concluded by ſaying, that patriotiſm was a moſt venerable word, when underſtood in a proper manner; but it was then ſo hackneyed, that it had fallen into diſgrace. "The form (ſaid he) is, "preſerved, but the ſubſtance is loſt. Patriots ſpring "up like muſhrooms; I could make fifty of them "within the compaſs of a night. Let a miniſter "only refuſe an unreaſonable, or an inſolent de- "mand, and up ſtarts a patriot: I never was afraid of "making patriots, and I deſpiſe all that they can do. "I believe that no miniſter ever had ſuch an attack "made upon him as the preſent; but I know that it "has been long forming; and there are gentlemen "here preſent who know that I could have prevented "it, and by means not difficult to be known. I am "convinced of my own integrity; and whatever "may be the iſſue of the preſent motion I ſhall re- "joice in it. The whole of my life has been one "continued act of duty to my country; and I here "defy my moſt inveterate enemies to prove one "ſingle charge which they have, with ſo much "art and appearance of ſincerity, exhibited againſt "me."

The miniſter having finiſhed his harangue, the queſtion was put, and carried in the negative by a ſmall majority, in conſequence of above ſixty of thoſe who pretended to be of the popular party having gone out.

The ſame motion was made in houſe of lords by lord Carteret, who was ſeconded by the dukes of Argyle and Bedford, the earls of Halifax, Carliſle, Berkſhire, Abingdon, and Weſtmoreland, with the lords Bathurſt and Haverſham. On the other hand, the conduct of the miniſter was vindicated by the dukes of Devonſhire and Newcaſtle, the lord-chancellor Hardwicke, the earl of Ilay, brother to the duke of Argyle, lord Harvey, the earl of Oxford, and the biſhop of Saliſbury. The queſton at laſt being put, it was carried in the negative. But although the miniſter was ſo ſucceſsful, yet, from that time, his character began to ſink; for ſo many iniquitous practices had been laid open, that although ſome of them, through the force of prejudice, and the heat of paſſion, had been conſiderably exaggerated, yet the ſober thinking members were convinced that the greater part were too well founded to admit of a ſingle doubt.

The death of the emperor Charles VI. had led his daughter the queen of Hungary, into a war with the elector of Bavaria, who had married the daughter of the emperor Joſeph, and in conſequence of that alliance laid claim to ſome of the Auſtrian dominions. The queen of Hungary demanded from Britain 12000 men, that had been promiſed her in conſequence of a former treaty; and his majeſty, in the beginning of April, went to the houſe, and informed the parliament of it. He took notice, that he was bound to ſupport his ally; and as the war would be attended with a very great expence, he doubted not but the commons would contribute chearfully to enable him to ſupport the dignity of his crown, and force his enemies to hearken to the voice of reaſon.

Both houſes joined to addreſs the king in the moſt loyal manner; telling him, that they would enable him to fulfil his engagements with the queen of Hungary, and furniſh the neceſſary ſupplies for protecting his German dominions from any attacks that might be made upon them by any power whatever.

On the 25th of April the king went to the houſe of peers, and, having ſigned ſuch bills as were ready, diſſolved the parliament. In the month of May he ſet out for his German dominions, having previouſly appointed a regency during his abſence.

The parliamentary buſineſs for the ſeaſon being thus over, it is neceſſary that we ſhould attend to the ſtate of the navy, and the operations of the fleet. Sir Chaloner Ogle, after meeting with ſeveral ſtorms came to an anchor at the iſland of St. Dominica, where lord Cathcart died, to the inexpreſſible grief of the army and navy. The command of the forces devolved upon general Wentworth; and the admiral having taken in freſh water, and other neceſſary proviſions, ſet ſail for Jamaica, in order to join admiral Vernon. In his way thither he fell in with a part of the French fleet, that had been ſent to aſſiſt the Spaniards, and a ſmart engagement enſued; but as war was not then declared between France and England, both admirals thought proper to deſiſt: and on the ninth of January Sir Chaloner Ogle arrived ſafe in the harbour of Port-Royal in Jamaica. This revived the drooping ſpirits of admiral Vernon; for the fleet now amounted to 29 ſhips, with 15,000 ſeamen, and an equal number of land forces. Indeed the loſs of lord Cathcart was ſincerely lamented; but as general Wentworth was conſidered as an officer of the moſt undaunted courage, great hopes were formed of the ſucceſs that would follow.

A council of war was immediately held at Spaniſh Town in Jamaica, wherein it was reſolved, that the fleet ſhould ſail towards Hiſpaniola, to obſerve the motions of the marquis D'Antin, who was ſuppoſed to act in concert with the Spaniards; but the marquis had ſailed for Europe in a moſt diſtreſſed condition.

This diſappointment occaſioned another council of war to be held, wherein it was reſolved to ſail to Carthagena, and attack that fort both by ſea and land. Accordingly, after a dangerous voyage, the Engliſh forces were landed on a ſmall iſland near the mouth of the harbour, where they erected a battery, and ſoon made a breach in the principal fort; while the fleet co-operated with them, and general Wentworth reſolved to enter the breach that had been made. At firſt every thing ſeemed to ſecond their operations, for the Spaniards abandoned the forts, and the Engliſh land-forces ſeemed to carry every thing before them. But, unfortunately, a miſunderſtanding having ariſen between the admiral and the general, neither would act in a proper manner, while the men, who were obliged to lay during the nights in the fields, expoſed to all the inclemencies of the weather, died in great numbers; ſo that their ſtrength was weakened, and it was feared they would become an eaſy prey to the enemy.

General Wentworth, in order to recover his loſt credit as a military officer, reſolved to take the place by ſtorm; but above 600 of his men were cut off, and all hopes of ſucceeding vaniſhed. To complete the misfortune, the greateſt part of the army lay ſick, and it was computed that no leſs than 3,440 men died in the ſpace of two days, merely in conſequence of the miſunderſtanding that had taken place among the commanders.

A council of war was again called, wherein each officer upbraided the other with not having done their duty; but during their debates the public ſervice was neglected, and the enemy left to triumph over our weakneſs. At laſt it was reſolved to ſail for Jamaica, which was effected without any obſtacle; but no ſooner was the news tranſmitted to England, than the people were filled with the utmoſt conſternation. All Europe waited with impatience for the event of this expedition, which had coſt Britain ſo much money; and the the Spaniards had given up their territories in South America for loſt, but this revived their ſpirits and enabled them to go on with the war with more ſpirit than ever, and at the the ſame time it encouraged the French to give them aſſiſtance.

Whether this unfortunate affair was owing to the conduct of the admiral, or the general, is of little importance; but certain it is, that admiral Vernon took ſuch care of the fleet, that he was conſidered rather as a father than a commander. Having refitted the fleet, which was in a moſt ſhattered condition, and taken every proper method for preſerving the health of the ſeamen, he reſolved to attack the town of St. Jago, in the iſland of Cuba. He had great hopes of ſucceeding in this enterprize, and, accordingly, the forces were landed; but general Wentworth ſtill oppoſed the admiral, ſo that nothing of conſequence was done, nor any honour acquired to the nation. The public money was ſquandered away in an empty parade; the people were filled with hopes, and in the end, being diſappointed, diſcontent took place every where. It is true, ſome few of the enemy's ſhips had been deſtroyed, but that was not attended with any ſucceſs worth mentioning; and after a fruitleſs attempt to bring honour to the Britiſh crown, and reputation to her arms, it was reſolved to ſail to Jamaica, where the fleet arrived, though not before many of the men had loſt their lives by ſuch diſorders as are peculiar to the climate in that part of the world.

The diſgrace that attended the Britiſh navy in the Weſt-Indies had a conſiderable effect on the political ſtate of Europe, according to the views of the different courts. The young king of Pruſſia, whoſe political and military talents had been hitherto conceal d, demanded of the queen of Hungary the province of Sileſia, in conſequence of ſome old claims which had been given up by his anceſtors; but in all diſputes between princes, power becomes predominant. The Pruſſian army was then the beſt diſciplined in Europe, the king at their head entering Sileſia, every thing gave way to him, while the queen of Hungary, who had taken poſſeſſion of her hereditary dominions, relied for ſupport on Great Britain. Indeed the Pruſſian monarch bought his conqueſts extremely dear; for count Neuperg, having raiſed an army, a moſt bloody battle enſued at Molwitz, near the river Neiſs. For ſome time it was doubtful in whoſe favour victory would declare herſelf, till at laſt, about ſix in the evening, the king of Pruſſia, by one of thoſe maſterly ſtrokes for which his character has been ſo juſtly celebrated, obliged the Auſtrians to retire, and the town of Neiſs ſurrendered to the conqueror.

Though this blow was not deciſive, yet it threatened the Auſtrian dominions with immediate ruin; but the queen of Hungary had ſtill great hopes from the late reſolutions of the Britiſh parliament. She alſo ſolicited the aſſiſtance of the ſtates-general; but the king of Pruſſia ſent a threatening letter to the Hague, wherein he informed the ſtates, that if they took any part in the preſent war, ſo as to oppoſe him, he would ſeize on ſuch parts of their territories as his anceſtors had formerly laid claim to. To enforce his orders, he commanded a body of 6000 men to encamp on the frontiers of Holland, which ſo intimidated the Dutch, that they were obliged to apply to the earl of Hyndford, the Engliſh ambaſſador, to intercede in their favour. But all theſe means proved ineffectual; for the Pruſſian monarch, finding that the court of Vienna, in concert with ſome other European powers, had entered into a confederacy againſt him, he reſolved to keep poſſeſſion of the places he had taken in Sileſia; and that he might be able to add the whole of that valuable province to his territories, he concluded a treaty offenſive and defenſive with France.

In the mean time the French, ever reſtleſs and ambitious, reſolved to humble the power of the houſe of Auſtria; and for that purpoſe made choice of the elector of Bavaria, who was intended to be made emperor, and the hereditary dominions of the queen of Hungary were to be ſettled on him and his family. Cardinal Fleury, who at that time was the chief miniſter at the court of Verſailles, was in the 88th year of his age, and a man of a moſt pacific diſpoſition; but notwithſtanding all his abilities, yet no ſooner had the French learned that the king of Pruſſia had declared in favour of the elector of Bavaria, than the whole people called out for war, and the cardinal was obliged to give way to the public clamour. The French king was ſo averſe to every meaſure that ſeemed to countenance the claims of the houſe of Auſtria, that he reſolved to place the elector of Bavaria on the imperial throne, and ſecure to himſelf ſuch of the Auſtrian provinces in the Netherlands as lay neareſt to his own dominions. This was a deep laid ſcheme, and the news of it was ſent to the marſhal de Belleiſle, then in Germany, that he might be ready for carrying on the intended project.

The ill ſucceſs of the Engliſh arms in America gave life to every oppoſition made againſt them by any of the European powers. The marſhal de Belleiſle had his army ſtrongly reinforced; and the Spaniards, eager to ſtrengthen themſelves by any alliance whatever, ſent conſiderable ſums of money to Paris, to defray the expences of the war in Germany.

The French king, in order to give ſome colour to theſe hoſtile preparations, publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he aſſerted, that nothing but the ſafety of his people could have induced him to take ſuch a ſtep; but as the king of England had aſſembled an army in Germany, ſo he thought it his duty to do the ſame. In the mean time, the marſhal de Belleiſle, who acted both as general and ambaſſador, conducted matters with ſo much art, that the king of Pruſſia, with the elector of Saxony, were both brought into a general confederacy againſt the houſe of Auſtria, whoſe dominions were to be parcelled out among them.

In conſequence of this confederacy, the elector of Bavaria took the field, and declared war againſt the queen of Hungary, whoſe whole forces, except a few in garriſon, were engaged in oppoſing thoſe of the king of Pruſſia. At firſt, the elector of Bavaria ſpread conſternation wherever he came, even to the gates of Vienna; while a large body of French troops, under the command of the marſhal Maillebois, penetrated through Weſtphalia to the frontiers of Hanover. His Britannic majeſty was then in Hanover; and his whole German forces amounted to 26,000 men. The king of Pruſſia being ready with an army to ſupport the French, he found himſelf under the neceſſity of ſigning a treaty; by which it was ſtipulated, that the Hanoverian forces ſhould not take any part in the war, but obſerve a ſtrict neutrality.

The queen of Hungary was now driven from Germany, and moſt of her dominions ſeized by the enemy. Denied aſſiſtance from any prince in the empire, except the elector of Hanover, and he, at the moment his army intended to march to her aſſiſtance, was obliged to ſign a treaty of neutrality. In this diſtreſſed ſituation, the queen had recourſe to methods more proper, and more advantageous than the aſſiſtance of any foreign power whatever. She aſſembled the ſtates of Hungary, a brave, warlike people, who had been ſubject to her anceſtors above 600 years; and coming into the ſtate-houſe at Preſburg, ſhe held her ſon, then about ſix months old, in her arms, and addreſſed her ſubjects, in Latin, to the following import. She told them, that her moſt unhappy circumſtances, as they then were, left her no reaſon to hope that ſhe could ever extricate herſelf out of ſuch difficulties, unleſs ſhe was aſſiſted in the moſt powerful manner. She added, that ſhe was abandoned by her friends, perſecuted by her enemies, and that even her own relations had conſpired againſt her. “ I have none to truſt to but you, my dear and “ loyal ſubjects. Here is your king in my arms; “ to you I commit both him and myſelf, not doubting “ but you will ſupport me in oppoſing my enemies; “ and if I ſhould be ſo unfortunate as to loſe all in “ Germany, I ſhall once more throw myſelf into the “ arms of my Hungarian ſubjects.”

This ſpeech, delivered in the moſt tender and pathetic manner, had the deſired effect. Many ladies in the hall ſhed tears; but the brave deputies drawing their ſwords, called out, “ Moriamur pro rege “ Maria-Thereſa: “ We will die for our king Maria “ Thereſa;” for the Hungarians always ſpeak of their ſovereigns in the maſculine gender.

It is impoſſible to expreſs the zeal that her loyal ſubjects exerted on the preſent occaſion: there ſeemed to be a conteſt among them who ſhould be the firſt to aſſiſt their diſtreſſed ſovereign; and in the compaſs of a few weeks, an army of 30,000 men, under the command of count Palfy, an old experienced general, was ſent to the relief of Vienna. Prince Charles of Lorrain, the favourite of the Auſtrian army, had raiſed ſome forces, in concert with his brother the grand duke of Tuſcany; and ſeveral other ſmall armies continued to protect ſome of the moſt important towns in Bohemia; and a variety of circumſtances ſeemed to concur towards extricating the queen of Hungary out of her numerous difficulties, and turning the intended miſchief upon her enemies.

Cardinal de Fleury, ever attentive to the intereſts of his country, and well acquainted with the internal power of Great Britain, left nothing undone to perſuade the French king to adopt the moſt pacific meaſures; and finding his opinion over-ruled, he was ſo dilatory in ſending proviſions and ammunition to the army in Germany, that the marſhal de Belleiſle found himſelf reduced to great hardſhips. Nor was the elector of Bavaria in much better circumſtances. Inſtead of attacking Vienna, which would undoubtedly have ſurrendered, he ſpent his time in the moſt dilatory manner; while Khevenhuller, the braveſt of the Auſtrian generals, did not fail to take every advantage, in order to recover ſuch places as had been taken from his royal miſtreſs. But the elector of Saxony, who owed the crown of Poland to the late emperor, joined his whole army to that of the French and Bavarians; and marching to Prague, the capital of Bohemia, it was inveſted with ſuch fury, that the whole garriſon ſurrendered priſoners of war; while the grand duke, who was marching to its relief, found himſelf under the neceſſity of retiring more to the ſouthward.

It was propoſed, by prince Charles of Lorrain, who commanded under his brother the grand duke, that the army ſhould be divided into three bodies, viz. one under the grand duke, a ſecond under prince Lobkowitz, and a third under Khevenhuller. Several advantages were obtained by theſe different armies, but the moſt important was that by Khevenhuller, who defeated the general Segur, who commanded for the elector of Bavaria; and afterwards being joined by the army under the grand duke, he attacked the city of Lintz, the capital of the Upper Auſtria, and the garriſon was obliged to capitulate.

The court of France, eager to purſue the meaſures already taken, proceeded with ſuch celerity, that the elector of Bavaria was crowned emperor, little oppoſition being made to his title. But this ſtep was trifling to what the French had in view: for as they had reſolved not to leave the queen of Hungary in poſſeſſion of one ſingle province, an ambaſſador was ſent to the Grand Signior, to inform him that he had now an opportunity of humbling the houſe of Auſtria, and annexing to his European dominions the antient kingdom of Hungary.

When the queen of Hungary was informed of theſe proceedings, ſhe was filled with the utmoſt conſternation. However, her natural fortitude, and a preſence of mind for which ſhe had been always diſtinguiſhed, ſupported her drooping ſpirits; and ſhe wrote a letter, with her own hand, to the Grand Signior, wherein ſhe mentioned the diſtreſſed ſituation to which ſhe was reduced; and begging that, conſiſtent with the character of an heroic prince, he would not avail himſelf of circumſtances that could not, in the end, produce any real advantage.

The empreſs of Ruſſia had intended to aſſiſt the queen of Hungary; but was prevented by the French having ſtirred up the Swedes to declare war againſt her. The Swedes accordingly entered the province of Livonia, and took ſome of the moſt important places; but the Ruſſians at laſt drove them from their territories. This was ſucceeded by a revolution in Peterſburgh, by which the empreſs was depoſed, and Elizabeth, the daughter of Peter the Great, elected empreſs in her room.

This revolution, however ſudden and unexpected, did not diſconcert any meaſures taken by the queen of Hungary, in order to ſecure her honour and intereſt. General Berner, who commanded for her in Auſtria, made an irruption into Bavaria, where he deſtroyed ſeveral of the French magazines, and obliged the garriſons of Iſchel and Hallſtadt to ſubmit, as priſoners of war. This maſterly ſtroke opened a paſſage for the Auſtrian army into the center of Bavaria; and, upon the whole, the campaign was finiſhed much to the advantage of the queen of Hungary. The French had tried every method to bring over the king of Sardinia to their intereſt, but in vain; for that prince was extremely jealous of the Spaniards or French getting footing in Italy. Genoa, indeed, declared againſt the queen of Hungary; and the kingdom of Naples being in a manner dependent on Spain, and Spain directed by French councils, it was no difficult matter to perſuade the court of Madrid to ſend a body of forces into Italy; and before admiral Haddock could come up with them, they were joined by the French fleet in the harbour of Toulon.

The king returned to England in the month of October, and on the firſt of December the new parment met, when Mr. Onſlow was again choſen ſpeaker. Never had there been a more violent conteſt than was occaſioned by the election of the new members. The miniſter, ſecure in his own influence, was unpardonably remiſs in ſoliciting his friends on this occaſion. The minority beheld with pleaſure this overſight, which they converted to their own advantage, and exerted themſelves with ſuch diligence, that they obtained at leaſt an equality of voices.

The ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty with a ſpeech, in which he informed both houſes, "That, agreeable to the advice of his parliament, by whoſe concurrence he had undertaken the preſent war, he had ordered the chief operations to be carried on in the Weſt-Indies: that he needed not inform them of the powerful confederacy which had been formed againſt her Hungarian majeſty; that was a matter too generally known to require any particular explanation: that had other powers, who lay under the like obligations with himſelf, been as punctual in fulfilling their engagements, the ſupport of the common cauſe would have been attended with leſs difficulty: that he had, purſuant to the advice of his parliament, ever ſince the death of the late emperor, exerted himſelf in ſupport of the houſe of Auſtria; he had endeavoured, by the moſt proper and early applications, to induce other powers who were equally engaged with him, and united by common intereſt, to concert ſuch meaſures as ſo important and critical a conjuncture demanded; and where an accommodation ſeemed to him neceſſary, he had laboured to reconcile thoſe princes, whoſe union would have been the moſt effectual means to prevent the miſchiefs which had happened, and to ſecure the intereſt and ſafety of the whole: that although his endeavours had not hitherto had the deſired effect, he could not but ſtill hope, that a juſt ſenſe of the common and imminent danger would produce a more favourable turn in the councils of other nations: that he hoped the parliament would think it expedient to put the nation in ſuch a condition as might enable it to aſſiſt its friends, and defeat his enemies; and he flattered himſelf they would make it their ſtudy to proceed with unanimity, vigour and diſpatch, in all their deliberations."

The commons being returned to their own houſe, Mr. Herbert (afterwards earl of Powis) moved for an addreſs to his majeſty, which was ſeconded by ſome other members: but lord Noel Somerſet having propoſed that it ſhould be inſerted in the addreſs, "that Britain ſhould not be involved in a war, in order to preſerve his majeſty's dominions in Germany," a long debate enſued, in which it appeared evident that the miniſter had loſt much of that ſuperiority which he had hitherto maintained over the houſe. At length a formal addreſs was agreed to, which was in ſubſtance as follows: "We will, ſaid they, grant ſuch effectual ſupplies as ſhall enable your majeſty not only to be in a readineſs to ſupport your friends and allies, at ſuch time and in ſuch a manner as the exigency and circumſtance of affairs ſhall require, but to oppoſe and defeat any attempts that ſhall be made againſt your majeſty, your crown and kingdom; or againſt thoſe who, being equally engaged with your majeſty, by the faith of treaties, or united by the common intereſt, or common danger, ſhall be willing to concert ſuch meaſures as ſhall be found neceſſary and expedient for maintaining the balance of power in Europe."

The coldneſs of this addreſs tended greatly to the prejudice of the miniſter: his mercenary friends ſuſpecting his power was upon the decline, began by degrees to forſake him; and thoſe who followed him from principle, imagined that he had been too negligent in the intereſts of a maſter who had ſo highly favoured him.

The miniſter alſo at this time committed a piece of miſconduct, which did him infinite prejudice: this was the ſetting up for chairman of the committee of elections, one Mr. Earl, a perſon who was very little eſteemed by either party, againſt Dr. Lee, whoſe intereſt was warmly eſpouſed by the oppoſition, and whoſe character was unexceptionable. This queſtion being carried againſt the miniſter, gave a mortal damp to his intereſt, and was the prelude to ſtill greater mortifications that awaited him; for the oppoſition in the houſe of commons finding their aſcendancy, ſoon manifeſted the force of their ſuperiority, which was ſeen in the debates on the controverted elections for Boſſinney in Cornwall, the city of Weſtminſter, the ſhire of Berwick, and Chippenham in Wiltſhire, which were all decided in favour of the oppoſition.

At that for Weſtminſter, a party of ſoldiers being called on pretence of a riot, the poll books were ſhut, and the two court candidates, lord Sundon and Sir Charles Wager, returned by the high bailiff. The electors of Weſtminſter hereupon preſented a petition, which being taken into conſideration, the election was declared void, the high bailiff committed to cuſtody, the juſtices who ſent for the ſoldiers reprimanded on their knees at the bar of the houſe, and a writ ordered for a new election, when lord Percival and Mr. Edwin were choſen. When the election was declared void, there were great rejoicings throughout the city of Weſtminſter. The court loſt this election by a majority of two only. This, however, ſerved evidently to demonſtrate the declenſion of the miniſter's intereſt, and the concluſion of his influence in the houſe of commons; and he himſelf was convinced it was high time to provide for his own ſafety, by retiring from a place where the majority of a ſingle voice might at any time have ſent him to the Tower. He had, however, the conſolation of being certain to find the royal protection extend, as far as it conſtitutionally could, to ſecure his perſon from the rage and fury of the times. He therefore continued to give his attendance in the houſe till the 2d of February, and even during that time carried ſome points againſt the oppoſition; but the deciſion of the Chippenham election on that day being carried againſt him only by one vote, and he having been very roughly handled in the courſe of the debate, he came out of the houſe, and in the lobby declared he would never enter it more.

This declaration was not ſo ſoon expected either by his friends or his enemies, and ſeems chiefly to have been accelerated by the repulſe Sir Robert met with in an attempt which, if it had ſucceeded, would probably, by dividing the oppoſition, have ſecured him a longer political reign.

His royal highneſs the prince of Wales, who was juſtly the darling of the whole nation, eſteeming Sir Robert Walpole as a bar between the king and his people, between the king and foreign powers, and between the king and himſelf, ſtood in the front of the oppoſition, and had for ſome years lived at a diſtance from his royal father's preſence. Sir Robert, therefore, finding himſelf ſo cloſely hunted, was reſolved to try, as the laſt expedient, to reconcile the king and prince, and thereby bring the latter off from the country party. With this view Dr. Secker, biſhop of Oxford, and afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, was ſent to the prince with a meſſage, importing, that if his royal highneſs would write a ſubmiſſive letter to his majeſty, 50,000l. ſhould be added to his annual income, 200,000l. ſhould be given him to pay his debts, he and his friends ſhould be admitted into the royal favour, and ſuitable proviſions ſhould be made for them all.

In anſwer to this, his royal highneſs deſired the archbiſhop to inform his majeſty, that however willing and deſirous he was to regain his loſt favour, he would not countenance any meaſure of government till the miniſter was removed.

A. D. 1742. It was this anſwer that determined Sir Robert to withdraw from power; but as it required ſome time to deliberate upon the firſt changes, it was requiſite to adjourn the houſe. Accordingly, on the 3d of February his majeſty adjourned both houſes of parliament to the 18th. In the mean time Sir Robert was, on the 8th of February, created by his majeſty, baron of Haughton, viſcount Walpole, and earl of Orford: and on the 11th he reſigned all his employments.

Soon after the reſignation of Sir Robert, the prince of Wales. attended by a great concourſe of nobility and other perſons of diſtinction, waited on his majeſty at St. James's. He was received in a very gracious manner, a reconciliation took place between him and the king; and a guard was immediately appointed to attend his royal highneſs at Carleton-houſe. This happy event, together with that of a change in the miniſtry, was celebrated with public rejoicings in moſt parts of the kingdom.

It was now expected, that the honour of the nation would be retrieved, ſuch meaſures purſued as were beſt adapted to reſtore and maintain the antient conſtitution, and that the ſtricteſt ſcrutiny would be made into the cauſe of paſt miſmanagement. But it ſoon appeared that the removal of Sir Robert cauſed no material alteration in the meaſures purſued by the new miniſtry.

The parliament met, purſuant to their adjournment, on the 18th of February; when petitions were preſented to them from the merchants of the moſt eminent trading towns in the nation, complaining that their goods had been taken by the enemy, becauſe the miniſtry had neglected to ſend out force ſufficient to protect them. This induced the houſe to reſolve itſelf into a committee, to conſider of the nature of theſe grievances; and the people in general began to hope for redreſs, when they found that the miniſter, who had ſo long been the object of their reſentment, was removed from the council.

But theſe hopes ſoon vaniſhed; for many of thoſe who had ſo violently oppoſed the miniſter, no ſooner found themſelves inveſted with power, than they reſolved to gratify their avarice and ambition, by acting on the ſame principles with him. Diſputes aroſe among them, which were agitated with great heat on both ſides, while the intereſt of the nation was, in a manner, totally neglected. Some were for calling the late miniſter to an account for his conduct; but others opposed it, because the profits that he had rly enjoyed were now divided among them-

. The nation in general cried out againſt him, ere ſupported in the houſe by ſuch diſcontented ers as had not been advanced to places in con-nce of the late change; but he was powerfully rted by many of thoſe who had formerly been ſt inveterate enemies; and every attack made t him proved abortive.

veral motions were made in the houſe of comto repeal the act for ſeptennial parliaments, and ſe the penſion-bill; but both theſe paſſed in gative, although ſupported by a powerful party. began to open the eyes of the people; for as two points were the principal objects the patriots nded to have in view, and as their number had conſiderably increaſed at the laſt general election, not doubted but they would have carried both otions: but they were miſtaken; for thoſe who ppeared moſt forward while Sir Robert was at ead of affairs, now did all in their power to op-every meaſure that tended towards promoting ntereſt and ſecurity of the nation. In a word, eople loſt all confidence in their repreſentatives; had changed men, but the ſame meaſures were
ed. Thoſe who had been the ſtrongeſt in the ition were brought over by penſions, or al-
by titles; among whom was the famous Mr. ney, who had ſo long diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the of commons. He was created earl of Bath, the mean time the miniſtry, in order to ſooth reſentments of the people, and, if poſſible, to liate their affections, paſſed a bill for excluding in officers from their ſeats in the houſe of com-

. Another bill was paſſed for encouraging the manufacture; and a third to prevent the marrif lunatics. They voted 40,000 ſeamen, and o landmen, for the ſervice of the current year:
provided for the ſubſidies paid to Denmark and e earl of Stair, a man equally acquainted with nd politics, had been appointed commander in of the army, in the room of John duke of e, who had reſigned all his employments; and in the ſpring that nobleman went over to the e, to try if he could bring the united provinces lare in favour of the queen of Hungary. But gh he was a man of the greateſt addreſs, and cquainted with the paſſions of ſtateſmen, yet he it impoſſible to bring over the Dutch to our in England for the ſervice of the queen of Hun-embarked for Flanders the latter end of April, the command of the earl of Stair. They were oined by 25,000 Hanoverians, and 6000 Heſ-

hat was expected.

king of Sardinia was convinced that he muſt ſtand or fall with the houſe of Auſtria; and therefore, as ſoon as he heard of the alteration that had taken place in the Britiſh miniſtry, he reſolved to join his forces to thoſe of the queen of Hungary. The French were terribly alarmed at this reſolution of his Sardinian majeſty; and as they doubted not but their harbours would be viſited by the Britiſh fleets, they reſolved to put their navy on a proper footing. The Auſtrian arms, ſtill attended with more ſucceſs than could have been expected, penetrated into the center of Bavaria, and Munich, the capital city of that electorate, ſurrendered to them. The queen of Hungary, no ſtranger with reſpect to the moſt proper methods to be uſed in order to acquire the eſteem and ſecure the affections of her army, wrote a letter to general Khevenhuller, deſiring him to thank the ſoldiers in her name, and to preſent them with the pictures of herſelf and her ſon Joſeph. No ſooner were the pictures ſhewn to the army, than they ſeemed fired with enthuſiaſm in favour of their ſovereign; and their whole conduct, during the remainder of the war, was a convincing proof that their loyalty was ſincere.

From the critical ſituation of affairs in Bavaria, the French were induced to ſend thither a freſh reinforcement, in order to drive the Auſtrians from Munich; upon which the garriſon, being afraid that they would be taken priſoners, abandoned the place: but before the French could march thither, it was retaken by a large body of Auſtrians. General Khevenhuller finding that another body of French, under the command of duke Harcourt, were marching to oppoſe him, quitted the city of Munich; and in order to ſecure a retreat, threw a bridge acroſs the Danube. Both armies came to an engagement near the banks of that river, where the Bavarians were defeated with conſiderable loſs: but prince Maurice of Saxony, afterwards known by the name of Marſhal Saxe, took the town of Egra; while Glatz, and ſome other towns in Sileſia, being greatly reduced for want of proviſions, and having loſt many of their men, were obliged to ſurrender to the king of Pruſſia.

The army under the command of prince Charles of Lorrain amounted to upwards of 40,000 men, beſides a large body of irregulars drawn from the moſt remote parts of the provinces. The Auſtrians had the greateſt confidence in prince Charles; and, in general, he was very ſucceſsful, for he prevented the king of Pruſſia from marching into Bohemia, at leaſt for ſome time. This gave freſh ſpirits to the Auſtrians; and prince Charles finding himſelf under an abſolute neceſſity of coming to a battle with the king of Pruſſia, both armies met at a place called Czaſlaw, about 30 miles eaſt from Prague. A moſt bloody engagement enſued; for both armies were nearly equal in number, and both were compoſed of as brave ſoldiers as ever took the field. The king of Pruſſia, after his men had done every thing in their power, was going to give way; but the irregulars that followed the Auſtrian army broke into the Pruſſian camp for plunder, and their example being followed by the regulars, the king embraced that opportunity to rally, and prince Charles was defeated, with the loſs of 3000 men.

This victory might have enabled the king of Pruſſia to penetrate into the heart of Bohemia; but he began to diſcover that he could not put any confidence in the French who had hitherto deceived him with promiſes of new reinforcements. This induced him to think of making peace with the queen of Hungary, and no time ſeemed ſo proper as when the memory of the late battle was recent in the minds of the Auſtrians. A packet, with diſpatches, had been ſent to the marſhal de Broglio, the French general, which was, by miſtake, delivered to his Pruſſian majeſty; and, upon peruſing the contents, he diſcovered that it was the intention of the French court to ſpare their army as much as poſſible, by throwing the burden of the war upon him. In a letter to marſhal de Broglio, and in a conference with marſhal de Belleiſle, he upbraided them for not ſeconding him in his operations; but they ſtill continued to deceive him with falſe hopes. Accordingly a treaty was concluded between the king of Pruſſia and the queen of Hungary, by which the latter gave up Sileſia, with the province of Glatz in Bohemia, upon condition of his withdrawing his forces, and obſerving a ſtrict neutrality. The elector of Saxony made peace with the queen of Hungary at the ſame time; ſo that the French were deprived of two of their allies, and the emperor was left expoſed to the whole power of the Auſtrian army.

Immediately after the battle of Czaſlaw, prince Charles marched towards Budweis, where he was joined by prince Lobkowitz, and their united army amounted to 60,000 men. Thus reinforced, prince Charles croſſed the Moldaw, and attacked a body of French under the command of M. de Aubigne, and put them to flight. He purſued and haraſſed them ſo much, that their loſs was equal to a defeat in a general engagement. The huſſars pillaged the French of their baggage; and ſuch of the ſoldiers as happened to ſtray from the main body were murdered by the peaſants. In the mean time, the marſhal de Broglio came up with a body of forces to oppoſe prince Charles, who was on the point of cutting off the whole French army; but nothing could re-animate the drooping ſpirits of his army; and they were ſo much ſtruck with terror, that they never looked behind them till they came under the walls of Prague. Here they were joined by the army under the command of marſhal de Belleiſle, and both generals reſolved to concert the moſt proper methods for oppoſing prince Charles. As ſoon as prince Charles came within ſight of the French at Prague, he encamped his men, and next day he was joined by his brother, the grand duke.

The marſhal de Belleiſle was now ſo much diſtracted concerning what means he could uſe to preſerve his army, that he offered to give up Prague upon condition that his men were allowed to depart, unmoleſted, out of Bohemia; but all the anſwer they received was, they muſt ſurrender priſoners of war. This would have been a fatal ſtroke to France; and had it taken place, their whole ſcheme would have been defeated; ſo that there remained nothing to be done but to defend the place to the laſt extremity; and, in conſequence thereof, one of the moſt remarkable ſieges took place that we meet with in hiſtory.

The trenches were opened on the 28th of July; and although the Auſtrian army was more formidable in appearance than that of the French, yet the latter were better acquainted with the arts of attack and defence, and their generals behaved with the moſt intrepid ſpirit and undaunted reſolution. They knew that the ſtrongeſt enemy they had to contend with was famine, for they doubted not but the Auſtrians would hinder the peaſants from ſending in proviſions. This happened juſt as they expected; for in a ſhort time, meat was ſold for 3s. 6d. a pound, and horſe fleſh was eaten by many of the gentry. Forage was ſo ſcarce, that 14,000 horſes were either killed or turned looſe, while the French officers gave every thing they had to purchaſe proviſions for the ſoldiers.

On the 22d of Auguſt the marſhal de Belleiſle made a ſally, at the head of 12,000 men, drove the Auſtrians from their works, filled up ſome of the intrenchments, and took general Monty priſoner, beſides killing 1500 men. Nor was the bravery of the Auſtrians leſs conſpicious; for prince Charles and the grand Duke expoſed their perſons on every occaſion, in order to animate the ſoldiers. Cardinal Fleury, who had the utmoſt averſion to war, propoſed bringing about an accommodation, and deſired the king of Great Britain to become a mediator; but his majeſty knew that no confidence could be placed in any propoſal made by the cardinal, and therefore rejected his overtures with diſdain. Finding himſelf baffled in this undertaking, he wrote a letter to the Auſtrian generals, wherein he informed them, that he had oppoſed the war, but was over-ruled by the king and the marſhal de Belleiſle; and this letter, which made a conſiderable noiſe, was publiſhed at Vienna.

In the mean time the city of Prague was ſubjected to the moſt direful calamities. Beſides the French army, it contained at leaſt 100,000 inhabitants, whoſe diſtreſs was beyond deſcription; nor was there any poſſibility of relieving them. The marquis de Fenelon, then ambaſſador at the Hague, propoſed that the army under the command of the marſhal Maillebois ſhould be ſent to relieve Prague; for France had been, in a manner, exhauſted both of men and money. This propoſal was ſtrongly oppoſed by the cardinal, who inſiſted, that if the brave army under the command of marſhal Maillebois ſhould be ſent into Bohemia, then France would be left expoſed both to England and Holland; but the marquis de Fenelon having undertaken to keep the ſtates-general from engaging in the war, the meaſure was adopted, although apparently attended with very dangerous conſequences. The emperor was averſe to this plan, becauſe his hereditary dominions were over-run by the Auſtrians; and he inſiſted, that if they were driven out of Bavaria, Prague would be relieved of courſe. Nor was Maillebois leſs averſe to this meaſure than the emperor; but the orders ſent to him being abſolute, he began his march from the Lower Rhine about the middle of Auguſt, at the head of a brave, well-diſciplined army. The duke de Harcourt was then in Bavaria, the imperialiſts were under the command of general Seckendorff, and the brave Khevenhuller watched their motions with an army of Auſtrians. But the principal object that engaged the attention of Europe was the fate of Prague.

As ſoon as prince Charles of Lorrain was informed that the marſhal Maillebois was marching againſt him, he turned the ſiege of Prague into a blockade; and, committing the care of it to prince Lobkowitz, ſet out to meet the French, in order to prevent their marching into Bohemia. In his march he was joined by the troops under Khevenhuller, but not before the imperialiſts had, by forced marches, given them the ſlip; and, in their way towards the French camp, marſhal Saxe, become a great favourite with the army, joined them, ſo that Maillebois found himſelf ſtrongly ſupported. This junction of the three armies was entirely owing to the good conduct of count Saxe; and from that time his knowledge in military affairs ſhone with ſuch a diſtinguiſhing luſtre, that no plan of operations was laid down without firſt conſulting him.

The French marſhals, Belleiſle and Broglio, reſolving to avail themſelves of the departure of prince Charles, made ſeveral ſallies upon the Auſtrians, who were at laſt obliged to raiſe the ſiege; ſo that all the detached parties of each army found an opportunity of joining together in two very formidable bodies. Prince Charles finding himſelf reduced to the alternative of either venturing on a battle, the fate of which would decide the war, or leaving the kingdom of Bohemia expoſed to the French, reſolved to avail himſelf of the moſt trifling circumſtance.

The ſcarcity of proviſions had obliged the French army once more to divide itſelf into ſeparate bodies; and prince Charles, who was well acquainted with the country, reſolved, if poſſible, to prevent their joining a ſecond time. This had the deſired effect; for the French being reduced to the greateſt extremity for want of proviſions, the main body, under Maillebois, marched towards Bavaria, where that general was diſgraced, and the command given to marſhal Broglio, who had diſguiſed himſelf as a peaſant to eſcape the Auſtrians, and in that manner had travelled ſeveral days without being ſuſpected.

Marſhal Belleiſle, who had been obliged to return to Prague, was ſo cloſely blocked up by the Auſtrians, that he reſolved, if poſſible, to make his eſcape from a place that he was not able to defend. This ſcheme he put in practice in ſuch a maſterly manner, as muſt convince every one that he was one of the moſt accompliſhed generals of that age. He ſent out ſome ſpies, who pretended to be deſerters, and they being taken to the Auſtrian general Lobkowitz, they informed him that the marſhal, during the next night, intended to make a general ſally from a particular quarter of the town. The Auſtrians, not doubting the truth of this ſtory, drew off their forces to that quarter; and, in the mean time, marſhal de Belleiſle made his eſcape from the place, and got at leaſt a day's march from Prague before prince Lobkowitz knew any thing of his departure. Three thouſand of the French were left in Prague, and Belleiſle continued marching ten days, over ice and ſnow, before the Auſtrians could come up with him. At laſt prince Lobkowitz getting intelligence what route they had taken, came in ſight of them; but not chuſing to venture on a general engagement with men reduced to a ſtate of deſperation, he reſolved to block up ſuch paſſes as lay before them, and ſo prevent them from joining with the main body of forces in Bavaria.

But notwithſtanding the vigilance of the Auſtrian general, yet the marſhal de Belleiſle roſe ſuperior to every difficulty. He made choice of a road ſo dangerous and unfrequented, that the enemy had no notion of his ever going that way; and although he was ſo much afflicted with the rheumatiſm, that he was obliged to be carried in a ſedan, yet he gave orders in the moſt cool and deliberate manner, without ever complaining of the hardſhips he ſuffered. At laſt, after a march, over ſnow and ice, of above 150 miles, and ſurmounting incredible difficulties, he arrived ſafe at Egra, having loſt about 1000 men thro' the inclemency of the weather, but none by any other accidents whatever. The troops left by him in Prague capitulated on the ſame day that he had completed his march, and were allowed to march to Egra; ſo that this diſtreſſed city was relieved, after a ſiege of five months and ſome days.

Such was the ſtate of affairs in Germany during the year 1742. But we muſt now look to Italy, where the different contending powers were uſing their utmoſt endeavours to light up the flames of war, and bring the ſmaller principalities, as well as the moſt powerful ſtates, into an alliance with them. The queen of Hungary, ſenſible that the king of Sardinia, conſiſtent with his own intereſt, could not join with France or Spain, reſolved to bring him over to her meaſures; and accordingly diſpatched an ambaſſador, for that purpoſe, to the court of Turin. But the Sardinian monarch was too cunning to enter into any negotiation till he had made propoſals to the court of London, in order to procure ſuch a ſubſidy as would defray his expences. Indeed the Engliſh miniſtry were now convinced that they ought not to keep any meaſures of a pacific nature with France: the views of that court were now fully laid open, eſpecially when it is conſidered in what manner they aſſiſted the Spaniſh fleet when it was oppoſed in the Mediterranean by admiral Haddock, whoſe orders were of ſo ambiguous a nature, that he knew not in what manner to act.

In the mean time admiral Haddock, partly from the fatigues of the ſervice, and partly from anxiety of mind occaſioned by the numerous diſappointments he had met with, found his conſtitution ſo impaired as to be under the neceſſity of returning to England for the re-eſtabliſhment of his health. In conſequence of this the command of the fleet devolved on commodore Leſtock, who had lately arrived from the Weſt-Indies, and was ſent up the Streights with ten ſail of men of war, to reinforce admiral Haddock, and oppoſe the united fleets of France and Spain.

As ſoon as admiral Haddock ſet ſail for England, the commodore made a proper inquiry into the ſtate of the fleet; and finding that the whole number of ſhips amounted to 28, he weighed anchor, and arrived ſafe in the harbour of Port-Mahon, in the iſland of Minorca. There he took in freſh proviſions; and having refitted ſuch of the ſhips as were damaged, he ſailed from Mahon, and appeared before the harbour of Toulon. The French, who imagined that he had come there in a hoſtile manner, were filled with conſternation; the whole adjacent country was alarmed by fires, beacons, &c. But they ſoon found their fears were without foundation; for the commodore next day left the place, and proceeded to Antibes, on the coaſt of Italy.

Some changes having taken place in the miniſtry, Leſtock was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral of the white: but it being determined to attempt ſome bold enterprize in the Mediterranean, during the courſe of the ſummer, the ſupreme concern of the fleet was beſtowed upon Thomas Matthews, eſq; vice admiral of the red, who was at the ſame time inveſted with the character of ambaſſador extraordinary to the king of Sardinia, and the other princes and ſtates of Italy. Matthews left England in the month of April, and in his paſſage took ſeveral French and Spaniſh merchant ſhips, and at length ſafely joined rear-admiral Leſtock in the harbour of Villa Franca.

No miniſtry, perhaps, ever took a more impolitic ſtep than in joining theſe two admirals in command, it being well known, that there had long ſubſiſted between them an inveterate diſlike to each other. Matthews even declared to the miniſtry, that he accepted the command merely on condition that Leſtock ſhould be ſpeedily recalled. But notwithſtanding this plain declaration, the latter was continued in his command till the honour of the nation was ſhamefully ſacrificed to the gratification of private reſentment.

Soon after admiral Matthews arrived in the Mediterranean, he detached captain Norris, in the Kingſton of 50 guns, and the Duke fire ſhip, to burn five Spaniſh gallies, which had taken ſhelter in the bay of St. Tropez, a French port in the Mediterranean: this order was effectually executed. But no action of the admiral's proved ſo agreeable to the people of England as that of ſending commodore Martin with a ſquadron of ſhips and bomb-veſſels to Naples, to demand, from the king of the two Sicilies, a promiſe in writing, to withdraw his troops from acting in conjunction with thoſe of Spain, and alſo not to give them for the future, any kind of aſſiſtance. If this demand ſhould be refuſed, Martin had orders to bombard the city of Naples.

The conſternation of the Neapolitans was incredible at the ſight of the formidable force Mr. Martin brought with him, and the peremptory manner in which he made the above demand: and however his Sicilian majeſty might diſlike the inſult upon his dignity, his private reſentment was obliged to ſubmit to the intereſt of the ſtate, which was in no condition to defend itſelf. Accordingly, after ſeveral meſſages between the commodore and the duke de Montealegre, the Sicilian miniſter, the latter in his maſter's name gave a written promiſe that his troops ſhould be immediately withdrawn out of Lombardy; and that he would not in any manner whatſoever aid or aſſiſt thoſe of Spain any more during the preſent war in Italy. This promiſe was inſtantly performed: the Neapolitan troops were forthwith recalled; by which means the Spaniſh army was ſo conſiderably weakened, that they were incapable of performing any action of importance during the remaining part of the campaign. By this bold, but ſucceſsful, ſtep of the Britiſh admiral, the queen of Hungary was ſaved from apparent deſtruction.

The Spaniards had attempted to ſend a large body of men from Italy; but although they were powerfully aſſiſted by the French, yet ſuch was the ſpirited conduct of the king of Sardinia, that he drove them back from Piedmont with very conſiderable loſs. The Auſtrians in Italy taking freſh courage from this circumſtance, returned to the duchy of Modena, and laid all the towns under contribution. Thus every thing on the part of the queen of Hungary ſeemed to wear a moſt promiſing aſpect in Italy. The king of Sardinia was her ally; the king of Naples was prevented from doing her any injury: ſome of the ſmaller ſtates were overawed; while admiral Matthews was cruiſing in the Mediterranean, to prevent either the French or Spaniards from landing any forces.

During theſe tranſactions on the continent of Europe, the Britiſh affairs in America were in a very deplorable ſituation. The admiral and the commander of the land forces could never agree in any ſingle propoſal, and the time that ſhould have been devoted towards proſecuting the war was ſpent in idle contention, the effect of paſſion and malevolence.

A reinforcement had been ſent over to admiral Vernon in the Weſt-Indies; and it was propoſed to ſail to Porto-Bello, and from thence to ſend a detachment over the iſthmus of Darien, to Panama, the capital city of that province. Admiral Vernon was of opinion, that no time ſhould be loſt; and therefore, having anchored in the harbour of Porto-Bello, he diſpatched Mr. Lowther, an officer of the army, to bring him proper intelligence concerning the ſituation of Panama, and what force would be neceſſary to reduce it. Upon the return of Mr. Lowther, a council of war was held, wherein he gave it as his opinion, that they could not, with ſafety, attack the fort of Panama, on account of the rainy ſeaſon, and the great ſickneſs that prevailed in the army. In this he was ſeconded by the other officers of the land forces; and admiral Vernon, vexed to the utmoſt, found himſelf under the neceſſity of returning once more to Jamaica, to take in freſh proviſions, without having been able to do any thing for the ſervice of his country.

The parliament met on the 16th of November, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he informed them, "that he had augmented the Britiſh troops in the Low-countries with 16,000 Hanoverians, and the Heſſian auxiliaries, in order to form ſuch a force, in conjunction with the Auſtrians, as might be of ſervice to the common cauſe in all events. He extolled the magnanimity and fortitude of the queen of Hungary, as well as the reſolute conduct of the king of Sardinia, and his ſtrict adherence to his engagements, though attacked in his own dominions. He mentioned the requiſition of Sweden for his good offices to bring about a peace between that nation and Ruſſia; the defenſive alliances which he had contracted with the czarina and the king of Pruſſia, as events which could not have been expected, if Great Britain had not manifeſted a ſeaſonable ſpirit and vigour in the defence and aſſiſtance of her ancient allies, and in maintaining the liberties of Europe; he obſerved, that the honour of his crown and kingdoms, the ſucceſs of the war with Spain, the re-eſtabliſhment of the balance and tranquillity of Europe, would greatly depend on the prudence and vigour of their reſolutions." His majeſty then informed the houſe of commons in particular, "that he had ordered the proper eſtimates for the ſervice of the enſuing year to be laid before them, and alſo the account of the expence of thoſe particular ſervices which he had already mentioned, and which they would find to have been concerted in as frugal a manner as the nature of them would admit. He ſaid, he was perſuaded they would readily grant him ſuch ſupplies as ſhould be found neceſſary for the ſecurity and welfare of the nation, requiſite for the ſupport of the common cauſe, and adequate to the emergency."

After his majeſty had retired, the commons returned to their own houſe, where great debates aroſe concerning the words of the addreſs that ſhould be preſented. This oppoſition was occaſioned by the conduct of the diſcontented members, who not being gratified according to their expectations, became as inveterate enemies to that miniſtry they had ſet up, as they had been to that which they pulled down. But all theſe attempts proved unſucceſsful; for both houſes preſented moſt dutiful and loyal addreſſes to his majeſty, wherein they approved entirely of every part of his conduct, and thanked him for his great care in watching ſo attentively over the affairs of Europe. They aſſured him, that nothing ſhould be wanting to ſupport the dignity of his majeſty's crown, and humble his enemies in every part of the world.

The attention of the commons was firſt engaged in concerting meaſures for raiſing the neceſſary ſupplies for the enſuing year. The national debt at this time amounted to 48,915,047l. 16s. 9d¼.

A. D. 1743. After various debates, the means agreed on for raiſing the ſupplies were as follow. The land tax was advanced to 4s. in the pound; 750,000l. were borrowed on exciſe-bills; 800,000l. were to be raiſed by a lottery; and 100,000l. was taken from the ſinking fund, beſides the whole overplus of the exchequer. The whole ſum granted by parliament to defray the expences of this year amounted to 5,314,100l.

Several motions were made to revive the place and penſion bills, and to enquire into the conduct of the earl of Orford during the laſt ten years of his adminiſtration. But although theſe motions were ſtrongly ſupported by Sir Watkin-Williams Wynn and Mr. Lyttleton, yet they were thrown out by a great majority.

Another motion was made, that his majeſty be enabled to take into Britiſh pay ſuch a body of Hanoverian and Heſſian dragoons as ſhould be conſiſtent with the ſtate of affairs on the continent. This was moſt violently oppoſed by the country-party; and it was urged, that by the act of ſettlement, Great-Britain was not to be concerned in any war relating to his majeſty's electoral dominions: nay, ſome of the members inſiſted, that to demand money to ſupport the Hanoverian forces was a groſs impoſition on the Engliſh nation; for they knew that thoſe troops could not take part with the queen of Hungary, without bringing his majeſty under the ban of the empire. It was anſwered by the minority, that every thing done by his majeſty was in compliance with the advice of his parliament; but this was denied by thoſe in the oppoſition, who inſiſted, that what was promiſed was upon a ſuppoſition that the ſtates-general would have joined their forces with thoſe of Great-Britain, in order to oppoſe the French, and ſupport the queen of Hungary. At laſt, the queſtion being put, it was carried in favour of the miniſtry by a great majority.

The next buſineſs the parliament entered on was, to take into conſideration the ſtate of the licences for the ſale of wine and ſpirituous liquors, and to impoſe other duties upon them than what had been done hitherto. It appeared evident, that the late reſtriction upon the ſale of ſpirituous liquors had not been of any ſervice in promoting the health or morals of the people; and therefore, that the ſale of thoſe pernicious articles might become more common, it was propoſed to lower the taxes. The whole bench of biſhops voted againſt this meaſure; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, in particular, ſpoke long and learnedly on the ſubject. Lord Harvey, who had been deprived of the privy-ſeal, vented all his ſpleen againſt the miniſtry, by comparing their conduct, in lowering the duties on ſpirituous liquors, to a tyrant who lets looſe a wild beaſt upon a parcel of innocent children.

On the other hand, the bill was ſupported by the duke of Newcaſtle, the earls of Bath, Cholmondeley, and Ilay, with the lords Bathurſt and Carteret. During this argument, many brilliant ſallies of wit were thrown out on both ſides, particularly by the earl of Ilay, who levelled his ſatire at the biſhops; and by the earl of Cheſterfield, who ripped up all the ſores of the miniſtry. At laſt, the queſtion being put, it was, as uſual, carried in favour of the miniſtry by a very great majority.

The minority in both houſes, finding the power of the miniſtry too ſtrong for them to overthrow, reſolved to give them all the trouble they could, by plying them in parliament with one motion after another. Accordingly they moved, that an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, praying that he would order the proper officer to lay before the houſe copies of all papers and memorials, with the anſwers to them, that had paſſed between the courts of Vienna and London: but this motion, with ſeveral others, was carried in favour of the miniſtry.

On the 22d of April his majeſty went to the houſe; and having given his aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, delivered a ſpeech, wherein he told them, that he had ordered his army, in conjunction with that of the queen of Hungary, to croſs the Rhine, and watch the motions of the French: that he had given orders to continue a ſtrong fleet in the Mediterranean, to prevent the Spaniards from ſending forces to Italy; and another in the Weſt-Indies: that he would not neglect any proper meaſures that could tend towards reſtoring the tranquillity of Europe, and procuring ſuch an honourable peace as would promote the intereſt both of his people and his allies. Laſtly, he thanked the commons for the chearful manner in which they had granted the ſupplies; told them, that the money ſhould be expended according to their direction; and doubted not but they would be ready to ſupport him on any future occaſion.

After the king had finiſhed his ſpeech, the lord chancellor, by his majeſty's command, prorogued the parliament.

During theſe tranſactions in England the greateſt preparations were made, in moſt parts of Europe, for opening the campaign. In Germany, the emperor Charles VII. was at the head of one party, ſtrongly ſupported by the French; and, in oppoſition to him, was the queen of Hungary, aſſiſted by Great-Britain. The Engliſh miniſtry endeavoured to prevail with the ſtates-general to join in ſupporting the houſe of Auſtria; and theſe endeavours being ſeconded by the prince of Orange, who was extremely fond of war, the Dutch raiſed, or rather increaſed, their army to 40,000 foot and 5,000 horſe, to be ready to march when ordered. This ſpirited reſolution in the ſtates, who had ſo long remained neuter, ſurpriſed all Europe; but, upon enquiry, it was found that they had been inſtigated by Mr. Van Haren, a young gentleman, and one of the deputies. He wrote elegant allegorical pieces, wherein he compared Holland to ancient Greece, when that famous republic was oppreſſed by the Perſians and Macedonians; and theſe pieces being univerſally read, the people were rouſed from a ſtate of inſenſibility.

The king of Pruſſia was cultivating the arts of peace in his dominions. The new empreſs of Ruſſia refuſed to join the French*; and the king of Sweden was too far advanced in years to engage in any enterprizes of a public nature.

His Britannic majeſty (having reſolved in the approaching campaign to head his troops in perſon) immediately after the prorogation of the parliament ſat out for Germany, attended by his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction.

The campaign had been opened this year ſooner than uſual. The queen of Hungary ſeemed to be in a proſperous ſtate; for the French army had ſuffered conſiderably during the preceding winter, owing to the ſeverity of the ſeaſon, and the ſoldiers crowding themſelves too near German ſtoves filled with burning wood, whereby the mortality among them became general, and great numbers periſhed.

The emperor took the field with what forces he could raiſe, and ſeemed determined to act in the moſt vigorous manner; but prince Charles of Lorrain, having gathered together an army of Auſtrians, attacked the imperialiſts, and gave them a total overthrow. Beſides priſoners, 5,000 were left dead on the ſpot, and the whole baggage and artillery of the emperor fell into the hands of the Auſtrians. This victory opened a way for the Auſtrians to penetrate into Bavaria, and the towns in general ſurrendered on their approach. The diſcomfited emperor was obliged to take ſhelter in Augſburg, one of the imperial cities; but Mentzel, an Hungarian general, at the head of a ſtrong party, drove him from it, ſo that he was obliged to ſeek ſhelter in Franckfort.

In the mean time the Britiſh forces, under the command of the earl of Stair, began their march for the Rhine, and in May they encamped near Hoech on the river Mayne. Their intention was to join the Auſtrian forces under prince Charles of Lorrain: and the French king, in order to prevent this junction, ordered marſhal Noailles to aſſemble

* About this time the French ſuſtained a very conſiderable loſs in the death of cardinal Fleury, who paid the debt of nature in the 90th year of his age. He was a man of great political abilities, and ſeemed to poſſeſs the untainted ſimplicity of the primitive ages. He had lived in an obſcure manner till upwards of ſixty years old, and then he was appointed biſhop of Frejus, a ſmall living, and ſituated in a very unhealthy part of the kingdom. At laſt ſuperior merit brought him into office, and the pope honoured him with a cardinal's hat. As a miniſter, the principal object he had in view was to promote the internal happineſs of the French people, to preſerve peace in Europe, and to make his ſovereign great without oppreſſing his ſubjects. In him, the French king loſt an able miniſter, a faithful ſervant, and an honeſt man: and although he might have enriched his family at the expence of the public, yet he deſpiſed ſuch meanneſs, and died extremely poor. Lewis XV, king of France, with his ſon, the late Dauphin, viſited the cardinal in his laſt moments; and his dying advice to them was to deſiſt from any farther connections in the war.

60,000 men upon the Mayne. After ſecuring the towns of Spire, Worms and Oppenheim, the marſhal paſſed the Rhine in the beginning of June, and poſted himſelf on the eaſt ſide of that river, above Franckfort. The earl of Stair advanced towards him, and encamped at Kilenbach, between the river Mayne and the foreſt of d'Armſtadt; from which place he made a motion to Aſchaffenburgh, with an intention to ſecure the navigation of the Upper Mayne; but the enemy, who lay on the other ſide of that river, had taken poſſeſſion of the poſts above, in ſuch a manner as to intercept all ſupplies. At the ſame time they found means to cut off the communication of water between Frankfort and the confederates.

On the 9th of June his Britannic majeſty arrived at the camp, and had the mortification to find his army, which conſiſted of 40,000 men, in danger of being ſtarved; but having received intelligence that 12,000 Hanoverians and Heſſians had reached Hanau, he determined to march thither in order to join thoſe forces, and procure proviſions for his army. Accordingly, on the 26th of June, he decamped, but had hardly quitted Aſchaffenburgh before it was ſeized by the French, and after marching about three leagues, he perceived the enemy to the number of 30,000, had paſſed the river, and were drawn up in order of battle at the village of Dettingen, to diſpute his paſſage. He now found himſelf in a very dangerous ſituation; the enemy at Aſchaffenburgh prevented his retreat; his troops were confined in a narrow plain, bounded on the right by hills and woods, and flanked on the left by the river Mayne, on the oppoſite ſide of which the French had erected batteries to annoy the allies in their march; a conſiderable part of the French army was, at the ſame time, drawn up at the end of a narrow paſs, having the village of Dettingen on the right, a wood on the left, and a moraſs in the center. Thus hemmed in on every ſide, his Britannic majeſty found himſelf reduced to the alternative of either fighting on the moſt unequal terms, or ſurrendering himſelf a priſoner of war, with his whole army. But all the precautions taken by the French were rendered abortive by the precipitate conduct of the duke de Grammont, who, impatient of waiting any longer, advanced to a riſing ground, and attacked the allies before the one half of them had paſſed the defile. Here the French were led into the ſame ſnare they had laid for their enemies; for their cannon, on the oppoſite ſide of the river, not being able to give the detached party any aſſiſtance, great numbers of them were killed.

The marſhal de Noailles having ſeen, from the oppoſite banks of the river, the conduct of the duke de Grammont, marched to his aſſiſtance, but too late; for the allied army behaved with ſo much intrepidity, that the French were defeated with great ſlaughter, and that army which in the morning ſeemed devoted to deſtruction, was in poſſeſſion of the field before evening. Indeed, the conduct of his Britannic majeſty, during the whole of the engagement, was conſiſtent with the character of a great hero. He rode through the ranks, encouraging the men to exert themſelves to the utmoſt, and they obeyed in the moſt chearful manner. No troops ever behaved with greater bravery than the Engliſh, and ſome of their principal officers were killed, particularly general Clayton, who was ſhot dead by a random ſhot from a French cannon. General Monroy, a brave Hanoverian officer ſhared the ſame fate; and the gallant duke of Cumberland, whoſe behaviour during the battle procured him the eſteem of all preſent, was wounded in the leg, as were ſeveral other officers of the higheſt diſtinction.

Immediately after the action his majeſty continued his march to Hanau, where he joined the Hanoverian and Heſſian forces. A general thanſgiving was performed on the 24th of June by the whole confederate army, for the ſucceſs of the late battle. The two armies continued on different ſides of the river Mayne till the 12th of July, when marſhal Noailles received intelligence that prince Charles of Lotrain was bending his march towards the confederate army, with an intent to place him between two fires; he reſolved to prevent this deſign by decamping in the night of the twentieth, having firſt deſtroyed his magazines.

About the latter end of Auguſt the allied army paſſed the Rhine at Mentz, and his Britannic majeſty fixed his head quarters in the epiſcopal palace of Worms; marſhal Noailles having retreated into Upper Alſace. The latter end of September the allies advanced to Spires, where they were joined by 20,000 Dutch auxiliaries. They then took poſſeſſion of Gimmerſhein, and demoliſhed the lines which the enemy had formed on the Queich, after which they again retired to Mentz.

Towards the latter end of October the king of Great Britain returned to Hanover, and the army ſeparated; the troops in the Britiſh pay marched back to the Netherlands, and the reſt took the rout to their reſpective countries.

During theſe tranſactions, the emperor Charles VII. unable to ſupport his dignity, wearied out with the fatigues of war, and feeling for the miſery he had brought on his ſubjects, by being a dupe to French councils, reſolved to conclude a ſeparate peace with the queen of Hungary; but the Auſtrian miniſter would hearken to no terms of accommodation. Many of the German princes began to conſider the queen of Hungary as too inflexible, and, at the ſame time, they pitied the unfortunate emperor, who longed earneſtly for peace. The two laſt places of importance in his dominions, viz. Egra and Ingolſtadt, were taken by the enemy, and in the laſt mentioned were found the records and archives of the electorate of Bavaria, the family jewels, pictures, plate, curioſities, and moſt of the valuable things belonging to the Bavarian nobility. This was a fatal ſtroke to the emperor; and to increaſe his misfortune, his kinſman and faithful counſellor, the archbiſhop of Mentz, was dead, and his ſucceſſor was a friend to the Auſtrians.

The campaign in Italy was not productive of any material tranſaction on either ſide. In the beginning of the year the king of Sardinia aſſembled an army of 40,000 men, in order to oppoſe the Spaniards, who had taken poſſeſſion of Savoy: but he was too inactive; for he rather remained on the defenſive, than offered to attempt any thing of importance. Count de Gages, who commanded another army of Spaniards in Italy, tranſmitted accounts to Madrid, that he had loſt, out of 40,000 men, above 10,000 by ſickneſs: but the king of Spain, who was under the influence of his queen, ſent peremptory orders to the count to engage; and accordingly he croſſed the Panaro, and encamped in a place belonging to the pope, reſolving to act ſome time on the defenſive. He ſent ſeveral preſſing letters to the king of Naples, to ſend him a freſh reinforcement: but however willing that prince was to aſſiſt the Spaniards, yet he knew, that if he had ſent them any part of his army, the Engliſh fleet would have battered down his capital.

In the month of September, prince Lobkowitz was ſent to take the command of the Auſtrian army in Italy, and immediately reſolved to take the field. Accordingly he marched againſt count Gages, who not having force ſufficient to oppoſe him, retreated to Fano, a ſmall town near the gulph of Venice, where he reſolved to wait for the Auſtrians. He cauſed all the paſſes and avenues leading to the town to be fortified; but prince Lobkowitz, knowing that the place would naturally be given up on account of the ſcarcity of proviſions, and not doubting but, before the expiration of the ſeaſon, the Spaniſh army would be obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war, he did not offer to purſue them, but put his men into quarters.

The prince de Conti was ſent, at the head of 12,000 men, to reinforce the army in Savoy, under the command of Don Philip; and to theſe were added 4000 foot, drawn from the Spaniſh regiments in Catalonia. The deſign of ſending theſe troops into Savoy, was to attempt to force a paſſage through the Alps, which had been attempted before by the marquis de las Minas, though without ſucceſs, and 3000 of the Spaniſh ſoldiers were cut off. The united army of the French and Spaniards now amounted to 56,000 men. As it was difficult to procure proviſions for ſuch a numerous body of men in the mountains of Savoy, where the poor peaſants have ſcarce as much as will ſupport themſelves, it was reſolved, in a council of war, to march to Chateau-Dauphine; but, after ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts, they found themſelves under the neceſſity of going into the ſame winter quarters they had occupied before: ſo that nothing of importance was done againſt his Sardinian majeſty during the whole campaign.

In the Mediterranean things remained in the ſame ſituation as the preceding year. Admiral Matthews had taken care to prevent the Spaniſh and French fleets from joining; but as the French reſolved not to act any longer in an underhand manner, it was agreed, that the fleet blocked up in Toulon ſhould be reinforced by ſome ſhips juſt finiſhed in that harbour; while another ſquadron was to be fitted out at Breſt, to intercept any reinforcements that might happen to be ſent from England to the Mediterranean. But ſome ſhips belonging to the Spaniards being taken by Matthews, he found out the ſcheme laid to overpower him; and ſent notice of it to the miniſtry, earneſtly begging that they would ſend him more ſhips and men, the fleet being in a very miſerable ſituation.

Sir Chaloner Ogle ſucceeded to the united command of the army and navy, in the room of general Wentworth and admiral Vernon, who had both been recalled home; but the Spaniſh admiral, de Torre, being ſtill in the harbour of the Havannah, with a large fleet, no material enterprize could be attempted. In the beginning of the year, however, he determined to make an attack on the Spaniards, which, in caſe of failure, could not materially weaken his fleet. He accordingly ordered captain Knowles, of the Suffolk, a 70 gun ſhip, to take under him the Burford of 70 guns, the Aſſiſtance, Norwich and Advice, of 50, and the Scarborough of 20, with three ſloops, and to proceed to Antigua, where he was to be joined by the Eltham of 40 guns and the Lively of 20. With this ſquadron he was to make an attempt upon la Gueira and Porto Cavallo, on the Caraccao coaſt; but the governor of the Caraccao having received intelligence of this expedition, erected new batteries, augmented the garriſons with a numerous body of Indians, Mulattoes and Negroes; and prevailed on the Dutch governor of Curacoa, an iſland of the leſſer Antilles, to ſupply him with a conſiderable quantity of ammunition; ſo that when Knowles made an attack upon the place, he met with ſuch a warm reception, that he was obliged to abandon the enterprize, and ſailed immediately for the iſland of Curacoa, in order to repair the damage he had ſuſtained. He had one lieutenant and ninety-two men killed, and 380 wounded. The Spaniards, however, had no great cauſe for exultation, as their town and fortifications were almoſt deſtroyed, beſides the loſs of 700 men.

Not diſcouraged by the loſs he had ſuſtained, Knowles no ſooner refitted his ſquadron than he put to ſea with a reſolution to make an attempt upon Porto Cavallo, off which place he came to an anchor on the 15th of April; when taking a view of the ſituation of the Spaniards, he diſcerned twelve of their ſmalleſt ſhips, and three gallies, hauled up to the head of the harbour out of gun ſhot, and two large ones, one of ſixty, the other of forty guns, moored cloſe over to the other ſhore, there not being depth of water ſufficient for them to go up the harbour. A ſhip was likewiſe laid acroſs the channel ready to be ſunk, if an entrance ſhould be attempted, a chain being fixed from the caſtle to her ſtern, and another from her head to the main, where the Spaniards had lately erected three faſcine batteries, which extended a conſiderable length; and on the low point, called Punta Brava, were two other faſcine batteries, one of twelve guns the other of ſeven: but the commodore perceiving they were ill-deſigned, and might eaſily be flanked, reſolved on the attempt. Accordingly the next morning two ſhips were ordered to cannonade, and ſoon ſilenced both thoſe batteries. In the evening the forces were landed under the command of major Lucas; but being ſeiſed with a ſudden panic, they fell into the greateſt confuſion, and retreated with precipitation to their ſhips. A general conſultation of officers was now held, when it appearing that moſt of the ſhips had ſpent the chief part of their ammunition, were all terribly ſhattered in their maſts and rigging, and quite unable to renew the attack, the commodore abandoned the enterprize, and, having made an exchange of priſoners with the governor of Porto Cavallo, he returned to Jamaica.

On the continent of America, things were in no better a ſituation than in the Weſt-Indies: for altho' general Oglethorpe undertook a long, fatiguing march, to prevent the Spaniards from penetrating into our provinces, yet he was obliged to return to Georgia, without having been able to do any thing of importance.

Having thus noticed the particular tranſactions of this year abroad, it is now time to attend to ſuch as claim our attention at home.

Soon after the king's departure for Germany, an affair happened, which, though inconſiderable in itſelf, made a great noiſe in London. A regiment of highlanders had been raiſed in Scotland, under pretence that they were to act as militia in preſerving the peace of the country. But being ordered up to London, they were reviewed on Finchley-common by general Wade, and then told that they muſt embark at Graveſend. This they complained of as inconſiſtent with the terms on which they had been embodied; and therefore a large body mutinied, and ſet out, in order to return to their own country; but they were overtaken by a regiment of dragoons, and brought priſoners to the Tower, where three of them were ſhot, and the remainder ſent to the Weſt-Indies; while ſuch as had continued obedient embarked for Flanders, where they behaved, in ſeveral engagements, with great bravery.

The princeſs Louiſa, his majeſty's youngeſt daughter, having been married by proxy to the prince-royal of Denmark, her highneſs ſet out for that kingdom on the 19th of October, accompanied by the counteſs of Albemarle and baron Salenthall, a Daniſh nobleman. On the 29th ſhe arrived at Hanover, and on the 18th of November was met at Altena by the prince, where they were publicly married, and then continued their journey to Copenhagen, the capital, amidſt the acclamations of the people.

About this time a great conteſt happened among the proprietors of the South-ſea company, relative to Mr. Knight, who had been their caſhier in the fatal year 1720, and had ever ſince lived in France as an exile. He had already procured his pardon from the crown, owing to ſome favourable circumſtances that were pleaded in his behalf; and he now offered the company 10,000l. by way of compoſition for all the claims againſt him. This offer was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by great number of the proprietors, who thought it would have the appearance of a moſt ſcandalous compoſition on the part of the company. At length, however, on a ballot, the offer of Mr. Knight was accepted by a great majority.

His majeſty being returned from Hanover, the parliament met on the firſt of December; when the king, in his ſpeech, told them, "That the dominions of the queen of Hungary had been evacuated by her enemies, and that the powerful armies which had marched to her aſſiſtance had retired out of the empire: that, in this conjuncture, it was with great pleaſure he could acquaint them, that he had been joined by a body of troops of his good friends and allies the ſtates-general: that, in further proſecution of theſe meaſures, a definitive treaty between him, the queen of Hungary, and the king of Sardinia, had been happily concluded; a treaty which in time ſhould be laid before them: that the advantages which muſt reſult from this alliance to the common cauſe were ſufficiently apparent; and it would be particularly conducive to the intereſt of his kingdoms, by diſappointing the ambitious views of the crown of Spain, with which they were at preſent engaged in ſo juſt and neceſſary a war: that as he made no doubt but they would proceed upon theſe foundations with firmneſs and conſtancy, they might reaſonably hope to ſee the public tranquillity ſoon re-eſtabliſhed, and a ſafe and honourable peace ſpeedily obtained: that ſuch were the ends which he had in view, and to the attainment of which he ſhould bend his whole ſtudy and attention; but, in order the more thoroughly to accompliſh them, vigorous and reſolute meaſures were neceſſary; and to concert and carry on ſuch meaſures, he did, with a juſt confidence, rely on their zealous, chearful and effectual ſupport."

Great debates aroſe in the houſe of lords concerning the nature of the addreſs that ſhould be preſented to his majeſty: for the earl of Sandwich moved, that the Hanoverians ſhould not be any longer continued in the pay of Great Britain, becauſe they were of no real ſervice to the nation. This motion, however, was over-ruled by a great majority, and 25 peers proteſted againſt it. It was much the ſame in the houſe of commons: for although ſeveral members moved for the diſcontinuance of Hanoverians in the Britiſh ſervice, yet the miniſtry carried all before them.*

A. D. 1744. The firſt buſineſs taken into conſideration by the parliament was the raiſing the proper ſupplies for carrying on the war; and ſo great was the power of the miniſtry, that ten millions were granted, a ſum that increaſed the national debt to an enormous height, and burthened the people with taxes intolerable to be borne. Many worthy members of both houſes ſpoke vehemently againſt ſuch ſcandalous meaſures, by which ruin was threatened to the whole nation. But the miniſtry carried their point, and all the attempts of thoſe in oppoſition were rendered abortive.

Theſe diſſentions in the Britiſh parliament were ſuddenly ſuſpended by an event that ſeemed to call upon both parties to unite in their common defence. This was the intelligence of an intended invaſion in favour of the pretender, whoſe elſeſt ſon, Charles-Edward, had paſſed through Italy in December, in the diſguiſe of a Spaniſh courier, embarked at Final, landed at Antibes, and proſecuting his journey to Paris, had been indulged with a private audience of the French king; who thought, by the parliamentary diſputes and general diſſatisfaction of the people of Great Britain, that the whole nation was ripe for revolt, and therefore determined to make uſe of young Charles, who was a youth of promiſing talents, ſecret, brave, and enterpriſing, to effect the projected invaſion of this kingdom; which, ſhould it at laſt miſcarry, would, he foreſaw, make a conſiderable diverſion from the continent in favour of France, and embroil and embarraſs the king of England, who was the chief ſupport of the houſe of Auſtria and all its allies. The old pretender was perſuaded to ſuffer his ſon to try the experiment: the young man embraced the offer with the greateſt alacrity. The French miniſtry began to make preparations for carrying the ſcheme into immediate execution, and every thing was propoſed to be conducted with equal ſecrecy and diſpatch. The court of Spain, equally concerned in the ſucceſs of the project with that of Verſailles, undertook to furniſh the neceſſary ſums, which the exhauſted ſtate of the French finances would not ſuffer them to advance.

Count Saxe was appointed by the French king commander in chief of the troops deſigned for this expedition. The count had been ſome time in England, and had taken notice that there were but few places fortified in a regular manner; and therefore, upon his return, having made a proper repreſentation of theſe things, an army of 15,000 men was ordered to march to the coaſt near Calais, Dunkirk, and Boulogne, where the young pretender was to ſee them embarked on board the proper tranſports. It is neceſſary to take notice, that although hoſtilities had, in ſome meaſure, been commenced between us and the French, yet war had not been declared; and, therefore, our miniſtry ſent an expreſs to Mr. Thompſon, then at Paris, to remonſtrate to the French miniſtry on their conduct; but he only received evaſive anſwers. A fleet of men of war had been fitted out at Breſt, as a convoy to the tranſports; and the command being given to M. Roqueſeuille, that admiral ſailed up the Britiſh channel, but was diſcovered by ſome Engliſh cruiſers, who took ſhelter in the harbour of Plymouth, and ſent an expreſs to the board of admiralty.

In conſequence of this information Sir John Norris was ſent to take upon him the command of the fleet, which lay at Spithead, and conſiſted of twelve ſhips of the line. He was ſoon joined by ſeveral others from Chatham; by which conjunction he found himſelf greatly ſuperior to the enemy.

The deſign of the French was to have landed their forces in Kent, and thereby ſtrike ſuch a terror into the people of London, that they would be obliged to abandon their houſes; but the Engliſh miniſtry took every precaution to fruſtrate their deſigns. Several regiments were ordered to march toward the coaſt oppoſite France; the different forts at the mouth of the Thames and the Medway were put in a poſture of defence; and directions were given to aſſemble the Kentiſh militia, to defend the coaſt in caſe of an invaſion.

* We cannot cloſe the domeſtic occurrences of the year 1743, without taking notice, that, on the third of September died the celebrated John Campbell, duke of Argyle and Greenwich. He was one of the moſt ſteady patriots that ever adorned this or any other kingdom. No ſcheme propoſed by the miniſter was ever ſupported by him, if it appeared to be inconſiſtent with the rights of the people. He had ſerved the crown in ſome of the higheſt departments of the ſtate; but neither promiſes nor threatenings could ever make him ſwerve from that duty he owed to his country. He was delicate in the choice of his friends; but when choſen, very conſtant to them: he was ſlow of promiſing favours, but when promiſed, the performance was ſure; and he often rather choſe to purchaſe preferment for his relations than aſk it. In ſhort he lived an honeſt man, and died lamented by every lover of virtue.---He was ſucceeded in his Scottiſh title by his brother Archibald, earl of Ilay. By his death the title of Greenwich became extinct.

On the 15th of February the king ſent a meſſage to both houſes of parliament, intimating the arrival of the Pretender's ſon in France, the preparations at Dunkirk, and the appearance of a French fleet in the Engliſh channel. In anſwer to this, both houſes joined in an addreſs, declaring their indignation and abhorrence of the deſign formed in favour of a popiſh Pretender; and aſſuring his majeſty that they would, with the warmeſt zeal and unanimity, take ſuch meaſures as would enable him to fruſtrate and defeat ſo inſolent an attempt. Addreſſes of the ſame kind were preſented by the city of London, both univerſities, the principal towns of Great Britain, the clergy, the diſſenting miniſters, the quakers, and almoſt all the corporations and communities in the kingdom. The 6000 auxiliaries, which the ſtates-general were by treaty obliged to furniſh on ſuch occaſions, were now demanded, and granted with great alacrity and expedition. Orders were alſo ſent to bring over 6000 of the Britiſh troops from Flanders, in caſe the invaſion ſhould actually take place. A proclamation was iſſued for putting the laws in execution againſt papiſts and nonjurors, who were commanded to retire ten miles from London; and, in ſhort, every precaution was taken that had any tendency towards preſerving the public tranquillity.

In the mean time the French went on with their preparations for the embarkation of their forces; and 7000 went on board at Dunkirk, while M. Roquefeuille attempted to get up the channel; but ſtopping near the Iſle of Wight, he was informed that the Engliſh ſquadron had deſerted their ſtation. He ſent Mr. De Barreil, his ſecond in command, with two ſhips of the line, to haſten the embarkation at Dunkirk: while he ſet ſail with the reſt of the fleet, and came to an anchor at a place called Dungenneſs, eighteen miles ſouth-weſt of Dover.

Sir John Norris, who had received information concerning the French fleet, ſet ſail from the Downs, and would have come up with them, had not the wind ſhifted about, ſo that he was obliged to caſt anchor within two leagues of the enemy. This induced the French admiral to call a council of war, and the reſult of it was, that they were to ſail home to their own coaſt, becauſe they had not force ſufficient to oppoſe the Engliſh. Accordingly, they weighed anchor; and a hard gale ſpringing up, they arrived off Cape Barfleur in a very ſhattered condition. The tranſports in particular were ſo much diſtreſſed for want of neceſſary proviſions, that many of the men were ſo extremely ſick that they were obliged to be landed; and this mighty armament, which had made ſo much noiſe, ended in nothing. The Engliſh remained maſters of the ſeas; and Sir John Norris returned with his ſquadron to the Downs, from whence he detached ſeveral ſhips to annoy the enemy. The Pretender, who, a few weeks before ſuppoſed he ſhould be able to make himſelf maſter of England by conqueſt, was obliged to return to Rome; for the court of France, whoſe tool he was, looked upon him in a very cold and indifferent manner.

The ſuſpicion of danger, in conſequence of a foreign invaſion, induced the parliament to ſet aſide the Habeas Corpus act; and, in conſequence thereof, ſeveral perſons of diſtinction were taken into cuſtody; but no proof of their guilt appearing, the court of King's-bench admitted them to bail, and they were ſoon after diſcharged.

The French king, finding all his ſchemes rendered abortive, declared war againſt Great Britain on the 20th of March. On the 31ſt of the ſame month his Britannic majeſty publiſhed a counter-declaration of war, to the great joy of the people, who had long beheld with indignation the inſults daily offered to the Britiſh flag. About the ſame time the French alſo declared war againſt the queen of Hungary; ſo that nothing was to be ſeen but preparations for taking the field as early as poſſible.

On the 3d of April his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and, in a moſt pathetic ſpeech, informed them, that, with reſpect to the event of the war, and the ſupport of his faithful and loyal ſubjects, he depended on the divine providence. He told them, that he had not drawn the ſword till forced to it; and that, as he had but one intereſt with his people, ſo he depended upon them for ſupport.

Affectionate and loyal addreſſes were preſented by both houſes to his majeſty; and a bill was brought in to make it high-treaſon in any Britiſh ſubject to correſpond with the Pretender. This bill having paſſed in the houſe of commons, was carried to the upper houſe, where the lord-chancellor Hardwicke moved, that an amendment ſhould be made, by extending the act to the natural lives of the Pretender's two ſons. Debates aroſe upon the merits of the amendment; for for it was argued, that however imprudent it might be in Britiſh ſubjects to correſpond with ſuch as had the moſt diſtant claim to the crown, yet it was inconſiſtent with humanity to make it criminal, particularly high-treaſon, the greateſt offence that can be committed in the eye of the law. It paſſed, however, by a ſmall majority, though not till eighteen lords had entered a proteſt againſt it: and when it was ſent down to the commons, great oppoſition was made to the amendment by thoſe who had framed the bill; but the court party carried it, and ſoon after it received the royal aſſent.

On the 15th of May the king put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he returned both houſes thanks for the many demonſtrations they had given him, during the courſe of it, of their good affections, and of their zeal for the ſupport of his government. He obſerved, that the great preparations made by France on the ſide of the Auſtrian Netherlands muſt convince all Europe of the ambitious and deſtructive views of that crown in the beginning of the preſent war: that it ſhould be his care, in conjunction with his allies, to purſue the moſt proper means to diſappoint theſe deſigns, and to proſecute the war in ſuch a manner as might be moſt effectual for obtaining a ſafe and honourable peace: that his good friends the ſtates-general had already, in purſuance of his requiſition, agreed to furniſh ſuccours ſtipulated by treaties, and had given the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of their ſenſe, not only of the common danger, but alſo of the inſeparable connection of their intereſts with thoſe of Great Britain, a diſpoſition which he would not fail to improve to the general good of the common cauſe: that he hoped the members of both houſes, on their return to their reſpective counties, would be particularly careful to preſerve the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom, eſpecially at this critical conjuncture, when they were called upon by every motive of duty and intereſt to cheriſh a more than ordinary zeal for the maintenance and defence of their religion and liberty againſt the malicious deſigns of their enemies.

During the ſitting of parliament, the fleet under the command of admiral Matthews had been ſtrongly for he had no leſs than 40 veſſels, 28 of which were of the line. On board of theſe were 15,000 ſeamen, with 800 men drawn from the garriſons in Minorca. The French and Spaniſh fleets had been, for a conſiderable time, blocked up in the harbour of Toulon; but the queen of Spain, who could ſet no bounds to her ambition, ſtirred up the French to give abſolute orders for their admirals to engage. Accordingly an expreſs was diſpatched to Toulon; and on the 9th of February this year the combined fleet came out of the harbour; and admiral Matthews, who had watched all their motions, made the neceſſary preparations to attack them. Leſtock commanded the left wing, or rear; Rowley the right, or van; and Matthews the center. But the wind dying away, they were obliged to come to an anchor. Next day, towards the evening, both fleets came very near to each other; but neither the French or Spaniſh admirals ſeemed willing to engage, becauſe of the ſuperior force of the Engliſh However, the admiral reſolved to loſe no time, and therefore gave orders for a general attack; but Leſtock kept back his ſhips, and ſuffered four of the Spaniſh ones to paſs him. The captains Hawke, Cornwall, Oſborne, and Forbes, behaved with the moſt unparalleled bravery; but ſome of the other captains acted in ſuch a manner, as to be a diſhonour to their country. Captain Cornwall commanded the Marlborough; and, after reducing the Real, the Spaniſh admiral's ſhip, to a perfect wreck, had both his legs ſhot off, and at laſt was killed by one of the enemy's chain-ſhot. The command having devolved upon the firſt lieutenant, the ſhip continued to fight till near five in the evening, when ſhe was towed out of the fleet as unfit for action. The Royal Philip, another Spaniſh ſhip, was ſo much diſabled, that admiral Matthews ordered one of the fire-ſhips to burn her. Theſe fire-ſhips are filled with gunpowder and other combuſtibles, with grappling irons on the fronts and ſides, which fix them to the enemy's ſhips; and then the ſailors getting into boats ſet fire to them, when all blow up together. It is the conſtant practice to ſend one of the large ſhips to protect the fire ſhip from being blown up by the enemy; and Matthews took that precaution, but the captain did not obey his orders. In the mean time the brave captain Mackay, who commanded the fire-ſhip, though unſupported by any veſſel whatever, continued to advance; and Leſtock having ſuffered the Spaniards to advance, Mackay ſaw his deſtruction inevitable, and therefore reſolved to loſe his life in the deſtruction of the Royal Philip. In conſequence of that deſperate reſolution, he got up along-ſide of the Spaniſh admiral's ſhip, and lighting a match ſet fire to the combuſtibles, and was blown up, without doing any other damage to the enemy than covering their decks with the wreck. The Namur, in which admiral Matthews was, ſuffered much in this engagement; and had ſhe not been aſſiſted by the brave captain Hawke, in the Berwick, ſhe muſt have been deſtroyed. Hawke took one of the Spaniſh ſhips of the line; but ſhe was the next day retaken by the French, who finding that ſhe was not fit for ſervice, burnt her. Towards the evening, the French admiral, M. de Court, attacked that part of the fleet under the command of Rowley; and although Leſtock was witneſs to this, yet he did not ſo much as offer him the leaſt aſſiſtance. Night coming on, the firing ceaſed; but next morning, Matthews ſeeing the enemy to the leeward, continued in purſuit of them till dark. In the morning the enemy's ſhips were diſcovered from the top-maſt-head, and Leſtock was ſent in purſuit of them; but before he could come up with them, Matthews gave the ſignal for him to deſiſt, and ſteered for the iſland of Minorca. The Spaniſh fleet, under the command of Don Navarro, got into the harbour of Carthagena, and that of the French into Alicant.

As ſoon as Matthews arrived in Minorca, he deprived Leſtock of his command, and ſent him a priſoner to England. The public were much divided in their opinions concerning the conduct of the two commanders; but certain it is they were men that, from motives of private reſentment, ſacrificed the public intereſt; ſo that, notwithſtanding the vaſt expence the nation had been at in fitting out the fleet, and after many brave men had been killed, no advantages were reaped from an engagement which, if rightly conducted, would have been the deſtruction of the Spaniſh and French navies. Matthews having reſigned his command of the fleet to admiral Rowley, and coming to England, was put under an arreſt by order of the government. A committee of the houſe of commons was appointed to enquire into his conduct, and that of admiral Leſtock; but they not being properly acquainted with the import of ſea-terms, nor the forms of naval engagements, preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, praying that he would iſſue his warrant to a court-martial to try the delinquents. As is cuſtomary in ſuch caſes, many of the evidences were abroad; ſo that the court-martial did not deliver their judgment till the latter end of the year 1746, when Leſtock was, to the great ſurprize of every one, acquitted, and Matthews declared incapable of ever ſerving his majeſty, and all his commiſſions were taken from him. People in general blamed the court-martial, nor is it fully known to this day which of the commanders was moſt deſerving of cenſure. Both were men of courage and abilities, but ſome private reſentment operated ſo ſtrongly on their minds, that no good could be expected from any thing undertaken by them in concert.

A proper regard was paid to thoſe who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the above action. Rear-admiral Rowley, with the captains Forbes, Oſborne, and Hawke, had honours and rewards beſtowed upon them ſuitable to their ſpirit, courage and conduct. A noble monument was erected to the memory of captain Cornwall, in Weſtminſter-abbey, by a vote of the Britiſh parliament, and at the public expence; an honour to which, by his gallant behaviour in this and ſeveral former actions, he was univerſally allowed to be juſtly entitled. Had all the commanders of the Britiſh fleet, during the engagement off Toulon, done their duty equally well, in all probability the Spaniſh ſquadron, if not the French likewiſe, might have been totally deſtroyed, and a glorious end put at once to the war.

The Mediterranean being now in a manner left open, the Spaniards had an opportunity of ſending forces and proviſions to Italy, while Don Philip was ſupplied in the ſame manner by the French. The Sardinian army, which had hitherto only guarded the paſſes of the Alps, had ſent a ſtrong detachment to Nice, and that place being conſidered as of the utmoſt importance, Don Philip and the French general reſolved to attack it. This was one of the boldeſt reſolutions that could have been formed, becauſe in that mountainous country a ſingle batallion can ſtop a whole army; and what was ſtill more, the king of Sardinia had formed a ſtrong camp near Villa Franca, which ſeemed almoſt impregnable.

Towards the latter end of March Don Philip and the prince of Conti, having collected their forces together, croſſed the Var, a river that runs from the Alps, and having taken the city of Nice, they advanced to attack the camp of the king of Sardinia in the midſt of rocks and mountains almoſt inacceſſible. A detachment from the forces on board the Engliſh fleet were ſent to aſſiſt the king of Sardinia; but the French and Spaniards, animated by the example of the two young princes who commanded them, made themſelves maſters of the firſt lines that ſerved as an advanced guard to the batteries of Villa Franca. Every thing gave way to the ardour of the French and Spaniſh troops, and although they loſt above 6,000 men, yet they proceeded from one rock to another, and made priſoner the marquis de Suze, natural brother to the king of Sardinia, and above 3,000 men under his command. Another moſt furious attack was made on Montalban, a ſtrong fort belonging to the king of Sardinia, and taken after an obſtinate reſiſtance; while the remainder of the Piedmonteſe army embarked on board the Engliſh fleet, and were lauded at a town called Oneglia, ſeven miles ſouth-weſt of Genoa, on the 20th of April, after a very tedious and dangerous paſſage.

A paſſage being thus opened into Italy, the Spaniards advanced to Oneglia, from whence the Piedmonteſe troops, under the command of general Sarizan, retreated and encamped at a place called Gareſſio, ſituated among rocks almoſt inacceſſible. But notwithſtanding all the advantages obtained by the French and Spaniards, yet they were in great want of proviſions in a country not capable of cultivation; and the artillery was obliged to be drawn by the ſoldiers. This induced the prince of Conti to propoſe to Don Philip, that, in order to preſerve the army, they muſt endeavour to return to the borders of France; and accordingly, on the 9th of June, all the detached parties being called in, they croſſed the Var, and ſoon after reached the Upper Dauphine, where they ſeparated in order to prepare for entering Italy by Demont, and ſome other paſſes that were then guarded by his Sardinian majeſty, who had taken every proper precaution, and although not an active general, yet diſplayed a large ſhare of military ſkill in oppoſing the enemy.

Early in the morning of the 18th of July, the French and Spaniſh armies, having ſtruck their tents, began to put in practice their intended ſcheme of forcing a paſſage into Italy, in a more advantageous manner than what had been attempted before. The undertaking was one of the moſt hazardous that could have been imagined, the Sardinian troops had every advantage on their ſide; but the French and Spaniards ſurmounted all difficulties, and took the paſs of Monte Cavallo, although defended by a detachment of 1200 men. The French grenadiers leaped into the intrenchments, and by the favour of a fog, which prevented the enemy from diſcovering them, took one redoubt after another, though not without the loſs of near 4,000 men. The king of Sardinia, driven from his ſtrong holds, reſolved to collect all his forces together, and provide for the ſafety of his capital city of Turin. The French and Spaniſh armies, fluſhed with ſucceſs, continued their march through defiles almoſt inacceſſible, and the whole plain country of Piedmont being now laid open to them, they exacted heavy contributions from the people, and enforced the payment of them under the ſevereſt penalties.

Don Philip and the prince of Conti reſolved to attack Coni, a ſtrong fort, about ten leagues ſouth of Turin, and garriſoned by 1200 men, under the command of baron Leutrum, who had taken every neceſſary meaſure to put it in a proper ſtate of defence, ſo as to preſerve it to the laſt extremity. The king of Sardinia having been joined by the forces under general Pallavicini, found himſelf at the head of 36,000 men, and conſcious that if Coni fell into the hands of the enemy, they would ſoon be maſters of Turin, his capital city, reſolved to put the whole upon the hazard of a battle, a ſtep much more conſiſtent with ſound policy, than to remain inactive. Accordingly, he marched to attack them in the entrenchments they had thrown up before the walls of Coni, but found it impracticable to bring them to a general engagement. The ſeaſon of the year, however, ſeconded his operations; for the French and Spaniſh armies had ſuffered ſo much, that they were obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and march back to Dauphine, leaving their ſick and wounded behind them to the mercy of the Piedmonteſe, and the whole country in the poſſeſſion of his Sardinian majeſty.

In the mean time prince Lobkowitz carried on the war againſt the Spaniards in the morei nterior parts of Italy; and the king of Naples, having thrown off the maſk, declared that he would aſſiſt his father the king of Spain; becauſe, as he alledged, he had been treated in a very illegal manner by the courts of London and Vienna. He inſinuated farther, that the queen of Hungary had attempted to raiſe an inſurrection in his dominions, and that prince Lobkowitz was to aſſiſt in driving him out of his hereditary dominions. The army under count Gages had marched towards the Neopolitan territories, while the Auſtrians marched towards Rome; and it was reſolved by the king of Naples, that both ſhould come to a general engagement: accordingly, they came in ſight of each other in the neighbourhood of Velletri, about twenty-ſeven miles eaſt of Rome, where they threw up entrenchments.

Both armies, for ſome time, remained inactive; but prince Lobkowitz, having received intelligence that one wing of the Spaniſh army was quite uncovered, reſolved to ſurprize it and ſeize on their head quarters in the town of Velletri, where their ammunition was kept. This project was executed in a very artful manner; for about midnight count Brown, having been ſent at the head of 6,000 Auſtrians, forced the advanced guards, and entering the town, put all thoſe who oppoſed him to the ſword, while ſuch as ſubmitted were made priſoners of war. The king of Naples and the duke of Modena narrowly eſcaped being taken; but count Brown being afraid that his retreat would be cut off, marched out of the town, ſo that no beneficial conſequences flowed from an enterprize ſo hazardous in its own nature, and ſo well conducted. As moſt of the Auſtrian ſoldiers had been taken from cold countries, ſo the climate of Italy did not agree with their conſtitution. The heat at autumn deſtroyed them in great numbers, and prince Lobkowitz, who imagined himſelf on the eve of victory, found his army daily decreaſing. Count de Gages, who from the whole of his conduct ſeems to have been a very experienced general, reſolved to avail himſelf of the diſtreſſed condition of the Auſtrian army; and therefore, as ſoon as he heard that they had marched from Velletri, he reſolved to haraſs them as much as poſſible. Accordingly, he ſtruck his tents; and coming up with the Auſtrians under the walls of Rome, where part of them had croſſed the Tiber, and broke down the bridges, a ſmart engagement enſued, in which the Auſtrians were the greateſt ſufferers: at the ſame time, great numbers of their ſoldiers deſerted, ſo that the prince's army was reduced to a handful of men; but notwithſtanding, he made good his retreat, amidſt a thouſand difficulties. At Gabbio, in the territory of Bologna, he received information that the French and Spaniſh troops had been driven out of Italy; which gave freſh ſpirits to the forces under his command; and he put them into winter-quarters in the neighbourhood of Imola, about 180 miles north-weſt of Rome; while the count de Gages, unable to purſue him any farther, retired to Viterbo, on the eaſt of Rome, and the winter was ſpent in making preparations for another campaign.

In Germany, the emperor ſaw himſelf ſtripped of every thing, and reduced to the neceſſity of living on a penſion from France; but even that diſtreſs became came of ſervice to him. Other princes beheld with indignation the inflexible ſpirit of the houſe of Auſtria, that would not hearken to any terms; and therefore the kings of Sweden and Pruſſia, with the elector Palatine, entered into a confederacy with France, in order to ſupport the emperor, and trouble the queen of Hungary. A declaration of their intentions was publiſhed, with this view, that the people of England, ſeeing ſuch a confederacy formed againſt the queen of Hungary, might be induced to withdraw from her any farther aſſiſtance. The king of Pruſſia ſent an order to his ambaſſador at London to remonſtrate to our court on the impropriety of diſtreſſing the head of the empire, and granting too much power to the houſe of Auſtria. This memorial was publiſhed in all our news-papers, and it convinced our miniſtry that the king of Pruſſia was well acquainted with the ſtate of parties in England.

The king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, reſolved to avail himſelf of the convention that had been formed againſt the houſe of Auſtria; and therefore he entered into an agreement with the queen of Hungary, to furniſh her with 30,000 men. In return, the queen was to give him a part of Sileſia, to which he laid claim by an antient title; for all the German princes have claims, or at leaſt pretend to have, to each other's territories. But money was another motive with the king of Poland: he demanded a conſiderable ſubſidy from Britain; but it was thought unreaſonable that the whole expence ſhould be defrayed by the Engliſh. Application was therefore made to the States-General, who promiſed to contribute one third of the ſame; but that proportion being deemed too ſmall, it was agreed that they ſhould pay two thirds of the ſubſidy.

During theſe tranſactions, the French had aſſembled an army of 120,000 men in the Netherlands, provided with a very formidable train of artillery, under the command of the marſhal de Noailles and count Saxe. As ſoon as Lewis heard that his army was aſſembled, he ſet out from Paris, in order to be preſent during the campaign; for, from a variety of concurring circumſtances, he flattered himſelf with diſtinguiſhed ſucceſs. On the 4th of May he reviewed his army at Liſle, and made ſeveral regulations relating to military diſcipline, which for ſome time had been greatly neglected.

The confederate army, compoſed of Britiſh, Dutch, Hanoverians, Heſſians and Auſtrians, amounting to about 76,000 encamped in the neighbourhood of Bruſſels, under the command of three different generals. Marſhal Wade commanded the Engliſh and Hanoverians; the duke of Aremberg had the command of the Hungarians; and the Dutch under count Maurice of Naſſau. Theſe three generals were greatly eſteemed by their reſpective ſovereigns. Wade had been brought up under the great duke of Marlborough; Aremberg had ſerved in many campaigns with prince Eugene; and count Maurice was deſcended from thoſe heroes who had eſtabliſhed the liberty of the united provinces. The only thing that tended towards retarding the progreſs of the allies, was the conduct of the Dutch: for although they had taken the field, yet they were rather unwilling to engage; and therefore ſent count de Waſſenaer to Lewis, to expoſtulate with him on the terrors they were under, becauſe of his army being ſo near the frontiers of their provinces. But the French king told the Dutch miniſter, that he had long borne with the inſults of his enemies; but as his indulgence had only emboldened them in their deſigns againſt him, he was determined not to hearken to any terms, but to proſecute the war with the utmoſt vigour.

The city of Courtray ſurrendered at the approach of the French; and Menin, one of the Dutch frontier towns, in which was a garriſon of 1500 men, was taken, after a ſiege of four days, and both ſoldiers and officers made priſoners of war. Thirty thouſand French, under the command of count Clermont, attacked Ypres, in which was a garriſon of 2500 men, commanded by the prince of Heſſe Philipſthal. The ſiege of this city began on the firſt of June, and continued till the 14th, when moſt of the outworks being taken, the governor was forced to capitulate. This important event opened a way for the French to penetrate into the center of the Auſtrian Netherlands, where the garriſons ſurrendered almoſt as ſoon as attacked.

The confederates could not ſtop the progreſs of the French; and their generals beheld their towns taken, one after another, without being able to give them any aſſiſtance. The French king made his public entry into Dunkirk in the moſt pompous manner, imagining that every thing would give way to his arms; but news was brought him, that prince Charles of Lorrain had croſſed the Rhine in ſight of the French army, at the head of 70,000 men; and had entered Alſace, after taking poſſeſſion of the important paſs of Lauterburg.

The effecting a paſſage over the Rhine did Charles the greateſt honour, and aſtoniſhed all Europe, it being looked upon as next to impoſſible; but the activity of the prince, and the perſeverance of his troops, ſurmounted every difficulty. Marſhal Coigni, who commanded the French army on the Rhine, ſaw with aſtoniſhment the Auſtrians in poſſeſſion of Alſace, and the whole province of Lorrain laid open to prince Charles. He ſaw no other means left but that of cutting his way through the enemy, which he attempted, and a bloody battle enſued; but the French were defeated, and obliged to return to their former ſtation; while flying parties infeſted the neighbourhood of Lorrain; and king Staniſlaus, with his whole court, was obliged to retire from his capital city of Nancy.

When news of this was brought to the French king, he did not heſitate one moment concerning the proper ſteps to be taken; but leaving an army of 40,000 men, under the command of marſhal Saxe, to protect his new conqueſts in Flanders, he ſet out to join his army on the Rhine, accompanied by the marſhal de Noailles, at the head of above 50,000 men. Upon his arrival at Metz, in Lorrain, he received information that an event of the utmoſt importance had taken place, and drawn the attention of prince Charles to another part. The king of Pruſſia marched through Saxony into Bohemia, at the head of 84,000 men, and a large train of artillery. On the frontiers of Bohemia he was joined by 20,000 men from Sileſia; and on the 25th of Auguſt he eſtabliſhed his head-quarters at Peterſwald, where he publiſhed a manifeſto, in order to juſtify his conduct, in having taken up arms againſt the houſe of Auſtria.

After cauſing ſeveral copies of this memorial to be diſperſed, he continued his march to Prague, which he inveſted; and having taken one fortification after another, the commander, General Ogilvy, ſurrendered, and 15,000 men were made priſoners of war. Having placed a garriſon of 6000 men in Prague, he left that city, and reduced ſeveral other places in Bohemia.

As ſoon as the court of Vienna was informed of theſe tranſactions, orders were immediately diſpatched to prince Charles to repaſs the Rhine, which he did in ſight of the French army, although they were much ſuperior to him in number. This circumſtance being communicated to the king of Pruſſia, he complained bitterly of the French generals for not oppoſing him; but he only received evaſive anſwers.

In the mean time, prince Charles having been reinforced by 20,000 Saxons, and a conſiderable number of Auſtrians under the command of general Bathiani, reſolved to attack the Pruſſian monarch, well knowing that he was too far diſtant from his own territories to procure new reinforcements. Indeed, the king was ſenſible that it was not in his power to ſtand his ground in Bohemia; and therefore, having abandoned all the paſſes leading to Prague, he entered that city, to which he was cloſely purſued by the Auſtrians. On the 19th of November he marched from Prague, leaving behind him his whole train of artillery; and ſo much did the Auſtrians haraſs his fatigued troops, and ſuch was the ſeverity of the ſeaſon, that many died; and when he arrived in Sileſia, the greateſt part of the army were naked. Having diſtributed them into winter quarters, he returned to Berlin, mortified with his diſappointment, and filled with indignation againſt the French ſtate.

During theſe tranſactions count Seckendorff had driven the Auſtrians out of Bavaria; and on the 22d of October the emperor entered his capital city of Munich. The French marſhals Belleiſle, Noailles, and Coigni, were at the head of 80,000 men; and on the firſt of September they inveſted the city of Friburg, a place of great ſtrength, and ſtill greater importance, as it opened a paſſage into the circle of Suabia. The French king arrived at Friburg on the 11th of October, immediately on which the trenches were opened, and the garriſon made a vigorous defence; but the ſuperior power and knowledge of the French overcame every obſtacle, and the place was ſurrendered on the 28th of November, all the ſoldiers having been made priſoners of war.

Though this was a moſt valuable acquiſition to the French, yet it was dearly purchaſed, for they loſt upwards of 18,000 men. In the arſenal they found 300 pieces of cannon, 72 field-pieces, and 200 mortars, with a ſuitable proportion of all ſorts of artillery and ammunition.

This conqueſt terminated the campaign in Germany. The French army was cantoned along the banks of the Rhine, under the command of marſhal Maillebois; and Lewis returned to Verſailles, where he was received by his ſubjects with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy.

In Flanders, the allies finding that the greateſt part of the French army had been obliged to march to the Higher Germany, reſolved to take advantage of their abſence: and accordingly, having croſſed the Scheld, a river that runs through great part of the Netherlands, they attempted to force marſhal Saxe to come to an engagement; but that general, ever cautious where he ſaw the leaſt appearance of danger, kept himſelf behind his trenches, waiting for a more favourable opportunity.

The allied army finding they could not bring marſhal Saxe to an engagement, filed off towards Liſle, the capital of French Flanders, which they might have taken, but they neglected ſo valuable an opportunity, for which the conduct of the generals was ſeverely cenſured in England. The truth is, the generals were divided in their opinions: Wade was too indolent to conduct any enterprize that required courage: the duke de Aremberg was afraid of giving umbrage to the French king, becauſe great part of his eſtate lay in France; and the Dutch generals were as inactive as if they had not had any connection in the war.

Nothing of any importance was performed, during this year, by the Britiſh ſquadron in the Mediterranean. It is therefore neceſſary to turn our thoughts to commodore Anſon, who was, toward the cloſe of the year 1740, ſent on an expedition into the South-ſeas, in order to diſtreſs the enemy in that part of the world.

The ſecret of this expedition appears to have been ſo ill kept, that the Spaniards were appriſed of all the particulars concerning it long before Anſon ſailed from England; and had fitted out a ſquadron of five ſail of the line, and two frigates, under the command of admiral Don Joſeph Pizarro, on purpoſe to defeat it. Had this fleet, which was every way ſuperior to Mr. Anſon's, been able to have performed its voyage, the ſucceſs of that officer might have been very indifferent; but by various accidents the whole of the Spaniſh armament was reduced to one 60 gun ſhip, which was at length obliged to return to Europe.

In the month of January, 1741, commodore Anſon arrived in the bay of St. Julian, on the coaſt of Patagonia, where he called a council of war, in order to conſult on the moſt proper methods to be uſed for diſtreſſing the enemy.

From St. Julian the commodore ſailed to the Streights of La Maire, where he loſt ſight of the Severn and the Pearl, two of his ſhips: nor did he ever ſee them again during the remainder of his voyage; for they were ſo much ſhattered, that they were obliged to return to the Brazils to refit, and from thence they ſailed for Europe. This induced the commodore to ſail to the iſland of Juan Fernandez, where ſuch of the men as had been long afflicted with the ſcurvy recovered in a moſt ſurprizing manner; that ſmall place being eſteemed one of the moſt healthy in the univerſe. The Wager, a ſhip of 20 guns, belonging to Anſon's ſquadron, having been driven on the iſland of Socoro, the crew mutinied, and confined the captain, after which they converted the long-boat into a ſchooner, in which they ſet ſail for the Brazils, where they arrived in the month of January, 1742. The captain, with ſuch of the men as had continued firm in his intereſt, had the good fortune to get on board a veſſel that carried them to Chiloi, and from thence to St. Jago, the capital of Chili, where they remained till there was a cartel for the exchange of priſoners, when they were ſent home to England.

The commodore was now reduced to a moſt ſhocking condition, in a part of the world where he could not procure any aſſiſtance; and his ſmall fleet conſiſted of no more than three ſhips, namely, the Centurion, the Glouceſter, and the Anna, which laſt was loaded with proviſions. But that fortitude and preſence of mind that ſeemed to be the particular characteriſtic of Mr. Anſon, never forſook him, even in the midſt of the greateſt dangers. He reſolved to attack the city of Paita, where the Spaniards had a large ſum of money, which they intended to ſend to Europe; and accordingly, he ordered his lieutenant, Mr. Brett, to land in the night, with only fifty-eight men; all which was accompliſhed without their being perceived by the enemy. Such was the conſternation among the inhabitants, who imagined that a great army was landed among them, that, with the governor, they abandoned the place in the utmoſt confuſion; while the Engliſh ſailors ſeized on all the treaſure, which they conveyed to their ſhips; and then the commodore ſent ſome more of his hands on ſhore, who ſet fire to the town, and reduced it to an heap of aſhes.

This was a moſt fatal ſtroke to the Spaniards, whoſe loſs amounted to above 1,500,000 dollars: and the commodore having weighed anchor, ſet ſail for the coaſts of Mexico and California. His deſign was to intercept the Manilla galleon, which he knew was then at ſea, and deſtined for the harbour of Acapulco; but it was the 19th of February before Mr. Anſon could get into the bay of Mexico. When he arrived there, he had the mortification to learn, that the Manilla ſhip had got into the harbour of Acapulco on the ninth of January, and that ſhe was to have ſailed ſoon after; but no ſooner had the Spaniſh governor learned that an Engliſh ſquadron was in thoſe ſeas, than he gave orders to countermand the ſailing of the ſhip; ſo that the commodore ſaw no other method left to ſave his ſhips, than to croſs the vaſt Pacific ocean, for the river of Canton in China. The Centurion and Glouceſter were all the ſhips he had now left; for although he had taken ſeveral prizes, yet not having ſufficient hands to navigate them in a proper manner, they were obliged to be ſunk; while the Glouceſter, ſoon after, having ſprung a leak, was obliged to be ſet on fire; ſo that there remained none but the Centurion.

The hardſhips which the crew of the Centurion ſuffered are almoſt beyond conception; for ſo many of the men were afflicted with the ſcurvy, that there was ſcarce a ſufficient number left to do the neceſſary duty. At laſt they made for the iſland of Tinian, in the vaſt Pacific ocean, where moſt of the crew recovered, but the whole number amounted to no more than 71. Having taken in all ſorts of neceſſary proviſions, the commodore once more put to ſea, and arrived in the river of Canton in China on the 12th day of November, after having ſuffered every thing that human nature could ſuſtain. The governor of Canton ſent an order to him, demanding the cuſtomary fees paid by all ſhips coming into that river: but he maintained the honour of the Britiſh flag, and inſiſted that he would never comply with any ſuch terms. The governor was amazed when he heard in what a cool and deliberate manner the commodore delivered his anſwer; and ſending for him on ſhore, they had a long conference together, the reſult of which was, that aſſiſtance was granted him to refit his ſhip, and take in proper proviſions.

On the 15th of April, 1743, Anſon left China, with a fixed reſolution of ſailing in queſt of one or more of the Manilla ſhips; and towards the latter end of May arrived off Cape Eſpiritu Santo, in the iſland of Samal Mare, where the Manilla ſhips always paſs in their voyage to Europe. There he lay by for ſome time; but on the 20th of June one of thoſe rich veſſels made her appearance, which added freſh ſpirits to the crew of the Centurion. The Spaniſh captain reſolved not to give up his prize, and, accordingly, a warm engagement enſued; but the ſuperior ſkill and undaunted courage of the Engliſh overcame every oppoſition: and although 67 of the Spaniards were killed, yet commodore Anſon loſt only two men.

With this rich prize the commodore returned to Canton, where he refitted his ſhip; and being willing to taſte the ſweets of his native country, from which he had been ſo long excluded, he ſet ſail for Europe, and on the 11th of March, 1744, arrived ſafe at the Cape of Good Hope. From thence he ſailed for England, and on the 9th of June arrived ſafe at Spithead. The treaſure was landed at Portſmouth, from whence it was conducted to London by thoſe brave ſeamen who had taken it.

Some other naval events took place during the courſe of this year. On the 18th of June Sir Charles Hardy ſailed with a ſquadron of eleven ſhips of the line, and one bomb-ketch, having under his convoy a conſiderable number of veſſels laden with ſtores and proviſions for the fleet in the Mediterranean. Sir Charles conducted his convoy ſafe to Liſbon, where he was detained a conſiderable time by a ſquadron of fourteen ſail of the line and ſix frigates, commanded by M. Rochambault, and ſent from Breſt to cruize off the rock of Liſbon, and intercept Sir Charles if he offered to put to ſea. The Britiſh miniſtry no ſooner received intelligence of this, than they ordered Sir John Balchen, who commanded a large fleet at Spithead to ſail with the firſt favourable wind, and proceed in queſt of the Breſt ſquadron. Before theſe orders could be put into execution Sir John was reinforced by a Dutch ſquadron of 20 men of war, commanded by admiral Bacchereſt, which their high mightineſſes had at length conſented to ſend, agreeable to the treaty of 1697. On the 7th of Auguſt the combined fleets ſailed from Spithead, conſiſting of 21 ſail of the line, and on the 9th of September arrived off the rock of Liſbon. M. Rochambault, finding this combined fleet ſo much ſuperior to him in force, thought proper to quit his ſtation, leaving Sir Charles Hardy at liberty to proceed according to his deſtination, and Sir John Balchen ſailed again for England; but, on the 3d of October, he was overtaken in the Bay of Biſcay, by a violent ſtorm of wind, in which his own ſhip the Victory, of 110 guns, was loſt on the rocks of Alderney, commonly called the Caſkets, and this brave commander, with all his officers, volunteers, and crew, amounting to 1100 picked ſeaman, periſhed. The reſt of the fleet with great difficulty eſcaped the fury of the ſtorm, and got ſafe to Spithead.

Another ſquadron, under the command of commodore Warren, was ſtationed to protect the leeward iſlands; and, in conſequence thereof, the French ſhips deſtined with proviſions for the iſland of Martinico, were taken, and the inhabitants reduced to the greateſt diſtreſs. In general, the Britiſh cruiſers were extremely fortunate; and although ſome of them were taken, yet, at the concluſion of the year, the balance in our favour againſt Spain amounted to 1,900,000l. and againſt France, 770,000l.*

The parliament met on the 28th of November; and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty with a ſpeech, in which he informed them, that although nothing of importance, in favour of the allies, had happened, yet he was determined, in conſequence of the aſſiſtance of his parliament, to proſecute the war with the utmoſt vigour. He told them, that nothing could ſo much contribute towards promoting the public tranquillity, as unanimity among the members: and concluded by recommending to them the obligations they were under to raiſe the proper ſupplies.

Both lords and commons voted that a loyal addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty; which being done, he gave to each a moſt gracious anſwer.

The meeting of the parliament produced a conſiderable change in the miniſtry; for the patriots were ſo clamarous againſt lord Carteret, now become earl Granville, in conſequence of his mother's death, that he reſigned all his places; and the duke of Bedford was appointed firſt lord of the treaſury; the ſeals were given to the earl of Harrington, as ſecretary of ſtate; the privy ſeal to lord Gower: the earl of Cheſterfield was ſent over to the Hague, to prevail with the ſtates-general to act more heartily in ſupport of the common cauſe; and, upon his return, he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke of Dorſet was made preſident of the council, the duke of Devonſhire ſteward of the houſhold; and Mr. Doddington treaſurer of the navy†.

* The greateſt misfortune that befel the Engliſh this year at ſea aroſe from a dreadful hurricane, which happened on the 20th of October, in the iſland of Jamaica, by which ſix ſhips of war, and near 100 merchantmen, were totally deſtroyed; and the greater part of the crews periſhed.

A. D. 1745. The moſt perfect harmony now ſubſiſted in both houſes of parliament. During the whole ſeſſion there was ſcarcely a diviſion heard of, and nothing was wanting on the part of the new miniſtry to convince his majeſty that they were determined to carry on the war with vigour. New levies for land and ſea were ordered, and the commons voted ſix millions and a half for the ſervice of the current year; to be raiſed by the land, the malt, and ſalt taxes, the ſinking fund, and an additional duty on foreign wines.

The king now informed his parliament, "That he had concluded a treaty of quadruple alliance, in conjunction with the queen of Hungary and the ſtates-general. By which the king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, confirmed and renewed the guarantee of the pragmatic ſanction, and promiſed to ſupport it with all his forces: that it was farther ſtipulated, as the kingdom of Bohemia was actually attacked, his Poliſh majeſty ſhould ſend to its defence an army of 30,000 auxiliary troops: that his Britannic majeſty and the ſtates-general ſhould pay to that prince an annual ſubſidy of 150,000l. ſterling; two thirds to be furniſhed by Great Britain, and one third by the United Provinces: that as ſoon as Bohemia and Saxony ſhould be free from danger, his Poliſh majeſty ſhould march 10,000 men to the Netherlands, or to any other place within the empire, which the king of Great Britain and the ſtates-general ſhould think moſt proper; for which a ſubſidy of 90,000l. ſhould be continued, to be paid according to the former proportions: that if, in conſequence of theſe meaſures, his Poliſh majeſty ſhould draw a war upon himſelf, he ſhould be ſupported by all his allies: that no peace ſhould be made without his conſent, and without procuring for him proper ſatisfaction; and that the empreſs of Ruſſia, the republic of Poland, and all the other powers of Europe ſhould be invited to accede to this treaty, which was to continue after the war was concluded."

On the 12th of March ‡ his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, his majeſty's youngeſt ſon, was appointed commander in chief of the Britiſh forces. This choice of a prince brought up in the army, and who had, on many occaſions, teſtified proofs of his courage, gave great ſatisfaction to the people in general. In the beginning of March his royal highneſs ſet out for Flanders.

The parliamentary buſineſs being diſpatched, his majeſty, on the 2d of May, went to the houſe of peers, and having ſigned ſeveral excellent bills, prorogued the parliament; and the next day he embarked at Graveſend, in order to viſit his German dominions.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the French were daily gaining ground; and, notwithſtanding ſome conſiderable loſſes, yet they ſeemed to riſe ſuperior to them. The queen of Hungary was much reduced, in conſequence of having ſpent great ſums in ſupporting her army; ſo that the eyes of all Europe were turned upon the event of the war. But many of the plans formed by the contending parties were near being diſconcerted, in conſequence of the death of Charles VII. emperor of Germany, and elector of Bavaria. That monarch, who had been advanced to the imperial dignity by the intrigues of the French, enjoyed little more than the name of emperor; and it may juſtly be ſaid of him, that he died of a broken heart. He had ſeen himſelf neglected, and even deſpiſed, by thoſe who, conſiſtent with the faith of treaties, were bound to ſtand by him. His hereditary dominions were wreſted from him; his enemies triumphed over him in every quarter: he ſaw his family on the brink of ruin; and, unable to ſuſtain the weight of his ſufferings, he ſunk under the load, and died, leaving to ſucceeding monarchs a ſtriking leſſon, never to let ambition blind their underſtanding, to truſt in thoſe in whom no confidence ought to be placed. When he was buried, the globe was carried before him, as if he had been the ſovereign of the whole world, although he had ſcarce a houſe, wherein he could reſt in ſafety.

As the late emperor had, in a great meaſure, been the cauſe of the war, the people in general were induced to hope that his death would reſtore peace to Europe; but the Engliſh miniſtry refuſed all propoſals of accommodation, thinking that they would have it in their power to diſtreſs the French, by carrying on the war in the moſt vigorous manner. The French, in order to play off their old game of interfering with the election of an emperor, caſt their eyes on the king of Poland, elector of Saxony; but that prince was perſuaded againſt embarking in ſuch a dangerous ſcheme, by his miniſter, count Bruhl who repreſented to him, that the Poles would never ſubmit to an emperor of Germany, leſt he ſhould deprive them of their privileges: and as the intereſt of the grand duke was very great, ſo, by an act of ſo imprudent a nature, he might even loſe his hereditary dominions. All theſe arguments were enforced from the example of the late emperor; and therefore the king of Poland, inſtead of aſpiring to the imperial crown, did every thing he could to place it on the head of the grand duke.

The next object that France had in view was, to raiſe the king of Pruſſia to the empire; but he was ſo well convinced of their perfidy, that he treated all their propoſals of that nature with the moſt ſovereign contempt. On the other hand, the queen of Hungary, who had ſtill ſome hopes of recovering Sileſia, would hearken to no terms of accommodation; and in that ſhe was ſtrongly encouraged by the Engliſh miniſtry, who made her the moſt liberal promiſes, that nothing ſhould be wanting to enable her to regain ſuch of her territories as had been ſeiſed by the French, and, at the ſame time, to raiſe her huſband, the grand duke, to the imperial throne.

† The two following circumſtances, which happened this year, (1744) being rather of a detached nature, we ſhall preſerve them as a note.

On the 18th of October died the celebrated ducheſs of Marlborough, in the 85th year of her age. She was a woman, who, from a very obſcure original, raiſed herſelf, by intriguing with the political parties, to the higheſt ſtation that a ſubject could arrive at. She poſſeſſed great abilities, with an unbounded ambition; but ſo artful in the uſe of money, that ſhe left behind her a moſt princely eſtate. By her death upwards of 30,000l. per ann. came to the duke her grandſon, and near as much to his brother, the Hon. John Spencer. She left 20,000l. to the earl of Cheſterfield, and to William Pitt, Eſq. 10,000l. and about 40,000l. more in legacies. The executors to her will were, the earl of Marchmont, the biſhop of Oxford, Dr. Stephens, and Beverſham Filmer, to each of whom ſhe left 2500l.

On the 2d of December the marſhal de Belleiſle and his brother having, in their journey to the Imperial court, ſtopped at a village, called Elbingrode, belonging to Hanover, of which they were ignorant, a party of the allied army took them both priſoners, and conveyed them to Stradt, from whence they were ſent over to England. They were treated with that reſpect due to their rank; and being on their parole of honour, were ſuffered to reſide at Windſor, and enjoy all ſorts of public diverſions.

‡ In this month died Robert earl of Orford, late prime miniſter, after having enjoyed, for a very ſhort time, a penſion of 4000l. per ann. from the crown in conſideration of his paſt ſervices. This miniſter, though he had long directed the application of the public treaſure, was not remarkable for his riches; for he was of a liberal diſpoſition, and had ſuch a number of rapacious dependents to gratify, that very little was left for himſelf.

The French monarch finding all his propoſals rejected, and not ſeeing the moſt diſtant appearance of putting an end to the war, reſolved to puſh it on, with the utmoſt vigour, in Flanders; and accordingly ſent marſhal Saxe to take upon him the command of the army, conſiſting of about 70,000 men, aſſiſted with a large train of artillery. To animate the troops, he ſoon after ſet out, accompanied by his ſon the dauphin, then about ſixteen years of age, and arrived in Flanders before the two armies could come to a general engagement.

The duke of Cumberland, who was juſt entering into the 24th year of his age, arrived at the Hague on the 7th of April; and having concerted proper meaſures with the ſtates-general, ſet out for Bruſſels, where he found prince Waldeck, general of the Dutch forces, and the count Konigſegg, the commander in chief of the Auſtrians. The duke had made the art of war his ſtudy from his moſt early youth; he was not afraid of the greateſt dangers; and although he knew that the French were ſuperior to him in numbers, yet ſuch was his opinion of the undaunted courage of the Engliſh, that he ſeemed to deſpiſe the French, who were commanded by ſome of the moſt experienced generals of that age. Some of them had ſerved above forty years in the army; they had reduced the art of war to a ſcience; and even the ſubaltern officers were able to conduct any engagement whatever.

Marſhal Saxe, one of the greateſt generals that ever commanded an army, was not ignorant of the youthful ardour of the duke of Cumberland; but at the ſame time, knowing that the troops under him were men of the moſt invincible courage, reſolved to obtain by ſtratagem what he could not in a regular engagement. Accordingly, for ſome days, he marched from one place to another, concealing his real intentions; but, on the 24th day of April, he ſat down before Tournay, a ſtrong city on the river Schelde, defended by a garriſon of 3,000 Dutch troops, under the command of baron Dorth. Tournay had been fortified by the great Vauban, and was eſteemed the ſtrongeſt of all the frontier towns belonging to the Dutch; ſo that the duke of Cumberland imagined, if he could raiſe the ſiege, it would be of the utmoſt ſervice to the common cauſe. Accordingly, he marched from Bruſſels, and on the 29th of April, came within muſket-ſhot of the French army, juſt as marſhal Saxe had expected; for the whole was a ſcheme laid by the French to draw the allies into a ſnare.

The French army was ſtrongly encamped; and between them and the allies was the village of Fontenoy, about three miles ſouth-eaſt of Tournay. On the 28th of April, the French king rode from the city of Douay, and took up his head-quarters at the bridge of Calonne, near the village of St. Antoin, where there was a ſtrong battery of cannon. The bridge of Calonne was guarded by ſeveral battalions, both of regulars and militia; ſo that every precaution was taken by the French, while the allies depended too much on perſonal courage.

The firſt object of the allies was to drive the French from their advanced poſts, which they did with great courage; but this only ſerved to make the enemy more formidable, by being more united. As the allies were now in poſſeſſion of the ground from which they had driven the French, they drew up on it, and a council of war being called, it was reſolved upon by the majority to engage the next morning. This opinion, however, was diſapproved of by the oldeſt generals, who thought it much better to act on the defenſive; but the opinion of the young ones was embraced.

The right wing, compoſed of Engliſh and Hanoverians, was drawn up in four lines, having the village of Vezon in their front. The Dutch, with part of the Auſtrians, compoſed the left wing, conſiſting of three columns, and they advanced into the plain of Fontenoy. Prince Waldeck, with ſome of the beſt Dutch troops, propoſed to attack Fontenoy; and the duke of Cumberland, in order to ſecond the prince, ordered general Ingoldſby to attack a fort near the village of Vezon, on which was a ſtrong battery of cannon. Sir John (afterwards earl) Ligonier, commanded the right wing of the infantry, and Sir James Campbell was ordered to cover him, by extending the cavalry as far as poſſible along the plain of Fontenoy.

The courage of the Britiſh forces on this memorable day is incredible; for at the firſt charge they drove the French beyond their lines, and would have penetrated into the center of their firſt line, had not marſhal Saxe opened a concealed battery, which ſwept off whole ranks at a time. The intrepidity of the Britiſh foot ſtruck the French with amazement; and there is not the leaſt reaſon to doubt, but they would have been maſters of the field, had not ſome particular circumſtances conſpired to deprive them of that glory.

General Ingoldſby was ſo dilatory in attacking the fort at Vezon, that marſhal Saxe had time to ſtrengthen it both with troops and cannon. But the moſt fatal circumſtance aroſe from the cowardice of the Dutch troops under prince Waldeck, for although he led them thrice on to the attack of Fontenoy, yet they as often fled, by which the Auſtrians were left expoſed to the fire of the enemy. Had Ingoldſby taken the fort at Vezon, the French king and his ſon, the dauphin, would have been made priſoners of war. But ſtill the courage of the Engliſh was the moſt ſurprizing that can be imagined. The broken lines were filled up from the rear, and although once put into ſome diſorder, yet when rallied by the duke, they advanced a ſecond time with more ardour than ever. In this manner both armies continued on the firſt day of May, from five in the morning till about three in the afternoon; but the Engliſh, who received no aſſiſtance from the left wing, were dreadfully galled by the enemy, who, in conſequence of the cowardice of the Dutch, took them in front and flank. Their numbers were now greatly reduced, and the French were raiſing a new battery, when orders were given for the allies to retreat. This they performed in ſuch excellent order, that ſome of the French cavalry, who attempted to purſue them, had a whole regiment deſtroyed. Next day the allies marched to Aeth; but ſuch of the brave ſoldiers and officers as had been wounded were obliged to be left to the care of the enemy, who treated them with great humanity.

Such was the deciſion of the memorable battle of Fontenoy, which was of no other ſervice than diſplaying the unfortunate bravery of the Engliſh and Hanoverians; the latter of whom, by their behaviour this day, ſilenced all the charges that had been brought againſt them for their conduct at Dettingen, while the Dutch diſgraced all the glories which they had ſome years before acquired at the battle of Malplaquet, under the famous duke of Marlborough.

In this action the allies loſt two brave generals, namely, Sir James Campbell, and major-general Ponſonby; two colonels, a great number of ſubaltern officers, and about 8,000 men. The loſs of the French cannot be well aſcertained: but it muſt be conſiderable, as ſeven of their generals were killed, and four others died ſoon after of their wounds.

Baron Dorth, the Dutch commander in Tournay, held out that important fortreſs againſt the whole French army till the twenty-firſt day of June, when he was obliged to capitulate, and obtained the moſt honourable terms. A detachment of 4,000 Engliſh and Hanoverians were ſent to reinforce the garriſon in the city of Ghent, but 1000 of them were cut off. At the ſame time the French took the cities of Aeth, Dendermond, Oudenarde, and Newport, with the important town of Oſtend; after which Lewis XV. the French king, returned in triumph to Paris.

All this time the confederate army lay entrenched beyond the canal of Antwerp, for the diſparity between them and the enemy was too diſadvantageous to ſuffer the former to think of giving the leaſt moleſtation to the latter in their acquiſitions.

On the 12th of October his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland left the confederate army, and ſet off on his return to England. The combined forces ſoon after took up their winter quarters, leaving the victorious marſhal Saxe in poſſeſſion of the greateſt part of the Auſtrian Netherlands.

In Germany, the French had ſent an army to the aſſiſtance of the young elector of Bavaria; but the Auſtrians had been ſo ſtrongly reinforced that the elector was obliged to leave his capital city of Munich, and take ſhelter in Augſburgh, while all that his army could do was to act on the defenſive, till ſuch time as reinforcements came to their aſſiſtance.

Count Traun, with an army of 30,000 Auſtrians, marched from Bohemia towards Franckfort, in order to drive out the French, under the command of the prince of Conti; alledging, as a reaſon, that there could not be a free election of an emperor, till all foreign troops were driven out of the empire. Count Bathiani joined count Traun, and the whole Auſtrian army, amounting to near 70,000 men, took the field, and the grand duke having taken upon himſelf the chief command, marched againſt the prince of Conti, and obliged him to repaſs the Rhine with a very great loſs.

The French king being thus driven out of Franckfort, ſeven ambaſſadors from ſo many electors, aſſembled in the Imperial college, to make choice of an emperor; but thoſe of Brandenburgh and the Palatinate were not preſent. The election fell on the grand duke of Tuſcany, huſband to the queen of Hungary; and on the 24th of September, the emperor was crowned with the uſual ceremonies. This important event, ſo much for the benefit of the princes in Germany, was, in a great meaſure, brought about by the unwearied aſſiduity of his Britannic majeſty, who left nothing undone to bring over the electors to the intereſt of the houſe of Auſtria, and prevailed upon the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel to withdraw his troops from the French ſervice, and enter them into Britiſh pay.

The king of Pruſſia, who had ſuffered ſo much the preceding year, would have liſtened to terms of accommodation, eſpecially as he found that he had been deceived by the French; but the houſe of Auſtria rejected every offer. The Auſtrians had taken ſome towns in Sileſia; but no ſooner had the king of Pruſſia learned that his propoſal had been rejected, than his indignation was fired, and all his military ſkill rekindled in his breaſt. On a ſudden he attacked the Auſtrians, and drove them from one poſt to another with great ſlaughter, beſides making many priſoners. At Glatz, 6,000 Pruſſians, under general Lehwald, attacked 12,000 Auſtrians commanded by general Helfrick, and totally defeated them. At Ratiber, 3,000 Auſtrians were made priſoners of war; every thing gave way to the victorious Pruſſians, to the ſurprize of all Europe, people in general imagining that he had been too much diſpirited by his loſſes to have undertaken things of ſuch importance; but there are particular reaſons that call forth great minds to action.

In the month of May, prince Charles of Lorrain being joined by the forces under the command of the prince of Saxe-Weiſſenfells, marched from Bohemia, and encamped on thoſe mountains which ſeparate that kingdom from Sileſia. The king of Pruſſia had taken all the precaution that the greateſt general could uſe, in order to augment his army, and ſecure his garriſons: and about the middle of June he found himſelf at the head of 84,000 men, all diſciplined in the beſt manner, and accuſtomed to the greateſt hardſhips that can be imagined. With theſe men he reſolved to attack prince Charles, who had advanced to Friedburg; and for that purpoſe ordered Du Moulin, his general, to march, at the head of 15,000 men, to make as if he intended to march towards Breſlaw, which was done that prince Charles might be led into a ſnare. This ſtratagem had the deſired effect; for the Auſtrians being taken off their guard, and lulled into ſecurity, the Pruſſians attacked them with ſuch fury, that although prince Charles and the prince of Saxe-Weiſſenfells did all that lay in their power to procure a victory, yet the military abilities of the king of Pruſſia bore down every oppoſition, and the Auſtrians were totally defeated, with the loſs of 5000 men killed, and near 7000 taken priſoners.

His Britannic majeſty was now at Hanover; and afraid that the king of Pruſſia would too much diſtreſs the houſe of Auſtria, entered into a treaty with him, which was concluded at Hanover in the month of Auguſt. By this treaty Great-Britain engaged to ſupport the king of Pruſſia in his conqueſt of Sileſia; but the courts of Vienna and Dreſden having proteſted againſt it, the king of Pruſſia marched into Luſatia, and having taken poſſeſſion of Gorlitz, forced prince Charles of Lorrain to take ſhelter in Bohemia.

About the ſame time the prince of Anhalt-Deſſau, one of the Pruſſian generals, entered Saxony, and made himſelf maſter of the city of Leipſic; while the king of Poland, afraid of being made a priſoner in his capital city, left Dreſden, and took refuge in Prague. Prince Lobkowitz, with a body of Saxons, attempted to force the Pruſſian lines, but he was defeated with great loſs, and Dreſden, the capital of Saxony, was obliged to ſubmit to the victorious king of Pruſſia. The king of Poland ſeeing the Pruſſians in poſſeſſion of his capital, was obliged to make peace on the beſt terms he could, and the queen of Hungary conſented to give up all future claim to Sileſia.

The campaign in Italy was far from proving favourable either to the queen of Hungary, or her ally the king of Sardinia. Count Gages paſſed the Appenines, in the month of April, and entered the ſtate of Lucca; from thence he proceeded by the eaſtern coaſt of Genoa to Leſtinde-Levante. The junction of the two armies was thus accompliſhed, and reinforced with 10,000 Genoeſe: mean while prince Lobkowitz decamped from Modena, and took poſt at Parma; but he was ſoon ſucceeded by count Schuylemberg, and ſent to command the Auſtrians in Bohemia. The Spaniards entered the Milaneſe without farther oppoſition. Count Gages, with 30,000 men, took poſſeſſion of Seravalle; and advancing towards Placentia, obliged the Auſtrians to retire under the cannon of Tortora: but when Don Philip, at the head of 40,000 troops, made himſelf maſter of Aqui, the king of Sardinia and the Auſtrian general, unable to ſtem the torrent, retreated behind the Tenaro. The ſtrong citadel of Tortona was taken by the Spaniards, who likewiſe reduced Parma and Placentia; and forcing the paſſage of the Tenaro compelled his Sardinian majeſty to take ſhelter on the other ſide of the Po. Pavia was then won by ſcalade; and the city of Milan ſubmitted to the infant, though the Auſtrian garriſon ſtill maintained the citadel. All Piedmont, on both ſides of the Po, as far as Turin, was reduced, and even that capital threatened with a ſiege, ſo that by the month of October the territories belonging to the houſe of Auſtria, in Italy, were wholly ſubdued, and the king of Sardinia ſtripped of all his dominions: notwithſtanding which, he continued firm and true to his engagements, and deaf to all propoſals of a ſeparate accommodation.

While theſe things were tranſacting on the continent, the naval affairs of England began in ſome meaſure to wear a more promiſing aſpect than they had for ſome time done. Admiral Rowley had been ſent into the Mediterranean, to command in the room of Matthews; and he, during the ſummer, bombarded Genoa, and ſeveral other places; while the Engliſh privateers took ſeveral capital prizes; all which contributed towards inſpiring the ſeamen with freſh courage.

But the moſt important naval tranſaction this year was the reduction of Cape Breton, in North-America, a place of great importance, which the French had been at prodigious expence in fortifying, and which they looked upon as one of their moſt valuable colonies. The ſcheme had been projected by the people of Boſton in New-England; and Sir Peter Warren, who had been ſtationed near the leeward iſlands, was ordered to ſail for North-America, to aſſiſt ſuch forces as were then in New-England in the intended expedition. Accordingly, on the 6th of April this year, Sir Peter ſet ſail, and ſoon after landed at Cauſo, having under his command ten ſhips of the line; and having taken on board 6000 men from New-England, he came to an anchor at Gabaron, about four miles ſouth of Louiſbourg, the capital of Cape Breton. The ground between the fort and the place where they landed was the moſt dangerous to paſs over that could be imagined; but the forces ſent from New-England ſurmounted all difficulties, and, by the moſt unwearied diligence and perſeverance, formed two camps, in order to carry on the attack. One of theſe camps was on the north, and the other on the ſouth ſide of the town; and the fort had a battery of 35 pieces of cannon, which commanded the entry into the harbour. The walls and ramparts mounted 64 great guns, beſides 16 large mortars; and the garriſon, beſides the inhabitants, contained 1200 regular troops, under the command of M. Chambon. At the weſt gate of the town was a ſtrong draw-bridge, ſecured by a battery of 16 guns, and near it was another battery of 34 guns. The New-England forces were only raw, undiſciplined troops; few of them had ever ſeen a military engagement: but notwithſtanding the almoſt unſurmountable difficulties that ſeemed to oppoſe them, yet they diſplayed ſuch courage as would have done honour to the beſt regulated forces in the world. They only waited for orders; and no ſooner had they received them, than they attacked the grand battery with ſuch fury, that the enemy was forced to abandon it, and that, in a great meaſure, contributed towards procuring them the victory. In the mean time, the Engliſh fleet blocked up the harbour, ſo that neither men nor proviſions could be brought to the beſieged; while ſeveral French ſhips, laden with ſtores and ammunition, fell into the hands of the Engliſh, and were condemned as legal prizes.

The New-England forces, who carried on the ſiege, were plentifully ſupplied with all ſorts of freſh proviſions; but the ſervice on the ſouth ſide of the town was attended with many difficulties; for moſt of the cannon deſigned to be placed on the battlements, were obliged to be dragged above two miles, through very marſhy grounds; in ſome parts almoſt impaſſable. Perſeverance and courage, however, ſurmounted every difficulty; and the troops that had been conſidered as unfit for action, in a regular manner, performed wonders. Several batteries were erected on the riſing ground near the place, from whence red-hot bullets were diſcharged into the town, and the governor, not ſeeing any proſpect of aſſiſtance, ſurrendered the place, and with the garriſon, who all engaged not to bear arms againſt Britain, during the ſpace of twelve months, were conveyed to Rochfort in France.

This was a moſt valuable acquiſition to Great-Britain; and his majeſty was ſo ſenſible of it, that he conferred ſeveral honours upon the officers. The inhabitants of New England acquired immortal honour, and convinced thoſe in power, that courage, joined with prudence, is able to accompliſh any thing.

While the continent of Europe, and the iſles of America were thus expoſed to the ravages of war, and ſubjected to ſeveral viciſſitudes of fortune, Great Britain underwent a convulſion in her own bowels by a rebellion, the moſt daring, and, conſidering the little encouragement it met with, the moſt alarming of any that appears in the Engliſh annals: a rebellion, which was as fatal in its iſſue, as it was proſperous in its commencement; and which, notwithſtanding its occaſioning ſome few calamities, confirmed in the hand of the ſovereign the ſceptre it meant to ſhake.

We have already ſeen in what manner Charles, the eldeſt ſon of the Pretender, attempted to invade England during the laſt year; and it is aſſerted, that upon his return home to his father at Rome, he was adviſed to lay aſide all thoughts of engaging in an enterprize likely to be attended with inſurmountable difficulties, and, if failing of ſucceſs, muſt involve many families in ruin.

Such was the advice given Charles by his father, who had failed in an attempt of the like nature; but the young adventurer, whoſe mind was full of romantic notions, and who had been hurried on by the advice of ſome needy fugitives, reſolved to try his fortune for the recovery of that crown which he looked upon as the right of his family. The French miniſtry looked on the whole as a Don Quixote expedition, and however earneſt they were to ſee Great Britain diſtreſſed, yet ſuch were their notions of the ſuperiority gained by them in Flanders, that all Charles could procure from them was only one ſhip of war to carry him over to Scotland, where he doubted not of meeting with many friends to ſupport his cauſe. Accordingly, he ſet ſail in a ſmall frigate from Port St. Lazaro, on the 14th of July, and was joined by the Elizabeth, a French man of war of 60 guns, which was to ſerve as a convoy. Their deſign was to have ſailed round Ireland, and then land in the Weſtern Iſlands of Scotland; but happening to fall in with the Lion, an Engliſh man of war of 50 guns, a deſperate engagement enſued, and the French ſhip was ſo much diſabled, that ſhe was obliged to ſet ſail for Breſt, where ſhe arrived in a very ſhattered condition. The frigate in which was the young chevalier, the marquis of Tullibardine, Sir Thomas Sherridan, and ſome few others, made her eſcape during the engagement, and continued her courſe ſo expeditiouſly, that on the 23d of July the young Pretender reached the weſtern iſles of Scotland, and landed at Moidart, where he was kindly received by Mr. Macdonald, who concealed him in his houſe till notice of his arrival was diſperſed among the clans; where he was ſoon joined by a conſiderable number of hardy mountaineers, under their reſpective chiefs.

Had the government acted vigorouſly on the firſt intelligence they received of his arrival, the young adventurer muſt ſoon have been cruſhed; but the lords of the regency paid little regard to the information, and even ſuſpected the integrity of thoſe by whom it was conveyed. A ſhort time, however, Charles having convinced them of their error.

aſſembled about 1500 men, encamped in the neighbourhood of Fort William, and immediately commenced hoſtilities. A detachment from his main body ſurprized two companies of new raiſed ſoldiers, who, after an obſtinate diſpute, were obliged to ſubmit. An officer of the king's forces having fallen into the hands of the rebels, was courteouſly diſmiſſed with one of the Pretender's manifeſtos, and a paſſport for his perſonal ſafety. The adminiſtration was now effectually alarmed. The lords of the regency iſſued a proclamation, offering 30,000l. to any perſon who ſhould apprehend the eldeſt ſon of the Pretender; and a courier was diſpatched to Holland, to haſten the return of his majeſty, who arrived in England about the latter end of Auguſt. A requiſition was made of the 6000 Dutch auxiliaries; and ſeveral Britiſh regiments were recalled from the Netherlands. A loyal addreſs was preſented to the king by the city of London, and the merchants of the metropolis reſolved to raiſe two regiments at their own expence. Orders were iſſued to keep the trained bands in readineſs; to array the militia of Weſtminſter; and inſtructions to the ſame effect were ſent to all the lords lieutenants of the counties throughout the kingdom. The principal noblemen of the nation made a tender of their ſervices to his majeſty, and many of them received commiſſions to levy regiments towards the ſuppreſſion of the rebellion. Bodies of volunteers were incorporated in London, and many other places: aſſociations formed, large contributions raiſed in different towns, counties, and communities; and a great number of eminent merchants in London agreed to ſupport the public credit, by receiving as uſual, bank notes in payment for the purpoſes of traffic.

As ſoon as it was known at Edinburgh that the Pretender's ſon had landed, Sir John Cope, commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, marched to oppoſe the rebels; but they gave him the ſlip, and on the fourth of September arrived at Perth, where they ſeized the public money, and proclaimed the Pretender king of Great Britain, by the name of James III. Here the young adventurer was joined by the titular duke of Perth, the viſcount Strathallern, lord George Murray, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, with their followers. The marquis of Tullibardine took poſſeſſion of Athol, and armed his tenants in ſupport of the cauſe he had undertaken. Being thus conſiderably augmented, the rebel army croſſed the Froth, took poſſeſſion of Edinburgh without oppoſition, and Charles fixed his head-quarters at the royal palace of Holyrood-houſe, but was diſappointed in ſeizing the treaſure belonging to the two banks of that kingdom, it having been previouſly conveyed into the caſtle, which was defended by a ſtrong garriſon, under the command of general Gueſt.

Sir John Cope, hearing the rebels were maſters of Edinburgh, marched back to Aberdeen, where, for the greater expedition, he embarked his troops, and on the 16th of September, landed at Dunbar, about twenty miles to the eaſtward of the capital. Here he was joined by two regiments of dragoons, who, on the approach of the rebels, had retired from Edinburgh, and he immediately marched towards the rebel army in order to give them battle. On the 20th he encamped in the neighbourhood of Preſton-pans; but the rebels did not wait for him to begin the attack, for the next morning early, the young Pretender charged at the head of the Highlanders with ſuch irreſiſtable impetuoſity, that the king's troops were ſoon broke, and entirely routed. At the firſt onſet, the dragoons fled with great precipitation, but the chief part of the infantry, who made a vigorous ſtand, were either killed or taken, 500 of the king's forces fell on the field of battle, among whom was colonel Gardiner, who diſdained to ſave his life at the expence of his honour: when abandoned by his own regiment of dragoons, he alighted from his horſe and fought among the infantry, until he fell covered with his wounds.

This victory was of great importance to the rebels; they procured arms, a train of field artillery, and a conſiderable ſum of money: for the tents, cannon, baggage, and military cheſt of the royal party fell into their hands. It alſo induced ſeveral of the chiefs, who had hitherto continued on the reſerve, to exert themſelves in favour of the Pretender. Charles was not, however, yet in a condition to purſue his march into England, he continued, therefore, to reſide at Holyrood-houſe; impoſed taxes on the inhabitants; ſeized the merchandize depoſited in the king's warehouſe at Leith; compelled the city of Glaſgow to advance a conſiderable ſum of money; and laid the whole adjacent country under contribution. Large ſupplies of money, artillery, and ammunition, were ſent from France by ſingle ſhips; and the number of his followers increaſed daily, though the greater and richer part of the inhabitants of Scotland were averſe to his family and pretenſions, and many even exerted themſelves in defence of the government. The miniſtry were no ſooner informed of Cope's defeat, than they ſent orders for three battallions of guards, and ſeven regiments of infantry to return from Flanders; and theſe being joined by the 6000 Dutch troops lately arrived in England, began their march to Newcaſtle, under the command of general Wade.

On the 16th of October the parliament met, when his majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſe, in which he informed them, "that an unnatural rebellion had broke out in Scotland; and that he relied upon their affections to him, and their care and concern for the public ſafety, to take ſuch ſteps as might enable him to extinguiſh this rebellion effectually; to prevent any foreign power from aſſiſting the rebels, and to reſtore the peace of the kingdom."

Addreſſes, containing the warmeſt expreſſions of loyalty, were preſented by both houſes to his majeſty; and the commons, in order to provide for the public ſafety, ſuſpended the Habeas Corpus act: upon which ſeveral ſuſpected perſons were taken into cuſtody. Admiral Vernon was ſent to command a fleet in the Downs, there being great reaſon to ſuſpect that the French would attempt to invade the ſouth of Kent, and his ſhips ſeized ſeveral French veſſels which were carrying arms and ammunition to the rebels in Scotland. This was ſtriking at the root of the rebellion, and from ſuch circumſtances our miniſtry were enabled to form ſome notion of their ſtrength, and the methods to be uſed in oppoſing them.

In the mean time Charles, finding it impracticable to ſeize the caſtle of Edinburgh, marched towards England at the head of 5000 men; for after the defeat of general Cope his army had increaſed conſiderably. On the twelfth of November the rebel army attacked the city of Carliſle, and in three days it ſurrendered; all the arms and ammunition falling into their hands: and there the Pretender was proclaimed. Thus ſucceſsful, and marſhal Wade not having been able to get up in time to oppoſe them, they marched ſouthward to Preſton, where they arrived without any moleſtation; and on the 29th made their public entry into Mancheſter. At Preſton and Mancheſter the Pretender was again proclaimed; and in the latter place a regiment was raiſed for him, and the command thereof given to one Mr. Townly, a Lancaſhire gentleman, who had been ſome years in the French ſervice. It is impoſſible to expreſs the conſternation of the people in London, when they found that the rebels had got ſo far ſouthward; and, therefore, the duke of Cumberland, who had returned from Flanders, was ſent down to oppoſe them.

In the beginning of December the rebels left Mancheſter, paſſed the river Merſey, and advanced to Congleton, ſeemingly with an intention to meet and engage the duke, whoſe advanced guard was then at Newcaſtle Underline; but they ſuddenly turned off to the left, and marched into Derby, as if they intended to avoid his royal highneſs, and proceed immediately to London. This news occaſioned inexpreſſible terror: the troops in the neighbourhood of the capital were ordered to march and form a camp upon Finchley-common, and the king reſolved to take the field in perſon, accompanied by the earl of Stair: the militia of London and Middleſex were kept in readineſs to march: double watches were poſted at the city gates, and ſignals of alarm appointed. But this ſtate of anxiety was of ſhort duration: the Pretender finding himſelf diſappointed in his expectations, and that no attempt was made by the French towards an invaſion, called a council of war at Derby, where it was determined to retreat to Scotland with all expedition. In purſuance of this reſolution they left Derby on the ſixth of December, and on the ninth arrived at Mancheſter; entered Preſton on the 12th, and continued their route with the ſame expedition to the northward. General Wade, with a view of intercepting them in their march, advanced from Ferry-bridge into Lancaſhire; but finding they had already reached Wigan, he returned to his poſt at Newcaſtle, after ſending general Oglethorpe, with his horſe and dragoons, to join another party detached by the duke in purſuit of the rebels, whoſe rear they overtook in Lancaſhire, and ſeveral ſkirmiſhes enſued, of no material conſequence to either party. Charles reached Carliſle on the 19th, and after reinforcing the garriſon of that place, croſſed the rivers Edin and Solway into Scotland. On the 21ſt the duke of Cumberland inveſted Carliſle, and on the 30th the garriſon ſurrendered at diſcretion. Thus having purſued the rebels to the northern verge of England, and retaken the only place they were maſters of, his royal highneſs returned to London, and the priſoners, amounting to 400, were confined in different jails.

A. D. 1746. After a very fatiguing march the rebels reached Glaſgow, from which they exacted very ſevere contributions. From this city they continued their march to Stirling, where they were joined by ſome forces, aſſembled by lord Lewis Gordon, and John Drummond. The latter, who arrived from France in November, with a ſmall reinforcement of French and Iriſh, fixed his head-quarters at Perth, and was joined by the earl of Cromartie and other chiefs, with 2000 of their vaſſals, and a ſmall train of artillery. A conſiderable ſum of money had been ſent them from Spain, and they had found means to ſurprize a ſloop of war at Montroſe, with the guns of which they fortified that harbour. Charles, thus reinforced, inveſted the caſtle of Stirling, defended by general Blakeney, who eaſily rendered all their attempts abortive. On the 13th of January general Hawley, who had aſſembled a conſiderable body of forces at Edinburgh, advanced to Linlithgow. Next day they rendezvouſed at Falkirk, and on the 17th the rebels were perceived in full march to attack the king's forces; upon which Hawley diſpatched two regiments of dragoons to drive them from an eminence which they had taken poſſeſſion of; but the firſt volley of the rebels broke their ranks, and they retreated with precipitation; and falling in among the infantry, put them likewiſe into confuſion. The rebels followed their ſucceſs, and the royal army, after making one irregular diſcharge, fled in the utmoſt diſorder, leaving the field of battle, with part of their tents and artillery, to the enemy.

After this defeat, it was thought expedient that the duke of Cumberland ſhould take upon him the command of the army in Scotland. His royal highneſs, therefore, on the laſt day of January, put himſelf at the head of the troops in Edinburgh, conſiſting of fourteen battalions of infantry, two regiments of dragoons, and 1500 highlanders from Argyleſhire. He began his march to Linlithgow, which obliged the enemy, who had renewed the ſiege of Stirling caſtle, to abandon that enterprize: they paſſed the Forth with great precipitation, retiring by Badenoch towards Inverneſs; the caſtle of which they reduced, together with Fort Auguſtus. They next laid ſiege to Fort William and Blair-caſtle of Athol, but failed in both theſe attempts. In the mean time the duke having ſecured their important poſts of Stirling and Perth, advanced with his army to Aberdeen, where he was joined by the duke of Gordon, the earls of Aberdeen and Finlater, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction. The ſloop of war which the rebels had ſurpriſed at Montroſe was about this time retaken, with a conſiderable ſum of money and a large quantity of arms on board, which ſhe had brought from France for the ſervice of the Pretender.

On the 8th of April the duke of Cumberland left Aberdeen, and on the 15th paſſed the Spey without oppoſition. At Nairn, where he halted to refreſh, he received inteilligence that the enemy had burnt Fort Auguſtus, and marched from Inverneſs to Culloden, about nine miles diſtant from the royal army, to give him battle. The ſame night, however, the rebels marched with an intent to ſurprize the duke's army before day light; but this ſcheme, by ſome miſunderſtanding amongſt them, proved abortive, whereupon they returned to Culloden, reſolving in that ſtation to wait for the duke, who, on the 16th, decamped between four and five in the morning; and after marching about eight miles, the advanced guard perceived the rebels, amounting to 28000 men, drawn up in order of battle, in thirteen diviſions, ſupplied with ſome pieces of artillery, and poſted behind ſome old walls and huts, in a line with Culloden houſe. The duke immediately formed the royal army into three lines, and about one at noon the engagement began. The cannon of the enemy was very ill ſerved, and as badly pointed, while that of the royal army made dreadful havock among them. Their front line then advanced to the attack, and about 500 of the Highlanders charged the duke's left wing with their uſual impetuoſity. The weight of this column diſordered one regiment; but two battalions advancing from the ſecond line, ſuſtained the firſt, and ſoon put a ſtop to their career by a dreadful fire, which killed a great number. In the mean time, the dragoons under general Hawley, aſſiſted by the Argyleſhire militia, having pulled down a park wall that covered the right flank of the rebels, broke in among them ſword in hand, and completed their confuſion. The French piquets on their left ſtood inactive during the whole engagement, and then ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war. In leſs than thirty minutes the whole rebel army was totally defeated, and the field covered with their dead bodies. Three thouſand were ſlain on the ſpot and in the purſuit. The earl of Kilmarnock was taken in the field of battle; the lord Balmerino ſurrendered himſelf in a ſhort time after, and the marquis of Tullibardine followed his example: the earl of Cromartie and his ſon had been taken priſoners ſome days before the engagement. This victory put a final ſtroke to the rebellion; but his royal highneſs continued in the north ſome time, to give proper orders for ſecuring the tranquillity of the country. Having, however, received the ſubmiſſion of almoſt all the clans and chieftains, he at length returned to London, which he entered amidſt the acclamations of the people.

As to the vanquiſhed adventurer, he eſcaped from the field of battle, and forded the river Neſs, and with a few horſe retired to Aird, where he held a conference with ſome of his adherents; but finding his affairs deſperate, he deſired each of them to conſult his own ſafety; after which he aſſumed various diſguiſes, wandering from place to place among the mountains and weſtern iſlands for four months, during which he underwent an amazing ſeries of dangers, hardſhips, and miſeries: at laſt two ſhips, ſent on purpoſe from France to the coaſt, took him and about thirty of his followers on board, and in the middle of Auguſt landed him at Reſcourt, near Morlaix, in Britany.

Addreſſes were now preſented to his majeſty from all quarters, congratulating him on the ſucceſs of his arms, which had once more reſcued the nation from the violent attacks of deſpotiſm and popery. The two houſes of parliament, who ſet the example, alſo voted their thanks to his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland for his great and eminent ſervices on this occaſion; and the commons ſoon after added 25,000l. per annum to his former revenue.

The rebellion being now happily ſuppreſſed, it was thought neceſſary to make examples of the moſt diſtinguiſhed delinquents. In conſequence of which, bills of indictment for high-treaſon were found againſt the earls of Kilmarnock and Cromartie, and the lord Balmerino. Theſe noblemen were tried by their peers in Weſtminſter-hall, on the 28th of July, the lord-chancellor preſiding as lord-high-ſteward on the occaſion. Kilmarnock and Cromartie confeſſed their crimes; and, in pathetic ſpeeches, recommended themſelves to his majeſty's mercy. Lord Balmerino pleaded Not Guilty: he denied being at Carliſle at the time mentioned in the indictment; but this being plainly proved againſt him, he waved his plea, and ſubmitted to the court, who found them all guilty, and they received ſentence of death. Kilmarnock and Balmerino were beheaded on Tower-hill; but ſome favourable circumſtances appearing in the caſe of Cromartie, he was pardoned, under certain reſtrictions. The lord Lovat, who was the life and ſoul of the rebellion, was afterwards tried, and being found guilty, received the puniſhment due to his crimes *.

* As the fate of the rebel lords is an event of an intereſting nature in the Engliſh hiſtory, we think it neceſſary to preſerve an ample account of the circumſtances that attended their reſpective executions.

The 18th of Auguſt was the time appointed for the execution of Kilmarnock and Balmerino. Accordingly, about ſix o'clock on the morning of that day, a troop of the life-guards, with another of the horſe-grenadiers, and about 1000 of the foot, marched through the city to Tower-hill. The foot were placed in the form of a battledore, the round part incloſing the ſcaffold in the centre, and the handle being formed by two lines, extending to the Tower-gate, with a proper ſpace between for the proceſſion to paſs. The horſe were drawn up in the rear of the foot, with a proper ſpace between for the commanding officers to traverſe the lines.

About nine the ſheriffs of London (attended by their officers and the executioner) came to view the ſcaffold, as alſo the houſe to which the lords were to be conducted, two rooms whereof were hung with black. At ten o'clock the block was fixed upon the ſcaffold, and covered with black cloth, with which alſo the ſcaffold was hung; and ſome ſacks of ſaw-duſt were carried up to ſtrew upon it. Soon after this, the two coffins were brought on the ſcaffold, covered with black cloth, with gilt nails, &c. On the earl of Kilmarnock's was a plate with this inſcription, viz. "Gulielmus Comes de Kilmarnock, decollat. 18 Auguſt, 1746: "ætat. ſuæ 42." And that for lord Balmerino had this inſcription: "Arthurus Dominus de Balmerino, decollat. 18 Auguſti, "1746, ætat. ſuæ 58."

In the mean time the ſheriffs went to the Tower, and after knocking at the gate, were admitted; when the priſoners, after the ſheriffs had given a receipt to the conſtable for their bodies, were delivered to their cuſtody. Soon after this, the proceſſion began; and when they had paſſed through the lines into the area of the circle formed by the guards, the paſſage was cloſed, and the troops of horſe drew up behind the foot. The lords were conducted into ſeparate apartments in the houſe facing the ſcaffold, their friends being admitted to ſee and converſe with them. The earl of Kilmarnock was attended by the Rev. Mr. Foſter, the Rev. Mr. Hume, and the chaplain of the Tower; and another clergyman of the church of England attended lord Balmerino. Before his lordſhip entered the houſe, hearing ſeveral of the ſpectators aſk, Which is lord Balmerino? He anſwered, ſmiling, I am he, Gentlemen, at your ſervice.

While they were in the houſe, the lord Balmerino aſked permiſſion to have a conference with the earl in his apartment; which being granted, among other queſtions he aſked the earl, if he knew of any order being ſigned by the prince (meaning the Pretender's ſon) to give no quarter at the battle of Culloden? To this the earl anſwering in the negative, the lord Balmerino added, "Nor I neither; and therefore it ſeems to be an invention to juſtify their own murders." The earl replied, "He did not "think this a fair inference, becauſe he was informed, after he "was a priſoner at Inverneſs, by ſeveral officers, that ſuch an or"der, ſigned George Murray, was in the duke's company." —"George Murray, ſaid lord Balmerino, then they ſhould not "have charged it on the prince." After this, he took his leave, embracing the earl with the moſt noble and generous compliments. "My dear Kilmarnock, ſaid he, I am only ſorry that "I cannot pay this reckoning alone; once more farewell for "ever!"

The lord Balmerino then left the room, and retired to his own apartment. As ſoon as he was gone, the earl, with the company preſent, kneeled down, and joined in a prayer delivered by Mr. Foſter; after which, having refreſhed himſelf with a bit of bread and a glaſs of wine, he expreſſed a deſire that lord Balmerino might go to the ſcaffold firſt; but being informed that he could not be indulged in this, as he was firſt named in the warrant, he appeared ſatisfied, ſaluted his friends, and ſaid, he ſhould make no ſpeech on the ſcaffold, but deſired the miniſters to aſſiſt him in his laſt moments; accordingly they, with his other friends, preceeded with him to the ſcaffold.

The multitude, who had been long expecting to ſee him on this awful occaſion, on his firſt appearing on the ſcaffold, dreſſed in black, with a countenance and demeanour teſtifying contrition, ſhewed the deepeſt ſigns of commiſeration and pity; and his lordſhip, at the ſame time, being ſtruck with ſuch a variety of dreadful objects at once, as the ſpectators, the block, his coffin, the executioner, and the inſtrument of death, he turned about to his friend Mr. Hume, and ſaid, "Hume, this is terrible!" though without changing his voice or countenance.

After repeating ſeveral ſhort prayers, one of which was for his majeſty king George, and the royal family, his lordſhip embraced and took leave of his friends. The executioner, who had previouſly taken ſomething to keep him from fainting, was ſo affected with his lordſhip's diſtreſs, and the awfulneſs of the ſcene, that, on aſking him forgiveneſs, he burſt into tears. His lordſhip bade him take courage, giving him at the ſame time a purſe with five guineas, and telling him he would drop his handkerchief as a ſignal for the ſtroke. He proceeded with the help of his gentleman, to make ready for the block, by taking off his coat, and the bag from his hair, which was then tucked up under a napkin cap; but this being too wide, the contracting it occaſioned ſome delay. The hair being adjuſted, he turned down the collar of his ſhirt and waiſtcot, kneeled down on a black cuſhion before the block, and drew his cap over his eyes; in doing which, as well as in putting up his hair, his hands were obſerved to ſhake; but, either to ſupport himſelf, or as a more convenient poſture for devotion, he happened to lay both hands upon the block, which the executioner obſerving, prayed his lordſhip to let them fall, leſt they ſhould be mangled, or break the blow. He was then told that the collar of his waiſtcoat was in the way, upon which he roſe, and with the help of a friend took it off; and the neck being made bare to the ſhoulders, he kneeled down as before. In the mean time, when all things were ready, and the baize which hung over the rails of the ſcaffold was, by direction of the colonel of the guard and the ſheriffs, turned up, that the people might ſee every circumſtance of the execution; in about two minutes after his lordſhip had kneeled down, he dropped his handkerchief, when the executioner, at one blow, ſevered his head from his body, except only a ſmall part of the ſkin, which was immediately divided by a gentle ſtroke. The head was received in a piece of red baize, and, with the body, put into the coffin, and carried in a hearſe to the Tower.

The executioner was obliged to ſhift himſelf, by reaſon of the quantity of blood that flew on his clothes; and in the mean time the ſcaffold was cleanſed, and freſh ſtrewed with ſaw-duſt. This being

Beſides the examples made in the execution of the lords, ſeventeen officers of the rebel army were condemned and executed at Kennington Common; nine at Carliſle; ſix at Brompton; ſeven at Penrith; and eleven at York. Some few who had received ſentence of death were pardoned, and a conſiderable number were tranſported to the plantations.

While England was engaged in cruſhing a rebellion at home, the war raged with great fury on the continent; for although an emperor had been choſen, yet the acquiſition made by the French in the Netherlands alarmed all Germany, while the Dutch looked for nothing leſs than immediate deſtruction. They in general conſidered it neceſſary that a perſon ſhould be made choice of to conduct the affairs of the republic, and none ſeemed more proper than the prince of Orange, who had married the princeſs royal of England. But a ſtrong party oppoſed that motion, and the command of the army was conferred on prince Waldeck, a German, and a man of known courage; but as he was not a native of the country, ſo it could not be ſuppoſed that he would act like one naturally attached to the republic.

About the middle of April, the French king took the field, accompanied by marſhal Saxe and ſeveral other generals: and the allies, under count Bathiani, not being able to oppoſe them, retreated to Breda, the capital city of Dutch Brabant, leaving Antwerp expoſed to the enemy, who, in a few days, took poſſeſſion of it. A detachment from the French army, under the command of the prince of Conti, was ſent to inveſt Mons, a city of great ſtrength; but the garriſon behaved with ſo much bravery, that notwithſtanding the ſuperior numbers of the French, yet the place held out till the latter end of July, when they were obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. So rapid were the conqueſts of the French, that every place gave way to them, almoſt as ſoon as they approached; and Lewis XV. publiſhed an edict, whereby he ordered to be annexed to his dominions all thoſe provinces that had been taken from his kingdoms by the treaty of Utrecht. All the towns of ſtrength in the Auſtrian Netherlands had ſubmitted to the French, except Namur, a ſtrong fort ſituated on the confluence of the Maeſe and the Sambre; and that the French reſolved to bring under ſubjection as ſoon as a convenient opportunity ſhould offer.

In the mean time the allied army being reinforced with a number of Heſſians that had been ſent over from Scotland, as alſo with a ſtrong body of Auſtrians, being done, the ſheriffs went for the lord Balmerino, who, during this time, had converſed chearfully with his friends, refreſhed himſelf twice with a bit of bread and a glaſs of wine, and deſired the company to drink to him, ſaying, that he had prepared a ſpeech, which he ſhould read on the ſcaffold, and therefore ſhould not there ſay any thing of its contents.

When the under-ſheriff entered his lordſhip's apartment to let him know the ſtage was ready, he prevented him by immediately aſking if the affair was over with the lord Kilmarnock; and being anſwered in the affirmative, he enquired how the executioner performed his office; and upon receiving the account, ſaid it was well done: then addreſſing himſelf to the company, he ſaid, "Gentlemen, I ſhall detain you no longer;" and with an eaſy unaffected chearfulneſs, ſaluted his friends, and proceeded to the ſcaffold. He was dreſſed in his regimentals, which were blue faced with red; and his appearance, with the apparent compoſure of his mind, aſtoniſhed the ſpectators.

As ſoon as he arrived on the ſcaffold, he took off his coat and waiſtcoat, together with his neckcloth, and threw them on his coffin; he then put on his flannel waiſtcoat, which had been provided for that purpoſe, and taking a plaïd cap out of his pocket, he put it on his head, ſaying, he would die a Scotchman. After kneeling down at the block to adjuſt his poſture, and ſhew the executioner the ſignal for the ſtroke, which was dropping his arms, he once more turned to his friends, and took his laſt farewell: then, looking round on the ſpectators, he ſaid, "Perhaps "ſome may think my behaviour too bold, but remember, (ſaid "he to a gentleman who ſtood near him) that I now declare it is "the effect of confidence in God and a good conſcience, and I "ſhould diſſemble if I ſhould ſhew any ſigns of fear."

As he paſſed the executioner, obſerving the axe in his hand, he took it from him, felt the edge, and returning it, clapped him on the ſhoulder to encourage him; he tucked down the collar of his ſhirt and waiſtcoat, and ſhewed the executioner where to ſtrike, deſiring him to do it reſolutely, for in that, ſaid his lordſhip, will conſiſt your kindneſs. He then went to the ſide of the ſtage, and called up the warder of the Tower, to whom he gave ſome money, aſked which was his hearſe, and deſired that the man might drive near the ſtage.

He then, without trembling or changing countenance, again knelt down at the block; and having, with his arms ſtretched out, ſaid, "O Lord reward my friends, forgive my enemies, "and receive my ſoul," he gave the ſignal by letting his arms fall. His amazing firmneſs and intrepidity, and the unexpected ſuddenneſs of the ſignal, ſo ſurprized the executioner, that though he ſtruck the part directed, the blow was not given with ſufficient ſtrength to cut through the neck, on which he made an effort to turn his head towards the executioner; but a ſecond blow immediately ſucceeding the firſt, rendered him quite inſenſible, and a third finiſhed the work. His head was received in the ſame manner as Kilmarnock's, and, together with the body, was put into the coffin, and conveyed to the Tower, in which place they were both interred the ſame evening.

The earl of Kilmarnock was a nobleman of fine perſonal accompliſhments; he had been educated in revolution principles, and engaged himſelf in the rebellion partly from the deſperate ſituation of his fortune, and partly from reſentment to the government, on account of his having been deprived of a penſion he had for ſome time enjoyed. The enemies of Mr. Foſter (who attended him after condemnation) pretended that he had all along flattered his lordſhip with the hopes of a pardon, provided he kept up a ſhew of penitence to the laſt. This calumny (for probably it was nothing more) received ſome countenance by Kilmarnock's raiſing his head, after it was laid upon the block, and looking round among the ſpectators; notwithſtanding which, he died as a man and a chriſtian.

The conduct of lord Balmerino, on this ſolemn occaſion, though very different from that of Kilmarnock, was far from ſuch as his enemies reported. It is beyond a doubt that he would have accepted a pardon from the crown, could he have obtained it; but finding all his applications ineffectual, he prepared himſelf for death with great fortitude and reſolution. The moſt accurate obſervers could not diſcover in his geſture, on the fatal day, the leaſt ſymptom of concern, much leſs of fear; notwithſtanding which he was ſo far from being inſenſible, that he was ſeen to check his natural boldneſs, leſt the ſpectators ſhould think it indecent. He maintained his principles to the laſt. Kilmarnock appeared to be convinced of the criminality of his conduct; but Balmerino certainly acted from principle.

The number of ſpectators at theſe executions was incredible; the hill, the ſcaffolding, and the houſes being crouded with people, who, in general, behaved with great decency during the whole ſolemnity; and very little damage or miſchief was done, either by accident or otherwiſe.

On the 8th of December Charles Ratcliffe, eſq; commonly called earl of Derwentwater, who had been taken in a ſhip bound to Scotland, was beheaded on Little Tower-hill, near the Minories, in conſequence of a rule of the court of King's-bench, for being concerned in the rebellion in the year 1715; at which time he received ſentence of death, but, with ſeveral others, made his eſcape out of Newgate.

As ſoon as he arrived on the ſcaffold, he aſked for the executioner, who coming to him, he took a parcel of gold out of his pocket, and gave it him, ſaying, "I am but a poor man, and "there are ten guineas for you; if I had more I would give it "you, and I deſire you to do your buſineſs ſo as to put me to the "leaſt miſery you can." He then kneeled down before the block, and, putting his hands together, made a ſhort prayer; after which two of the warders of the Tower came to him, one of whom took off his wig, and the other put a white cap on his head. After this, the unhappy criminal roſe, and, with their aſſiſtance, took off his coat and waiſtcoat. He then turned about, and took his leave, in a reſpectful manner of the ſheriffs; untied the collar of his ſhirt, which was faſtened with a black ribbon, and began to tuck down the collar of his ſhirt; but not being able to reach far enough behind, he deſired the executioner to aſſiſt him; which he accordingly did.

After ſaying a ſhort prayer, and croſſing himſelf ſeveral times, he laid his head on the block, and deſired the executioner to ſtrike far enough, adding theſe his laſt words, "When I ſpread my "hands thus, do you take my head off." This ſignal he gave in leſs than half a minute, when one blow ſevered the head, except a ſmall part of the ſkin, which was cut aſunder at a ſecond eaſy ſtroke. The body falling on the ſcaffold, the executioner ſearched his pockets, from whence he took half a guinea, a ſilver crucifix, and his beads. The head and body were put into a coffin, and carried in a hearſe to the Nag's-head in Gray's-inn-lane; and the next morning were interred in the church-yard of St. Giles's in the Fields.

ans, reſolved to remain no longer unconcerned ſpectators, but to oppoſe the French with courage and perſeverance. Prince Charles of Lorrain, who had marched towards the Netherlands, knew the importance of Namur, and therefore drew up the allied army, which he had now taken under his command, on an eminence, in ſight of the French forces. Nothing could have been better contrived than the meaſures taken by the prince, ſo far as he was able to act conſiſtent with the inferiority of his army to that of the enemy. But the count Lowendahl, having taken Huy, where the allies had their magazine, the prince was obliged to retire to the north of the Maeſe, and leave Namur expoſed to the enemy. Accordingly, the trenches before it were opened on the 2d of September, and the ſiege carried on by 33,000 French till the 23d, when the garriſon, conſiſting of 4000 Auſtrians, after making a brave defence, were obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. The allied army, which lay encamped near Maeſtricht, being joined by Sir John Ligonier, with ſeveral battalions from Britain, prince Charles reſolved not to remain any longer inactive, but to venture on an engagement with the French: but count Saxe perceived his intention, and having fortified his camp in the ſtrongeſt manner, the allied army was obliged to return once more to Maeſtricht. To that place they were followed by the French, who had been reinforced with that part of the army which had been employed againſt Namur. The allies now finding that an engagement was inevitable, prepared to meet the enemy, who had been drawn up in three columns, with artillery in the front; and about noon a moſt dreadful cannonading began, which did great execution on both ſides. At laſt the allies, after having done every thing that could have been performed by brave men, were obliged to abandon the field, and retreat to Maeſtricht, with the loſs of 5000 men, and thirty pieces of artillery. But the French purchaſed the victory extremely dear, having loſt upwards af 9000 men, without obtaining any material advantage, not being able to prevent the allies from making good their retreat. This action terminated the campaign in the Netherlands. The allies, paſſing the Maeſe, took up their winter quarters in the duchies of Limburgh and Luxemburgh; while the French cantoned their troops in the places which they had newly conquered.

In Italy the Auſtrian and Sardinian forces performed many ſignal actions. Don Philip was obliged to Thus fell this unhappy man thirty years after his eſcape from Newgate; a great part of which time he ſpent with the Pretender in Italy. He was the youngeſt brother of James earl of Derwentwater, who was beheaded in the year 1716. They were the ſons of Sir Francis Ratcliffe by the lady Mary Tudor, natural daughter to king Charles II.

Simon Frazer, lord Lovat, the laſt and moſt extraordinary perſonage that ſuffered for this rebellion, was executed on Thurſday the 9th of April, 1747. This nobleman, in 1692, was a captain in Tullibardine's regiment; and, in 1695, he, with the aſſiſtance of his clan, violently forced the lady dowager of Lovat to marry him, for which he was tried and condemned; but being afterwards pardoned by king William, he fled to France, and turning papiſt, accepted a commiſſion under the late king James. He was confined for ſome years in the Baſtile for acting a double part between the two crowns of England and France; and at length obtained his liberty by taking the order of prieſthood. He officiated as a jeſuit prieſt at St. Omer's till the rebellion in 1715, when coming over to England, he eſpouſed the cauſe of government, and aſſiſted in recovering Inverneſs from the rebels; for which he got the title of Lovat, and obtained the command of a company of high-landers.

In this rebellion, however, he again fluctuated in his conduct; and while he endeavoured to preſerve appearances himſelf, he ſent his ſon, with the greater part of his clan, to join the Pretender, as appeared by an expoſtulatory letter ſent to him from the lord preſident. In anſwer to this letter, he not only endeavoured to exculpate himſelf, but was baſe enough to reproach his ſon in the moſt ſevere terms: and in a letter to the duke of Cumberland uſed the moſt hypocritical flattery in vindication of his innocence.

He was apprehended by lord Loudon, from whom he made his eſcape; but was at laſt taken concealed in a hollow tree, while he was preparing to go abroad. He was tried by the houſe of peers, before whom he preſerved a jocoſe behaviour; and his defence was filled with the moſt ſatirical turns. His criminality, however, appearing ſufficiently manifeſt, he was found guilty, and received ſentence of death.

When the warrant for his execution was notified to him, he appeared indifferent as to his fate; and though he was urged by his friends to throw himſelf at his majeſty's feet and petition for mercy, he abſolutely refuſed it, ſaying, "he was ſo old and infirm "that his life was not worth aſking."

Through the whole of his conduct, after conviction, he appeared undaunted, and preſerved his jocoſe, ſatirical temper to the laſt moment of his life. He received the notice of his death-warrant without the leaſt alteration in his countenance, thanked the gentleman who brought it for the favours he had done him, and drank a glaſs of wine to his health; after which he ſat down and converſed chearfully with him for a conſiderable time.

The next morning, being informed that it was reported an engine was to be made for his execution like that called the Maiden, formerly uſed for beheading ſtate criminals in Scotland, he commended the contrivance, "for, ſaid he, as my neck is very ſhort, "the executioner will be puzzled to find it out with his axe; and "if ſuch a machine be made, I ſuppoſe it will get the name of "Lovat's Maiden."

On the Monday preceding his execution, the major of the Tower went to ſee him, and aſked him how he did. "Do?" ſays he, "Why, Sir, I am doing very well; for I am fitting myſelf "for a place where hardly any majors go, and very few lieutenant-generals."

The next morning he deſired one of the warders to lay a pillow upon the floor at the foot of the bed, that he might try if he could properly perform his part in the tragedy in which he was next Thurſday to be chief actor: and after having kneeled down, and placed his head upon the foot of the bed, he roſe up, and ſaid, "By this ſhort practice, I believe, I ſhall be able to act my part "well enough."

On the Wedneſday morning his lordſhip waked about two o'clock, and prayed moſt devoutly for ſome time; after which he went to reſt again, and ſlept till between ſix and ſeven, when he called for the warder to dreſs him as uſual; and during the courſe of the day, he not only talked pertinently and ſedately with ſome gentlemen that came to ſee him, both about his own private affairs, as well as the public affairs of the nation, but merrily joked with the warder that attended him, the barber that ſhaved him, and almoſt every one that went to him. After eating a hearty dinner, he ſmoaked a pipe, according to cuſtom, and then ſent orders to get ſome veal roaſted, that it might be ready to mince for his breakfaſt the next morning.

On Thurſday the 9th, being the fatal day, his lordſhip waked about three o'clock in the morning, and, as he had done the preceding day, prayed in a very devout manner for ſome time. At five he got up, called for a glaſs of wine and water, as uſual, and ſat reading in his chair for two hours without ſpectacles; for, notwithſtanding his great age, he had never made uſe of any, which was ſuppoſed to have ariſen from his uniform method of living; for though he often drank a chearful glaſs, yet he never drank to exceſs, and very ſeldom taſted wine without its being properly mixed with water.

During the courſe of the morning his lordſhip behaved with his uſual gaiety, without once diſcovering the leaſt ſign of fear or uneaſineſs, as appeared from ſeveral incidents. At eight o'clock he deſired his wig might be ſent to the barber, that he might have time to comb it out in the genteeleſt manner; and having deſired the warder to get him a purſe to put the gold in, which he deſigned for the executioner, he added, "Let it be a good one, leſt the "gentleman ſhould refuſe it." On the warder's bringing two to chuſe, he did not ſeem to approve of either; however, he choſe one, and ſaid, "Though it be none of the beſt, it is a purſe that "no man would refuſe with ten guineas in it." Between eight and nine he called for a plate of minced veal, ate heartily, and then, having aſked for ſome wine and water, he drank the healths of ſeveral of his friends and acquaintances.

On the morning of execution Mr. Alderman Alſop, one of the high ſheriffs, (the other being ill) attended by the two under ſheriffs and the proper officers, with the executioner, went from the Mitre Tavern in Fenchurch-ſtreet, to the houſe appointed for them on Tower-hill. At ten o'clock the block was fixed on the ſcaffold, and his lordſhip's coffin brought, which was covered with black cloth, adorned with coronets, &c. and on the lid was this inſcription: "Simon Dominus Fraſer de Lovat, decollat. "April. 9, 1747, ætat. ſuæ 80."

At eleven o'clock the high ſheriff, with his attendants, went to the to abandon Milan; and the king of Sardinia having retaken all the Piedmonteſe forts, advanced towards Genoa, in order to join the Auſtrian army. This brought on a moſt bloody engagement, in which above 9000 of the French and Spaniards were killed, and 6000 taken priſoners; while the Auſtrians did not loſe above 4000. Soon after this battle, the Auſtrian forces were joined by thoſe of the king of Sardinia, who took upon him the command in chief, and reſolved, if poſſible, to drive the French and Spaniards from their entrenchments, which he effected; for they were obliged to retreat, with the loſs of 8000 men, beſides their cannon and ammunition.

In conſequence of theſe repeated loſſes, Don Philip found his army reduced to 30,000 men, with which he returned to Provence, and put them into winter quarters. Nor was it much better with the count de Gages, whoſe forces ſuffered conſiderably; and the court of Madrid was ſo enraged, that he was recalled, and the command given to the marquis de las Minas.

On the 4th of December the ſenate of Genoa delivered up their capital city to the Auſtrians, who placed in it a garriſon of only 600 men, under the command of the marquis de Botta. Had the Auſtrians, on this occaſion, obſerved a conduct conſiſtent with humanity, they might have remained maſters of Genoa: but their cruelty, in exacting taxes of an exorbitant nature, drove the people to deſpair, and awakened in them the laſt remaining ſpark of courage. They roſe in ſuch numbers upon the garriſon, that they killed many of them; and being joined by the peaſants in the neighbouring country, the whole Auſtrian army was driven out of the territories of Genoa.

In the month of July this year died Philip, king of Spain, a man of a peaceable diſpoſition, but hurried on to war by the intrigues of the French king, and the ambition of his queen, who was a mortal enemy to the Auſtrian family. Much about the ſame time died Chriſtian VI. king of Denmark, a prince beloved by his ſubjects. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Frederick, who had married the princeſs Louiſa, daughter of his Britannic majeſty, and who reigned many years afterwards, rather as a tender parent than an abſolute ſovereign.

The naval tranſactions of this year were productive of very little honour to the Britiſh nation. Commodore Peyton, who commanded ſix ſhips of war in the Eaſt-Indies, ſhamefully declined engaging a French ſquadron of inferior force, and abandoned the important ſettlement of Fort St. George, which, in the month of September, was taken by commodore de la Bourdounais. The French then made an attempt upon St. David's, another of our ſettlements in the Eaſt-Indies; but by the valour of the garriſon, and the arrival of commodore Griffin from Europe, with a ſtrong reinforcement of ſhips, they were compelled to abandon their enterprize.

A powerful fleet was fitted out at Spithead, conſiſting of 16 large ſhips, and 8 frigates, beſides bomb ketches, tranſports, and ſtore ſhips, in order to attempt the conqueſt of Quebec, the capital of Canada, but by unaccountable delays the fleet was detained in England, till the ſeaſon was too far advanced to riſque the great ſhips on the coaſt of North-America. The miniſtry, however, unwilling that this expenſive armament ſhould be wholly uſeleſs to the nation, diſpatched it under the command of admiral Leſtock to the coaſt of Britany, with orders to make himſelf maſter of port l'Orient, which place was the repoſitory of all the ſtores and ſhips belonging to the French Eaſt-India company. Six battalions, with a detachment of matroſſes and bombardeers were embarked in 30 tranſports, under the command of lieutenant general Sinclair. On the 14th of September, the whole fleet ſailed from Plymouth, and ſteering directly for the coaſt of Britany, which they made on the 17th, they anchored in the road of Poldue; but the troops were not landed till the 20th. The militia, reinforced by ſome detachments from different regiments, were aſſembled to the number of 2000, and ſeemed reſolved to oppoſe the diſembarkation; but finding the Engliſh determined to land, they thought proper to retire. When the forces were within half a league of the town, a deputation was ſent to general Sinclair, offering the Tower, and demanded the priſoner. When it was notified to his lordſhip, that the ſheriffs were come to demand him, he deſired the company to withdraw a little, till he ſaid a ſhort prayer. In a few minutes he called them in again, and ſaid, "Gentlemen, I "am ready." After having got down one pair of ſtairs, being invited by general Williamſon to reſt himſelf a little in his apartment, his lordſhip, on entering the room, paid his reſpects, in a very polite manner, to the ladies, then to the gentlemen, and, while he ſtayed, talked as freely, and with as little ſeeming concern, as if he had been invited to an entertainment. After getting down the ſecond pair of ſtairs, he was put into the governor's coach, and carried to the Tower-gate, where he was delivered to the high-ſheriff and his attendants.

He was conducted from the Tower-gate, in another coach, to a houſe on the hill, from the upper rooms of which was a platform made to the ſcaffold. The rooms were hung with black cloth and ſconces, the diſmal appearance of which produced not the leaſt alteration in his lordſhip's countenance. After delivering a paper to the ſheriffs, he told them they might give the word of command when they pleaſed, "for, ſaid he, as I have been an officer "in the army many years, I have been accuſtomed, and am rea"dy to obey command." After this he knelt down, and ſaid a ſhort prayer, then drank a little burnt brandy with bitters, and was conducted to the ſcaffold.

When he was aſcending the ſteps to the ſcaffold, he looked round, and obſerving ſuch a prodigious crowd of people on the hill, he ſaid, "he wondered, there ſhould be ſuch a buſtle about taking off "an old grey head that could not get up three ſteps without two "men to ſupport it." As he ſtood on the ſcaffold, obſerving one of his friends look very much dejected, he clapped him on the ſhoulder, ſaying, "Chear up thy heart, man; I am not afraid, "why ſhouldſt thou?" He then gave the executioner a purſe with ten guineas in it, recommending him to act his part handſomely; "for, ſaid he, if you do not, and I am able to riſe a"gain, I ſhall be very angry with you." After examining the axe, and viewing his coffin, he repeated ſeveral lines from Ovid and Horace. This done, he took off his cloaths, and knelt down at the block, telling the executioner he would ſay a ſhort prayer, and then drop his handkerchief as a ſignal for him to do his buſineſs.

Having placed himſelf too near the block, the executioner deſired him to move a little farther back, which he did, and after placing his head and neck properly on the block, in half a minute he dropped his handkerchief, when the executioner, having now become expert in his buſineſs, ſevered the head from the body at one blow, both of which were put into the coffin, and carried in a hearſe to the Tower, where, the next day, they were interred.

As his lordſhip had originally profeſſed the proteſtant religion, but had afterwards declared himſelf a Roman Catholic, while he was an exile in France; and as he had taken the oaths to the government, and profeſſed being again a proteſtant, ever ſince his return in the year 1715, it was uncertain what religion he would die of, till after he was told of the warrant being ſigned for his execution. He then threw off the diſguiſe in which he had ſo long appeared, and deſired that Mr. Baker, a Roman prieſt, might have permiſſion to come to him, for that he was and would die a Roman Catholic.

Before the warrant for his execution was ſigned, he was prevailed on by his friends to petition for a pardon for his eldeſt ſon, then a priſoner in Edinburgh Caſtle, who was forced into the rebellion by his imperious commands, as appeared by the witneſſes for the crown at his trial. In this petition, however, he refuſed to expreſs himſelf in ſuch terms as he thought bore the appearance of ſubmiſſion, or was the leaſt inconſiſtent with his real principles.

On the day of his execution, one of the largeſt ſcaffolds, on the ſouth-ſide of the hill, ſuddenly fell down; by which accident about twenty perſons were killed, and a much greater number dreadfully maimed and bruiſed.

Lord Lovat's ſon was afterwards releaſed from confinement; and the circumſtances of his caſe being conſidered, he was provided for in the army.

offering to admit the Britiſh forces, on condition that they ſhould be reſtrained from pillaging the inhabitants, and deſtroying the magazines; and that they ſhould pay a juſt price for their proviſions. Theſe terms being rejected, the inhabitants prepared for a vigorous defence; upon which general Sinclair reſolved to beſiege the place in form; though he had neither time, artillery, nor forces, ſufficient for ſuch an enterprize. All his cannon amounted to no more than a few field pieces; and he was obliged to wait for two iron guns, which the ſailors dragged up from the ſhipping. Had he given the aſſault on the firſt night after his arrival, when the town was filled with terror, in all probability it would have been eaſily taken by ſcalade; but the reduction of it was rendered impracticable by his delay. The ramparts were mounted with cannon from the ſhips in the harbour; additional works were raiſed; the garriſon was reinforced with ſeveral bodies of regular troops, and great numbers were aſſembling from different parts, ſo that the Britiſh forces were in danger of being ſurrounded in an enemy's country. Unwilling, however, to abandon the enterprize, they erected a ſmall battery againſt the town, which they ſet on fire in ſeveral places, with their bombs and red hot bullets, and repulſed a detachment from the garriſon, which had made a ſally to deſtroy their works. But finding their cannon produced no effect upon the fortifications they deſpaired of ſucceſs, and the ſeaſon of the year rendering it dangerous for the ſhips to continue on the coaſt, general Sinclair, after burying the two pieces of iron cannon, retreated to the ſea ſide, and embarked with a very inconſiderable loſs. In the beginning of October the fleet ſailed to Quiberon bay, where they deſtroyed a Spaniſh man of war, took poſſeſſion of a fort on the peninſula, and reduced the trifling iſlands of Hovat and Heydie; after which they returned to England.

On the 18th of November, the parliament met; when his majeſty, in his ſpeech, told them, that it had been propoſed to hold a conference at Breda; but as it could not be known what would be the iſſue, he was determined to proſecute the war with vigour; and therefore the commons were given to underſtand, that it would be neceſſary for them to grant the ſupplies as ſoon as poſſible.

Both houſes were unanimous in preſenting the moſt loyal and affectionate addreſſes to his majeſty; and the commons granted him 9,425,254l. for defraying the expences of the war. On the other hand, the king, in order to ingratiate himſelf with the people, propoſed to reduce three regiments of horſe and dragoons, and two troops of his life-guards, by which a conſiderable ſum of money would be ſaved: and ſo ſenſible were the commons of the king's œconomy in reducing theſe unneceſſary forces, that they received his meſſage with the warmeſt expreſſions of gratitude, and both houſes preſented him with addreſſes on the occaſion.

In the mean time, it appeared evident that the French had no intentions of making peace; for their late ſucceſſes had made them ſo arrogant, that they would hearken to no terms of accommodation, but ſuch as ſhould be dictated by themſelves. Ferdinand, the new king of Spain, who had ſucceeded his father, began to wiſh for peace; and even went ſo far, as to upbraid the French miniſtry with having led his ſubjects into an expenſive and unneceſſary war. The king of Portugal was made choice of to act as a mediator between Great-Britain and Spain; but the negotiation was rendered abortive, by the artful intrigues of the French, and the unrelenting diſpoſition of the Spaniſh queen-dowager.

A. D. 1747. The allied powers, convinced of the ambitious deſigns of France, determined to aſſemble a powerful army in the Netherlands. His royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland had ſet out for Holland about the beginning of December, to concert with marſhal Bathiani the plan of operations for the enſuing campaign, in which he was to act as commander in chief of the confederate forces. In the month of March he took the field, and fixed his head quarters at the village of Filberg: the prince of Waldeck, with the Dutch troops, were poſted at Breda, and marſhal Bathiani near Venlo. The allied army conſiſted of 120,000 men, but, through the inexcuſable negligence of the Dutch and Auſtrians, they had neither forage nor proviſions, which obliged them, notwithſtanding their early appearance in the field, to continue inactive for ſix weeks.

In the month of April count Saxe took the field at the head of 140,000 men; and the count de Clermont had under his command 19 battalions and 30 ſquadrons. On the 16th count Lowendahl was detached at the head of 27,000 men to invade Dutch Flanders; he began by inveſting Sluys, which capitulated on the 19th; and before the end of the month, Sas Van Ghent, and ſeveral other places of leſs importance were reduced. Lowendahl then inveſted Hulſt; to the aſſiſtance of which the allies ſent a detachment of three Engliſh battalions under general Fuller, and the duke of Cumberland, at the head of nine battalions more, followed with all poſſible expedition; but juſt on his arrival before the town, it was ſhamefully ſurrendered by the Dutch governor, and the firſt intimation his royal highneſs received of this event was by a general diſcharge of the artillery from the fortifications upon his troops, by which numbers of men were killed, and his own perſon in imminent danger. The French general now took poſſeſſion of Axel and Terneuſe, and, continuing his rapid progreſs, he, in a very ſhort time, completed the reduction of all Dutch Flanders. He then began to prepare flat-bottomed boats for making a deſcent upon the iſlands of Zealand, which ſtruck the inhabitants with conſternation, and in all probability they would have been obliged to ſubmit to the enemy, had not commodore Mitchel, who was ſtationed with a Britiſh ſquadron in the Swin, defeated the deſigns of Lowendahl. The populace of Zealand, ſeeing the danger to which they were reduced, clamoured loudly againſt their governors, who they aſſerted had been regardleſs of their preſervation. This opportunity was embraced by the friends of the prince of Orange. They reminded the people, that when the republic was threatened with deſtruction by Lewis XIV. in 1672, the election of a ſtadtholder abſolutely ſaved the ſtate. Inflamed by theſe repreſentations, the people roſe in a body, and compelled their magiſtrates to declare the prince of Orange ſtadtholder. In compliance with the general voice, on the 2d of May, the prince was, in the aſſembly of the ſtates-general, inveſted with that dignity, and at the ſame time declared captain-general and admiral of the United Provinces.

About this time a treaty was ſigned between his Britannic majeſty and the empreſs of Ruſſia, whereby, in conſideration of an annual ſubſidy of 300,000l. ſhe engaged to keep on foot, during the war, upon the frontiers of Livonia, a body of 50,000 foot, and 40 or 50 gallies upon the coaſt of that province, to act in ſuch manner as his Britannic majeſty ſhould think proper.

The Dutch were now ſo thoroughly ſenſible of the danger to which their dilatory proceedings had expoſed them, that they were willing to act vigorouſly, in concert with Great Britain, in proſecuting the war; but previous to their fully exerting themſelves, they inſiſted upon the diſſolution of the parliament of Great Britain, of which, from the various complexions it had worn, they had no very good opinion. With this demand, the king, by advice of his council, thought proper to comply; and on the 18th of June, having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, he diſmiſſed them with a ſpeech, filled with the moſt warm, and grateful acknowledgments for the loyalty, zeal, and tenderneſs, he had experienced from them in the moſt critical emergencies of government: a conduct, he ſaid, that muſt for ever endear the memory of this parliament to poſterity: but as it would neceſſarily determine in a ſhort time; and as nothing would give ſo much weight and credit to our affairs abroad in the preſent conjuncture, as to ſhew the dependence he had on the affections of his people, he had judged it expedient ſpeedily to call a new parliament, not in the leaſt doubting to receive freſh proofs of the ſame loyalty and affection of his faithful ſubjects in the choice of their repreſentatives. In conſequence of this declaration the parliament was diſſolved, and writs were iſſued for ſummoning a new one.

While theſe things were tranſacting, the confederates formed a deſign of retaking Antwerp: but this city was ſo effectually covered by the grand army of the enemy, and ſo well fortified and garriſoned, that they ſoon found the enterprize impracticable. His royal highneſs then reſolved to take poſt between the Great and Little Nethes, by which he covered Bergen-op-Zoom and Maeſtricht. About the latter end of May the French king arrived at Bruſſels, and Saxe then determined to undertake the ſiege of Maeſtricht. For this purpoſe he advanced towards Louvain; and the confederates perceiving his intention, put their army into motion likewiſe, to take poſt between that town and the enemy. On the 20th of July, the allies took poſſeſſion of their ground, and drew up in order of battle, with their right at Beilen, and their left extending to Wirle, within a mile of Maeſtricht, having in the front of their left wing the village of Laffeldt, in which they poſted ſeveral battalions of Britiſh infantry. The enemy had taken poſſeſſion of the heights of Herdeeren immediately above the allies; and both armies cannonaded each other till the evening. The next morning the enemy's infantry marched down the hill in one column and attacked the village of Laffeldt, which was defended with great obſtinacy. The aſſailants ſuffered terribly in their approach from the cannon of the confederates, and they met with ſuch a warm reception from the Britiſh muſquetry that they could not ſtand it; but when theſe were broke and diſperſed, freſh brigades ſucceeded with aſtoniſhing perſeverance. The allies were driven out of the village; yet being ſuſtained by three regiments, they meaſured back their ground, and repulſed the enemy with great ſlaughter. Saxe, however, continued pouring in other battalions, and, the confederates being thus over-powered by numbers, the French regained and maintained their footing in the village, after it had been three times loſt and carried.

In the mean time the duke of Cumberland ordered the Britiſh and Hanoverian forces to advance on the right of the enemy; and he had taken his meaſures ſo prudently, that victory would have declared in favour of the allies, had it not been for the cowardly behaviour of the Dutch. The Britiſh and Hanoverian foot advanced with ſuch bravery, that the French had almoſt given way, and the duke ordered the Dutch cavalry to ſupport them; but, inſtead of obeying the orders, they wheeled to the right, and trod down five battalions of the allied army. The French general, taking the advantage of this unexpected circumſtance, ordered his cavalry to advance, which they did, and broke through the lines of the Engliſh. In vain did the duke of Cumberland attempt to rally the Dutch forces; and had it not been for the moſt exemplary behaviour and bravery of Sir John Ligonier, the allied army would have been totally defeated. That brave general, putting himſelf at the head of a large body of cavalry, attacked the French with ſuch fury, that he checked their progreſs, and, in conſequence thereof, enabled the duke to retreat in very good order. Sir John having, by his gallant behaviour, thus ſaved the army, was the laſt man that offered to retreat, and then he was taken priſoner, along with the Hanoverian general d'Yſſembourg, general Bland, colonel Conway, and lord Robert Sutton. The loſs, in killed and wounded, fell almoſt wholly on the Engliſh, Hanoverians and Heſſians, for few of the Auſtrians engaged; and the Dutch, inſtead of having done their duty, contributed, in a great meaſure, towards the loſs of the battle. This victory coſt the enemy upwards of 10,000 of their beſt troops, excluſive of 700 taken priſoners, among whom were ſix officers, and ſeveral other perſons of rank and diſtinction.

After the battle the allies paſſed the Maeſe, and encamped in the duchy of Limburgh, ſo as to cover Maeſtricht, the garriſon of which was reinforced by two Engliſh, three Auſtrian, and five Dutch battallions.

The French army continued for ſome time in the neighbourhood of Tongres; and marſhal Saxe having amuſed the confederates with marches and countermarches, at length detached count Lowendahl, with 36,000 men to beſiege Bergen-op-Zoom, the ſtrongeſt fortification of Dutch Brabant, and hitherto deemed impregnable. It was ſecured with a garriſon of 3000 men, and well provided with artillery, ammunition, and magazines. The enemy appeared before it on the 12th of July, and ſummoned the governor to ſurrender, which he refuſed. The prince of Saxe-Hilburghauſen, with twenty battalions and fourteen ſquadrons of the troops that could be moſt conveniently aſſembled, were ſent to its relief: the prince entered the lines, and there waited in expectation of a ſtrong reinforcement from the allied army; and the old baron Cronſtrom, whom the ſtadtholder had appointed governor of Brabant, aſſumed the command of the garriſon. The enemy carried on their attacks with great vivacity, and the beſieged defended themſelves with equal vigour. Count Lowendahl received ſeveral reinforcements; and a conſiderable body of troops were detached from the allied army under the command of baron Schwartzemberg, to co-operate with the prince of Hilburghauſen. Lowendahl loſt a great number of his men by the continual fire from the town, while he in return opened ſuch a number of batteries, and plied them ſo warmly, that the defences began to give way. From the 16th of July to the 15th of September, the ſiege produced an uninterrupted ſcene of horror and deſtruction: deſperate ſallies were made, and mines ſprung with the moſt terrible effects: the works began to be ſhattered, the town was laid in aſhes, the trenches were filled with the bodies of the ſlain; nothing was ſeen but fire and ſmoak; nothing heard but one inceſſant roar of bombs and cannon. The damage, however, chiefly fell on the beſiegers, who were ſlain in heaps, while the garriſon ſuffered very little, and could be occaſionally relieved, or reinforced from the lines. It was now generally believed that the French general would be baffled in his endeavours: which belief ſeems to have extended to the governor of Bergen-op-Zoom, and lulled him into a fatal ſecurity: for ſome inconſiderable breaches being made in one ravelin and two baſtions, Lowendahl reſolved to ſtorm them: theſe Cronſtrom thought invincible, and, on that ſuppoſition, preſumed that the enemy would not attempt an aſſault: but the French general having regulated his diſpoſitions, about four o'clock in the morning of the 16th of September the ſignal was given for the aſſault. A prodigious quantity of bombs being caſt into the ravelin, the French troops threw themſelves into the foſſe, mounted the breaches, forced open a ſally-port, and entered the place almoſt without oppoſition; for they had time to extend themſelves along the curtain, and form themſelves in order of battle, before the garriſon could be aſſembled. But though the enemy had thus ſeized the ramparts without reſiſtance, they did not find ſo eaſy a matter to gain poſſeſſion of the town. Two battalions of the Scottiſh troops, in the ſervice of the ſtates-general, were aſſembled in the market-place, and attacked them with ſuch fury, that they drove them from ſtreet to ſtreet; but freſh forces arriving, the Scots were compelled to retreat in their turn; yet they continued to diſpute every inch of ground, fighting until two thirds of them were killed; and then thoſe which remained abandoned the town, having brought off the governor, who at the time of the aſſault was aſleep in his quarters, where he would have been ſurprized and made priſoner, had it not been for the amazing bravery of theſe Highlanders; for the troops that were encamped in the lines had retired with the utmoſt precipitation. The reduction of this important fortreſs was followed by the ſurrender of all thoſe in the neighbourhood, by which means the victors became maſters of the whole navigation of the Schelde. As ſoon as Lewis was informed of Lowendahl's ſucceſs, he promoted him to the rank of marſhal of France. He likewiſe appointed count Saxe governor of the conquered Netherlands; after which he returned in triumph to Verſailles; and in a little time both armies retired into winter quarters, when his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland embarked for England, where he arrived on the 13th of November.

During this campaign the French had a powerful army in Italy, under the command of M. Belliſle. In the beginning of April that general paſſed the Var without oppoſition, and took poſſeſſion of Nice, Montalban, Villa Franca, and Ventimiglia; while the Auſtrians under the command of general Brown retired towards Final and Savona. Count Schuylenburg, who had ſucceeded the marquis de Botta, determined, if poſſible, to recover Genoa. For this purpoſe he aſſembled his forces in the Milaneſe; when, on the 13th of January he forced the paſſage of Bochetta, and advanced into the territories of Genoa. On the 31ſt of March he appeared before that city, at the head of 46,000 men, and ſummoned the inhabitants to ſurrender, but he received for anſwer, "That they would defend their liberty to the laſt " drop of their blood, and periſh in the ruins of " their capital, rather than ſubmit to the court of " Vienna." Schuylenburg, however, did not inveſt the town till the beginning of May, when Boufflers, who commanded the Genoeſe, made a furious ſally, and drove the beſiegers from their poſt: but the Auſtrians being well ſupported, he was obliged to retreat with the loſs of 700 men. The ſiege was now carried on with the greateſt vigour and intrepidity: the ſuburbs of Biſagno were taken, and, in all probability, the city itſelf muſt have ſurrendered, had not the general been obliged to abandon his enterprize, in order to cover Piedmont and Lombardy from the attempts of the French. The ſiege, therefore, was raiſed on the 10th of June, and the Auſtrian forces returned into the Milaneſe, in order to join the army of his Sardinian majeſty.

M. Belleiſle having determined to attempt an irruption into Piedmont, arrived at the paſs of Exilles, a ſtrong fortification on the frontiers of Dauphine, on the 6th of July. The king of Sardinia had committed the defence of this important poſt to the count de Brigueras, who, with fourteen battalions of Piedmonteſe and Auſtrians, formed an encampment behind the lines; while detachments were poſted along all the paſſes of the Alps. On the 8th, the chevalier de Belleiſle, brother to the marſhal, attacked the Piedmonteſe intrenchments with ſurpriſing vigour; but was repulſed with loſs in three ſucceſſive attempts. This brave general, determined not to ſurvive a miſcarriage, made one more effort to animate his diſpirited troops. Seizing a pair of colours from the hands of an enſign, he called on thoſe neareſt him to follow, and advancing with aſtoniſhing intrepidity, amidſt a furious diſcharge of the enemy's muſquetry, he fixed the colours with his own hands upon the intrenchments; but, at the inſtant, he received two muſquet balls, one in the head and the other in the body, which laid him dead on the ſpot. The French, diſcouraged by the loſs of their leader, fled with precipitation, leaving 4800 of their men dead in the field, beſides which they had 600 wounded. The marſhal being informed of his brother's death, found all his hopes of penetrating into Piedmont by the way of Ceva fruſtrated; upon which he retreated towards the Var, to join the troops from Exilles, and prevent any invaſion on Dauphine by the king of Sardinia, for which purpoſe that monarch had aſſembled an army of 70,000 men, but the exceſſive rains rendered his ſcheme abortive; and about the middle of October both armies went into winter quarters.

The naval tranſactions of this year were very favourable to England. An expenſive armament was fitted out by the French king, in order to retake Cape Breton; but this attempt being rendered impracticable, by the death of the duke d'Anville, who had been appointed commander of the fleet, and other events, Lewis reſolved to renew his efforts againſt the Britiſh ſettlements in North America and the Eaſt Indies. Accordingly two ſquadrons were fitted out at Breſt: that deſtined to act in America was commanded by de la Jonquiere, and the other by M. de St. George. The Engliſh miniſtry being informed of theſe meaſures, determined to fruſtrate them, by intercepting both ſquadrons, which were to ſail at the ſame time. Vice-admiral Anſon and rear-admiral Warren were ordered out with a powerful fleet to cruize off Cape Finiſterre. On the 3d of May they fell in with the French ſquadron, conſiſting of ſix large men of war, the ſame number of frigates, and four armed veſſels which had been equipped by their Eaſt India company, having under their convoy thirty merchant ſhips richly laden. The enemy's ſhips of war immediately drew up in line of battle, while the merchantmen, under the protection of the ſix frigates, continued their courſe with all the ſail they could carry. The Britiſh fleet was by this time formed, and the engagement began with great fury; but the enemy were ſoon compelled to ſtrike their colours. The loſs on both ſides was nearly equal. Immediately after the battle, three ſhips were diſpatched in purſuit of the merchantmen and their convoy, nine ſail of which were taken. Our fleet then returned with their prizes in triumph to Spithead. A conſiderable ſum was found in bullion, on board the French merchant ſhips, which was conveyed to London in waggons, amidſt the acclamations of the populace. By this victory we not only put a ſtop to the deſigns of France againſt our poſſeſſions in North America and the Eaſt Indies, but likewiſe diſtreſſed them by having upwards of 4000 of their beſt ſailors locked up in our priſons. Soon after this tranſaction admiral Anſon was created a peer, and admiral Warren honoured with the order of the Bath.

Towards the latter end of June commodore Fox, with ſix ſhips of war, arriving off Cape Portugal, near the coaſt of Galicia, fell in with a fleet of French merchantmen from St. Domingo. This fleet, which conſiſted of 170 ſail, was under the convoy of four large ſhips of war, commanded by commodore de la Motte. On diſcovering the Britiſh ſquadron, La Motte abandoned his convoy, 46 ſail of which fell into our hands, having on board 1428 ſailors, together with a very valuable cargo, of ſugar, indigo, cotton, and other valuable articles.

In the beginning of Auguſt rear-admiral Hawke ſailed from Plymouth, with fourteen ſhips of the line, to intercept a fleet of French merchant ſhips bound for the Weſt Indies; and after cruiſing for ſome time upon the coaſt of Britany, about eight in the morning of the fourteenth of October, being then in the latitude of Belleiſle, he ſaw a great number of ſhips, which proved to be the fleet he was in queſt of, under convoy of nine ſhips of the line, beſides frigates commanded by M. de l'Eſtanduaire. As ſoon as the French commodore could diſtinctly make the Britiſh ſquadron, he ordered one of his great ſhips and a frigate to proceed with the merchantmen, while he formed the line of battle, and waited the attack. At eleven in the forenoon, admiral Hawke diſplayed the ſignal to chace, and in about half an hour both fleets engaged. The battle laſted till night, when all the French ſquadron, except the Intrepide and Tonant, had ſtruck to the Engliſh flag. Theſe two ſhips eſcaped in the dark, and returned to Breſt in a very ſhattered condition. The loſs of the enemy amounted to 800 men, while that of the Engliſh did not exceed 200.

As ſoon as the action was over, admiral Hawke diſpatched a ſloop to commodore Legge, whoſe ſquadron was ſtationed at the Leward iſlands, with intelligence of the French fleet of merchant ſhips outward bound, that he might take the proper meaſures for intercepting them in their paſſage to Martinique, and other French iſlands. In conſequence of this advice, the commodore redoubled his vigilance, and a great number of the enemy's ſhips fell into his hands. Admiral Hawke now conducted his prizes to England, and ſoon after his arrival was created a knight of the Bath.

Rear-admiral Knowles, with a ſquadron of eight ſhips and two frigates, attacked fort Louis, on the ſouth ſide of Hiſpaniola, which after a ſhort but vigorous defence, was ſurrendered and demoliſhed. He then made an attempt upon St. Jago, in the iſland of Cuba, but in this he miſcarried; which he attributed to the miſconduct of captain Dent; but that gentleman being tried in England by a court-martial, was acquitted with honour.

In the month of September, admiral Knowles being then on a cruize off the Havannah with ſeven ſhips of the line, he fell in with a Spaniſh ſquadron, under the command of the admirals Reggio and Spinola. Our fleet and that of the enemy were nearly equal in ſtrength, and an engagement immediately began, which laſted ſix hours; when, about eight in the evening, two of the enemy's capital ſhips ſtruck, upon which the reſt of their fleet, ſheered off, and got ſafe into the Havannah *.

In the courſe of this year the Britiſh cruizers were ſo alert and ſucceſsful, that they took 644 prizes from the French and Spaniards; whereas the loſs on our ſide did not exceed 450. In a word, the ſuperiority of the naval arms of Britain was now ſo conſpicuouſly evident, that ſhe had not an enemy to conteſt her ſovereignty of the ocean.

When ſtates and empires make the moſt forcible efforts to diſplay their ſtrength, it is then generally found that they are the moſt in need of, and moſt inclined to, a reſpite from their operations. There was not one of the belligerant powers who did not now begin to think ſeriouſly of a peace. Notwithſtanding the rapid conqueſts France had made, ſhe drooped in the midſt of her triumphs; her trade being in a manner deſtroyed by a war with the Dutch. Auſtria ſaw her finances almoſt exhauſted, her armies ill ſupplied, and moſt of her provinces laid waſte. Spain, who carried on the war with equal inactivity and ill ſucceſs, and found the evils it had intended Great Britain were all fallen on itſelf, began to adopt more moderate meaſures. England, which of all the contending powers had ſuſtained by far the greateſt expence, was not able to carry on another campaign without loading the people with new taxes, and the Dutch, who were much fonder of negotiating than fighting, ardently wiſhed to ſee their barrier freed from the French yoke, and themſelves delivered from friends, who under the pretence of protecting them, laid waſte their moſt fruitful provinces, and ſtopped the ſources of their commerce. In fine, all the contending powers ſeemed, towards the cloſe of this year, to be inſpired with the ſame pacific views and inclinations; and it required no conſummate ſkill in politics to foreſee that the war could not be of much longer duration.

The new parliament met on the 10th of November; and the commons having again choſen Arthur Onſlow eſq; their ſpeaker, his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech; in which he congratulated the two houſes on the ſignal ſucceſſes of the Britiſh navy, and the happy alteration of the government of the United Provinces. He likewiſe gave them to underſtand that a general congreſs would ſpeedily be opened at Aix-la-Chapelle, to concert the means for effecting a general pacification; and obſerved, that nothing would more conduce to the ſucceſs of this negotiation, than the vigour and unanimity of their proceedings.

Such loyal and affectionate addreſſes were preſented in return to his majeſty's ſpeech, from both houſes, as made the government perfectly ſecure of having their moſt ſanguine wiſhes fulfilled; and indeed never did parliament make good their profeſſions with greater punctuality than the preſent. They voted 40,000 ſeamen, and 49,000 land forces, beſide 11,900 marines; the ſubſidies to the queen of Hungary, the czarina, the king of Sardinia, the electors of Mentz and Bavaria, the prince of Heſſe, and the duke of Wolfenbuttle: the ſum of 235,749l. was granted to the provinces of New England, to reimburſe them for the expence of reducing Cape Breton; and 500,000l. were given to his majeſty for the farther proſecution of the war. In ſhort, the whole ſupplies fell very little ſhort of nine millions; of which ſix and a half were raiſed on a loan by ſubſcription, charged on a new ſubſidy of poundage exacted from all merchandize imported into Great Britain; and the reſt by continuing a land at 4s. in the pound, the malt duty, and a million taken from the ſinking fund.

* Here again Mr. Knowles accuſed ſome of his captains with miſbehaviour, whoſe conduct, on their return to England, was examined into by a court-martial. Two of theſe captains were cenſured; nor did the admiral himſelf eſcape without reprimand for ſome neglects he had been guilty of in the courſe of the action. This was made a kind of party quarrel amongſt the gentlemen of the admiral's ſquadron, which ended in the death of captain Clarke, who was ſhot by captain Innes in a duel fought between them in Hyde-Park: but it appearing, by unqueſtionable evidence, that the deceaſed had given the challenge, his majeſty was pleaſed to extend his royal clemency towards his antagoniſt.

A. D. 1748. In the month of March a congreſs was actually opened at Aix-la-Chapelle, by the earl of Sandwich and Sir Thomas Robinſon on the part of the Engliſh; count de St. Severin for the French; and for the States General baron de Waſſenaer and mynheer Haſſelaer.

In the mean time it had been reſolved by the allies to bring an army of 90,000 men into the Netherlands this campaign, in order to compel the French to abandon the barrier. But ſo dilatory were the Engliſh in their proceedings, that the tranſports with the troops on board, deſtined to act in the confederate army, did not ſail from the Nore till the beginning of March. The allies, however, encamped in the neighbourhood of Ruremonde, to the number of 110,000 men. Marſhal Saxe had received poſitive orders from the French king to form the ſiege of Maeſtricht, and accordingly on the third of April he inveſted that city. The garriſon conſiſted of Imperial and Dutch troops, under the command of the baron d'Alva, who defended the place with great ſpirit and reſolution; but the beſiegers, though annoyed by frequent ſallies, determined to ſurmount all oppoſition, and therefore carried on their approaches with aſtoniſhing bravery and reſolution. After a furious aſſault, in which every inch of ground was diſputed, they effected a lodgment in the covered way; and the fate of Maeſtricht began to be doubtful, when a courier arrived there from the duke of Cumberland, with advice that the preliminary articles of peace had been ſigned at Aix-la-Chapelle, on the 19th of April, upon which all hoſtilities were ſuſpended.

On the 13th of May the king put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech; in which he informed both houſes, that the preliminaries to a peace were actually ſigned at Aix-la-Chapelle, and that the baſis of this accommodation was a general reſtitution of all the places that had been taken during the war.

Immediately after the prorogation of the parliament, his majeſty having appointed a regency to govern in his abſence, ſet out for his German dominions: and now a ſuſpenſion of arms was proclaimed at London, and likewiſe in the capital of all the contracting powers: orders were ſent to the reſpective admirals to refrain from hoſtilities: and a communication of trade was again opened between the late contending nations.

During theſe tranſactions, admiral Boſcawen, who commanded a powerful armament in the Eaſt Indies, undertook the ſiege of Pondicherry. The admiral himſelf marched over land, from Fort St. David, with a ſmall army of 4000 Europeans, and about 2000 natives; the command of the fleet being left to captain Liſle of the Vigilant, who had orders to anchor with the whole ſquadron two miles to the ſouthward of Pondicherry, and remain there till farther orders: ſo that by the tenth of Auguſt the place was inveſted by land, and blocked up by ſea. The garriſon conſiſted of 2000 Europeans, and 3000 Indians, under the command of M. du Pleix, who had taken every precaution for the defence of the place; but the admiral proſecuted his operations with ſo much vigour that he ſoon made himſelf maſter of the fort of Aria Coupan, about three miles from the town; and then proceeded immediately to the town, which had been all this time bombarded by the ſhipping; but the fortifications were ſo ſtrong, that little progreſs was made. At length, finding his army reduced by ſickneſs, and the rainy ſeaſon approaching, the admiral ordered the artillery and ſtores to be reimbarked; and on the ninth of October he raiſed the ſiege, having loſt 757 ſoldiers, and 255 ſeamen: after which he had the mortification to ſee ſeveral of his ſhips, with above 1200 men, periſh in a violent hurricane on the coaſt of Coromandel.

The miniſters at Aix-la-Chapelle were all this time aſſiduouſly employed in adjuſting the articles of the definitive treaty. Plenipotentiaries from the other contending powers had joined with thoſe already mentioned; and among the whole many difficulties were ſtarted that could not be adjuſted till the return of expreſſes from their reſpective ſovereigns. At length, however, all obſtacles being removed, the definitive treaty was ſigned on the ſeventh of October, by the earl of Sandwich and Sir Thomas Robinſon, on the part of Great Britain; by the count de St. Severin and the marquis de la Porthune Thueil, on the part of France; by the marquis de Soto Major, on the part of Spain; by the count de Kaunitz, on the part of her imperial majeſty; by Don Joſeph Oſſorio and the count de Chavannes, on the part of Sardinia; and by count Bentinck and the other plenipotentiaries, for the Dutch; by the count de Monzone for the duke of Modena; and the marquis Doria for the Genoeſe.

By this famous treaty the contracting powers agreed, that all priſoners on each ſide ſhould be mutually releaſed without ranſom, and that all conqueſts ſhould be reſtored: that the duchies of Parma, Placentia, and Guaſtalla, ſhould be ceded as a ſettlement to the infant Don Philip, and the heirs male of his body; but in caſe of his aſcending the throne of Spain, or that of the two Sicilies, or his dying without male iſſue, that they ſhould revert to the houſe of Auſtria: That the king of Great Britain ſhould, immediately after the ratification of this treaty, ſend two perſons of rank and diſtinction, to reſide in France, as hoſtages, until reſtitution ſhould be made of Cape Breton, and all the other conqueſts which his Britannic majeſty ſhould have made in the Eaſt or Weſt Indies, before or after the preliminaries were ſigned: that the aſſiento contract, with the annual ſhip, ſhould be confirmed for four years, during which the enjoyment of that privilege was ſuſpended ſince the commencement of the preſent war: that Dunkirk ſhould remain fortified on the land ſide, but towards the ſea continue on the footing of former treaties. All the contracting parties became guarantees to the king of Pruſſia for the duchy of Sileſia and the county of Glatz, as he at preſent poſſeſſed them; and they likewiſe engaged to ſecure the empreſs queen of Hungary and Bohemia in poſſeſſion of her hereditary dominions, according to the pragmatic ſanction.

The other articles regarded the form and time fixed for the mutual reſtitutions, as well as for the termination of hoſtilities in different parts of the world. But the right of Britiſh ſubjects to navigate in the American ſeas, without being ſubject to ſearch, was not once mentioned; though in fact this claim was the original ſource of the war between Great Britain and Spain: neither were the limits of Acadia aſcertained. Theſe and all other diſputes were left to the diſcuſſion of commiſſaries.

No peace ever gave leſs ſatisfaction to the Engliſh than this of Aix-la-Chapelle. Great ſums of money had been granted by the Britiſh parliament, the ſubjects had been loaded with heavy taxes, and they had paid them in order to ſupport the honour of the nation; but here, in conſequence of this treaty, they found that their treaſure had been laviſhed away, and the flower of their army deſtroyed, for no other purpoſe than that of ſupporting German princes, and protecting the electorate of Hanover. They complained that their plenipotentiaries had deceived them, and concluded the articles of peace before they had been duly conſidered by the people; and nothing but murmurs were to be heard throughout the kingdom.

On the 23d of November his majeſty arrived in England from his German dominions; and on the 29th of the ſame month he opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein he informed them that the definitive treaty of peace was at length ſigned by all the parties concerned; that he had made the moſt effectual proviſion for ſecuring the rights and intereſts of his ſubjects, and for procuring to his allies the beſt terms and conditions that the ſituation of affairs would admit: that he took much ſatisfaction in being able to tell them, that he had found a good diſpoſition in all the parties engaged in the war to bring this negotiation to a happy concluſion: that from theſe circumſtances they might promiſe themſelves a long enjoyment of the bleſſings of peace, provided they made a right uſe and improvement of it: that as great a progreſs had been made in reducing the public expences as the nature of the caſe would allow; and he only deſired them to grant him ſuch ſupplies as might be requiſite for the current ſervice of the year, for their own ſecurity, and for fulfilling ſuch engagements as had been already contracted and laid before them: that times of tranquillity were the moſt proper for leſſening the national debt, and ſtrengthening themſelves againſt future events; and he muſt recommend to them, as the moſt effectual means for theſe purpoſes, the improving of the public revenue, and the maintaining the naval force of the kingdom in due ſtrength and vigour: that theſe brave men, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the ſervice of their country, were certainly proper objects of parliamentary favour and protection; and he hoped they would deem it their duty, as well as intereſt, to convert their moſt ſerious attention towards the advancing of commerce, and the cultivating of the arts of peace.

Both houſes preſented very loyal and affectionate addreſſes in anſwer to this ſpeech, though not without ſome oppoſition from the commons. Some of the members in the oppoſition condemned the conduct of the miniſtry in giving plenary powers to the deputies to conclude a peace, before the arrival of 37,000 Ruſſians, who were on their march to join the allied army. They inſiſted that an enquiry ſhould be ſet on foot, to make thoſe at the helm of public affairs give an account in what manner the public money had been ſo laviſhly ſquandered away; but the power of the miniſterial party bore down all oppoſition; and even eight millions were granted for the ſervice of the current year.

BOOK XVI.

From the Concluſion of the Treaty of Peace at Aix-la-Chapelle, to the Demiſe of George the Second.

A. D. 1749. THE calamities of war being now happily terminated, by the late treaty of peace*, the parliament directed their attention to ſuch meaſures as might be moſt intereſting to the nation, and thereby ſatisfactory to the people. During the courſe of the ſeſſion ſeveral excellent laws were made; and ſuch trifling contentions took place, that the buſineſs was diſpatched with very little interruption. The chief matter of debate aroſe in conſequence of a bill for naturalizing foreign proteſtants; but the city of London remonſtrated ſo ſtrongly againſt it, that the bill was dropped.

The parliamentary buſineſs being finiſhed, his majeſty, on the 13th of June, put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſhort ſpeech, in which he told them, That the terms and conditions of the definitive treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle had been carried into execution by the ſeveral contracting parties with great punctuality and good faith, ſo far as the time and diſtance of the places would admit. He expreſſed his hopes, that at the next meeting they would be able to perfect what they had already begun, for advancing the trade and navigation of his kingdoms; particularly, by rendering our naval force the moſt ſerviceable and uſeful. He expreſſed his ſatisfaction at ſeeing the public credit in ſo flouriſhing a condition, at the end of an expenſive, tho' neceſſary war, and then having thanked them for their ſupplies, and recommended unanimity among them, he prorogued the parliament.

During the ſitting of parliament the earl of Hallifax, (who was at this time firſt lord of trade and plantations) formed a ſcheme, in which he was aſſiſted by many perſons of diſtinction, for the ſettlement of a new colony in Nova Scotia, in order to extend the power of Great Britain in that large tract of country, diffuſe the benefits of population and agriculture, and improve the fiſhery of that extenſive coaſt. This excellent and patriotic ſcheme met with the ſucceſs it deſerved; for his majeſty having been pleaſed to honour it with his royal approbation, the lords of trade and plantations gave notice in the Gazette, and other public papers, on the 7th of March, that proper encouragement would be given to ſuch of the officers and private men lately diſmiſſed his majeſty's land and ſea ſervice, as were willing to accept of grants of land, and to ſettle with, or without their families in the province of Nova Scotia. In conſequence of this advertiſement, by the beginning of May, no leſs than 3.750 perſons, with their families, had engaged themſelves to go to this new ſettlement, and fix their habitations there. The honourable Edward Cornwallis was appointed governor of this infant colony, and accordingly accompanied the ſettlers thither. The whole fleet, after a pleaſant voyage, ge, arrived ſafely at Nova Scotia, and anchored on the 21ſt of June, in the bay of Chebucto, ſituated in the center of the ſouthern part of the province; Annapolis being on the ſouth, and Canſo on the north. Immediately on their arrival a town was planned out at the head of Chebucto harbour, and ſoon finiſhed; when it was divided into lots, and named Hallifax, from the title of the peer who firſt projected it. Many people ſoon after ſettled in its neighbourhood; and, upon the whole, Hallifax may be now looked upon as one of the moſt valuable acquiſitions to the Engliſh nation.

* In the month of February the declaration of a general peace was proclaimed at the uſual places in London and Weſtminſter; and in April a moſt magnificent fire-work was played off in the Green Park, in commemoration of that event. It was honoured by the preſence of his majeſty and the royal family, both houſes of parliament, and all the principal perſons of London and Weſtminſter: but it miſcarried in the execution by the ſudden blowing up of a part of the ſtructure; by which the great pains, time and expence beſtowed on it were in ſome meaſure rendered fruitleſs.

On the 16th of November the parliament again re-aſſembled, and his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he declared, That he now met them with particular pleaſure, as the re-eſtabliſhment of a general peace had reſtored to his people the bleſſings of tranquillity: that the good effects reſulting from thence were already apparent by the flouriſhing condition of commerce, and the riſe of public credit, which naturally laid the ſureſt foundation, for an increaſe of ſtrength and laſting proſperity to his kingdoms: that he had not failed, during the courſe of the laſt ſummer, to avail himſelf of every opportunity that offered for cementing and preſerving the peace; and that it was his firm reſolution to do every thing in his power, to preſerve it inviolable, and to adhere religiouſly to the engagements he had contracted.

The commons voted 183,232l. for making good the engagements into which his majeſty had entered; 1,045,590l. towards diſcharging the national debt; 463,052l. for ſupplying deficiences; 249,930l. for defraying extraordinary expences; 122,246l. for reimburſing the inhabitants of North America the money they had expended in making preparations for an expedition againſt Canada, and for ſupporting the colony of Nova Scotia; 36,476l. towards maintaining the above coloniſts during a twelvemonth; and 2,199,855l. for the ſervices of the enſuing year. The whole ſupply amounted to upwards of four millions.

About this time the attention of the public was engaged by a diſturbance of a very ſingular nature. Several young Oxonians of an irregular and diſſolute turn, had for ſome time taken it into their heads, in all companies, and on all occaſions, to be guilty of many idle and inſolent reflections upon the preſent government, and even publicly to toaſt the young pretender's health. The vice-chancellor of the univerſity, and the heads of houſes, had done their utmoſt to check the licentiouſneſs of theſe ſparks, but in vain; therefore, in order to diſculpate themſelves, they publiſhed a declaration, expreſſing their utmoſt abhorrence of ſuch factious and ſeditious practices, and likewiſe their firm reſolution to puniſh, according to the utmoſt ſeverity and rigour of the ſtatutes, all perſons, of what ſtate or quality ſoever, who ſhould be convicted of ſuch offences. Nevertheleſs, as no puniſhment was inflicted on the delinquents by the univerſity, the government ordered three of the moſt audacious of them to be taken into cuſtody; two of whom, Dawes and Whitmore, were tried in the court of King's Bench; and being found guilty, on the cleareſt evidence, were ſentenced to walk through the courts of Weſtminſter, with a paper fixed on their foreheads, denoting their crimes, to pay a fine of five nobles each, to be impriſoned for two years, and to find ſecurity for their good behaviour during ſeven years more. Some ſevere cenſures were paſſed upon the univerſity itſelf on this occaſion; the principals of which were ſtrongly ſuſpected of being tinctured with Jacobitiſm.

During the courſe of this year ſeveral perſons of eminence paid the debt of nature; particularly, Charles Seymour, the great duke of Somerſet; the humane and generous John duke of Montague; field-marſhal Richard Temple, viſcount Cobham; John Lindſay, the brave earl of Crawford; Sir John Norris, admiral of England; and Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, who had been ſo famous for his oppoſition to the Walpolean adminiſtration.

A. D. 1750. In the beginning of this year the inhabitants of London were thrown into the utmoſt conſternation by two ſhocks of an earthquake: the firſt happened on the 8th of February, between twelve and one at noon, and was felt throughout the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and the parts adjacent; ſome chimnies were thrown down, and the waters, in ſeveral places, were greatly agitated. The ſecond happened on the 8th of March following, about half after five in the morning. The latter was far more ſevere than the former, though providentially no lives were loſt. It was preceded by a hollow ruſtling noiſe, reſembling that of wind. In ſome places the ſhock was ſo violent that the people left their beds and houſes, and ran into the ſtreet almoſt naked. For ſome time before the ſhock happened a continual, confuſed lightning, which darted with great ſtrength and very low, was obſerved. The ſhock was felt in ſeveral parts of Eſſex, Surry, and Kent, as well as in Middleſex, ſo that the panic became univerſal in all the four counties; and was ſtill farther increaſed by the ridiculous prediction of a wild enthuſiaſtical ſoldier, who boldly propheſied that a third ſhock would happen in the night between the 7th and 8th of April, and lay the whole cities of London and Weſtminſter in ruins. Though this prognoſtication ſeems, when viewed in the eye of reaſon, too ridiculous to merit the leaſt attention, yet it produced the moſt aſtoniſhing effect on the credulous and already terrified vulgar. Multitudes of the inhabitants abandoned their houſes, and retired into the country; and in the evening of the 7th of April the fields adjacent to the metropolis were crouded with people, who waited there during the whole night in the moſt alarming ſituation, till the light of the morning put an end to their apprehenſions, by convincing them, that the prophecy they had been weak enough to credit had no other baſis than that of falſhood.

On the 18th of March, between five and ſix in the evening, a ſhock of an earthquake was alſo felt at Goſport, Portſmouth, and the Iſle of Wight, which greatly ſurprized and terrified the inhabitants. Several other places in Europe were viſited with this dreadful calamity, as France, Germany, &c. The iſland of Cerigo, in the Archipelago, was almoſt deſtroyed, and above 2000 of the inhabitants periſhed.

The parliamentary buſineſs being finiſhed, his majeſty, on the 12th of April, went to the houſe of peers, and after thanking the commons for the ſupplies they had granted, and the attention they had ſhewn to the good of the public, prorogued * the parliament; a few days after which he ſet out for his German dominions.

* Soon after the prorogation of the parliament, a very extraordinary accident happenned at the ſeſſions at the Old Bailey. The putrified air adhering to the clothes of the malefactors, ſpread a peſtilential fever among the audience. The Lord-mayor of London, one alderman, two of the judges, ſeveral lawyers, and the greater part of the jury, loſt their lives by this peſtilential vapour. This melancholy cataſtrophe occaſioned orders to be given for thoroughly cleaning the jail of Newgate, and erecting a ventilator on the leads, in order to extract the foul air out of the priſon, and cauſe a circulation of freſh; to prevent, if poſſible, the like event for the future.

couraging the Britiſh herring and white-cod fiſheries. Several perſons of eminence now promoted this intention; a company was formed, and the prince of Wales choſen their governor. Every method was taken to procure the Dutch manner of curing the fiſh; ſubſcriptions were ſent from all quarters, and a great number of hands were employed in building and equipping the buſſes, or veſſels, uſed in the fiſheries; and the moſt pleaſing hopes were entertained, that this undertaking would be productive of the greateſt national advantages. But ſo many difficulties occured in the execution, that the ſucceſs did not equal their ſanguine expectations.

As ſeveral difficulties between England and Spain could not be ſettled by the general treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, conferences were now opened at Madrid for terminating them. At the beginning the debates were very warm between the plenipotentiaries of the reſpective nations; but it was at laſt concluded, that the king of Spain ſhould pay in three months, to the South Sea company of England, 100,000l. ſterling, as an indemnification for all the claims upon the crown by virtue of the aſſiento contract; that the Engliſh trading to the ports of Spain, ſhould pay no other duties than thoſe exacted from them during the reign of the Spaniſh monarch Charles II. that they ſhould be treated on the footing of the moſt favoured nations; and that they ſhould continue to enjoy the privilege of gathering ſalt on the iſland of Tortuga.

While the king was abroad he ſigned a treaty with the emperor of Morroco; by which all the Britiſh captives in his dominions were ſet at liberty. He alſo endeavoured to get the archduke Joſeph, ſon of the emperor, elected king of the Romans; but the ſcheme met with ſuch oppoſition, that for the preſent it was obliged to be laid aſide.

A. D. 1751. His majeſty being returned from his German dominions, on the 17th January he opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech, in which he informed them, that he had concluded two treaties, one with the king of Spain, and the other with ſome of the German princes, the contents of which ſhould be laid before them. He recommended to both houſes unanimity in their councils: and concluded, by deſiring them not to forget the ſtate of the nation, but above all things provide for its internal ſafety. To this ſpeech loyal addreſſes were preſented by both houſes, and received by his majeſty in the moſt gracious manner.

The attention of the commons was entirely engroſſed at the beginning of this ſeſſion, in conſidering a cauſe of a very delicate and intereſting nature. Lord Trentham, eldeſt ſon to earl Gower, and one of the repreſentatives for Weſtminſter, having in the courſe of the former ſeſſion accepted of the place of a lord of the admiralty, his ſeat in parliament became of conſequence vacated; and having again declared himſelf a candidate, he met with a powerful opponent in the perſon of Sir George Vandeput, a private gentleman, who was powerfully ſupported by the anti-miniſterial party, and by all thoſe who aſſumed the name of independent electors.

During the receſs of parliament, matters had been carried on with great acrimony between the two parties. Upon the cloſing of the poll, lord Trentham appeared to have the majority of votes; upon which the other candidate demanded a ſcrutiny, which was immediately granted; and this likewiſe turned out in favour of his lordſhip, who was thereupon returned by the high-bailiff of Weſtminſter as duly elected, and took his ſeat accordingly in the houſe at the opening of the ſeſſion. Enraged at their defeat, the other party immediately preſented two petitions to the houſe againſt this return; one from Sir George's friends, the other from himſelf, both complaining of the injuſtice and partiality ſhewn by the high-bailiff in the courſe of the ſcrutiny. In oppoſition to theſe, lord Trentham made complaint of unconſtitutional practices in his opponents, and in particular of their having inſulted and intimidated the high-bailiff in the execution of his office.

The matter was now brought before the houſe, where the high-bailiff made his appearance, and accuſed counſellor Crowle, the honourable Alexander Murray, brother to the lord Elibank, and one Gibſon, an upholder, of having been moſt forward in obſtructing him, in the diſcharge of his duty. Theſe three perſons were ſummoned to the bar, when Mr. Crowle was ordered to receive a reprimand from the ſpeaker on his knees, and Gibſon was committed priſoner to Newgate. The charge againſt Mr. Murray was more heavy than againſt the other two, the high-bailiff accuſing him of having behaved in the moſt riotous and ſcandalous menner, as well during the time of the ſcrutiny as when it was over, and with threatening him, the high-bailiff, and committing other acts of violence after the return was made; in particular, the having put himſelf at the head of a mob who ſeemed to be for Sir George Vandeput, and exciting and inflaming the ſaid mob to inſult and murder the high-bailiff, by repeatedly crying out, "Will no body knock the dog on the "head? Will no body kill the dog?" or words to that effect. Full proof of this charge being made to the houſe, they reſolved that Mr. Murray ſhould be committed cloſe priſoner to Newgate, and that he ſhould be brought to the bar of the houſe to receive ſentence on his knees. To the bar he was accordingly brought; but when he came there he peremptorily refuſed to kneel; a circumſtance that greatly aggravated his former crime, by thus daring to ſet the whole houſe of commons at defiance. It was therefore reſolved, that the honourable Alexander Murray, Eſq; having in a moſt inſolent and audacious manner, at the bar of the houſe, refuſed to be upon his knees, in compliance with their former reſolution, had been guilty of a high and moſt dangerous contempt of the authority and privilege of the houſe: that for this offence he ſhould be committed cloſe priſoner to Newgate; and that while he was there, he ſhould not be allowed the uſe of pen, ink, or paper, nor be indulged in the privilege of having any perſon admitted to him, without the leave of the houſe.

Theſe reſolutions were immediately put in execution, and that night, (or rather morning, for this affair kept the houſe ſitting till one o'clock) Mr. Murray was conveyed to Newgate, where he continued till the end of the ſeſſion, and the legality of lord Trentham's election was now fully confirmed*.

During

* While Mr. Murray was in Newgate he was taken dangerouſly ill, and application was made to the houſe, that he might be removed to a more commodious place. The phyſician that attended him was particularly examined, who gave it as his opinion that Mr. Murray was affected with the jail diſtemper. On this report, after ſome debates, the houſe agreed, that the ſpeaker ſhould iſſue a warrant for removing him to the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms; but Mr. Murray, who conſidered their whole conduct as an oppreſſive exertion of unjuſt power, refuſed to accept their favour, and expreſſed a reſentment againſt his friends for having made application without his knowledge. He therefore remained in Newgate till the 25th of June, when the ſeſſion of parliament expiring, he was releaſed.

When he left Newgate he was accompanied in his coach by lord Carpenter, and Sir George Vandeput, in whoſe cauſe he ſuffered; with the ſheriffs of London in a chariot, and other gentlemen in coaches, who formed a proceſſion; and in this manner he proceeded from Newgate, amidſt a vaſt concourſe of people, to his brother's, the lord Elibank, in Henrietta-ſtreet, near Oxford-market. It was remarked, that on the firſt firing of the guns, when

During the ſitting of the parliament the nation ſuſtained an irreparable loſs in the death of his royal highneſs Frederick, prince of Wales, (father to his preſent majeſty) who paid the debt of nature on the 20th of March, in the 45th year of his age. His death was occaſioned by the breaking of an impoſthume between the pericardium and diaphragm, which threw the matter contained in it upon the ſubſtance of the lungs. His royal highneſs caught a cold about three weeks before in Kew Gardens; and this was encreaſed by his coming very warm from the houſe of lords with the windows of his chair down; ſoon after which he complained of pains that were thought to be pleuretic, and were attended with a fever. About a quarter of an hour before his death, he told Dr. Wilmot, who attended him, and had been up all the preceding night, that he was much better, and adviſed the doctor to go home. A few minutes after the doctor's departure he complained to the princeſs (who ſtill remained with him) of a ſudden pain and a very offenſive ſmell, when throwing himſelf on his back, he immediately expired. His remains were depoſited in the chapel of Henry VII. the duke of Somerſet walking as chief mourner, attended by ſeveral other noblemen.

With reſpect to the character of this prince, we muſt conſider it both in a public and private light. In public, he ſeemed to have nothing ſo much at heart as the good of the people; and he often attended the debates in the houſe of peers, in order to acquire a perfect knowledge of the conſtitution. The people in general had formed the moſt ſanguine hopes, that one day they would be happy under his government; and there is great reaſon to believe, that had he aſcended the throne, he would have cultivated the arts of peace in a manner ſuperior to all thoſe who had gone before him. In his private life, he was an affectionate huſband, a tender parent, an indulgent maſter, and a ſincere friend. All the time he could ſpare from public buſineſs, was ſpent in ſuperintending the education of his children; ſo that it may juſtly be ſaid of him, "He joined in one, the prince, the "father, the huſband, and the friend." But all the hopes of the public were blaſted, and ſunk in the nature of all ſublunary things.

Soon after the death of the prince, his eldeſt ſon (our preſent ſovereign) was created prince of Wales; and the princeſs-dowager of Wales, his mother, was, by the parliament, appointed to act as regent in his ſtead, if his majeſty ſhould happen to die before he arrived at years of maturity.

On the 25th of June the king went to the houſe of peers, when, after thanking them for the prudence and diſpatch with which they had conducted the public buſineſs, he prorogued the parliament.

Among the acts paſſed this ſeſſion of parliament was one for regulating the commencement of the year, and correcting the calendar, agreeable to the Gregorian computation, which had been long adopted by moſt other kingdoms. It was, by this ſtatute, enacted, that the year ſhould, for the future, begin on the firſt of January, and that the eleven intermediate and nominal days between the 2d and 14th of September next ſhould, for that year, be omitted. By this correction the equinoxes and ſolſtices will happen nearly on the ſame nominal days on which they fell at the council of Nice, in the year 325.

The death of prince Frederick was not the only ſhock the royal family received during the courſe of this year. On the 11th of October the prince of Orange died, in the 41ſt year of his age; and that event was ſucceeded by the death of the queen of Denmark, youngeſt daughter of his majeſty, who expired or the 19th of December.

Beſides the royal perſons already mentioned, his Swediſh majeſty paid the debt of nature this year, and was ſucceeded by Adolphus Frederick, duke of Holſtein Eutin, and biſhop of Lubeck.

With reſpect to the affairs on the continent, the French ſeemed intent on proſecuting their deſign of enlarging their conqueſts in North America, and in ſpiriting up the Indians to murder our traders on the borders of Virginia. Spain was intent on putting their navy on a proper footing; and, for that purpoſe, ſeveral of the men who, in conſequence of the peace, had been diſcharged from our dock-yards, were inveigled over to that country, where they built ſeveral ſhips of war on the ſame model as the Engliſh. Nothing could be more inconſiſtent with ſound policy, than to ſuffer thoſe uſeful men to leave the kingdom; and it was the duty of the miniſtry, when they diſcharged them, to provide for them ſome other employments, inſtead of leaving them to ſtarve.

On the 14th of November the parliament reaſſembled, when his majeſty, in his ſpeech, informed them, that he had, in conjunction with the ſtates, concluded a treaty with the king of Poland, elector of Saxony. He added, that the untimely death of the prince of Orange had occaſioned no change of affairs in Holland; and that he had received the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from the ſtates of their firm reſolution to maintain the intimate union and friendſhip happily ſubſiſting between his majeſty and thoſe ancient and natural allies to his crown. He concluded with exhorting both houſes to conſider ſeriouſly of ſome effectual method for ſuppreſſing thoſe audacious crimes of robbery and violence then ſo frequent about the capital; proceeding, in a great meaſure, from that profligate ſpirit of irreligion, idleneſs, gaming, and extravagance, which had of late extended itſelf in an uncommon degree; to the great diſhonour of the nation, and the prejudice of the principal part of the people.*

when his majeſty went to the houſe, orders were given to get all things in readineſs for his releaſement; and on the ſecond firing, on his majeſty's return, he ſtepped into his coach, accompanied as before-mentioned, and went in proceſſion with a flag carried before him, on which was written, in large letters, "MURRAY "AND LIBERTY."

Mr. Murray's caſe was afterwards publiſhed in a very ſpirited pamphlet, which renewing the reſentment of the houſe at their next meeting, it was reſolved that he ſhould be again committed to Newgate, and that he ſhould receive the ſentence on his knees. To avoid this, however, he very prudently retired, and went abroad. A proſecution was commenced againſt the publiſher of his caſe for a libel; but in that the houſe met with a rebuff, by the jury bringing in a verdict for the defendant.

* Never was admonition of this kind more neceſſary from the throne than at this period; for a greater ſpirit of profligacy and diſſoluteneſs now prevailed than had been known for many years paſt. Numbers of perſons were executed for the moſt ſhocking and atrocious crimes. In the courſe of this year only, one Miſs Blandy was executed for poiſoning her father, an eminent attorney at Henley upon Thames in Oxfordſhire; and Miſs Jefferies, another young gentlewoman, was executed, with Swan her lover, for murdering her uncle, a wealthy tradeſman who had retired from buſineſs, and with whom ſhe had lived for a conſiderable time. A large mob aſſembled at Tring in Hertfordſhire, and ſeizing an old woman and her huſband (each of them upwards of 70 years of age) under the notion of their having bewitched ſome of the neighbours, treated them with ſuch inhumanity, by ducking and beating them, that the woman died on the ſpot, and the man in a very few days after. For this murder one Colley was hanged. Three fellows, namely, Nichols, Welſh and Jones, were diſcovered this year alſo to have been the authors of a rape and murder, for which one Coleman, a brewer's clerk, had unjuſtly ſuffered upon their falſe evidence. Thoſe wretches were ſo har-

To this ſpeech addreſſes, replete with expreſſions of loyalty, affection and approbation, were returned by both houſes; and ſuch an unanimity now appeared in their proceedings, as afforded the moſt pleaſing proſpect to every true lover of his country.

A. D. 1752. The neceſſary ſupplies being granted, the commons proceeded on other buſineſs of importance; and many uſeful acts were paſſed for the regulation of the internal policy of the nation. One act was made to puniſh ſuch as kept diſorderly houſes; and another, by which all pawnbrokers were obliged to take out licences: that the people in the highlands might be brought under a proper ſubjection to the government, ſome of the forfeited eſtates were reduced into one conſolidated fund, and the profits ariſing from them appropriated towards erecting charity ſchools, that the children of thoſe concerned in the rebellion might be brought up in the principles of the proteſtant religion. Working-ſchools were at the ſame time eſtabliſhed, by which many poor children were uſefully employed; and poſterity will have reaſon to bleſs thoſe who firſt propoſed making an act that will, in the end, be attended with the moſt beneficial conſequences.

Another act was paſſed during this ſeſſion of parliament for preventing the horrid crime of murder: wherein it was ordained, that every criminal convicted of having wilfully, and of malice, killed another, ſhould be executed on the next day except one after the ſentence was pronounced; but if it ſhould happen that ſentence was pronounced on Friday, then execution was not to take place till Monday, becauſe of the Sunday intervening. The body of the malefactor was to be either delivered to the Surgeons, to be diſſected and anatomized, or it was to be hung in chains on a gibbet; but it was not, on any account whatever, to be buried. The commons paſſed a reſolution, that, for the future, all their daily journals ſhould be annually publiſhed, and the care of the publication was left to Mr. Hardinge, the chief clerk, which gave great ſatisfaction to the ſubjects in general.

The parliamentary buſineſs being finiſhed, his majeſty, on the 25th of March, went to the houſe of peers, and after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, prorogued the parliament; a few days after which he ſet out for Hanover.

During the courſe of this year moſt of the powers of Europe were very buſy in promoting ſuch ſchemes as ſeemed conſiſtent either with their intereſt or ambition. Some trifling diſputes aroſe between the king of Pruſſia and the court of Great Britain, but theſe were adjuſted in the moſt amicable manner. In Corſica, nothing was to be ſeen but diſorders of the worſt ſort; for the Genoeſe, who pretended to the right of ſovereignty over that iſland, had impoſed ſuch grievous taxes on that people that they became mad by oppreſſion. In Germany, a ſecond attempt was made to elect the archduke Joſeph king of the Romans; but it was ſo violently oppoſed by the king of Pruſſia, that the whole dropped for the preſent, contrary to the inclination of his Britannic majeſty, who had exerted himſelf very much on the occaſion. In America the French were carrying on their plots in ſuch a barefaced manner, that it was not conſiſtent with the honour or intereſt of Great Britain to remain an idle ſpectator. Nor were the French leſs aſſiduous in executing their projects in the Eaſt-Indies, where they ſpirited up the natives to make incurſions into our ſettlements, by which many of our traders were much injured. In the Weſt-Indies, the ſame ſchemes were carried on; ſo that the people of this country began to ſee that the French had only made peace in order to declare war as ſoon as they could, conſiſtent with the nature of their circumſtances.

On the 15th of September this year, a moſt dreadful hurricane happened in South-Carolina, by which many of the inhabitants were killed, and ſeveral houſes in Charles-Town deſtroyed. This reduced the people to great diſtreſs; but the generoſity of the inhabitants of Great Britain was ſo warm in their favour, that all their loſſes were made up, and the colony left in a more flouriſhing condition than ever.

A. D. 1753. The king being returned from his German dominions, on the 11th of January he opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne; to which both houſes returned very loyal and affectionate addreſſes. Two millions were granted for the ſervice of the current year; and, upon the moſt ſtrict enquiry, it appeared that the national debt amounted to the enormous ſum of 74,468,451l. 15s.

During this ſeſſion ſeveral acts were paſſed, particularly one for bringing to juſtice all thoſe concerned in plundering ſuch ſhips as ſhould happen, by ſtreſs of weather, to be driven on the Engliſh coaſt. This was a moſt humane act; as the inhabitants reſiding near the ſea, particularly in Cornwall, had been guilty of that infamous practice; and thoſe who ought to have been conſidered as objects of compaſſion, were robbed and ſtripped naked.

But that which principally attracted the notice both of the public and the legiſlature, was a bill brought in for the general naturalization of the Jews. It was much countenanced by the miniſtry; and having originated in the houſe of lords, it paſſed with very little oppoſition.

As ſoon as it was known that this bill had paſſed the upper houſe, the whole nation appeared in one continued ſcene of clamour and oppoſition. It was repreſented as an attempt to undermine the chriſtian religion, and ſet aſide the order of God. The lord-mayor of London, with the aldermen and common-council, preſented petitions againſt it, and ſo did the greater part of the merchants; but notwithſtanding, it paſſed the lower houſe by a great majority. It is not conſiſtent with the dignity of hiſtory to intermeddle with political diſputes, any farther than to relate the circumſtances that gave riſe to them. Thoſe who ſupported this bill thought that great riches would be brought into the nation; and that the Jews, by buying up the goods manufactured by our artificers, would extend our commerce throughout the world. On the other hand, the popular party ſaid, that the Jews had been fugitives and vagabonds ever ſince the reign of the emperor Veſpaſian; that it was the order of God they ſhould be ſo for rejecting the Meſſiah, and the terms of ſalvation offered in the goſpel. They added farther, that they were to continue ſo till they acknowledged the Lord of glory, and therefore it was the higheſt preſumption in us to grant them any indulgence. Indeed, the legiſlative power, as well as the miniſtry, were ſenſible of this; for next ſeſſion the act was repealed, and the people, in conſequence thereof, looked upon themſelves as releaſed from a ſtate of bondage.

The next bill which engaged the attention of the public was that to prevent clandeſtine marriages. The dened as, to be preſent at Coleman's execution, heard the declaration of his innocence, and afterwards aſſiſted in drawing the cart from under him. Nichols, by turning evidence, eſcaped the punishment due to his crime; but the other two were hanged, confeſſing their guilt.

The reaſon of this bill being brought in aroſe from young heirs and heireſſes having inadvertently placed their affections on others below their ſtation, by which they were often reduced to ruin. It is extremely natural for men who have procured titles, and acquired riches, to endeavour to preſerve the one untainted, and the other undiminiſhed; and the warmer paſſions becoming extinct in the mind, a ſort of nominal prudence takes place that can never be agreeable to youth. Such were the reaſons aſſigned, or rather made uſe of, in framing this bill; and it not only paſſed both houſes by a great majority, but alſo became a law, in conſequence of the royal aſſent. It is certain, that it has both its advantages and diſadvantages, but the end deſigned by it has not taken place. No proviſion is made in the act againſt foreign marriages; and therefore nothing is more common than to hear of minors' going over to the continent, to indulge their inclinations; nor has Scotland, where the proteſtant religion is profeſſed, been ſo much as mentioned. The act, like all others of a public nature, occaſioned much ſpeculation, and was either approved of or condemned according to the different ſentiments of the people. It is certain, that it might have been framed in a much better manner; but, upon the whole, we may ſee that nothing is more difficult than the reducing of natural principles to civil inſtitutions, founded on the caprice of men, who, in general, are guided by their paſſions, inſtead of reaſon.

About this time an inſtitution was eſtabliſhed, which had been long wanting in Britain, and was of the utmoſt importance to the republic of letters. The vaſt collection of natural curioſities belonging to Sir Hans Sloane (who lately paid the debt of nature) were purchaſed by the government, and depoſited in the noble ſtructure called Montague Houſe, in Great Ruſſel-ſtreet, near Bloomſbury, in conſequence of an act of parliament paſſed for that purpoſe. But, that the honour of the nation might be fully eſtabliſhed, and a place opened for men of learning to ſtudy, without being at any expence, the collection of manuſcripts belonging to the earl of Oxford were likewiſe purchaſed; and theſe, with the king's library, and the valuable collection made by Sir John and Sir Robert Cotton, were brought to the ſame place, which is now called the Britiſh Muſeum, and is open for the reception and uſe of the public in general. Nothing could have done greater honour to the nation than this inſtance of their good ſenſe and unbounded liberality. The moſt curious records in the nation, and copies of ſuch books as are not to be found any where elſe, are now left free for the inſpection of every one. The great officers of ſtate, amounting to twenty-one in number, are appointed official governors of this royal foundation. Two are appointed by the Oxford family, two by the deſcendants of Sir Hans Sloane, and the ſame number by thoſe who are heirs to Sir John and Sir Robert Cotton. Theſe, amounting to twenty-ſeven in number, are to chuſe fifteen, ſo as to make the whole body of governors forty-two. But although their number is ſo large, yet no perſon can be preſented to an office in the houſe, but by an order ſigned by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord-chancellor, and the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons.

The parliament continued ſitting till the 17th of June, when his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and in a ſhort ſpeech informed them, that nothing had happened, ſo far as he had been able to procure intelligence, that could in the leaſt diſturb the public peace; after which both houſes were prorogued.

With reſpect to foreign affairs, the French were every where buſy in preparing to break through the treaty of Aix-la-chapelle, as ſoon as an opportunity ſhould offer. They had been ſpiriting up ſome of the nabobs, or ſubordinate princes in the Eaſt-Indies, to take up arms againſt the Engliſh: and although many of their attempts had been rendered abortive, yet they did not deſiſt from them; ſo that at laſt, as will appear in the ſequel, it became a national concern. It was much the ſame in America, where they had inſtigated the natives of Canada, and ſome other provinces, to take up arms againſt the Britiſh ſettlers in Nova Scotia, in order to reduce that province, which had been eſtabliſhed at ſo much expence, to the condition of a French colony.

On the 15th of November the parliament re-aſſembled, and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty, who, in his ſpeech from the throne, obſerved, that the events of this year had rendered it unneceſſary for him to offer any thing in particular to their conſideration, relative to foreign tranſactions; that the public tranquillity and the ſtate of Europe remained on the ſame footing as at the cloſe of the laſt ſeſſion; and that they might be aſſured of his ſteadineſs in purſuing the moſt effectual meaſures for preſerving to his people the bleſſings of peace.

As ſoon as the commons were returned to their houſe, a motion was made for an addreſs to his majeſty; but it did not paſs without ſeveral ſevere animadverſions on the inconſiſtency between this ſpeech and the real ſituation of affairs in Europe; nor did the French eſcape without many ſpirited declarations againſt their perfidious conduct both in America and Aſia.

Before we cloſe the domeſtic tranſactions of the year 1753, it may not be improper to take notice of two remarkable incidents, the firſt of which happened in the beginning of the year, and for ſome time almoſt totally engaged the attention of the public. A young woman, whoſe name was Elizabeth Canning, pretended, that as ſhe was coming home at night, on new-year's day, ſhe was met under Bedlam wall by two fellows, who pulled off her gown, cap, and apron, and having gagged her, threatened her life if ſhe made the leaſt reſiſtance, and afterwards dragged her along between them to the houſe of one Mrs. Wells near Enfield Waſh, where menaces and confinement were made uſe of to induce her to turn proſtitute, which however ſhe had the courage to reſiſt. She ſaid, that an old gipſey, one Mary Squires, ſtripped her of her ſtays in Mrs. Wells's houſe; and ſhe declared, that during her confinement of near a month in that place, ſhe had no other ſubſiſtence but a quartern loaf and a gallon of water: after ſo long a ſtay, ſhe took the opportunity to pull down ſome boards which were nailed before the window of the room ſhe was confined in, made her eſcape, and came, on the 29th of January, in a very miſerable naked condition, and almoſt deprived of her ſenſes, to her mother, a poor widow woman, who lived in Aldermanbury poſtern.

Though nothing could be more improbable, and indeed more incredible than this ſtory, yet it operated ſo powerfully on the paſſions of the common people, eſpecially the enthuſiaſts of all denominations, that large ſubſcriptions were raiſed for proſecuting the ſuppoſed delinquents. Warrants accordingly were iſſued for apprehending Mrs. Wells, miſtreſs of the houſe at Endfield Waſh; the maid ſervant, whoſe name was Virtue Hall, and Squires, the old gipſey woman, whom Canning charged with having robbed her of her ſtays. Virtue Hall, on her examination before Mr. Juſtice Fielding, confeſſed her being witneſs to the above ill uſage and confinement: the gipſey and Mrs. Wells were hereupon ſent to priſon, and afterwards tried at the Old Bailey, where the former received ſentence of death, and the latter to be branded as a bawd, and impriſoned ſix months as an acceſſary to the fact.

Some time after, poſitive and reputable evidence being produced, that Mary Squires was at Abbotſbury in Dorſetſhire, at the very time when it was depoſed ſhe had ſtript Canning of her ſtays at Wells's houſe; and Virtue Hall having retracted her evidence before the Lord Mayor, then Sir Criſpe Gaſcoigne, that magiſtrate, ſurprized at the many impoſſibilities and abſurdities in Canning's ſtory, undertook to diſcuſs it to the bottom, for the ſake of truth and juſtice; in which he diſcharged himſelf with that noble reſolution and impartiality which ought ever to animate the chief magiſtrate of this metropolis. Application was made to the throne for mercy, in behalf of the gipſey Squires, whoſe execution was reſpited; and his majeſty having ordered the whole affair to be laid before his attorney and ſolicitor-general, on their report, after having ſtrictly examined the witneſſes on both ſides, this poor old creature was indulged with a full pardon.

By this time the matter had roſe to ſuch a pitch as to divide the whole kingdom into two parties, who were inflamed againſt each other with the moſt outrageous ſpirit of animoſity, which was continued for almoſt a year. Pamphlets and papers innumerable were publiſhed on each ſide, in which the moſt ſcandalous liberties were taken with the characters of thoſe who were principally concerned for either party. Bills of perjury were mutually preſented; the evidences for Squires were tried and acquitted; Canning abſconded for ſome time, but afterwards ſurrendered to take her trial for wilful and corrupt perjury, at the Old Bailey; and during her trial, which laſted many days, the court adjourning from time to time, there were great mobs and riots about the ſeſſions-houſe, and the lord-mayor was often inſulted and abuſed in his paſſage to and from the court. The jury however brought in Canning guilty, and ſhe was committed to Newgate; but two of the jurymen having made oath, that the verdict they had given was not agreeable to their conſciences (for though they believed her guilty of perjury, they did not believe her to be guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury) the friends of the priſoner moved for a new trial, which point being argued next ſeſſion, before five of the judges, they gave their opinion, that the verdict was a good one, and perfectly agreeable to the evidence; and therefore in concluſion, Canning was ſentenced to be tranſported to the Britiſh colonies for ſeven years. Her departure however was, through the indiſcreet and bigotted zeal of her protectors, made rather a matter of parade and triumph, than the ſubmiſſion to a legal ſentence denounced againſt her as a culprit and impoſtor: large ſums were collected for her private uſe; a ſhip was hired purpoſely to carry her to the place of her deſtination, in which ſhe was ſupplied with every convenience that a perſon of the moſt comfortable circumſtances could require for a voyage of amuſement; and letters of recommendation accompanied her from perſons of diſtinction here at home, to others reſident in that part of the world to which ſhe was tranſported.

The other incident that principally diſtinguiſhed this year in England was the execution of Dr. Archibald Cameron, a native of Scotland, and brother to the famous Lochiel, a ſtaunch friend of the young Pretender, and remarkably active in the late rebellion. The doctor had accompanied his brother in all his expeditions, though not in a military capacity, and had been involved in the ſame attainder with him: flattering himſelf, however, that after ſo long time elapſed, he had no danger to apprehend from detection, he ventured over this year to North Britain, in order to recover ſome debts due to him in that country: he was, however, diſcovered, apprehended, conducted to London, and confined in the Tower; and being afterwards brought before the court of King's-bench, the identity of his perſon was there ſworn to, in conſequence whereof he received ſentence of death, and ſuffered at Tyburn on the ſeventh of June with great fortitude and decorum; and it was thought by moſt cool and conſiderate people, that the government might have ſpared this unfortunate victim, without impairing its dignity, or derogating from its juſtice.

A. D. 1754. As no material tranſaction occurred during the preſent ſeſſion, we ſhall only obſerve, that, on the 6th of April, his majeſty, after giving the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills which had paſſed both houſes, prorogued the parliament: ſoon after which it was diſſolved by proclamation, and writs were iſſued for calling a new one.

During the receſs of parliament, Mr. Pelham, brother to the duke of Newcaſtle, died, and was ſucceeded in the important office of firſt lord of the treaſury, by his brother, at that time one of the ſecretaries of ſtate. He was a man of great abilities, beloved by the people, and honoured by his ſovereign with many marks of his royal favour. He was a real friend to the Hanover family; and during a courſe of many years, he had ſupported the intereſts of government in the houſe of commons, without ever propoſing any thing that, in the end, could become prejudicial to the people.

The elections for the new parliament went every where in favour of the miniſtry; and the writs being returned, the parliament was opened on the 10th day of May by the duke of Cumberland, and ſome other noblemen, who acted by virtue of a commiſſion from his majeſty. Mr. Onſlow being re-choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, and approved of by the crown, the lord chancellor made a ſpeech to the parliament, importing, "That his majeſty had given them this early opportunity of coming together, in order to compleat, without loſs of time, certain parliamentary proceedings, which he judged would be for the good of his ſubjects; but he did not think proper to lay before them any matters of general buſineſs, reſerving every thing of that nature to the uſual time of aſſembling in the winter."

This ſhort ſeſſion continued only to the 5th of June, when it was cloſed, and the parliament prorogued to the 8th of Auguſt, and afterwards to the month of November.

During theſe tranſactions, the miniſtry, alarmed at the progreſs of the French in America, and convinced, from the evaſive anſwers they received from that court, that nothing could be effected by negotiation, ſent peremptory orders to the governors of the American colonies, to repel force by force, and drive the French from their ſettlements on the Ohio, provided they refuſed to retire in a peaceable manner. But before the governors could march their forces over the mountains, the French found means to make themſelves maſters of Lugs-town, built on the Ohio by the inhabitants of Virginia; ſeized the block and truck houſes, where they found ſkins and other commodities to the amount of 20,000l. and cut in pieces all the Britiſh ſettlers except two, who fortunately made their eſcape.

Alarmed and exaſperated at theſe proceedings, the Engliſh governors held a congreſs with the chiefs of the ſix Indian nations at Albany, when the treaties were renewed, and the ſavages demanded the aſſiſtance of the king of England, to drive the French from the ſeveral poſts and poſſeſſions they had uſurped within the territories of the Indians.

In conſequence of theſe proceedings, colonel Waſhington was diſpatched to the banks of the Ohio at the head of 4000 men. On his arrival he threw up ſome works, and erected a kind of occaſional fort, in hopes of being able to defend himſelf till he ſhould be joined by a reinforcement from New-York. A ſmall party of the French being ſoon after ſent to demand the ſurrender of the fort, which they pretended was built on their lands, Waſhington took the whole detachment priſoners. This ſo provoked de Villar, governor of Canada, that he marched againſt Waſhington, who, though labouring under the greateſt diſadvantages, ſuſtained the attack for a conſiderable time; but being overpowered by numbers, he ſurrendered the fort upon capitulation, and marched towards the frontiers of Virginia. In the mean time, the Indians, who paid no regard to the treaty, harraſſed the Engliſh in their retreat; plundered their baggage, and maſſacred every individual that fell into their hands.

This tranſaction rendered a rupture between the two nations inevitable; nor were either wanting in their preparations for obtaining the deſired ſucceſs. The French took every opportunity of ſending freſh reinforcements of men and money to Quebec; while the Engliſh miniſtry were continually ſending ſalutary cautions to the governors of the ſeveral colonies in North America; enjoining them to lay aſide their domeſtic quarrels, and join their whole force to drive their common enemy from the territories they had invaded. Two regiments were alſo ordered to be levied in America, one under the command of Sir William Pepperel, and the other under governor Shirley.

About this time the queen-mother of Spain loſt all her influence at court, by the diſgrace of her favourite, the marquis de la Enſenada, who was ſucceeded by Mr. Wall, the ſon of an Iriſh papiſt, who followed the fortune of James II. at the revolution. The king of Portugal, who had received many favours from the Engliſh, began to act in the moſt ungrateful manner. He impoſed ſome ſevere taxes upon the Britiſh merchants in the factory at Liſbon, and even went ſo far as to cauſe ſome of them to be impriſoned.

The parliament met on the 14th of November, when the king, in his ſpeech, informed them, that he had done every thing to preſerve the public peace of Europe, and that no material alteration had taken place ſince their laſt ſeſſion. He recommended to them to take into their conſideration the affairs of America, but took no notice of the encroachments made by the French on our ſettlements. This was conſidered, by the more diſcerning of the people, as one of the greateſt maſter-ſtrokes of policy; for the minority in the houſe were gaining ground; and it was expected, had his majeſty diſcovered the real ſtate of American affairs, violent oppoſition would have been made to the addreſs, which is always expected at the beginning of each ſeſſion.

The addreſs being preſented, the commons voted, that the ſum of 4,073,727l. ſhould be granted for the ſervice of the current year. Subſidies were alſo granted to ſeveral foreign princes, particularly the elector of Bavaria, who was to have a body of forces ready, in caſe his majeſty's dominions in Germany ſhould be attacked by the French, or any other of the European powers.

Theſe vigorous reſolutions of the houſe of commons alarmed the French to the higheſt degree; but as they had all along acted in the moſt inſincere manner, ſo, on the preſent occaſion, they directed their ambaſſador, the duke de Mirepoix, to amuſe our miniſtry with pretences, that they had not the moſt diſtant view of diſturbing ſuch of our ſubjects as were ſettled in America. Theſe declarations were, however, of too fallacious a nature to have any effect with the people of England. The eyes of the miniſtry were now opened, and nothing ſeemed ſo neceſſary as that of ſupporting the intereſt and honour of the nation.

A. D. 1755. On the 23d of January a proclamation was iſſued, offering a bounty to ſuch ſeamen as were willing to enter into his majeſty's ſervice. Preſs-warrants were ſent to the principal ſea-port towns: all artificers in our dock-yards, as well as ſeamen, were prohibited, under ſevere penalties, from entering into foreign ſervice: and all ſuch as were abroad were commanded to return.

Things were now grown to ſuch an height, that the deſigns of the French could be no longer concealed; and therefore the king ſent a meſſage to the parliament by Sir Thomas Robinſon, informing them, that the encroachments made on our ſettlements in America rendered it neceſſary for him to augment both his navy and army, and he doubted not but his faithful ſubjects would ſtand by him with their lives and fortunes.

Affectionate and loyal addreſſes were preſented by both houſes: and although the French boaſted much of the ſuperior power of their fleets in Breſt and Toulon, yet the Britiſh ſubjects paid little regard to it. The miniſtry prohibited the Iriſh from ſupplying the French with proviſions, which was one of the beſt meaſures that could have been taken, and was applauded by the people in general.

The greateſt diſpatch was made by our miniſtry to fit out the fleet; and towards the latter end of April, admiral Boſcawen ſailed from Portſmouth with ten ſhips of the line, and ſix frigates, in which were 6000 ſoldiers and marines. About the ſame time ſailed from Breſt the French fleet, under the command of admiral Macnamara, an Iriſh gentleman; but he had ſecret inſtructions to diſpatch his vice-admiral in his room, while he himſelf, with five ſhips of the line, cruized near the ſtreights of Gibraltar, with no other view than to try whether he could not oblige our admiral to divide his fleet, which had been reinforced by a ſquadron under the command of admiral Holborne. Mr. Pitt, at that time ſecretary at war, procured an act which will ever do honour to his memory, namely, to advance ſix months pay to the ſeamen, and not ſuffer them to ſell their tickets to rapacious uſurers, who often bought them at the rate of 50 per cent. diſcount, to the diſhonour of the nation.

The parliamentary buſineſs being finiſhed, his majeſty, on the 25th of April, went to the houſe of peers, and, in his ſpeech, informed them, that he had adhered, in the moſt ſacred manner, to the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle; but as the French had, in the moſt barefaced manner, broken every article of it, he could not, conſiſtent with the honour of his crown, and the duty he owed to his people, ſuffer them to proceed any further without the moſt vigorous oppoſition. He added, that he never would declare war but upon the moſt juſtifiable terms; and concluded, by aſſuring them, that he truſted for ſucceſs in the Divine Providence, which was ever ready to aſſiſt thoſe who acted juſtly. He then prorogued the parliament, and having made choice of a proper regency to conduct the public affairs, ſet out to viſit his electoral dominions.

While his majeſty was abroad he was informed, that the French king had entered into a ſecret treaty with the court of Vienna; and to prevent any evil conſequences that might reſult therefrom, he engaged to take into his pay a large body of Heſſian troops; and, at the ſame time, concluded a treaty offenſive and defenſive, with the empreſs of Ruſſia.

In the mean time the French were continuing their depredations on our ſettlements, and the inhabitants of the American colonies were quarrelling with their governors. This induced all thoſe who wiſhed well to our intereſts in America, to look down, in the moſt unfavourable manner, on the unproſperous ſtate of the public affairs. Unanimity was wiſhed for; but few expected it. Admiral Boſcawen, who was now off Louiſburg, attacked part of the French fleet, and actually diſperſed them, which gave ſome gleam of hope to the people of England, who promiſed themſelves great things from the ſuperior abilities of that commander. Two of the French ſhips were taken and ſent into Halifax in Nova Scotia, where they were afterwards condemned as lawful prizes.

In the month of June a trifling expedition was made on the frontiers of the colony eſtabliſhed by the French in Canada; but no other conſequences reſulted from it than that of keeping up the ſpirits of the people.

On the other hand, during the ſame month, general Braddock, who was at this time in America, marched from Virginia at the head of 2000 regulars in order to attack fort Du Queſne, a French fortreſs on the river Monongahela, which runs into the Ohio. In the courſe of his march he met with ſo many obſtacles that his little army was greatly reduced; for the coloniſts, who had long quarrelled with their governors, refuſed to ſend him ſuch waggons and proviſions as were neceſſary for his aſſiſtance. However, under all theſe difficulties, on the 8th of July he arrived within ten miles of fort Du Queſne, his army then amounting to little more than 1200 men.

In the mean time the French, who were poſted at this fort, and conſiſted of 1000 regulars, and 600 irregulars, and a conſiderable number of Indians in their intereſt, having gained very particular intelligence of general Braddock's deſigns, the number and condition of his forces, and the route they were to take, no ſooner found that he was advancing, than they alſo advanced to meet him: and having made choice of a very advantageous piece of ground, about ſix miles ſouth of the fort, they formed a camp, and entrenched themſelves in a very maſterly manner, having a thick wood on each ſide of them, that extended along the route which they knew the Engliſh general muſt take.

General Braddock was certainly a man of courage and reſolution; but he was haughty, poſitive, and difficult of acceſs; qualities ill ſuited to the tempers of the people among whom he was to command. His officers, particularly Sir Peter Halket, earneſtly beſought him to proceed with circumſpection, and to employ the friendly Indians in his army by way of advanced guard, in caſe of an ambuſcade, for which that country was ſo well adapted. But, as if courage alone was ſufficient to enſure ſucceſs in all military enterprizes, the general paid no regard to this ſeaſonable advice: he reſumed his march the next day (July 9) without ſo much as endeavouring to procure the leaſt intelligence of the ſituation and diſpoſition of the enemy, or even taking the neceſſary precautions to ſend out ſcouts to viſit the roads and thickets, which lay on both ſides of him as well as in his front.

With this ſupine negligence did he advance within about three miles of the enemy's intrenchments, when they drew out of their lines, placing their irregulars in front, and 1500 regulars behind to ſupport them: they alſo ſtationed a great number of their Indians in the wood, who effectually concealed themſelves behind the buſhes and thickets. About noon general Braddock appeared with his troops, when he was ſaluted with a general diſcharge upon his front, and all along his left flank: upon which he gave orders to puſh forwards, as the enemy were in ſight, though not within muſket-ſhot; and as ſoon as they came near enough, the attack was begun by colonels Gage and Burton.

The Indians immediately gave the whar-whoop; and riſing from their ambuſh in the thickets, diſcovered themſelves on both ſides, flanking our men in vollies, among whom they did incredible execution. The advanced guard being now between three fires, immediately gave way; but being rallied with much difficulty by the officers, they gave one fire, and then retreated in the utmoſt confuſion, and threw Dunbar's regiment, which was behind them, into great diſorder; they were with unſpeakable difficulty once more rallied by the officers, many of whom were killed as they were uſing their endeavours to inſpirit their men, who did indeed ſtand one more fire from the enemy, but without returning it. The general, who exerted himſelf as much as man could do, after having five horſes killed under him, was ſhot through the arms and lungs, of which he died the fourth day. As ſoon as he dropped, both regiments fled with the utmoſt terror and precipitation, deſerting their officers, who, though alone, kept their ground till, of 60, five only remained who were not either killed or wounded. The provincials, who compoſed the rear, ſtill ſtood unbroken, and continued the engagement on very unequal terms for near three hours, but were then compelled to retire.

The loſs of the Engliſh in this unfortunate action amounted to 700 men, beſides the baggage, artillery, &c. The officers ſuffered moſt in proportion, the Indians having conſtantly marked them out to fire at. Sir Peter Halket fell at the firſt fire at the head of his regiment, and the general's ſecretary and two of his aids-de-camp ſoon after ſhared the ſame fate.

This was a fatal ſtroke to the Engliſh, and attended with the moſt dreadful conſequences to thoſe who lived in the back ſettlements; for the Indians in the intereſt of the French poured upon them in great numbers, and committed the moſt horrid barbarities.

It was the general opinion, that it would be too late to take the field during the remainder of the ſeaſon; and, therefore, inſtead of attacking Crown-Point, (as had been intended) it was reſolved, that during the winter, the forces ſhould be employed in keeping up a communication between that place and Albany. General Shirley took upon him the command of one part of the troops, but his conduct was much cenſured; while that of general Johnſon, who commanded the other part, was equally applauded. The miniſtry were ſenſible of his vaſt abilities, and therefore he was created a baronet; and, at the ſame time, received a preſent of 5000l.

As the French could not, with common decency, conceal their real intentions any longer, they endeavoured to perſuade the Spaniards that it was their duty to prevent the Britiſh navy from becoming formidable in America; but Mr. Wall, their chief miniſter, was a ſincere friend to the Engliſh, and conſequently did every thing to fruſtrate the deſigns of the French. They had pretended that we were the aggreſſors in North America; and when the king of Spain offered to become a mediator between the contending parties, he was given to underſtand, that no ſuſpenſion of arms could be agreed upon as had been demanded by the French, till reparation had been made to our coloniſts for the injuries they had ſuffered. This induced the French miniſtry to intrigue with the German princes, and they brought over to their intereſt the elector of Cologne, who promiſed to let them form magazines in his territories. From this circumſtance, the people of England were convinced that the deſigns of the French was to attack Hanover, and for that purpoſe they entered into a confederacy with the court of Vienna, with a deſign of diſtreſſing the king of Pruſſia. Nothing was left undone by his Britannic majeſty to ſecure his electoral dominions; and for that purpoſe he formed ſeveral alliances with the German princes. A ſecond treaty was alſo entered into between our ſovereign, and the empreſs of Ruſſia; but it did not take effect.

In the mean time, news arrived that admiral Boſcawen had obtained ſome conſiderable advantages over the French; and much about the ſame time, Sir Edward Hawke ſailed from Portſmouth with 18 ſhips of the line, in order to intercept the French fleet; but they had the good fortune to eſcape and get ſafe into Breſt. Four men of war were diſpatched from Portſmouth, under the command of commodore Frankland, to protect our ſugar plantations from the enemy, and likewiſe to exerciſe plenary powers in committing hoſtilities wherever it ſhould ſeem neceſſary, or where he ſhould happen to meet with oppoſition. Orders were ſent to all our naval officers to ſeize ſuch of the French ſhips as they could lay hold of; and the duke de Mirepoix, who was not able to deceive our miniſtry any longer, ſet out on his return home without taking leave.

With reſpect to our affairs in the Eaſt-Indies, the miniſtry had, in the preceding year, ſent rear-admiral Watſon and rear-admiral Pocock with a ſquadron of capital ſhips, having Aldercorn's regiment on board, to ſupport our intereſts in that part of the world; of which the coaſt of France was no ſooner informed, than, dreading the conſequences of war with the Engliſh on that trading coaſt, they diſpatched M. Godehew, with orders to ſuperſede M. du Pleix in his government; and afterwards exert his utmoſt endeavours to conclude a pacific treaty with the governor of Madraſs, and with the other Engliſh ſettlements on the coaſt of Coromandel. Accordingly, the propoſals he made being highly acceptable to the Engliſh, on the 26th of December, 1754, articles of a proviſional treaty, and articles and ſtipulations of a truce, were ſigned between governor Saunders and M. Godehew; ſoon after which the latter of theſe gentlemen was recalled home, and M. de Leyrit appointed to ſucceed him, whoſe conduct ſoon convinced the Engliſh that the tranquillity, which they hoped would have been permanent, was founded on an uncertain baſis. They were not miſtaken, for early in the year it was found that the French were endeavouring, though in direct contravention of the proviſional treaty, to make themſelves maſters of all Decan. At the ſame time they alſo took poſſeſſion of Golconda, and ſent aſſiſtance to the Polygor of Vellour, who was then in actual rebellion againſt his ſovereign Mahomed Ally Khan, our ally.

At this time admiral Watſon, with the fleet under his command, ſailed to reduce Tullagee Angria, a piratical prince in the neighbourhood of Bombay, whoſe chief reſidence was at Geriah. His city was well fortified; and he was now become formidable to all the trading ſhips of Europe.

Watſon, after refitting his ſquadron at Bombay, and receiving the neceſſary intelligence with regard to the fort and harbour of Geriah, ſailed immediately on his intended expedition. In his paſſage he was joined by a diviſion of ſhips fitted out by the company, having on board a body of troops under the command of colonel Clive; and in the neighbourhood of Geriah by the Marahatta fleet, conſiſting of four grabs, forty ſmaller veſſels, &c. and a land army of horſe and foot, amouting to 8000 men, commanded by Rhamagee Punt, who had already one fort, and was even treating about the ſurrender of Geriah.

The pirate himſelf had quitted his capital; but his wife and family were ſtill there, under the protection of his brother-in-law, whom he had left governor of the place. As ſoon as the admiral came before the town, he ſent a meſſage to the governor, commanding him to ſurrender; but he haughtily anſwered, that he would defend the place to the laſt extremity.

The admiral, upon receiving this anſwer, formed his fleet into two diviſions, and ſailed immediately into the harbour, notwithſtanding a very warm fire from the enemy's batteries, and the grabs poſted in the harbour for that purpoſe. This fire, however, was ſoon ſilenced; for the ſhips were no ſooner at their proper ſtations, than their ſhot drove the troops of Angria from their poſt, and diſmounted moſt of their guns. One of the ſhells thrown by the Engliſh fell into a grab, ſet her on fire, and the flames extending to the reſt, they were all deſtroyed. The fort ſhared the ſame fate in about two hours, and ſoon after the firing entirely ceaſed. Suſpecting that the governor of the place would rather chuſe to ſurrender to the Marahattas than to the Engliſh, Watſon diſembarked all the troops that colonel Clive might be ready to take poſſeſſion if it ſhould be thought neceſſary. The bombardment of the fort was ſtill continued, and the ſhips warped near enough to the walls to batter a breach, when the admiral ſent an officer with a flag of truce to the governor, requiring him to ſurrender. This demand was, however, a ſecond time refuſed, and the ſhips began once more to batter the place with redoubled vigour. About one o'clock the magazine of the fort blew up, and at four the garriſon hoiſted a white flag for a capitulation; but the parley that enſued proving abortive, the bombardment began afreſh, and continued till after five, when the white flag was again diſplayed, and the governor ſubmitted to the terms impoſed by the Engliſh. The flag of Angria was ſtruck, and two captains from Clive's army, at the head of a detachment, took poſſeſſion of the fort, and immediately hoiſted the Britiſh colours.

The admiral having thus reduced the capital of the pirate's dominions, determined to carry off all the ſtores, &c. he could diſcover, in order to prevent Angria from rendering it again formidable to European merchant-ſhips in theſe ſeas. He found in the place 200 pieces of cannon, 6 braſs mortars, a large quantity of ammunition; beſides money and effects, amounting to 130,000l. But this loſs, however fatal it might prove to Angria, was not the greateſt: his whole fleet, conſiſting of eight grabs, one ſhip finiſhed, two upon the ſtocks, and a great number of gallivots, were totally deſtroyed. Among a great number of priſoners were Angria's wife, children and mother, towards whom the admiral behaved in the moſt humane manner.

During theſe tranſactions in India his majeſty returned from his German dominions, and reached his palace at Kenſington on the 15th of September. On the 13th of November * he opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he

* On the 1ſt of this month a moſt dreadful calamity happened at Liſbon, which laid great part of that city in ruins. The inquiſition having condemned ſeveral proteſtants and others, whom they conſidered as diſaffected to the Romiſh church, All-Saints day was appointed for their execution, or as they call it, the celebration of an act of faith. Many of the ignorant people from the country, had aſſembled at Liſbon, to be witneſſes of this horrid ſpectacle; but as proteſtants, if found among the mob, are ſure to be treated with every mark of indignity, ſo the gentlemen of the Engliſh factory retired quietly to their apartments. During the morning the ſky he informed both houſes, "that the moſt proper meaſures had been taken to protect our poſſeſſions in America, and to recover ſuch parts of them as had been either uſurped or invaded: that to preſerve his people from the calamities of war, as well as to prevent a general flame from being lighted up in Europe, he had always been ready to accept of reaſonable and honourable terms of accommodation; but that nothing of that kind had been offered by France: that he had alſo confined his views and operations to hinder France from making new encroachments, or ſupporting thoſe already made; to exert his people's right to a ſatisfaction for hoſtilities committed during a time of profound peace, and to diſappoint ſuch deſigns as, from various appearances and preparations, there was reaſon to think has been formed againſt his kingdoms and dominions: that he believed no impartial power could object to proceedings ſo abſolutely neceſſary for the defence and ſecurity of his people: that his good brother, the king of Spain, beheld theſe differences with concern; and the part he had taken in the common welfare of Europe, made him earneſtly wiſh the preſervation of the public tranquillity, and had induced him to give the moſt ſolemn aſſurances to continue in the ſame pacific ſentiments: that he himſelf had greatly increaſed his naval force, and augmented his army in ſuch a manner as might be leaſt burthenſome to his ſubjects: and, finally, that he had concluded a treaty with the empreſs of Ruſſia, and another with the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, which ſhould, in proper time, be ſubmitted to their peruſal."

Great debates aroſe in both houſes concerning the addreſſes that ſhould be preſented to his majeſty on the ſubject of his ſpeech; for many lords and gentlemen diſapproved of his having concluded treaties, without previouſly aſking their advice. However, after a moſt violent conteſt, the addreſſes were preſented, which occaſioned ſeveral reſignations; particularly, that of Mr. Pitt, pay-maſter of the forces, who was ſucceeded by the earl of Darlington and Mr. Hay, while Sir George Lyttelton was appointed chancellor of the exchequer in the room of Mr. Legge.

When the public buſineſs came on before the houſe of commons, every thing went in favour of the miniſtry; and the treaties concluded by his majeſty were approved of by a very great majority. Subſidies were granted to the empreſs of Ruſſia, the elector of Bavaria, and the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel; but the ſon of the latter, for reaſons unknown, renounced the proteſtant religion, which gave great offence to all the other princes of that perſuaſion, eſpecially to his Britannic majeſty, who had beſtowed upon him his daughter in marriage.

About this time a rumour was ſpread throughout the kingdom, that the French intended to attempt an invaſion; upon which all hopes of peace were given up, though the French ſtill ſubmitted to every indignity which our navy offered them. It was evident, they wanted a pretence for entering into a new war, and nothing ſeemed more likely to give colour to ſuch a meaſure, as that of our men of war ſeizing the ſhips belonging to their merchants.

The Eſperance man of war, a French ſhip of eighty guns, having been ſent from Rochfort to Breſt, was met by captain Stephens in the Orford of ſeventy guns, and after a deſperate engagement, that laſted three hours, the Frenchman, with above 300 ſailors on board, was taken and carried into Plymouth, ſo that notwithſtanding war was not formally declared, yet the hoſtilities committed ſhewed that it could not be far diſtant.

A. D. 1756. The attention of the parliament was principally engaged in concerting the moſt proper meaſures for the ſecurity of the kingdom. Among other things it was ordered that all the old regiments, both of dragoons and foot, ſhould be augmented, and that ten new regiments of foot, beſides ſeveral troops of light horſe, ſhould be immediately raiſed. For defraying the whole public expence, the parliament granted the ſum of 7,298,515l. Many excellent laws paſſed during this ſeſſion, and in general the members were unanimous; ſo that few arguments were uſed in oppoſition to what was propoſed by the miniſtry.

War was now apparently inevitable; but while the court of Great Britain was deliberating on the moſt proper method to be uſed in proſecuting it, an incident took place that ſuprized all Europe, and gave a new and moſt unexpected turn to the face of public affairs.

The king of Pruſſia, who had ſpent ſeveral years in cultivating the arts of peace, diſcovered ſuch profound knowledge in the art of politics, that no treaty of the moſt ſecret nature could be long concealed from him. By his ſecret emiſſaries, in different countries, he learned that the empreſs of Ruſſia, in conjunction with the French and the empreſs queen of Hungary, had entered into a league offenſive and defenſive, and that Sileſia was not only to be retaken and annexed to the houſe of Auſtria, but likewiſe all the hereditary dominions of the king of Pruſſia were to be divided among the conquerors; and this treaty was acceded to by Auguſtus, elector of Saxony and king of Poland. As we had agreed to bring ſome Ruſſian troops into the empire of Germany, in order to defend the electorate of Hanover, the Pruſſian monarch publiſhed a manifeſto, wherein he declared that he was ready to take the field, at the head of his whole army, to oppoſe the entrance of any forces that ſhould preſume to come into the empire. This was a moſt mortifying ſtroke to our ſovereign, who imagined that his electoral dominions would be ſeized by the French; and therefore it was propoſed by our miniſtry that nothing could contribute more towards ſecuring Hanover, than that of entering into a treaty with the king of Pruſſia. Propoſals of the like nature had been made to him by the French; but he had ſuch proofs of their perfidy, that he paid no regard to any thing advanced by them. Accordingly, it was agreed upon between him and the court of Great Britain, that, in conſequence of the war having broke out in North America, and there being reaſon to fear that it might extend further, both the contracting powers ſhould exert themſelves to the utmoſt, in order to prevent any foreign troops from coming into the ſky had continued ſerene and clear, a cloud was not to be ſeen; but about ten o'clock in the forenoon a moſt dreadful ſhock of an earthquake was felt, and the water in the river Tagus roſe above ten feet perpendicular. On the altars of the ſeveral churches tapers had been lighted to celebrate the horrid ſolemnity, and the violence of the concuſſion having thrown them down, they ſet fire to the other materials, and in a few minutes the whole city ſeemed to be in a blaze. In many parts the earth opened, as if ready to devour the ſuperſtitious inhabitants, and according to the moſt moderate computation, no leſs than 8000 perſons of both ſexes periſhed. The ſurvivors were obliged to take ſhelter in the adjacent fields, where they could not procure the neceſſaries of life, and many of them periſhed with cold and hunger. Our ambaſſador at the court of Madrid having tranſmitted an account of this calamity to our miniſtry, his majeſty, touched with the circumſtances of the unhappy ſufferers, went to the parliament houſe, and informed the members; who, to their everlaſting honour, ordered that 100,000l. ſhould be ſent to relieve their immediate wants. The king of Portugal was ſo ſenſible of this inſtance of Britiſh generoſity, that he wrote a moſt grateful and affecting letter to our ſovereign, promiſing that on every occaſion, for the future, he would take care to provide for the intereſt of our ſubjects, when they came to ſettle in his dominions.

the empire, or to paſs through it, that the public peace might be maintained.

On the 23d of March his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and the commons being ſent for, he informed them, there was great reaſon to fear that the French intended to invade this kingdom, becauſe of the vaſt naval preparations making by them along the coaſt. He propoſed that 6000 Heſſian troops ſhould be immediately taken into the pay of Great Britain, and that they ſhould be ſent over to this kingdom to prevent the deſigns of the enemy. But the moſt remarkable circumſtance was, his majeſty's not having taken the leaſt notice, that general Blakeney, governor of Fort St. Philip, and Sir Benjamin Keene, our ambaſſador at the court of Madrid, had both ſent letters to the ſecretary of ſtate, informing him, that the French were fitting out a large ſquadron at Toulon, and that there was not the leaſt doubt but they intended to attack the iſland of Minorca, and the general requeſted that he might be ſupplied with proper aſſiſtance.

What could induce the miniſtry to act in ſuch a manner will remain a ſecret for ever, ſo far as we are able to learn; but certain it is, nothing could be more unjuſtifiable. Thoſe who wiſhed well to the nation cenſured their conduct in the ſevereſt manner, but ſtill the miniſterial influence prevailed, and bore down all oppoſition. Such as were real patriots moved, that the militia might be raiſed to defend the nation, and that no mercenary troops ſhould be hired; but the miniſtry, as if they had intended to exaſperate the people to the utmoſt, made a motion to the lower houſe, that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, deſiring that he would take into Britiſh pay twelve battalions of his electoral troops, and that they ſhould be brought over to this kingdom. Great oppoſition was made to this motion, but the miniſtry carried their point; in conſequence of which, the nation was, in a manner, filled with foreign troops, and the people diſcontented. The vulgar rabble, who were ever fired with indignation at the arrival of foreigners, wanted an opportunity to quarrel with theſe poor men, who could not be ſuppoſed to have any connection with public affairs; but their behaviour was ſo inoffenſive, that even their moſt inveterate enemies could not find fault with them.

The miniſtry began now to ſee the neceſſity they were under of protecting the iſland of Minorca; and, accordingly, it was reſolved, that a fleet ſhould be ſent into the Mediterranean, under the command of admiral Byng, ſon of lord Torrington, who had procured a peerage by his vaſt knowledge of naval affairs. The abilities of Mr. Byng had never been called in queſtion: he had ſerved in ſeveral expeditions, and had made himſelf agreeable both to the officers and ſeamen. No perſon could be endowed with more ſenſibility, and humanity ſeemed to be his darling paſſion. Along with him, as ſecond in command, was Mr. Weſt, a man of great abilities, and much eſteemed both for his courage and prudence. It will ſcarcely be credited, in future ages, that our miniſtry acted only upon principles of ignorance; for diſcerning perſons will aſcribe their conduct to ſomething of a criminal nature.

But before we proceed to relate the particulars of this unhappy expedition, we ſhall juſt take notice, that on the 27th of May * his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he thanked his parliament for the vigorous and effectual ſupport they had given him; and acquainted them, that the injuries and hoſtilities which had been for ſome time committed by the French againſt his dominions and ſubjects, were then followed by the actual invaſion of Minorca, though guaranteed to him by all the great powers of Europe, and particularly by the French king: that he therefore found himſelf obliged, in vindication of the honour of his crown, and of the rights of his people, to declare war in form againſt France; that he relied on the Divine Protection, and the vigorous aſſiſtance of his faithful ſubjects in ſo juſt a cauſe.

The Engliſh fleet did not ſail from Spithead till the 7th of April; and during their voyage to Gibraltar, which laſted till the ſecond of May, many of the ſeamen were taken ſick, and, conſequently, the fleet much weakened. He had only one battalion of land forces on board; and when he got into the harbour of Gibraltar, general Fowke, who commanded the garriſon, refuſed to aſſiſt him with any of his men, alledging, as an excuſe, that he had not ſufficient to defend the place, in caſe an attack ſhould be made. He learned farther, that M. de Galiſſoniere, the French admiral, had ſailed from Toulon with a large fleet of the line, beſides tranſports, on board of which he had no leſs than 15,000 land forces, which he had landed in Minorca, and taken poſſeſſion of every thing except the fort of St. Philip.

The French fleet, of which our miniſtry had received repeated accounts, ſailed from Toulon on the tenth of April, juſt three days after Mr. Byng ſailed from Portſmouth; and the inequality of the voyages being ſo great, there is no wonder that they got there before our fleet could ſo much as enter into the Mediterranean. General Blakeney, who had notice of the approach of the French, took care to provide for the ſafety of Fort St. Philip, as far as was poſſible, conſidering what a ſmall number of men he had then under his command. It was in vain for him to attempt to defend the reſt of the iſland, and, conſequently, the French forces landed without oppoſition, at a place called Ciudadalla, on the weſtern part of the iſland, and prepared to attack Fort St. Philip. The duke de Richlieu was at the head of this expedition; and when he landed, he found that he had neglected to bring horſes with him to draw the heavy artillery over roads that had been, in a manner, rendered impaſſable, by order of general Blakeney. This circumſtance obliged him to re-imbark his heavy artillery, and land it Mahon, near St. Philip's, where he intended to erect his batteries. In the mean time, the general ſent a meſſenger to the French marſhal, demanding to know why he had landed in the iſland of Minorca in an hoſtile manner; and received for anſwer, that he acted in conformity with the practice of the Engliſh, who had taken ſome of their men of war without making a public declaration of their intentions.

On the 11th of May the intrenchments were opened; and marſhal Richlieu ſent his compliments to general Blakeney, offering him what conditions he pleaſed to accept of; but the governor told the meſſenger, that it would be ſoon enough to treat of terms when they came ſo near each other as to be able to ſhake hands. Accordingly, the royal ſtandard was placed upon the caſtle, as a ſignal that the garriſon would defend it to the laſt extremity. But here our attention attention is called off to objects partly different, and partly connected with it.

* On the 18th of May England declared war againſt France, which was anſwered by a declaration of the like nature at Paris againſt England on the 11th of June following. The city of London, followed by many corporations throughout the kingdom, preſented moſt loyal addreſſes to his majeſty on this occaſion, and promiſed to ſupport him with their lives and fortunes; ſo that he had the pleaſure to find that he reigned as an object of love in the hearts of his ſubjects.

While admiral Byng was at Gibraltar, he ſent an expreſs to the lords of the admiralty, informing them, that he had been ſent on an expedition at an improper ſeaſon; that he had not force ſufficient to oppoſe the French; and that there was great reaſon to fear all his attempts would be rendered abortive. This meſſage from the admiral gave great offence to the miniſtry, who were conſcious that they had acted inconſiſtent with their duty; and therefore they cauſed a report to be propagated, that Byng would never face the French.

On the 19th of May the Engliſh fleet came to an anchor off the iſland of Minorca, when captain Hervey was diſpatched with a letter to general Blakeney, to inform him of the arrival of the fleet, and to know in what part of the iſland he would have the recruits landed; but before he had got out of ſight of the admiral's ſhip, the French fleet appeared, and ſeemed to be very ſtrong; but the admiral made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for attacking them.

During the courſe of the night nothing of importance happened: and when the morning appeared, there was ſuch a thick fog that the fleets loſt ſight of each other; but about noon the ſky clearing up, the line of battle was formed, and admiral Weſt bore down upon the French. Had Weſt been properly ſeconded, there is reaſon to believe that the enemy would have been defeated; but admiral Byng, although in every reſpect a brave officer, yet, on the preſent occaſion, laid his conduct open to much cenſure. It ſeems that the admiral was diſtracted in his opinion, whether to retreat or advance; for when the captain of his own ſhip deſired him to bear down upon the enemy, he peremptorily refuſed, leſt he ſhould fall into the ſame error as admiral Matthews had done ſome years before. No ſign of cowardice was diſcovered in the whole of Mr. Byng's conduct, but he acted in ſuch an abſurd manner, that the ſhips moſt fit for action did not come up; ſo that the enemy, who had rather acted on the defenſive, had an opportunity of ſailing away.

Admiral Byng remained four days in expectation of the French fleet returning: during that time, ſeveral councils of war were held, in which it was at length agreed, that they ſhould ſet ſail for Gibraltar, not having forces ſufficient to protect fort St. Philip. This was one of the moſt imprudent ſteps that could have been taken; for had they remained but one day longer, they would have intercepted a large fleet, laden with proviſions and military ſtores, for the uſe of the French army in Minorca. It was above a month before the fleet arrived at Gibraltar; and news of their miſcarriage being publiſhed, admiral Hawke, aſſiſted by admiral Saunders, was ſent into the Mediterranean with orders to ſuperſede admiral Byng, who, with general Fowke, the deputy-governor of Gibraltar, were put under an arreſt, and ſent priſoners to England in the Antelope man of war, in order to be tried by two different court-martials.

During theſe tranſactions, the French carried on the ſiege of Fort St. Philip with great vigour, while the garriſon made a moſt gallant defence. The French army amounted to upwards of 20,000 men, with ſixty two large battering cannon, and twenty-one mortars, which kept playing inceſſantly on the fort. On the fifteenth of June, general Blakeney ordered a moſt furious attack to be made on the enemy, by which they were, for ſome time, driven back, and many of their batteries were demoliſhed.

The ſoldiers in the garriſon did not exceed 2500 in number; and the French general being well ſupplied with every thing neceſſary for carrying on the ſiege, deſtroyed moſt of the outworks, and then made a breach in the wall.

On the 27th of June the duke de Richlieu put himſelf at the head of a large detachment, and attacked the place ſword in hand, which was gallantly defended by the Engliſh, who diſputed every inch of ground with them. Several of the mines were ſprung, and ſuch execution was done upon the enemy, that great part of the glacis was covered with dead bodies. Notwithſtanding this, the French continued the attack, and made themſelves maſters of two ſtrong redoubts: colonel Jefferies, the ſecond in command under general Blakeney, was ſuddenly ſurrounded, and, with 100 men, taken priſoners, juſt at the inſtant that he was on the point of retaking one of the redoubts: Major Cunningham, another brave officer, was ſo deſperately wounded, that he could not do his duty: ſo that the governor was deprived of the aſſiſtance of two men whoſe courage and prudence had rendered them very conſpicuous. The duke de Richlieu then ordered a parley to be beat, under pretence of burying the dead; but no ſooner had the governor granted his requeſt, than he made uſe of the time in fortifying the redoubts he had taken, by which he became maſter of all the ſubterraneous paſſages, ſo as to be able to blow up the fort. The general finding it, in a manner, impoſſible to hold out againſt ſuch a numerous army, which was daily encroaching upon him, called a council of war, in which it was reſolved that the place could hold out no longer, but that propoſals muſt be made to the French to enter upon articles of capitulation.

The duke de Richlieu was ſo ſenſible of the bravery of the Engliſh general, that he offered them what terms they pleaſed; and accordingly they were permitted to march out with all the honours of war, and to remain in the iſland till ſhips came from Gibraltar to take them on board, which was not till the 7th of July.

Thus did Britain loſe the iſland of Minorca, a place of the utmoſt importance during a war, becauſe it affords proviſions and harbours of ſafety for all ſuch veſſels as happen to go from England to the Mediterranean. The importance of it was not known till it was loſt; and had we been at war with any of the Italian ſtates, we could ſcarce have had an opportunity of ſending a fleet beyond Gibraltar.

We ſhall now proceed to deſcribe the moſt material operations of our army, during this year, in other parts of the world. In the beginning of the ſpring the earl of Loudon had been ſent to America, to take upon him the command of the army deſtined to act in that quarter of the world; but ſo negligent had the miniſtry been in fitting him out in proper time, that before he landed he found the French general Montcalm in the field, at the head of a conſiderable army. In the mean time, Oſwego, a ſtrong fort ſituated on the lake Ontario, in Canada, was taken by the French, and all the men found in it ſent priſoners to Montreal. The loſs of this important place was owing entirely to the delays made by our miniſtry, and the altercations that took place between our generals and the coloniſts. Fort Granville fell into the hands of the French at the ſame time, which ſtruck ſuch a damp into the minds of the people, both in the north country and on the continent of America, that nothing was to be heard but murmurs, while the conduct of our officers was ſeverely cenſured.

In the Eaſt-Indies the French had been very active in ſpiriting up the natives againſt our ſettlements, particularly in Bengal, where the new nabob, Surajah Dowla, took the field, and laid ſiege to the town of Calcutta. The governor, Mr. Drake, being a quaker, refuſed to fight; ſo that the command devolved upon

Mr. Holwell, who reſolved to hold it out to the laſt extremity. But the enemy's army was almoſt innumerable, and the place but poorly fortified. Add to this, that the ſhips belonging to the company had fallen down the river, which the nabob knew, and reſolved to avail himſelf of that circumſtance. He would not hearken to any terms of capitulation, although Mr. Holwell propoſed them to him, but, by mere force of numbers, ruſhing into the place, cruelly ordered the governor, with 150 men, to be confined in a dungeon, where 123 periſhed before morning for want of freſh air. This was one of the moſt horrid tranſactions that we meet with in hiſtory; it was directly oppoſite to the laws of war, and contrary to the principles upon which civil government is founded. The governor, Mr. Holwell, with ſuch others as ſurvived, were ſent priſoners to the nabob's capital, far up the country, where they were treated with great cruelty.

In the mean time the empreſs of Ruſſia, highly exaſperated that we ſhould have entered into a treaty with the king of Pruſſia without conſulting her, ordered her army to be augmented conſiderably; and, at the ſame time, in order to conceal her real intentions, ordered her miniſters at foreign courts to publiſh manifeſtos, intimating, that ſhe had nothing in view but that of protecting her own dominions. The empreſs-queen of Hungary proceeded in the ſame manner; ſo that the flames of civil war were now lighted up on the continent of Europe; while the king of Pruſſia, ever attentive to his own intereſt, and the ſecurity of his ſubjects, reſolved to be beforehand with both, and prevent them from taking thoſe advantages which they intended.

No prince could ever be more active, on this occaſion, than the king of Pruſſia; for the moment he learned that the court of France had entered into an alliance with the empreſs-queen, he ordered his miniſter at the court of Dreſden to demand leave for a body of his forces to paſs through Saxony; but inſtead of receiving an anſwer, the elector ordered all his forces to be collected together, and encamped at Pirna, till ſuch time as he could receive reinforcements of Auſtrians, to enable him to take the field. This ſo exaſperated the king of Pruſſia, that he took the field at the head of a moſt formidable army, and obliged the elector of Saxony to depart to Poland, to which nation he was conducted by a body of dragoons, while all the treaſures and archives belonging to his hereditary dominions were ſeized, and his army made priſoners of war. Leipſic ſurrendered at the ſame time to the conqueror; and the people were obliged to provide, not only all ſorts of neceſſaries for the Pruſſian army, but alſo to furniſh them with money to carry on other conqueſts.

The king of Pruſſia came up with the Auſtrian army on the 1ſt of October, when he reſolved to give them battle, having firſt ſhewn his generals the ſituation of the ground, and acquainted them with the ſteps that he intended to take. The Auſtrians having neglected to take poſſeſſion of ſome riſing grounds, the king of Pruſſia gave orders for his troops to advance, and attack the enemy's cavalry, who were poſted in an adjoining plain. Indeed, the attack was made with ſo much fury, that the Auſtrian cavalry gave way, and fell back upon the infantry: upon which the Pruſſians advanced with ſuch courage, that although ſixty pieces of cannon played upon them, yet they made themſelves maſters of all the ditches and defiles. The Auſtrian army being thus put into confuſion, they began to give way, which the king of Pruſſia obſerving, ordered the whole body of his infantry to advance, and wheel about to the left, where they attacked the ſuburbs of Lowoſchutz, and reduced the whole to a heap of aſhes. Count Brown, who commanded the Auſtrian army, was obliged to retreat in the beſt manner he could, leaving the honour of the victory to the Pruſſians, after an engagement that laſted from ſeven in the morning till three in the afternoon. The Pruſſian monarch was not, however, able to make his enterprize of any great advantage to himſelf; for the winter approaching, he was obliged to put his troops into quarters of cantonment at Dreſden, and along the Elbe. Count Schwerin commanded another part of his army, which had penetrated into Bohemia; and they finding that proviſions could not eaſily be procured, retired towards Sileſia, and took up their quarters in the province of Glatz.

During theſe tranſactions abroad, the diſcontents among the people of England increaſed to ſuch an height, that in the month of November his majeſty thought proper to make the following alterations in the miniſtry; the duke of Devonſhire was appointed firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury in the room of the duke of Newcaſtle: the right honourable Bilſon Legge was made chancellor of the Exchequer, in the place of Sir George Lyttleton. Earl Temple was appointed firſt lord of the admiralty: the right honourable George Grenville was made treaſurer of the navy: lord chancellor Hardwicke having reſigned the ſeals, they were put into commiſſion; and Mr. Pitt was appointed one of the ſecretaries of ſtate in the room of Mr. Fox.

The parliament met on the 2d of December, when the king, in his ſpeech, told them, That, under the protection of the Divine Providence, he doubted not but he ſhould be able to fruſtrate all the ſchemes laid againſt him by his perfidious enemies. He told them, that nothing could ſo much engage his attention, next to the mother country, as the preſervation of America; and, for that reaſon, that the war ſhould be proſecuted with the utmoſt vigour. He added, that nothing could contribute more towards diſtreſſing the enemy, than internal peace among his ſubjects; and therefore recommended to them unanimity in all their deliberations. The militia (he ſaid) was one of the moſt favourite objects he had in view, with reſpect to the preſervation of the nation; and therefore he told them, that it was their duty to put it upon the moſt reſpectable footing. He concluded by telling them, that no meaſure ſhould be undertaken by him, but by the advice of his parliament, in whom he placed the utmoſt confidence.

Addreſſes being preſented by both houſes, the committee of ſupply and of ways and means were appointed, who proceeded to conſider the public eſtimates, when it was reſolved to augment the land forces from 35 to 49,749 effective men, including 4008 invalids. The ſeamen were ſettled at 55,000 men, including 11,419 marines, with a ſufficient proviſion for their maintenance. They alſo enabled his majeſty to perform his agreement with, and provide for, his Heſſian and Hanoverian forces; beſides which they granted ample ſums for garriſons, for the ordering, for the levying new regiments, for forming and maintaining an army of obſervation in Germany, and fulfilling his majeſty's engagements with the king of Pruſſia; for the ſupport of the Britiſh forts on the coaſt of Africa; for the relief of South Carolina and Virginia; the ſupport of Nova Scotia and Georgia; for enabling the Eaſt-India company to keep a military force in their ſettlements, and for ſeveral other uſes and contingencies: which ſupplies, in the whole, amounted to 8,350,325l.

A. D. 1757. In the beginning of this year, the attention of the public was principally engaged in the fate of admiral Byng, the particulars of which, together with that of the other officers who were accuſed of being inſtrumental to the loſs of Minorca, we ſhall lay before our readers. Many of the proceedings of this remarkable affair occurred in the preceding year, but as the matter did not terminate till the commencement of the preſent, we have here collected the whole together in one point of view; as well that the reader may have a more diſtinct and clear idea of the affair, as to prevent any unneceſſary digreſſions that would have broken in upon the chain of other events.

Admiral Byng, on his arrival at Gibraltar, was (as has been already obſerved) ſuperſeded in his command by Sir Edward Hawke, and ſent home priſoner; as was alſo his ſecond in command, rear-admiral Weſt, ſeveral of the captains of the fleet, and general Fowke, with ſome of the land officers belonging to the garriſon of Gibraltar. The priſoners all arrived, on the 3d of July (1756) at Portſmouth, when Mr. Byng was immediately put under arreſt, and ſoon after conveyed to Greenwich, and committed to the cuſtody of the governor of the hoſpital, by whom he was kept ſtrictly confined till the time of his trial by a court-martial, which was delayed by the abſence of many evidences in the Mediterranean, required both in his favour and againſt him.

Admiral Weſt and lieutenant-general Fowke were ordered up to London, where the admiral met with a moſt gracious reception from his royal maſter; but general Fowke was ordered to take his trial for diſobeying his majeſty's orders, tranſmitted to him by the ſecretary of war, relating to the embarkation of a battalion of troops to be ſent in the fleet with Mr. Byng to reinforce fort St. Philip.

The court-martial commiſſioned to try general Fowke conſiſted of two generals, eleven lieutenant-generals, and three major-generals, general Sir Robert Rich being preſident. Mr. Fowke, in his defence againſt the above charge, urged, that his orders were not abſolute, but diſcretionary; and that the execution of them was left to his and Mr. Byng's diſcernment and judgment, for which he particularly referred to a letter from the ſecretary of war to him, as commander in chief of Gibraltar; the whole tenor of which imported a diſcretionary power remaining in him as to the execution of thoſe orders. He moreover defended the ſteps he had taken in with-holding the forces, by ſhewing, that if he had made the detachment of a battalion, and put it on board the fleet, he ſhould not then have had much more than two reliefs of men, (ſo wretchedly was this important garriſon provided with defence,) and this at a time when there was the greateſt reaſon to believe that the place was in danger of being attacked. Notwithſtanding this defence, and that the letters from the ſecretary at war produced in court appeared to contain inſtructions that were very confuſed at leaſt, if not contradictory, his judges found him guilty of the charge, and he was ſentenced to be ſuſpended for the ſpace of one year; a ſentence which was not only confirmed by his majeſty, but alſo accompanied with a diſmiſſion from his ſervice: nor was he reſtored during the courſe of this reign, though his caſe was generally thought to be exceeding hard.

With reſpect to the unhappy admiral Byng, no method had been left untried to inflame the nation to a degree of frenzy againſt him, by repreſenting him as the ſole cauſe of the diſgrace in the Mediterranean, and the loſs of Minorca; the importance of which (however little it ſeems to have claimed the attention of our miniſtry in the beginning) was now repreſented in the moſt ſtriking colours. Admiral Byng had, before his return to Gibraltar, diſpatched a letter to the admiralty, containing the particulars of the action off Minorca, and of the reſolutions of the council of war he had ſummoned. This letter, however, was not made public till ſome days after Sir Edward Hawke was ſent out to ſuperſede him; and even then it was curtailed and mutilated in an extraordinary manner, ſeveral paſſages being ſuppreſſed which tended to his own juſtification, or contained any reflection upon the negligence or inattention of the miniſtry. This proceeding was certainly very unfair. Accordingly, the admiral's friends did not fail to publiſh his letter entire, with ſome remarks not very favourable to thoſe who had thus garbled it.

His adverſaries, however, had got the populace on their ſide; and there was not a ſpecies of libelling, in proſe or verſe, that was not exhauſted to render him odious. They ridiculed and refuted the reaſons he had given for returning to Gibraltar after his rencounter with the French ſquadron: they inveighed againſt his inſolence, his folly, his cowardice, and his miſconduct: they even ſtuck not at making royalty itſelf an inſtrument of their artifice, by inſinuating that his majeſty had prognoſticated Byng would not fight, from the contents of his firſt letter from Gibraltar. In a word, they exerted themſelves ſo ſtrenuouſly in maintaining and increaſing the popular deluſion, that no notice was taken of the miſconduct of the miniſtry, while Byng was pointed out as the object of univerſal deteſtation. Addreſſes upon addreſſes were tranſmitted from all parts of the kingdom to the throne, particularly from the city of London, calling aloud for an examination into the cauſe of the infamy that had befallen the Britiſh arms by ſea, and of the loſs of the important iſland of Minorca, which by its ſituation drew to Great Britain the reſpect of Spain, the confidence of Italy, and the ſubmiſſion of the piratical ſtates of Barbary.

In conſequence of theſe ſolicitations his majeſty commanded an immediate examination into the cauſes of the loſs of Minorca, which was attended to with great diligence by the parliament. We have already ſeen the puniſhment inflicted on Mr. Fowke; and now the whole magazine of political arts having been exhauſted to fix the charge of cowardice, treachery, and treaſon, againſt the devoted admiral, he was at length ordered to prepare for his trial; the place appointed for which was on board his majeſty's ſhip the St. George, in Portſmouth harbour; and the court was compoſed of the following four admirals and nine captains, viz. Thomas Smith, eſq; vice-admiral of the red, preſident; Francis Holbourne, eſq. rear-admiral of the red; Henry Norris, eſq. rear-admiral of the white; Thomas Broderick, eſq. rear-admiral of the blue; captain Holmes, captain Boys, captain Simcoe, captain Bentley, captain Dennis, captain Moore, captain Douglas, and the honourable captain Auguſtus Keppel.

The court ſat thirty-one days, Sundays excepted, (viz. from the 28th of December to the 27th of January,) examining witneſſes, and hearing the priſoner's defence. At length, on ſumming up the evidence, the court were of opinion, "That admiral Byng did not do his utmoſt to relieve St. Philip's Caſtle in the iſland of Minorca, then beſieged by the forces of the French king:" after which they came to the following reſolution, That the admiral appears to fall under the following part of the twelfth article of the Articles of War, to wit, "Or ſhall not do his utmoſt to take or deſtroy every ſhip which it ſhall be his duty to engage; and to aſſiſt and relieve all and every of his majeſty's ſhips which it ſhall be his duty to aſſiſt and relieve:" and as that article poſitively denounces the puniſhment of death upon the delinquent, without any alternative left to the diſcretion of the court, under any variation of circumſtances, they adjudged him to be ſhot to death. But it having fully appeared, by the evidence of lord Robert Bertie, lieutenant-colonel Smith, captain

Gardiner, (captain of the admiral's own ſhip the Ramillies) and other officers of the ſhip, who were near the perſon of the admiral, that they did not perceive any backwardneſs in him during the action, or any marks of fear or confuſion, either from his countenance or behaviour; but that he appeared to give his orders coolly and diſtinctly, and did not ſeem wanting in perſonal courage: from theſe and other circumſtances, the court being induced to believe that his miſconduct aroſe neither from cowardice nor diſaffection, did therefore unanimouſly think it their duty to recommend the ſaid admiral John Byng to his majeſty as a proper object of mercy. Alſo, when they made a report of the ſentence of death they had paſſed on the admiral, they added thereto the following remonſtrance to the lords of the admiralty in his favour:

"We the underwritten, the preſident and members of the court-martial, aſſembled for the trial of admiral Byng, believe it neceſſary to inform your lordſhips, that in the whole courſe of this long trial we have done our utmoſt endeavours to come at truths, and to do the ſtricteſt juſtice to our country and the priſoner; but we cannot help laying the diſtreſſes of our minds before your lordſhips on this occaſion, in finding ourſelves under the neceſſity of condemning a man to death, from the great ſeverity of the twelfth article of war, part of which he falls under, and which admits of no mitigation, even if the crime ſhould be committed by an error in judgment only; and therefore, for our own conſciences ſakes, as well as in juſtice to the priſoner, we pray your lordſhips, in the moſt earneſt manner, to recommend him to his majeſty's clemency."

In conſequence of this recommendatory remonſtrance from the court martial, and the petitions of lord Torrington, nephew to the unhappy admiral, and other perſons of high diſtinction allied to his family, the lords of the admiralty applied to his majeſty that the opinion of the twelve judges might be taken, whether the ſentence of the court martial was legal? The ſentence was accordingly referred by the king to the judges, who declared it legal; in conſequence of which, a warrant was ſigned by the lords of the admiralty for carrying it into execution: but it was again ſuſpended, at the requeſt of ſeveral members of the court-martial, who alledged, that they had ſomething to diſcloſe, relative to the ſaid ſentence, which greatly affected their own conſciences; and application was made to the houſe of commons by one of the members, praying the aid of parliament to be releaſed from his oath of ſecrecy, in order to diſcloſe the grounds why ſentence of death had paſſed upon the ſaid admiral. Upon this, a bill for releaſing the members from their oath of ſecrecy was ordered into the houſe of commons, and paſſed that houſe; and a reſpite was ſent to admiral Byng for a fortnight: but when the bill came into the houſe of lords, and when the members were examined there, the ſame was rejected; ſo that this and every other effort to get the admiral reprieved from his ſad fate all proving ineffectual, he was, purſuant to his ſentence, executed on the 14th of March, 1757, on board his majeſty's ſhip Monarque, in Portſmouth harbour.*

Thus ended the enquiry into the conduct of general Fowke and admiral Byng; the one of whom was broke and diſmiſſed his majeſty's ſervice, for not following inſtructions which contradicted themſelves; and the other ſuffered an ignominious death for following the advice and opinion of a council of war, and for not having done every thing that was perhaps poſſible to have been done for diſtreſſing the enemy, and relieving the fortreſs they had beſieged.---The reſt of the officers, as well of the fleet as army, who had been ordered home with the admiral and general, were, upon their reſpective trials, honourably acquitted.

Though the people had been highly incenſed againſt the conduct of Byng, yet they at laſt looked upon him rather as unfortunate than criminal. They conſidered him as one who had been ſacrificed to ſcreen the miniſtry from cenſure; and although a parliamentary enquiry was made into their conduct, yet they contrived to act in ſuch a manner that the whole came to nothing. The only good effects attending the execution of the admiral was, the reviving a true ſpirit of courage among our officers, both by ſea and land. From this circumſtance they ſaw and were convinced, that no ſtation, let it be ever ſo dignified, could ſcreen them from the puniſhment due to neglect or cowardice; and that the only way to true honour and real glory, was to diſcharge their duty faithfully.

While the attention of the public was engaged in the fate of admiral Byng, the parliament were aſſiduouſly employed in concerting proper meaſures for promoting the welfare and ſecurity of the nation. As there was great reaſon to fear that the French would invade this kingdom, and as it was neceſſary that great part of our regular forces ſhould be employed abroad, ſo a bill was brought into parliament to eſtabliſh a national militia, on an extenſive and uſeful plan. This was ſuch a conſtitutional meaſure as gave pleaſure to the nation in general; and yet ſome diſcontented perſons exclaimed ſo loudly againſt it, that many of the people, particularly in Yorkſhire, actually roſe in a body, and demoliſhed the houſe where the juſtices of the peace and deputy lieutenants had met to make choice of ſuch as were to ſerve.

---

* On the morning of his execution, orders being given to all the men of war at Spithead to ſend their boats with the captains and all the officers of each ſhip, accompanied by a party of marines under arms, to attend the ceremony, they, in purſuance of that order, rowed from Spithead, and with great difficulty (the wind blowing very hard) made the harbour about eleven o'clock. Mr. Byng, accompanied by a clergyman who attended him during his confinement, and two gentlemen his relations, walked out of the great cabin to the quarter deck, where he ſuffered a few minutes before twelve o'clock. He was dreſſed in a light-coloured coat, white waiſtcoat and white ſtockings, with a large white wig, and had in each hand a white handkerchief. When he came on the deck he threw down his hat, kneeled on a cuſhion, tied one handkerchief over his eyes, and dropped the other as a ſignal; on which a volley was fired at him from ſix marines, the bullets from five of which went through him, and he was dead in an inſtant. It was not more than two minutes from his coming out of the cabin till he fell motionleſs on his left ſide. He died with great fortitude and compoſure, not ſhewing the leaſt ſign of timidity. Immediately before he ſuffered, he delivered a paper to the marſhal of the high court of admiralty, the contents of which were as follow:

"A few minutes will now deliver me from the violent perſecutions, " and fruſtrate the further malice of my enemies. Nor " need I envy them a life ſubject to the ſenſations my injuries and
" the injuſtice done me muſt create. Perſuaded I am, juſtice
" will be done to my reputation hereafter. The manner and
" cauſe of raiſing and keeping up the popular clamour and prejudice
" againſt me, will be ſeen through; I ſhall be conſidered,
" as I now perceive myſelf, a victim deſtined to divert the indignation
" and reſentment of an injured and deluded people from
" the proper objects. My enemies themſelves muſt now think
" me innocent. Happy for me, at this my laſt moment, that I " know my own innocence, and am conſcious that no part of my " country's misfortunes can be owing to me. I heartily wiſh the " ſhedding my blood may contribute to the happineſs and ſervice
" of my country; but cannot reſign my juſt claim to a faithful
" diſcharge of my duty according to the beſt of my judgment,
" and the utmoſt exertion of my ability for his majeſty's honour,
" and my country's ſervice. I am ſorry that my endeavours
" were not attended with more ſucceſs, and that the armament
" under my command proved too weak to ſucceed in an expedition
" of ſuch moment. Truth has prevailed over calumny and
" falſhood; and juſtice has wiped off the ignominious ſtain of my " ſuppoſed want of perſonal courage or diſaffection. But who " can be preſumptuouſly ſure of his own judgment? If my crime
" is an error in judgment, or differing in opinion from my judges;
" and if yet, the error in judgment ſhould be on their ſide, God
" forgive them, as I do; and may the diſtreſs of their minds, and " uneaſineſs of their conſciences, which in juſtice to me they " have repreſented, be relieved and ſubſide, as my reſentment
" has done! The ſupreme Judge ſees all hearts and motives;
" and to him I muſt ſubmit the juſtneſs of my cauſe.

" J. Byng."

On board his majeſty's ſhip Monarque, in Portſmouth Harbour, March 14, 1757.

At this time the great dearth of corn, owing to the iniquitous practice of engroſſing, reduced many perſons, and, indeed, the nation in general, to great diſtreſs. Bread was ſo dear, that the poor could ſcarce purchaſe it. Tumults happened in almoſt every part of the kingdom; which is not to be wondered at, when it is conſidered, that the people were ſtarving in the midſt of plenty. His majeſty, touched with the ſufferings of his people, recommended their diſtreſſed condition to parliament; and an act was paſſed to prohibit, for a limited time, the exportation of all ſorts of grain.

On the 15th of February his majeſty ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, to inform them, that the French were daily pouring ſuch numbers of troops into Germany, that there was reaſon to fear they had ſome deſign on his electorate dominions. He therefore recommended Hanover to their protection, not doubting but his faithful commons would aſſiſt him to the utmoſt. In anſwer to this meſſage, moſt loyal addreſſes were preſented by both houſes; and it was voted, that an annual ſubſidy ſhould be paid to the king of Pruſſia, and that an army of obſervation ſhould act on the borders of Hanover, under the command of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, to watch the motions of the French, and prevent them from making any encroachments on that electorate.

At the ſame time great preparations were made for the naval ſervice; and a deſign was formed to take from the French Louiſbourg, the capital of Cape Breton. Sir Edward Hawke, with the admirals Saunders and Oſborne, were ſent to North America with conſiderable fleets; and general Hopſon, with lord Charles Hay, had under them 6,200 land forces. Two ſquadrons were diſpatched at the ſame time, one to the Eaſt, and the other to the Weſt-Indies; ſo that every thing was done for the intereſt of the nation: but ſuch of the former miniſtry as had been diſcarded, made ſo violent an oppoſition to theſe meaſures, that Mr. Pitt, and the honourable Mr. Legge, who had acted as the moſt ſteady and upright patriots againſt every thing that ſeemed to threaten any hurt to the nation, were commanded to reſign. They did not, however, retire from public buſineſs, without receiving the approbation of their fellow-ſubjects; for moſt of the cities and corporations preſented them with addreſſes, and their freedoms in gold boxes.

On the 4th of July his majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he was pleaſed to aſſure the parliament, "That the ſuccour and preſervation of America had been his conſtant care, and, next to the ſecurity of his kingdoms, ſhould continue to be his great and principal object: that he had taken ſuch meaſures as he truſted, by the bleſſing of God, would effectually diſappoint the deſigns of the enemy in thoſe parts: that he had no farther view but to vindicate the juſt rights of his crown and ſubjects from the moſt injurious encroachments; to preſerve tranquillity, as far as the circumſtances of things would admit; and to prevent the true friends of Britain, and the liberties of Europe, from being oppreſſed and endangered by any unprovoked and unnatural conjunction."

In the mean time addreſſes were preſented to the king from moſt of the corporations in England, requeſting him to reſtore Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge to their former employments: and it muſt be remembered, to the honour of his majeſty, that he liſtened with ſuch attention to the voice of the people, that on the 29th of June the former was re-inſtated ſecretary of ſtate; and on the 7th of July the office of chancellor of the Exchequer was again ſupplied by the latter. Theſe circumſtances, added to ſome other prudent alterations, again removed the diſcontent of the people, and tranquillity was once more reſtored throughout the kingdom.

Having thus taken a view of the ſtate of affairs at home, let us now turn our eyes to the continent, where we ſhall find the beginning of this year marked with a ſtriking inſtance of the dreadful effects of frantic enthuſiaſm, in an attempt made upon the life of the French king. A perſon of very mean extraction, named Robert Francis Damien, a native of French Flanders, was the perſon who undertook the performance of this action. He had lived ſome years as a footman in different families in Paris, but had been turned away for an obſtinate temper, and a certain gloomineſs that made him diſagreeable to all thoſe with whom he had any connections. It does not appear that he had any accomplices, nor could the torture itſelf make him diſcover what were his motives. On the fifth of January, about ſix in the evening, as the king was getting into his coach at Verſailles, to go to Trianon, on a viſit to his daughter, the unhappy wretch, having concealed a large claſp knife under his cloak, ſlipped through the guards, and made a ſtroke with it at the king. The point pierced between the fourth and fifth ribs, but it was not mortal; and the aſſaſſin, who ſeemed not to be any ways concerned, was immediately ſeized and committed to priſon. He was ſoon after brought to his trial, according to the laws of France, and executed in ſuch a horrid manner, as is even ſhocking to relate. Inciſions were made in his fleſh with red hot pincers, and melted lead poured into them. In that manner the poor wretch was tortured ſeveral hours, and then torn in pieces by four horſes, after which his quarters were burnt to aſhes. His father, wife, daughter, and family were baniſhed the kingdom, and the name of Damien was effaced and obliterated; ſo that the innocent were involved in the puniſhment of the guilty.

In the ſpring of this year the French had ſent two armies into Germany. One of theſe conſiſted of 80,000 men, under the command of marſhal d'Etrees, an officer of the moſt undaunted courage, and under him were marſhal de Contades, and the count de St. Germain, who had been from their infancy accuſtomed to arms. The other army conſiſted only of 25,000 men, becauſe it was to be joined by a body of Auſtrians; but the grand army was to attack Hanover. In Bohemia 100,000 Auſtrians had taken the field; an equal number of Ruſſians were marching through Poland; while the Swedes, croſſing the Baltic, attacked the moſt important places in Pomerania.

Surrounded on all ſides with enemies, the king of Pruſſia, inſtead of being diſcouraged, ſeemed rather to increaſe every day in all thoſe arts of heroiſm that conſtitute the character of an able general. In the beginning of the year he marched from Dreſden, acroſs two bridges thrown over the Elbe, attended by field-marſhal Keith, and ſeveral other generals of approved abilities. They marched in three bodies or diviſions, nor did the Auſtrians ſo much as know that he had taken the field till he had advanced a conſiderable way into Bohemia. He ordered the prince of Bevern to march as if he had intended to attack Egra, with a ſmall detachment of the army; upon which count Brown, the Auſtrian general, ſent Aremberg, with a detachment, to oppoſe him. This was juſt what the king of Pruſſia wiſhed for; and laying hold of that circumſtance, wheeled to the right, and cut off all communication between the grand army of the Auſtrians and the detachment under general Aremberg. This was ſuch a maſterpiece of generalſhip as is ſcarce to be met with in hiſtory; but the Auſtrians did not underſtand it. They imagined that the king intended to retreat, and conſequently were drawn off their guard and led into a ſnare.

On the 9th of April the prince of Bevern, having paſſed ſome of the moſt dangerous defiles, gained a compleat victory over the detachment of the Auſtrian army, and ſo opened the whole country for the reſt of the Pruſſian forces. In the mean time the king kept marching along the Elbe, to obſerve the motions of count Brown, and drove the Auſtrians from their ſtrong camp at Budin.

On the 6th of May the different detachments of the Auſtrians being collected together, inſtead of attacking the Pruſſians, they encamped on the banks of the Moldau, near Prague. There the king of Pruſſia, as if no enterprize had been too great for his abilities, attempted to flank count Brown, who had no other means left but that of wheeling to the right, to ſave his army. Every difficulty gave way to the Pruſſians; one defile was taken after another; but in one of their attacks on an advanced body of the Auſtrians, field-marſhal Schwerin, a brave officer, was killed at the age of 82, crowned with military glory, and ſincerely regretted by his ſovereign, who had long been convinced, that he was one of the braveſt generals that ever commanded an army.

This brought on a general engagement, and the Pruſſians, with the moſt amazing courage, broke through the right wing of the Auſtrians, and made themſelves maſters of ſeveral batteries; while a body of cavalry broke the front line, and put the whole into ſuch confuſion, that above 6000 were killed; among whom were ſeveral generals, beſides marſhal Brown, the commander in chief. The Pruſſians drove the Auſtrians into the city of Prague, and in four days the trenches were opened and lines of circumvallation drawn. It could not be ſuppoſed that ſuch a vaſt army as that of the Auſtrians would be able to ſubſiſt long in a city that had not proviſions ſufficient for the inhabitants; and therefore prince Charles of Lorrain reſolved to cut his way through the Pruſſian lines, at the head of 12,000 men. The time agreed upon for putting this ſcheme in execution was the middle of the night; but in the mean time, one of the Auſtrian ſoldiers having deſerted, gave an account of the whole to the king of Pruſſia, who took care to be upon his guard, ſo that the prince, with his party, was defeated, and obliged once more to take refuge in the city. The heavy artillery belonging to the Pruſſians being now arrived, a moſt dreadful cannonade began, and great part of the city was reduced to a heap of rubbiſh. Proviſions were become ſo ſcarce, that they were obliged to eat horſes fleſh; and the Pruſſians, who had hitherto acted as men whom no oppoſition could reſiſt, began to imagine that the whole Auſtrian army would be made priſoners, and the dominions of the empreſs queen of Hungary be divided among them. Vienna itſelf was in danger of being beſieged, for every place lay open to their victorious arms; but a circumſtance took place that gave a general turn to public affairs, and convinced his Pruſſian majeſty that he had a weak ſide as well as others.

Count Daun, who had ſerved many years in the army of the empreſs queen without ever riſing higher than the rank of a major-general, was appointed to take upon him the command of the army. Like the Roman Fabius, he was ſo cautious, that he never acted offenſively till, in human probability, he had a proſpect of ſucceeding, and then he proſecuted his meaſures with the utmoſt perſeverance. Calm and deliberate, he viewed victory as uncertain; and on every occaſion, took care to ſecure a retreat. He did not, like ſome generals, deſpiſe the enemy he had to engage with; but knowing that the moſt trifling circumſtance was able to turn the fortune of the day, he reſolved never to enter upon any thing with raſhneſs, but rather to preſerve his army for a more proper opportunity, when an unguarded moment might ſecure victory, ſave the territories of his ſovereign, and diſappoint all the ſchemes formed by thoſe who were fluſhed with hopes, in conſequence of recent ſucceſſes.

Such were the qualities of this brave general, whom the Auſtrian miniſtry pitched upon as the moſt proper perſon to retrieve their loſſes, and ſave the army, which was then in the utmoſt diſtreſs, in the city of Prague. He collected together the fugitives that had run away after the late battle, and having received freſh ſupplies, he formed a camp at Rolin, near Prague. A communication was opened with that city, ſo that the garriſon was daily ſupplied with proviſions. This was a moſt galling ſtroke to the king of Pruſſia, who was tired out with the continuance of the ſiege, and therefore reſolved to attack count Daun in his camp, where he was ſtrongly entrenched. This was one of the moſt imprudent actions that could have been committed; and marſhal Keith, who ſaw what would be the conſequence thereof, remonſtrated to the king againſt it. He told him, that no meaſure was ſo proper as that of carrying on the ſiege, and waiting for count Daun, who, if he preſumed to attack the Pruſſian army in their lines, would undoubtedly be defeated; whereas, on the other hand, an attempt upon him in his camp would be attended with two dangers; namely, a defeat, and an opportunity for the Auſtrian army to eſcape out of Prague. But nothing could prevail with the king; he looked on his troops as invincible; and in conſequence thereof, on the 13th of June, he left his camp before Prague, and joined the prince of Bevern, who had advanced to a place called Milkowitz.

The Auſtrians under count Daun were encamped in the moſt advantageous manner on three riſing grounds, ſo that it ſeemed almoſt impoſſible to diſlodge them; but the Pruſſian monarch, relying on the courage and valour of his troops, began the attack about three in the afternoon, and by the moſt invincible courage, they made themſelves maſters of two of the riſing grounds. The third encampment, however, baffled all their attempts; and it being utterly impracticable to bring up the horſe, they were obliged to give way, which threw the king into the moſt violent paſſion, eſpecially when he recollected that he had acted contrary to the opinion of marſhal Keith.

A prodigious number of men were killed on both ſides, and the Pruſſian monarch was obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Prague, and retreat in the beſt manner he could. The Auſtrians attempted to haraſs him, but his men behaved with ſuch bravery, that they loſt but few of their number; and count Daun entered the city of Prague in triumph. The Pruſſian monarch was ſo ſenſible of his error, that in a letter to marſhal Keith, he took the whole blame upon himſelf, and declared that no troops could ever have acted with greater bravery than the Auſtrians.

Nothing, however, could damp his ſpirits; his uſual bravery gave life to all his actions; and although guilty of an error very common in war, he reſolved to profit by miſtakes, and riſe ſuperior to misfortune. He was ſurrounded by enemies on every ſide, his reſources for carrying on the war were to be drawn from his own dominions, which were then on the point of being invaded by the Ruſſians; but he reſolved to act with more prudence for the future, and make caution a concomitant of courage.

His Britannic majeſty was ſo equitable in all his proceedings, that although obliged to defend Hanover, yet, leſt he ſhould give the leaſt offence to any of the German princes, he ordered a manifeſto to be publiſhed; wherein was pointed out the deſigns of the French, and the neceſſity his majeſty was under to protect his electoral dominions. As ſoon as this manifeſto was publiſhed, his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland aſſembled the allied army, and marching from Hanover, croſſed the Weſer near Retburgh, which he took from the French, and there eſtabliſhed his head quarters.

His royal highneſs had diſpoſed of his troops in the moſt admirable manner; for they ſtretched out in one line of different detachments, under the command of the moſt experienced generals; but they had not been long at Retburg, when the duke learned that the French army was marching from the Lower Rhine, and that their deſign was to cut off his communication with the Weſer. The French, whoſe numbers were double to that of the allies, continued marching forward, and his royal highneſs was obliged to repaſs the Weſer, as he had not ſtrength ſufficient to venture on an engagement. The river Weſer is on each ſide ſurrounded with high banks, and certain it is, that the duke, notwithſtanding the inferiority of numbers, might have made a violent oppoſition to the French, and diſputed their paſſage inch by inch; but inſtead of that, they were ſuffered to croſs on temporary bridges without the loſs of a ſingle man. They then ſeized the important paſs of Stadt Oldendorff, which opened a paſſage into Hanover, and that electorate was laid under very heavy contributions.

On the evening of the 4th of July, the duke ordered in all his detached parties, and drew up in order of battle, but the ſoldiers were obliged to reſt all night on their arms. About five next morning, the French cannon began to play upon that wing of the army that was compoſed of Heſſians; and although they were cut down in whole ranks, yet they continued firm and immoveable. About eight in the morning the ſmall arms began to fire, and certain it is, the allied army behaved with as much bravery as ever was diſplayed in a field of battle, for they were not ſo much as put into the leaſt diſorder. The only fault they committed was, the ſuffering the grenadiers, who compoſed the center, and were drawn up in a wood, to defile off in order to ſtrengthen the right wing; for by that movement the French were enabled to penetrate ſo far, that one of the Hanoverian batteries fell into their hands. The hereditary prince of Brunſwick behaved, on this occaſion, with the moſt ſingular bravery; for putting himſelf at the head of a body of grenadiers, they retook the battery with their bayonets fixed, although the French party, whom they drove from it, were double their number.

The French, however, were in poſſeſſion of two riſing grounds, on which they had erected ſtrong batteries; and as it would have been next to impoſſible to have taken them, the duke, after doing all that could be performed by an able general, found himſelf under the neceſſity of ſounding a retreat. This was one of the moſt obſtinate engagements during the whole of the laſt war, for it laſted full three days, and the French loſt four times as many men as the allies, while the retreat made by the latter was ſo well conducted, that the enemy were afraid to purſue.

The duke of Cumberland having left a ſmall detachment at Hamelen for its defence, continued his march, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Hoya, in order to cover Bremen and Verden, and to preſerve a communication with Stade, to which place the archieves and moſt valuable effects of Hanover had been removed.

The French ſoon reduced Hamelen, and during their ſtay there, M. d'Etrees received orders from his court to reſign his poſt of commander in chief of the French forces to the duke de Richlieu, who, on his arrival at the camp, detached the duke de Chevreuſe to take poſſeſſion of Hanover, with the title of governor of that city. Finding all oppoſition would be vain, the inhabitants ſubmitted to the enemy, and the Hanoverian garriſon, after being diſarmed, was left at liberty to go where they pleaſed. Richlieu himſelf, at the head of his army, followed the duke of Cumberland ſtep by ſtep, as far as the Aller, where many ſkirmiſhes happened between the two armies. That of the duke, however, though in a ſtrong ſituation, was by far too weak to think of holding out againſt the numerous forces of the French, which in a manner ſurrounded the allies; they had alſo made themſelves maſters of a little fort at the mouth of the river Zwinga, whereby they cut off the duke's communication with the Elbe.

The allies now found themſelves under an abſolute neceſſity of either being compelled to ſurrender priſoners of war, or fight with unequal numbers, under every diſadvantage. In this diſtreſſed ſituation, the king of Denmark interpoſed as a mediator, and a convention was ſigned by the generals on both ſides, in conſequence of which, no leſs than 40,000 Hanoverians, Heſſians, &c. were obliged to lay down their arms, and go into quarters of cantonment. This treaty was ſigned at a place called Cloſter Seven, and gave great offence to his Britannic majeſty; for by it the dominions of the king of Pruſſia were left expoſed to the French, who would not neglect to avail themſelves of ſuch a circumſtance. A declaration was publiſhed at London on the 16th of September, wherein his majeſty diſclaimed all knowledge of any thing relating to the convention at Cloſter Seven, and that he had not given the duke power to conclude it; ſo that he would ſtill act in concert with the king of Pruſſia.

Whatever conjectures may be formed, it is certain the duke of Cumberland had not force ſufficient to oppoſe the French; and undoubtedly, had he engaged, he would have been defeated. On the other hand, in conſequence of the convention, the king of Pruſſia's territories were expoſed to the enemy, who penetrated into them, and committed the moſt horrid barbarities, exacting contributions of a moſt exorbitant nature, and putting thoſe exactions in force by military execution.

In the mean time the Ruſſians, who had entered Ducal Pruſſia, continued their march, under the generals Apraxin and Fermer, and ſpread ſuch deſolation wherever they came, as had ſeldom happened ſince the Roman empire was over-run by the Goths and Vandals. Pomerania, eſpecially that part of it belonging to the king of Pruſſia, was ravaged and depopulated by the Swedes. Count Daunt had penetrated into Sileſia: the French, under the prince de Soubiſe, were advancing towards Saxony; and the whole dominions of the king of Pruſſia were given up for loſt. But nothing could diſcourage that prince, nor damp the bravery of his ſpirits. The barbarities committed by the Ruſſians were ſuch, that the king of Pruſſia reſolved to attack them firſt, and this brought on a general engagement on the 30th of Auguſt. The Ruſſians, on this occaſion, behaved with great intrepidity; whole ranks, and even lines, were cut down: but notwithſtanding, they knew not what it was to retreat. The victory was diſputed by both, but the loſs of men was greateſt on the part of the Ruſſians.

The ACTION near CAPE FRANCOIS on the 21st of Oct^{r} 1757 between his Majesty's Ships the Augusta, Dreadnought, & Edinburgh, under the Command of Capt^{n} Forrest, and seven French Men of War, when the latter where defeated, and oblig'd to sheer off in a shattered condition.

The king of Pruſſia having left ſome men to guard the paſſes which lead towards Bohemia, marched in order to meet the combined armies of France and the Empire, under the princes de Soubiſe and Saxe Hilburghauſen, and came up with them at Roſbach on the 5th of November, when the Pruſſians obtained a compleat victory, with the loſs of only a few men. In this battle the king of Pruſſia, and all his army, behaved with ſuch courage, and made the diſpoſitions with ſuch prudence, that the enemy were cut off in vaſt numbers, and the greateſt part of their baggage and ammunition was taken, beſides many priſoners.

On the 12th of November, the king ſet out to aſſiſt the prince of Bevern, who was then in Sileſia; and in his way thither, a party of 4000 ſoldiers, who had been priſoners among the Auſtrians, and had made their eſcape, joined him; and meeting with ſeveral parties of huſſars and croats, they diſperſed them, and ſeized the proviſions they were eſcorting to the army.

At laſt the king came up with the Auſtrian army near Schweidnitz, and a moſt bloody battle enſued, in which the Pruſſians obtained a compleat victory, though dearly bought. The Auſtrians, after doing every thing that brave men could perform, were obliged to retreat, and take ſhelter under the walls of Breſlaw, which had lately fallen into their hands.

His Pruſſian majeſty immediately purſued the Auſtrians, and undertook the ſiege of Breſlaw, which ſurrendered in a few days, and 13,000 men were made priſoners of war. The military cheſt, containing the ammunition, was taken at the ſame time; and the king, in compaſſion to his army, who had performed wonders, ordered them into quarters of cantonment during the reſt of the winter.

In the mean time the Hanoverians, who had been confined from action by a treaty of neutrality, were oppreſſed, in the moſt cruel manner, by the French; in conſequence of which his Britannic majeſty ordered a declaration to be publiſhed, wherein he explained the motives which influenced his conduct, and induced him once more to have recourſe to arms. His royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland having thought proper to reſign the command of the electoral army, it was conferred on prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic, who, about the latter end of November, put the troops in motion. On the 4th of December, they overtook a body of 2000 men, which formed the enemy's rear; theſe they attacked and totally routed. On the 14th of the ſame month another action happened upon the Aller, between a body of 7 or 8000 Hanoverians, under general Zaſtrow, and one of about 10,000 French, in which the former remained maſters of the field.

Theſe advantages animated the Hanoverians, and ſtruck ſuch a panic into the enemy, that they were almoſt incapable of reſiſtance, ſo that the former recovered poſſeſſion of Lunenburgh, Zell, and all that part of the Brunſwic dominions next to Pruſſia. The enemy, however, had committed the moſt terrible outrages in every place; the ſuburbs of Zell were reduced to aſhes, and by the orders of Richlieu the orphan houſe was ſet on fire, and many of the poor innocents periſhed in the flames. The ſeverity of the weather prevented prince Ferdinand from purſuing his advantage; he therefore marched to Ultzan and Lunenburgh, where his army was put into winter quarters.

With reſpect to the naval tranſactions during this year, the Engliſh cruizers and privateers made ſeveral captures: but although they diſtreſſed the enemy, yet they acquired but little advantage to themſelves. In the Weſt-Indies, captain Forreſt, in the Auguſta, accompanied by ſome other ſhips, cruized off the bay of Cape François, although a large ſquadron of French men of war were lying at the ſame place. The French admiral not knowing how to juſtify his conduct if he remained inactive, reſolved to attack the Engliſh, and, for that purpoſe, ſailed out of the harbour. Captain Forreſt, who watched all his motions, no ſooner ſaw him hoiſt his ſails, than he prepared to meet him, and ſhortened ſail, in order to give the enemy time to come up.' About noon the French fleet, conſiſting of four ſhips of the line and three frigates, formed into one line; and the Engliſh captain ordered the Dreadnought and the Edinburgh to attack them. The engagement began with great fury, but the bravery of the Engliſh bore down all oppoſition; and towards the evening, the French were obliged to retreat with conſiderable loſs. The Engliſh, who could not, conſiſtent with their own ſafety, purſue the enemy, kept all night under ſail in the bay; and next morning ſeized a large fleet o French merchant ſhips, which were carried into Jamaica, and there ſold as legal prizes.

In the Eaſt-Indies affairs this year turned out very favourable to the Engliſh. On the 31ſt of January admiral Watſon and colonel Clive, who had reſolved to revenge the death of their countrymen in the preceding year, appeared with two ſhips before the town of Calcutta, and were received by a briſk fire from the batteries. This ſalute was returned ſo warmly, that the enemy's guns were ſoon ſilenced, and in leſs than two hours the place and fort were abandoned. Colonel Clive, on the other ſide, inveſted the town, and made his attack with ſuch vigour, as greatly contributed to the ſudden reduction of the ſettlement. Immediately on the ſurrender of the fort captain Coote took poſſeſſion of it with his majeſty's troops, and found ninety-one pieces of cannon, four mortars, abundance of ammunition, ſtores and proviſions, with every thing neceſſary for ſuſtaining an obſtinate ſiege. Thus, with the inconſiderable loſs of nine ſeamen killed, and three ſoldiers, the Engliſh were re-eſtabliſhed in the two ſtrongeſt fortreſſes on the Ganges. In a few days after the city of Hughly, higher up the Ganges, was reduced with as little difficulty. The loſs of this place was of infinite conſequence to the nabob; for in it were his ſtorehouſes of ſalt, and vaſt granaries for the ſupport of his army; all which were burnt and deſtroyed. Enraged at theſe misfortunes, the viceroy of Bengal aſſembled an army of 10,000 horſe and 15,000 foot, fully reſolved to expel the Engliſh out of his dominions, and take ample vengeance for his late diſgraces. Accordingly, in February he marched towards Calcutta, and encamped about a mile from the town. Colonel Clive immediately made application to the admiral for a reinforcement, and 600 men under the command of captain Warwick were granted him. The colonel then drew out his forces, advanced towards the enemy, and began the attack with ſuch fury, that the viceroy, after a feeble reſiſtance, retreated, with the loſs of 1000 men killed, wounded and taken priſoners, 500 horſes, great numbers of draft bullocks, and four elephants. This advantage, though leſs deciſive than could have been wiſhed, ſo much intimidated the nabob, that he made ſeveral conceſſions greatly to the honour and advantage of the company, which were ſolemnly ſigned and ſealed with the nabob's own hand.

The Engliſh commanders, however, had too much diſcernment to confide in the promiſes of a barbarian; but theſe ſentiments they prudently concealed, till they had thoroughly reinſtated the affairs of the company, and reduced the French power in this province. The chief object of their deſigns was the reduction of Chandenagore, a French ſettlement higher up the river than Calcutta, and the moſt important of any poſſeſſed by them in the bay of Bengal. Accordingly, colonel Clive, being reinforced by 300 men from Bombay, began his march to Chandenagore, at the head of 700 Europeans, and 1600 Indians. On his arrival, he took poſſeſſion of all the out-poſts, except one redoubt mounted with eight pieces of cannon, which he left to be ſilenced by the admiral. On the 18th of March, the admirals Watſon and Pocock arrived within two miles of the French ſettlement, with the Kent, Tyger, and Saliſbury men of war, when they found their paſſage obſtructed by booms laid acroſs the river, and ſeveral veſſels ſunk in the channel. Theſe difficulties being removed, they advanced early on the 24th, and drew up in a line before the fort, which they battered with great fury for three hours, while colonel Clive was making his approaches on the land-ſide, and playing vigorouſly from the batteries he had raiſed. Their united efforts ſoon obliged the enemy to ſubmit, and the place ſurrendered by capitulation. The keys were delivered to captain Latham of the Tyger; and in the afternoon colonel Clive with the king's troops took poſſeſſion. The reduction of this fortreſs, in which was a numerous garriſon, well provided with proviſions and warlike ſtores, was effected with the loſs of forty men only on the ſide of the conquerors.

The Britiſh commanders now reſolved to enter upon ſome meaſures which ſhould oblige the treacherous viceroy to a ſtrict performance of the late treaty. But as re-commencing hoſtilities againſt ſo powerful a prince was in itſelf dangerous, the affair was laid before the council of Calcutta; during which deliberations a fortunate incident happened, that determined them to come to an open rupture. The principal perſons in the viceroy's court found themſelves oppreſſed by his haughtineſs and inſolence, and the ſame ſpirit of diſcontent reigned among the officers of his army, who ſaw that the peace of the country could never be reſtored, unleſs either the Engliſh were expelled, or the nabob depoſed. Accordingly a plan was concerted for diveſting him of all his power. This conſpiracy was conducted by Jaffier Ali Khan, his prime miniſter and chief commander, who communicated his project to Mr. Watts, ſecond in council at Calcutta; after which, the plan being fully concerted between the diſaffected Indians and the council, colonel Clive was ordered to take the field with his little army. Admiral Watſon undertook the defence of Chandenagore, and the garriſon of that place was detached to reinforce the colonel, together with fifty ſeamen to be employed as gunners, in managing the artillery. On the 19th of June a detachment was ſent to attack Cutwa fort and town, ſituated on that branch of the river forming the iſland of Caſſimbuzar. This place ſurrendered at the firſt ſummons; and here the colonel waited three days in expectation of receiving advices from Ali Khan. But finding himſelf diſappointed of the wiſhed-for intelligence, he, on the 22d croſſed the river, and the ſame day attacked the army of the viceroy, conſiſting of 20,000 men, with his own forces only, Ali Khan not yet chuſing to declare his intentions openly. The enemy, after a vigorous but ſhort conteſt were totally routed: the nabob's camp, baggage, and fifty pieces of cannon were taken, and a complete victory obtained. The colonel purſuing his advantage, immediately marched to Muſcalavat, the capital of the province, where he was joined by Ali Khan and the malcontents. It had been previouſly agreed that this Indian chief ſhould be inveſted with the dignity of nabob; and accordingly colonel Clive proceeded ſolemnly to depoſe Sulajud Dowla, and ſubſtitute Ali Khan in his room, who was publicly acknowledged by the people as ſuba or viceroy of the provinces of Bengal, Bahar and Orixa. The late viceroy being ſoon after taken, was put to death by his ſucceſſor, who readily complied with all the conditions ſtipulated with the company before his elevation. He conferred on his allies very liberal rewards, and granted the company the moſt extraordinary privileges; at once ſhewing the generoſity of his temper, and how juſtly he merited the aſſiſtance which had been afforded him. By this alliance and the reduction of Chandenagore, the French were entirely excluded the commerce of Bengal and its dependences, the trade of the Engliſh company was reſtored, and even augmented beyond the moſt ſanguine hopes; a new ally was acquired whoſe intereſt obliged him to remain firm to his engagements; above two millions ſterling were paid to the company, and the ſufferers at Calcutta; the ſoldiers and ſeamen were gratified with the ſum of 600,000l. as a reward for their ſervices, beſides ſeveral other advantages which it would appear tedious to enumerate: we ſhall therefore only obſerve, that in the ſpace of fourteen days, a ſurprizing revolution was effected, and the government of a vaſt country, ſuperior in wealth, fertility, extent, and number of inhabitants to moſt European kingdoms, was transferred by a handful of troops, conducted by an officer, who had attained the art of war rather by intuition than inſtruction and experience. The public joy which theſe vaſt ſucceſſes occaſioned was, however, greatly diminiſhed by the death of admiral Watſon, who fell a ſacrifice to the unwholeſomeneſs of the climate. He paid the debt of nature on the 18th of Auguſt, and was ſincerely lamented by the whole factory.

But we muſt now return to the domeſtic affairs of England. On the 1ſt of December the parliament met; and his majeſty, in his ſpeech, informed them, that although things had turned out contrary to his expectations and the juſtice of his cauſe, yet he was determined in his own mind to proſecute the war with vigour; for which purpoſe he depended on divine providence and the aſſiſtance of his faithful commons. He expatiated largely on the late ſucceſſes which the king of Pruſſia had obtained over his enemies in Germany; and took notice to the commons, that the eyes of all Europe were turned towards them, as the perſons who, in all human probability, were moſt likely to eſtabliſh the public tranquillity. He concluded by recommending to them the neceſſity they were under to ſupport the king of Pruſſia, whoſe victories in Germany would weaken the power of the French.

Addreſſes of thanks having been preſented, the commons proceeded to ſettle the ſupply; the whole of which amounted to 10,486,457l. Out of this 40,000l. were granted to the Foundling Hoſpital; 300,000l. towards diſcharging the debt of the navy; and 670,000l. for enabling his majeſty to make good his engagements with the king of Pruſſia.

A. D. 1758. The ſupplies being granted, the commons took into conſideration the ſtate of the nation; and many excellent laws were made for the good of the ſubject. A tax was laid on ſeveral articles of luxury, particularly on ſilver plate, which was charged 6d. each ounce; and licences were obliged to be taken out for vending ſuch things as ſeemed not, in their own nature, neceſſary. The regular payment of wages due to ſeamen was eſtabliſhed into a law, which was of infinite ſervice to that uſeful body of men; and the laws relating to the militia being ſound defective, a new bill was brought in, by which they were explained and amended.

Every thing that could be projected being now done for the welfare and ſecurity of the nation, on the 20th of June the parliament was prorogued by commiſſion, the king being ſo indiſpoſed as not to be able to attend the houſe; but the commons were given to underſtand that his majeſty entertained the higheſt ſatisfaction at their proceedings during the whole of the ſeſſion.

The conduct of Mr. Pitt, who had the principal ſhare in the management of public buſineſs, was univerſally applauded by the people; and it muſt be acknowledged that no miniſter ever acted with greater courage, wiſdom, or perſeverance. He was a true judge of merit under every character, and in every ſtation; and ſuch accompliſhed men were made choice of by him to command the army and the navy, that the Britiſh glory roſe to the higheſt pitch of grandeur.

Such was the internal ſtate of Britain at the cloſe of this ſeſſion of parliament; ſo that conſiſtent with the order of things, we ſhall now take a view of the reſpective tranſactions that occurred, during this year, on the continent.

The king of Pruſſia had made ſuch excellent uſe of the ſucceſſes that had attended his arms during the remainder of the laſt year, that the Ruſſians were obliged to diſperſe themſelves in Poland for want of ſubſiſtence; and the Swedes, who had over-run Pomerania, were ſo haraſſed by the Pruſſian ſoldiers, who drove them from one place to another, that they were obliged to take ſhelter in Stralſund. The Auſtrians, who had been driven out of Sileſia, took refuge in Bohemia; and although the Pruſſian monarch had armies, to the amount of 300,000 men, to contend with, yet the ſame magnanimity which had diſtinguiſhed every part of his conduct, ſhone now more conſpicuous than ever. The French were meditating ſchemes for annexing Hanover to their own dominions; and the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, who had no reaſon to expect any favours from ſuch perfidious enemies, yet entered into a treaty with Lewis XV. wherein he promiſed to withdraw his troops from aſſiſting the Hanoverians, and employ them in the ſervice of France. This was one of the moſt ungrateful propoſals that, perhaps, ever had been made; and it conveys to us a very mean idea of the fidelity of German princes. The landgrave had been long ſupported by the Engliſh; he had entered into a treaty of the moſt ſolemn nature with our ſovereign: but here, like a mean, mercenary wretch, he recedes from all his engagements, and turns his back upon his moſt generous benefactor. Nor was it much better with the duke of Brunſwick, who, although under many obligations to us, promiſed to act in concert with the French; but all his ſchemes were defeated by the conduct of his brother prince Ferdinand, who commanded the allied army; and that of his ſon, the hereditary prince, who acted under his uncle.

The French, who had made themſelves maſters of Bremen, and ſome other places belonging to the German empire, were ſoon driven from them by a detachment under the prince of Holſtein Gottorp; while the duke de Richlieu, who had behaved in the moſt cruel manner to the Hanoverians, was ſuperſeded, and the command of the army given to the count de Clermont. This new general, as ſoon as he had reviewed the army, found it in a moſt wretched condition, in conſequence of the relaxation of diſcipline, the ſeverity of the ſeaſon, and the almoſt total want of all the common neceſſaries of life. He knew, that, under ſuch circumſtances, it would be an act of madneſs to attempt any thing againſt prince Ferdinand; and therefore thought it moſt prudent to retreat towards the Rhine, while the hereditary prince of Brunſwick haraſſed his rear, and ſeized the greateſt part of the baggage.

The duke de Randau, the French governor at Hanover, who had done every thing to reſtrain the licentiouſneſs of the ſoldiers, and in all things diſcharged his duty as a man of honour and humanity, ordered all the magazine of proviſions to be diſtributed among the poor; and, upon the whole, left behind him ſuch an amiable character, as ſhines far more conſpicuous than all the blandiſhments of military honours.

Prince Ferdinand made every diſpoſition that could be thought of for diſlodging the French from ſuch places as they were ſtill in poſſeſſion of in the electorate of Hanover; and the garriſon of Hoya, a ſtrong town on the Weſer, was taken, and all the military ſtores fell into the hands of the allies. Minden was taken at the ſame time, and the French now found that they were loſing ground every day.

The French general having croſſed the Rhine, cantoned his forces along the banks of that river; while prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick took poſſeſſion of Munſter, from whence his detached parties iſſued with ſuch rapidity, that they beat up the quarters of the French, and drove them from all their advanced poſts. This was ſhocking news to the haughty French king, whoſe armies had been hitherto conducted by men raiſed to office through the intrigues of his miſtreſs: but now it was found neceſſary to change both men and meaſures. The duke de Belleiſle was placed at the head of the war department; and, like a real lover of his country, he boldly repreſented to his ſovereign, that the conduct of his generals in Germany had been ſo inconſiſtent with the duty they owed to the public, that they deſerved the higheſt cenſures. He, at the ſame time, ſent letters to the colonels of regiments, commanding them in his majeſty's name, not to expoſe any commiſſions to ſale, but beſtow them according to merit and ſeniority, becauſe ſuch only are qualified to ſerve in the army, and conduct the buſineſs of war, who have acquired knowledge by experience.

On the 23d of June both armies met at a place called Crevelt, and a moſt obſtinate engagement enſued, when the French were obliged to give way, but their retreat was covered by their dragoons, who behaved with the greateſt courage imaginable. This victory, which coſt the allies many of their beſt forces, was yet far from being deciſive: for although ſeveral towns ſurrendered to them, among which was the city of Duſſeldorp, yet the enemy took refuge under the walls of Cologne; and juſt about the ſame time, the marſhal de Contades was ſent to take upon him the command of the French army. Prince Ferdinand had propoſed, in a council of war, to make an irruption into the Netherlands, and ſo draw the French out of Germany, that they might not have an opportunity of diſturbing the king of Pruſſia, while their own territories were in danger of being invaded. General Imhoff, an Hanoverian officer, attacked a party of the enemy, and drove them from a wood; but the prince de Soubiſe had made himſelf maſter of the important town of Gottingen, by which prince Ferdinand, whoſe army had ſuffered much by the overflowing of the Rhine, was in danger of having his forces divided. Prince Xaverius was ſent with a body of forces to aſſiſt the prince de Soubiſe; while prince Ferdinand, who was perfectly acquainted with the country, diſpatched general Oberg, with 10,000 men, to join a detachment of Heſſians who were on their march to aſſiſt the allied army; for the French had acted in ſuch an inſincere manner with the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, that he had determined not to have any farther connections with them. Both armies continued on the defenſive, as if their ſole intention had been to watch the motions of each other; but on the 10th of October, about four in the afternoon, a ſevere cannonading began; and notwithſtanding the allies, for ſome time, ſeemed to gain the advantage, yet they were at laſt obliged to give way, but retreated in good order. General Oberg loſt his magazine of proviſion and ammunition; but prince Ferdinand having been joined by a body of Britiſh troops under the command of the duke of Marlborough, who died ſoon after, the French reaped but little benefit from the victory.

In the mean time, the king of Pruſſia beſieged the town of Schweidnitz, and carried on the attack with ſuch vigour, that the garriſon was obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. He likewiſe detached a ſtrong party who took the town of Trawtenaw, by which a paſſage was opened for his troops to march into Bohemia or Moldavia. Accordingly, he marched to the city of Olmutz, the capital of the latter, in which was a ſtrong garriſon; but the king beſieged it in form.

Count Daun, who knew the importance of the place, marched to its relief; and meeting with a large convoy of proviſions, he ſeized the whole, by which the king of Pruſſia was obliged to raiſe the ſiege. His ſuperior knowledge and preſence of mind enabled him to make an exceeding good retreat; and although count Daun watched all his motions, yet he was afraid to attack him; and marſhal Keith brought off all the heavy artillery. The Auſtrian detached parties gave way as faſt as he approached: one of them was ſurrounded and taken; and the king, who ſeemed to riſe ſuperior to misfortune, reſolved to transfer the ſeat of war to Bohemia.

The empreſs of Ruſſia had entered into a new confederacy with the courts of Vienna and Verſailles, and in conſequence thereof her army was ordered to take the field, under the generals Fermer and Brown. Koningſburg, the capital of Pruſſia, was taken without any reſiſtance; and the Coſſacks and Colmacks, a ſet of inhuman barbarians who followed the army, ravaged the neighbouring country, murdering the people without diſtinction of age or ſex.

As ſoon as the king of Pruſſia heard that they were approaching towards the frontiers of Sileſia, he began his march from Bohemia, in order to give them battle. The Ruſſians had now advanced to the neighbourhood of Franckfort; and on the 9th of Auguſt the king arrived at Landſhut, where he croſſed the Oder, and next day the army was allowed to reſt. The Pruſſian monarch reſolved to attack them immediately, and for that purpoſe marched paſt their left flank, and drew up his army in order of battle on an extended plain, the Ruſſians having got poſſeſſion of the riſing grounds. This brought on a moſt bloody engagement, in which above 20,000 Ruſſians were killed, till at laſt night parted them, and the Pruſſians continued under arms. Next morning the battle was renewed, for the Ruſſians were ſo numerous that they remained in an immoveable ſtate, notwithſtanding their loſs. The victory was claimed by both ſides, although neither had obtained one; but both behaved with the moſt undaunted courage.

Beſet, as the king of Pruſſia was, with enemies on every ſide, he ſtill continued to act with vigour; and finding that count Daun intended to attack his brother, prince Henry, he marched to his aſſiſtance with twenty-four battalions, and arrived at Torgau on the 5th of September. Several ſkirmiſhes happened between the advanced parties on both ſides; and the king, whoſe army had been much weakened, was obliged to remain on the defenſive. Count Daun, who always acted in the moſt cautious manner, finding that the Pruſſians had neglected to fortify the village of Hochkirchin, began his march in the middle of the night of the 14th of October, and attacked that wing of the Pruſſian army which was under the command of marſhal Keith.

This was an unexpected ſtroke, and although the Pruſſians did every thing in their power to repair the loſs, yet they were, after a moſt obſtinate engagement, forced to give way; and the brave marſhal Keith, with prince Francis of Brunſwick, were killed, and the prince of Anhalt taken priſoner. The king loſt above 3000 men; but he retreated in good order, and continued ten days, endeavouring to bring the count to a freſh engagement. Of all the generals during the war count Daun ſeems to have been the moſt properly qualified for making uſe of detached parties, and haraſſing an enemy in a retreat. Whenever he found that the king had decamped, he was ſure to haraſs his rear.

Prince Henry of Pruſſia was reduced to great ſtraits in Saxony, while the marſhal Laudohn was ſent to haraſs the king in Luſatia. Dreſden was the great object the Auſtrians had in view, becauſe in conſequence of its being taken from the Pruſſians an opening would be made into Brandenburgh. This they knew would diſtreſs the king more than any thing they could undertake; but it was not to be executed ſo eaſily as they imagined. Count Schmettau, who commanded in Dreſden, declared that if the Auſtrians ſhould attack the city, he would reduce the whole to a heap of aſhes; and although the magiſtrates begged on their knees that he would deſiſt from ſuch a meaſure, yet he remained inflexible, and actually laid combuſtibles into the houſes. He began with the ſuburbs, where moſt of the Saxon nobility and gentry reſided, and in a few hours the whole was in one continued blaze. Count Daun beheld, with aſtoniſhment, the conflagration, and being afraid that the general would ſerve the interior part of the city in the ſame manner, he deſiſted, in ſome meaſure; while the king of Pruſſia relieved the town of Neiſs, and then reſolved to return to Saxony. This obliged count Daun to retire towards Bohemia; and the Ruſſians, who had penetrated into Pruſſian Pomerania, in order to beſiege ſome fort that would afford them winter quarters, were obliged to return to Poland. They did not, however, fail to ruin Ducal Pruſſia, where they robbed and murdered the inhabitants in the moſt horrid manner, ſo that the whole country was a ſcene of blood and miſery.

During the whole courſe of this year the Britiſh navy had been very ſucceſsful both in America and Europe. Captain Forreſt, with the captains Langdon and Suckling, attacked a French ſquadron at Cape François, and diſabled ſeveral of them; after which he proceeded to the bay of Hiſpaniola, and in his way thither took a ſquadron of nine ſhips, all richly laden, which greatly diſtreſſed the French, and brought a conſiderable ſum of money into the nation. Admiral Boſcawen ſailed from Portſmouth in the month of February for the North American ſeas, and Sir Edward Hawke was ſent to the bay of Biſcay. On the coaſt of Spain, admiral Oſborn, aſſiſted by captain Gardiner, a brave officer, attacked a French fleet of conſiderable force, and took two of the largeſt belonging to their whole navy. Sir Edward Hawke intercepted a large fleet laden with ſtores and proviſions for North-America; and a few days after he took a fleet of their merchant ſhips, by which their commerce was greatly diſtreſſed.

A conſiderable damp, however, was given to the joy which theſe ſucceſſes occaſioned, by the terrible accident that befel the Prince George of eighty guns, commanded by rear admiral Broderick, in his paſſage to the Mediterranean. On the 30th of April, about two in the afternoon, a dreadful fire broke out in the fore part of the ſhip and raged with ſuch violence, that, notwithſtanding all the officers and men uſed their utmoſt efforts to ſuppreſs it, the flames increaſed; and the ſhip being conſumed to the water-edge, ſunk about ſix o'clock in the evening. When all endeavours proved ineffectual, and no hopes of preſerving the ſhip remained, the barge was hoiſted out for the preſervation of the admiral, who accordingly entered it; but, all diſtinction being now forgot, the ſailors ruſhed into it in ſuch crowds, that in a few minutes it overſet. The admiral, who foreſaw what muſt be the conſequence, had ſtripped off his cloaths and committed himſelf to the mercy of the waves. In this ſituation he remained a full hour, when he was taken up by a boat belonging to a merchant ſhip. Beſides the admiral, the captain, four lieutenants, the purſer, the chaplain, the maſter, two lieutenants of marines, the boatſwain, three paſſengers, fourteen petty officers, and about 300 men were ſaved, while the reſt, amounting to 500, periſhed.

The Engliſh miniſtry having formed a ſcheme for making a deſcent on the coaſt of France, two powerful ſquadrons were accordingly equipped for that purpoſe. One of them conſiſted of eleven large ſhips, commanded by lord Anſon and Sir Edward Hawke, and the other was compoſed of four ſhips of the line, two fire-ſhips, two bombs, twenty tenders, ten ſtore-ſhips, and 100 tranſports, the whole of which were put under the direction of commodore Howe. On board the latter was embarked a body of troops, conſiſting of ſixteen regiments, nine troops of light horſe, and 6000 marines, under the command of the duke of Marlborough. The troops, which had for ſome time been encamped in the iſle of Wight, were embarked the latter end of May, and the two fleets ſailed, in the beginning of June, from St. Helens, for the coaſt of Bretagne. The ſquadron commanded by lord Anſon ſtanding to the weſtward, and the other ſteering right athwart the channel. They had hardly left the Engliſh coaſt when the weather became very tempeſtuous, and juſt before midnight the commodore made a ſignal for the fleet to lay to, leſt they ſhould run on the French ſhore before break of day. It continued to blow a ſtiff gale all night, and they could not make ſail again till ſix the next morning. About eight they ſaw cape la Hogue, whither they directed their courſe, but on account of the ſtrong tide againſt them, they could not reach this place till the evening, when the whole fleet came to an anchor in the channel. Early the next day the fleet got under ſail, and ſteered directly for the bay of St. Malo. On the fourth, about five in the afternoon, being entirely becalmed, they came to an anchor within three miles of the place: the next morning they weighed before it was day, and ſtood along the coaſt till they opened the bay of Cancalle, where they intended to diſembark the forces. About eight in the morning the commodore made a ſignal for the ſhips with the grenadiers on board to make ſail, and about four in the afternoon the whole fleet came to an anchor, four frigates excepted, which were ordered to continue their courſe towards a battery that might impede the landing of the forces. Ten companies of grenadiers, under the command of general Moſtyn, were immediately put into flat-bottomed boats, and as ſoon as the frigates had ſilenced the before-mentioned battery, they landed without any other oppoſition than a few ſpent ſhot, fired by ſome peaſants, who on the approach of a ſerjeant and twelve men inſtantly fled: and in this they only followed the example of ſeven companies of foot and three troops of dragoons, they having retired from the ſhore as ſoon as they perceived the Engliſh grenadiers in motion.

Lord Down, at the head of twenty men, was ordered to march through a very narrow paſs up to the village, where they were met by the marquis de Landal, intendant of the coaſt, and one of his ſervants. Lord Down inſtantly called to him, and aſſured him, that if he would ſurrender he had nothing to fear; but this he fooliſhly refuſed to do, upon which he, together with his ſervant and horſes, were ſhot dead on the ſpot. After taking poſſeſſion of the village of Cancalle, the grenadiers lay on their arms all night. The next day the diſembarkation was compleated, and the whole encamped: the head quarters being fixed at Cancalle. The day following, as ſoon as it was light, the whole army, except the third brigade, ſtruck their tents, and began to march in two columns. The firſt, conſiſting of the brigade of the guards, two battalions of grenadiers, and the firſt brigade, commanded by lord George Sackville, marched from the left, till they fell into the great road leading to St. Malo. The ſecond column, conſiſting of the ſecond and fourth brigades, commanded by the earl of Ancram, marched alſo from the left through a country wholly encloſed, and the road ſo remarkably narrow, that 200 pioneers, who marched at the head of the diviſion, were frequently obliged to continue their rout in ſingle files. At the ſame time the fields on each ſide the road ſo intercepted their view, that they often could not ſee more than forty yards beyond their flanks. The inhabitants of the villages had deſerted their houſes, and ſtripped them of every thing they could remove, ſo that the whole country appeared a mere deſert.

The march, however, was conducted with great order, and without beat of drum: but though the diſtance was no more than ſix miles, they did not reach their ground till it was late in the evening. St Malo was now reconnoitred by the general officers; and a camp marked out about a mile from the city. Parties of horſe were immediately detached to different parts of the country to ſcour the road and make good diſcoveries. One of theſe detachments perceived a large baſon behind the town, into which all the ſhipping belonging to the place were collected, and concealed from the ſight of the Engliſh fleet by a prodigious ſtorehouſe, built in the form of a rotunda, near the rope-walk. Marlborough, on being informed of this diſcovery, detached all the cavalry, with a foot ſoldier mounted behind each of the horſemen, furniſhed with hand granades, matches, &c. Theſe, concealed by the night, paſſed under the enemy's cannon on the walls to the harbour, where they found a large fleet conſiſting of men of war, privateers and merchantmen. Fire was immediately ſet to the neareſt ſhips; and alſo the magazines of pitch, tar, ropes, &c. all which, in the ſpace of a few hours, became ſuch a dreadful ſcene of conflagration, that even imagination itſelf is unable to paint. The ſhips were all faſt a-ground, and ſo cloſe together that it was impoſſible for any of them to eſcape. Two men of war, one of 50, the other of 30, 33 privateers, from 18 to 30 guns each, and above 70 ſail of merchant ſhips, were by this conflagration reduced to aſhes, together with a great quantity of naval ſtores.

It being expected that a ſally would be made from the town, about eleven at night the duke of Marlborough ordered the ſecond brigade to march, in order to ſupport the piquets; but the whole was performed without the leaſt attempt from the enemy, though it was well known that a very conſiderable body of troops had, the preceding day, thrown themſelves into the town, from the oppoſite ſide of the river. The conflagration continued the whole night; and the next morning foraging parties were detached from the camp, the army having landed with proviſions which would laſt them only two days.

While the army lay encamped near St. Malo, one of the battalions of the guards marched under the command of general Cæſar, to the town of Doll, ſituated about twelve miles up the country, where they were politely entertained by the magiſtrates; and as their deſign was nothing more than to reconnoitre the country, they continued one night in the town without committing the leaſt act of hoſtility, and in the morning returned to their camp. A party of the light horſe, advancing ſtill farther, fell in with the vedets of a French camp, two of whom, after a long chaſe, they took, and brought them priſoners to the Engliſh army.

It was now evident that the town of St. Malo was too well fortified to hope for ſucceſs, all thoughts of attacking it were therefore laid aſide; and the general having received repeated advices, that the French were buſily employed in aſſembling forces to attack his camp, he returned to Cancalle, where commodore Howe had made ſuch a maſterly diſpoſition of the boats and tranſports, that the reimbarkation of the troops was performed with ſurprizing eaſe and expedition. The ſoldiers, while they continued in the enemy's country were reſtrained from committing the leaſt outrage, by the ſevereſt diſcipline; and all the houſes which the inhabitants had abandoned were left untouched.

As ſoon as the troops were all embarked, the fleet left Cancalle bay, and after encountering the fury of a tempeſtuous ſea for near a fortnight, came to an anchor near Cherburg; and on the firſt of July, arrived in the road of St. Helen's. The ſoldiers were landed on the Iſle of Wight, and a conſiderable part of them ſent, under the command of the duke of Marlborough and lord George Sackville, to reinforce the allied army in Germany.

The fleet in which theſe troops were embarked ſailed from St. Helen's on the firſt of Auguſt; and after a tedious paſſage, anchored before Cherburg. The enemy had for ſome time expected the Engliſh would ſoon attack this place: nor had they been idle during the interval. They had thrown up an entrenchment, extending near four miles along the coaſt from the fort de Ecourdeville, ſituated about two miles to the weſt of Cherburg, and fortified it with ſeveral batteries at proper diſtances. Behind this intrenchment, a body of horſe and infantry appeared, dreſſed in red and blue uniform. But as they did not advance to the open beach, the landing of the Engliſh forces was attended with little danger. A bomb ketch was firſt ſent to anchor near the town, and throw a few ſhells into the place, as a feint to amuſe the enemy, with regard to the ſpot, where they intended to land, which was near a league to the weſtward of Querqueville, the weſternmoſt fort in the bay. The other bomb ketches being poſted along the ſhore, conſiderably galled the entrenchment by not only throwing ſhells, in the uſual manner, but alſo by loading the mortars with great quantities of balls, which were thrown to a very conſiderable diſtance, and, by ſcattering as they flew, did an infinite deal of miſchief. While theſe veſſels kept up an inceſſant fire on the trenches, the grenadiers and guards were landed without oppoſition, and formed immediately on the beach, having a natural breaſtwork in their front. The enemy advanced upon them in good order from the left, where the ground was interſected with hedges. On perceiving the approach of the enemy, the Britiſh troops marched towards them, and a ſtraggling fire began; but the French declined the engagement, and took poſſeſſion of a hill, whence they diſcharged a few random ſhot on the Engliſh advanced poſts.

During this trifling ſkirmiſh the reſt of the infantry were diſembarked, and the enemy took advantage of the night to retire. General Blythe, who now commanded the Britiſh forces, encamped at the village of Erville, and the next morning marched towards Cherburgh. An advanced party took poſſeſſion of fort Querqueville, which the enemy had abandoned, together with the lines and batteries along the ſhore.

When the Engliſh reached Cherburg, they found the place entirely deſerted by the enemy, the gates were open, and they entered it without the leaſt oppoſition.

The harbour and baſon of Cherburg being deſtroyed, together with all the forts in the neighbourhood, and about twenty pieces of braſs cannon conveyed on board the Engliſh ſhips, a contribution, amounting to about 3000l. ſterling, was exacted from the town, and a plan of reimbarkation concerted, as it appeared, from the reports of peaſants and deſerters, that the enemy were already increaſed to a formidable number. A ſlight entrenchment being raiſed, ſufficient to defend the laſt diviſion that ſhould be reimbarked, the ſtores and artillery were ſhipped, and the light horſe immediately carried on board their reſpective tranſports, by means of platforms laid in the flat-bottomed veſſels.

On the 16th of Auguſt the forces marched from Cherburg down to the beach, and reimbarked at fort Gallet, without the leaſt diſturbance from the enemy. The next day the fleet ſet ſail for the coaſt of England, and anchored in the road of Weymouth, under the high land of Portland. Two days after it again weighed and ſtood to the ſouthward, but was obliged by contrary winds to return to the ſame ſtation. The ſecond effort, however, was more effectual; and ſteering to the French coaſt, they arrived in the bay of St. Lunaire, two leagues to the weſtward of St. Malo, upon which place it was determined to make another attempt. The ſloops and ketches being poſted along ſhore to cover the landing, the troops were diſembarked on an open beach, and a ſmall party detached to the harbour of St. Briac, above the town of St. Malo, where they deſtroyed about fifteen ſmall veſſels: but St. Malo itſelf being carefully reconnoitered, appeared to be impregnable either by the land forces or ſhipping, which obliged the deſign againſt it to be laid aſide. The general, unwilling to reimbark without attempting ſome ſtep for the farther annoyance of the enemy, reſolved to penetrate into the country, regulating his motions, however, by thoſe of the fleet, which by this time had quitted the bay of St. Lunaire, where it could not ride in ſafety, and anchored in the bay of St. Cas, about three leagues to the weſtward.

On the 8th of September the army began its march to St. Guildo, which they reached in the evening, and the next day continuing their rout, they encamped in the open ground, about three miles from the bay of St. Cas, which was immediately reconnoitred for reimbarkation, the general having received intelligence that the duke d'Aiguillon had advanced from Breſt to Lambale, within ſix miles of the Engliſh camp, at the head of twelve regular battalions, ſix ſquadrons, two regiments of militia, eight mortars and ten pieces of cannon. Had our troops decamped in the night in ſilence, they might poſſibly have reached the beach before the enemy had received the leaſt notice of their deſign: but inſtead of this cautious method of proceeding, the generale was beat about two o'clock in the morning, which could not fail of alarming the French. Before three, the troops were all in motion, and met with ſeveral little ſkirmiſhes on their march, but no conſiderable body of the enemy appeared till the embarkation was begun; when they took poſſeſſion of an eminence by a windmill, and immediately opened a battery of ten cannon and eight mortars, from whence they fired on the ſoldiers on the beach, and on the boats in their paſſage, which did terrible execution. They then began to march down the hill, with deſign to gain a wood, where they might form and extend themſelves along the front of the Engliſh; but in their deſcent they ſuffered ſeverely from the cannon and mortars of our ſhipping, which broke their line and threw them into great confuſion. They then turned off to one ſide, extended themſelves along a hill to the left, and advanced in a hollow way, from whence they ſuddenly ruſhed out to the attack. By this time the greater part of our troops were embarked, but the rear-guard, conſiſting of all the grenadiers, and half of the firſt regiment of guards, in all about 1500 men, remained on the ſhore, under the command of major-general Drury. On the enemy's advancing, that officer ordered his troops to form in grand diviſions, and march from behind the bank that covered them, in order to attack the enemy before they could form on the plain. At the firſt onſet the French gave way, but continual ſuccours of the enemy arriving, they in their turn drove the Engliſh, and now general Drury, too late, perceived the error he had been guilty of in drawing his men from behind the bank, for the ſecond diviſion could not get over the breaſt-work time enough to ſuccour the firſt, which was entirely broken. The French having now got poſſeſſion of the dyke, kept a continual fire upon the grenadiers; and the general ſeeing there was no remedy left but to retreat, ordered the whole to wheel immediately to the right, and make to the boats as faſt as poſſible. Some got on board, but a battery which the enemy had erected on an eminence, played ſo furiouſly, that numbers of the boats were beat to pieces. The French now perceiving that the grenadiers had no retreat left, mounted the dyke, and by a vaſt ſuperiority of numbers drove them into the ſea, where the greateſt part of them were cut to pieces or drowned. General Drury was ſhot in the breaſt; but by the help of a grenadier, he ſtripped off his cloaths, and plunged into the water, where he died. Our loſs amounted to about 1000 men, among whom was Sir John Armitage, a volunteer. After the action was over, ſeveral meſſages of civility paſſed between the duke d'Aiguillon and the Engliſh commanders, to whom a liſt of our priſoners was ſent, with aſſurances that the wounded ſhould receive all the aſſiſtance neceſſary in their condition. Theſe particulars being adjuſted, the commodore ſailed for the coaſt of England, and on the 18th of September arrived at Spithead, ſoon after which the ſoldiers were diſembarked.

Notwithſtanding this ſcheme miſcarried in its execution, yet other advantages were obtained over the French that ſerved to counterbalance it; and from circumſtances of a very peculiar nature.

One Mr. Cumming, a quaker, who had been ſeveral voyages to the coaſt of Africa, made himſelf acquainted with every thing worth notice; and being a man of great abilities and deep penetration, obſerved the extenſive trade carried on by the French, and made himſelf acquainted with the Mooriſh king of Legibelli, whoſe dominions lay along the coaſt where the greateſt part of the trade was carried on. Gum Senega, an article much uſed in the manufactures of Great Britain, had been many years wholly engroſſed by the French, who ſold it to the Dutch, and they to us, at a moſt exorbitant price. But this was not all; for Mr. Cumming took notice that many other valuable articles and branches of trade were carried on, ſuch as elephants teeth, gold duſt, cotton, ambergreaſe, and ſeveral others, all of which were of the utmoſt importance to Great Britain, and might, if conducted with ſpirit, become a real national good.

Mr. Cumming loſt no time in making himſelf acquainted with every thing worthy of notice, and ingratiated himſelf ſo far into the good graces of the African prince, that he made him a friend to the Engliſh, and promiſed him great advantages in conſequence of trading with them. But what contributed moſt towards promoting the deſign, was the conduct of the French, who had exaſperated the prince againſt them; and he was extremely deſirous to have them driven from the river Senegal, where moſt of their territories had been eſtabliſhed. He deſired that the king of Great Britain would ſend a few ſhips of war for that purpoſe; promiſing, at the ſame time, to aſſiſt them with what land forces he could raiſe.

The difficulties that Mr. Cumming had to engage with were great indeed; but the love he had for his country made every thing ſeem trifling. The miniſtry conſidered the whole as a Don Quixote like ſcheme, that would be attended with great loſs without any ſolid advantages ariſing from it; but Mr. Cumming repreſented the practicability and utility of it in ſuch ſtrong terms, that they granted a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips under the command of captain Marſh, with five companies of marines under the command of major Maſon, and a ſmall number of artillery, under the direction of captain Walker; but Mr. Cumming was to ſuperintend the whole.

This ſmall armament ſailed from Portſmouth in March, and put into the iſland of Teneriff, in order to procure freſh water. There the ſquadron remained till Mr. Cumming ſailed in the Swan ſloop to Portenderrick, with a letter to the prince written in the Arabic language. In this letter, to which the king of Great Britain had put his ſeal, Mr. Cumming was appointed to act as ambaſſador, and conduct the whole of the Britiſh trade that ſhould be carried on in that country. Upon his arrival, he found the prince of the place engaged in war with one of the neighbouring nations, and that he was then at a very great diſtance. But Amir, the prince's miniſter, ſent word to his ſovereign that Mr. Cumming was arrived, and that he could raiſe 300 men to aſſiſt him, upon condition of their being properly reinforced from the chief army. This would have diſconcerted perſons of leſs fortitude than Mr. Cumming; but the greater the difficulties he had to encounter with, the more active he was in endeavouring to ſurmount them. Having ſent notice to captain Marſh, at Teneriff, to proceed on his voyage, that brave officer weighed anchor, and got to the mouth of the river Senegal, where he learned that the Indian forces promiſed him were not ſo much as raiſed. Next day he took a large Dutch ſhip laden with gum, and the captain told him, that the French had erected ſeveral batteries along the ſide of the river, and that they were determined to diſpute the paſſage with the Engliſh. This, however, no way intimidated the captain; who made the proper preparations for landing, although the enemy kept firing upon them. This brought on a general engagement, which laſted ſeveral hours; and two of the Engliſh tranſports running aground, the marines got on ſhore, where they were joined by thoſe who had landed before them. They immediately threw up an entrenchment to protect them from the fire of the enemy, till ſuch time as they could get the ſtores landed.

The next day two deputies from the French governor arrived, and offered terms of capitulation; upon which it was greed, that all the Europeans belonging to the French ſhould be ſafely conducted to France in an Engliſh veſſel, and that none of their private property ſhould be taken from them: that every thing of a public nature ſhould be delivered up to the Engliſh; and that the inhabitants who chuſed to remain in Fort Lewis, ſhould be under the protection of the Engliſh government.

Theſe terms being agreed on, captain Walker and captain Campbell were ſent up the river to take poſſeſſion of the forts, but when they came to the firſt place appointed for their landing, the enemy neither took notice of them, nor hung out the flag of truce. This ſurprzied them much; and as they did not know what their intention might be, they ſailed back to the ſquadron, and then went on ſhore to their entrenchments. There they were informed that the negroes were in arms at Fort Louis, becauſe they had not been included in the treaty, and the governor refuſed to abide by the capitulation, unleſs the director-general of the French factory ſhould be permitted to remain, to ſee that every thing was executed according to agreement. This requeſt was immediately complied with, and then the fort was delivered up to major Maſon, who found in it great quantities of merchandiſe, beſides proviſions and military ſtores. The inhabitants of the place chearfully ſwore allegiance to the king of England. The prince Legibelli ſent an ambaſſador from his camp to congratulate Mr. Cumming on his ſucceſs, and all the neighbouring princes entered into treaties with him. In the whole of this important expedition, the Engliſh did not loſe a ſingle man, and, by prudence and courage obtained poſſeſſion of a very valuable place.

Mr. Cumming knew that the valuable ſettlement at Fort Louis could not be maintained by the Engliſh, unleſs they were in poſſeſſion of Goree, about 100 miles diſtant, where the French had large magazines, and where they kept all their ſlaves before they ſent them to the Weſt-Indies. An attempt was made upon the iſland, but the Engliſh had not ſufficient force to take it.

Intimation of this being tranſmitted to England, commodore Keppel was ſent with ſix ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and tranſports, on board of which were 700 land forces. On the 28th of December they came to an anchor off Goree, and next morning prepared to attack the place. The French, who had erected batteries along the ſhore, played briſkly upon our men of war, particularly the Prince Edward, which had her main bowſprit ſhot away, but the Naſſau made to her aſſiſtance. The commodore, who was in the Torbay, paid the utmoſt attention to every thing; and ſo terrible was the fire from his ſhip, that the whole ſeemed one continued blaze.

Prodigious numbers of negroes came down to ſee the engagement, and were filled with ſurprize at the bravery of the Engliſh ſeamen, whoſe courage increaſed with their danger. The fire from the Engliſh ſhips ſoon obliged the governor to ſtrike the flag; and then the lieutenant, with the commodore's ſecretary, were ſent on ſhore, where they were met by the governor's ſecretary, who aſked them what terms the commodore was willing to grant. This ſurprized them, becauſe they imagined that the garriſon were ready to ſurrender priſoners of war; and then they aſked him, whether the flag was not ſtruck? He anſwered, that it was not, but only for a parley; upon which they parted in diſguſt. The engagement was begun again with greater fury than ever; but in leſs than an hour, the governor, as a ſignal to ſurrender, dropped the flag and the regimental colours, and then a party of marines took poſſeſſion of the iſland. Two trading veſſels, which happened to be at anchor in the road, likewiſe fell into the hands of the Engliſh, with ſtores, money and merchandize, to the value of 20,000l. This important conqueſt coſt the victors only 100 men killed and wounded. Commodore Keppel having left a garriſon at Goree, and reinforced that of Senegal, returned with his ſquadron to England.

During theſe tranſactions, things of great importance were carrying on in America; where, excluſive of the fleet and marines, the government had aſſembled about 50,000 men, including 22,000 regular troops. Lord Loudon having returned to England, the chief command devolved on major-general Abercrombie: but as the objects of operation were various, the forces were divided into three ſeparate bodies, under three diſtinct commanders. Twelve thouthouſand were deſtined for an attempt on Cape Breton, under the command of major-general Amherſt. The general himſelf reſerved near 16000 for the reduction of Crown Point; and 8000, under brigadier-general Forbes, were allotted for the conqueſt of Fort du Queſne.

On the 28th of May major-general Amherſt embarked his troops at Halifax in Nova Scotia, and ſailed for Louiſbourg with the Engliſh ſquadron commanded by admiral Boſcawen, the whole fleet conſiſting of 157 ſail. On the 2d of June they came to an anchor in Gabarus Bay, about ſeven miles to the weſtward of Louiſbourg. The garriſon of this place conſiſted of 2500 regular troops, and 300 militia, formed of the burgers, under the command of the chevalier Druncour, who had taken every precaution in his power to prevent the Britiſh forces from landing on the iſland. He formed a chain of forts extending two leagues and a half along the moſt acceſſible parts of the beach; batteries were erected, entrenchments thrown up, and the mouth of the harbour guarded by ſix ſhips of the line and five frigates, three of which were ſunk at the Haven's mouth, in order to render the paſſage impaſſable to the Engliſh fleet.

But notwithſtanding theſe diſpoſitions, our troops, amidſt innumerable difficulties, made good their landing; after which the ſiege was carried on with ſuch vigour and reſolution, that the French governor, finding it impoſſible to withſtand the fury of the aſſault, thought proper to capitulate on the 27th of July, by which he and the garriſon became priſoners of war. Major Farquhar, with three companies of grenadiers, immediately took poſſeſſion of the weſtern gate; and brigadier Whitmore was ſent into the town to ſee the garriſon lay down their arms, and to poſt the neceſſary guards on the ramparts, and at the doors of the magazines.

Thus with the inconſiderable loſs of about 400 men killed or wounded, the Engliſh obtained poſſeſſion of the important iſland of Cape Breton, and the ſtrong town of Louiſburg, in which the victors found 221 pieces of cannon, with 18 mortars, and a large quantity of ſtores and ammunition. The merchants and inhabitants were conveyed to France in Engliſh ſhips; but the garriſon, together with the ſea-officers, marines, and mariners, amounting in all to 5637 priſoners, were tranſported to England.

The loſs of Louiſbourg gave a fatal blow to the French intereſt in America, and facilitated the reduction of their other ſettlements in that part of the world. An account of the affair was immediately brought to England, in a veſſel diſpatched for that purpoſe, with captain Amherſt, brother to the commander; who was alſo intruſted with eleven pair of colours taken at the ſiege. Theſe were, by his majeſty's order, carried in great parade, eſcorted by detachments of horſe and foot guards, with kettle drums and trumpets, from the palace of Kenſington to St. Paul's cathedral, where they were depoſited as trophies of victory, under a diſcharge of cannon, and other ſuitable expreſſions of triumph and exultation. Nor were the rejoicings for this conqueſt confined to London: addreſſes of congratulation were preſented to his majeſty by almoſt every town and corporation in the kingdom.

After the reduction of Cape Breton, ſeveral ſhips were detached with a body of troops under the command of lord Rollo, to take poſſeſſion of the iſland of St. John, a ſmall place in the gulph of St. Lawrence, which, from its fertility in corn and cattle, had, ſince the beginning of the war, ſupplied Quebec with conſiderable quantities of proviſion. The inhabitants, who amounted to upwards of 4000, made not the leaſt oppoſition, but readily delivered up their arms. On this, lord Rollo repaired to the governor's houſe, where he found ſeveral ſcalps of Engliſhmen, whom the ſavages had butchered in conſequence of the encouragement given for ſuch inhuman proceedings by their French allies.

The joy and ſatisfaction ariſing from the conqueſt of Louiſbourg and St. John were not a little damped by the diſaſter which happened to the main body of the Britiſh forces in America, under the immediate direction of general Abercrombie. In the beginning of July his army, amounting to near 7000 regular troops, and 10,000 provincials, embarked at the mouth of Lake George, on board batteaus and whale boats, with proviſion, artillery and ammunition; ſeveral pieces of artillery being mounted on rafts to cover the propoſed landing, which was effected the next day without oppoſition. The general's ſcheme was to inveſt Ticonderoga, a fort ſituated on a point of land between lake George and a narrow gut communicating with lake Champlain. Three ſides of this fortification were ſurrounded with water and nature had ſecured the front by a moraſs.

The troops being landed, they were immediately formed into three columns, and began their march towards the advanced guard of the enemy, conſiſting of one battalion encamped behind a breaſt-work of logs, which, on the approach of the Engliſh, they abandoned with great precipitation. The route from this breaſt-work to the fort lay through a thick wood, which would not admit of any regular paſſage: and the guides proving extremely ignorant, our forces were bewildered, and the columns thrown into the utmoſt diſorder. A French detachment likewiſe met with the like embarraſſment, and falling in with lord Howe, at the head of one of the Britiſh columns, an engagement enſued, in which the enemy were totally defeated. But this trifling advantage was dearly purchaſed by the loſs of lord Howe, who fell in the beginning of the action, univerſally lamented, being a young nobleman of approved courage and moſt promiſing talents.

The troops were now ſo much fatigued and diſordered, that general Abercrombie thought it adviſeable to return to the landing place, which they reached about eight in the morning. When the men were refreſhed, lieutenant-colonel Bradſtreet was detached at the head of one regiment of regulars, ſix companies of Royal Americans, and a body of rangers, to take poſſeſſion of a ſaw-mill, which the French had abandoned, in the neighbourhood of Ticonderoga. This poſt being ſecured, the general advanced towards the enemy. In his march he was met by ſome deſerters, who informed him that the French had aſſembled eight battalions, and a body of Canadians and Indians, amounting in the whole to 8,000 men; that theſe, being encamped before the fort, were employed in forming a ſtrong intrenchment, where they intended to wait for a reinforcement of 3000 men, who had been detached, under the command of M. de Levi, to make a diverſion on the Mohawk river; but upon intelligence that the Engliſh forces were approaching, were recalled for the defence of Ticonderoga. General Abercrombie now reſolved, if poſſible, to ſtrike ſome deciſive blow before this junction could be effected. Early the next morning he detached an engineer acroſs the river on the oppoſite ſide of the fort, to take a view of the enemy's intrenchments; on his return this officer reported, that there was a proſpect of attempting the works with ſucceſs, as they were not yet finiſhed. Accordingly a diſpoſition was made for the attack; and proper guards being left at the ſaw-mill and the landing place, the whole army advanced towards the intrenchments, but, to their unſpeakable diſappointment, found it impregnable. The breaſt-work was eight feet high, and the ground before it covered with felled trees, with their boughs pointing outwards, projecting in ſuch a manner as to render the intrenchment almoſt inacceſſible. Our troops, undaunted at theſe ſeeming difficulties, marched up to the attack with the utmoſt intrepidity, during which they ſuſtained a moſt terrible fire from the enemy's muſquetry and cannon. They then endeavoured to force their way ſword in hand through theſe embarraſſments, and ſome of them even mounted the breaſt-work; but the enemy were ſo well covered, that they could deliberately direct their fire without the leaſt danger to themſelves. The Engliſh having thus made repeated attacks under the moſt diſadvantageous circumſtances, and ſuffered great loſs, began to fall into confuſion. The general was now convinced that there remained no hope of ſucceſs; and to prevent a total overthrow, he took ſuch meaſures for ſecuring a retreat, that the army retired unmoleſted to their former camp, with the loſs of about 1800 men, including a great number of officers.

After reſting his men, the general retired to the batteaus, and re-imbarking the troops, returned to Lake George, from whence he had taken his departure. He then detached lieutenant-colonel Bradſtreet with a body of 3000 men, to execute a plan that officer had formed againſt Fort Frontinac, ſituated on the north ſide of the river St. Lawrence, juſt where it takes its riſe from the Lake Ontario. Having advanced with his detachment to the ſide of this lake, he embarked in ſome ſloops and batteaus provided for the purpoſe, and landed within a mile of Fort Frontinac, the garriſon of which, conſiſting of 110 men, with a few Indians, immediately ſurrendered priſoners of war. Bradſtreet then made himſelf maſter of all the enemy's ſhipping on the lake, amounting to nine armed veſſels, ſome of which carried eighteen guns. After deſtroying the fortifications the colonel returned to Oſwego, with the veſſels, artillery, ſtores, ammunition and merchandize.

We have already obſerved that 8,000 men, under brigadier-general Forbes, were appointed for the reduction of Fort du Queſne. That general began his march on the 30th of June from Philadelphia for the river Ohio. The difficulties and fatigues he met with were aſtoniſhing: but he ſurmounted them all, and at length arrived at Ray's-town, at the diſtance of ninety miles from Fort du Queſne, from whence he detached colonel Grant, at the head of 800 men, to reconnoitre the fort and its outworks. On his approach the enemy ſent out a large body of forces to meet him. An engagement enſued, which the Engliſh maintained with their uſual courage for three hours; but at length being overpowered by numbers, they were obliged to retreat with the loſs of 300 men killed or taken; among the latter were major Grant and nineteen officers. Far from being diſpirited by this misfortune, brigadier Forbes immediately advanced with his whole army, reſolving to make himſelf maſter of the fort or periſh in the attempt. But before his arrival the French had thought proper to abandon the place, and retire down the river Ohio, to their ſettlements on the Miſſiſſippi. On the 25th of November the Engliſh entered the fort, and, after repairing the fortifications, which the enemy had diſmantled, the general changed its name from Fort du Queſne to Pittſburgh: after which he concluded a treaty of friendſhip and alliance with the Indian tribes, and then returned to Philadelphia.

In the beginning of this year captain Tyrrel, in the Rockingham man of war, was ſent to protect our commerce in the Weſt-Indies; and in the bay of Martinico he demoliſhed a French fort, with ſeveral merchant ſhips that had on board very valuable cargoes and a conſiderable number of privateers. Captain Tyrrel was ſeldom diſengaged from action, and few men in his ſtation ever acquired greater honour. Happening to fall in with the Weaſel ſloop of war, commanded by lieutenant Bowles, between Montſerrat and Guadaloupe, they diſcovered a fleet of nineteen veſſels, under the convoy of a man of war named the Floriſſant, and two large frigates. But, notwithſtanding a ſuperiority of numbers, Tyrrel, who was a ſtranger to fear, immediately hoiſted ſail, and gave chace. The two frigates were ſoon rendered unfit for action: upon which captain Tyrrel attacked the man of war, and poured a whole broadſide into her. A moſt deſperate and bloody engagement enſued, in which captain Tyrrel loſt three of his fingers, and was otherwiſe ſo much wounded, that he was obliged to give up the command to Mr. Marſhal, his firſt lieutenant, who fought bravely till he was killed; and then the command devolved upon the ſecond lieutenant, who fought ſo deſperately, that the Floriſſant was obliged to ſtrike; but the ſea running high before the Buckingham could board her, ſhe again hoiſted her colours, and made her eſcape. This was reckoned one of the moſt glorious actions during the war, and will ever redound to the honour of Tyrrel, who loſt only twenty men, while the French loſt 180, beſides above 300 wounded; ſo that it was with the utmoſt difficulty that they could keep the ſhip above water till they got into the harbour of Martinico.

In the Eaſt-Indies things were not ſo ſucceſsfully conducted this year as might have been expected, though no blame could be thrown upon our commanders, who exerted themſelves to the utmoſt. Admiral Pocock, being joined by commodore Stephens with ſeveral ſhips of the line, they ſet ſail from the bay of Madraſs, in order to intercept the French fleet, which they expected to fall in with near the bay of St. David.

On the 29th of March the Admiral came up with the French fleet, conſiſting of nine ſhips of the line, and reſolved to give them battle. The engagement laſted ſeveral hours; and about five in the evening the French admiral got before the wind, and the Engliſh admiral gave the ſignal for a general chace; but night coming on, he was obliged to deſiſt. In the morning the purſuit was continued; but ſeveral of the ſhips were ſo much diſabled, and the wind was ſo much in favour of the French, that the Engliſh admiral was obliged to anchor in the bay of Madraſs. There he learned that one of the French ſhips had been ſo much damaged that they had been obliged to run her aground; and that they had not been able to land any forces at St. David's. Three of the Engliſh captains, who had not been active enough in obeying the admiral's ſignals, were tried by a court-martial, and broke; for it was in conſequence of their conduct that the French fleet eſcaped, which otherwiſe would have been totally deſtroyed.

The next object the admiral had in view was the reduction of Pondicherry; and having repaired his ſhips, he ſet ſail for that place on the 10th of May. He arrived in the bay oppoſite to that fort on the 30th of May where he got ſight of the French fleet, but could not come up with them, which obliged him to return to Madraſs, in order to conſult on the moſt proper methods to be uſed, and likewiſe to get a ſupply of freſh proviſions, of which the fleet was in great want.

Having conſulted with the governor, and got every thing ready, the admiral weighed anchor on the 25th of July, and in two days got ſight of the French fleet, conſiſting of eight ſhips and a frigate. They were ſteering towards Pondicherry, and admiral Pocock made the ſignal for a general chace, but could not come up with them till the 3d of Auguſt, when a general engagement enſued. The French admiral found it impoſſible to reſiſt the bravery of the Engliſh; and therefore, in a few minutes, he gave way, while the Engliſh purſued till night, when they were parted, and by that means the French got into the road of Pondicherry. In this engagement the Engliſh had a conſiderable number wounded, among whom were commodore Stephens and captain Martin; but they had not above forty killed.

On the 14th of September colonel Draper, on board the commiſſary's ſhip Pitt, arrived at Madraſs, having under his command ſome companies of his own regiment: and in the beginning of December the French forces encamped near a place called Choultry. The Engliſh cannonaded them a whole day, and next morning they ſeemed as if going to draw up in order of battle. Colonel Draper, with colonel Lawrence, being afraid that they might cut off their retreat, took poſſeſſion of the Black Town, and the French marched up to attack it; but one of their regiments was ſurprized by colonel Draper, and almoſt cut off. Had the colonel been properly ſupported, he would, in all probability, have defeated the enemy; but his numbers were ſo ſmall, that he was obliged to retreat.

Having thus particularized the events of the war in Europe, Aſia, Africa and America, we ſhall cloſe the foreign tranſactions of this year with relating a circumſtance of a very peculiar nature that happened in Portugal, namely, an attempt to aſſaſſinate the king, the particulars of which were as follow:

On the 3d of September his majeſty, according to cuſtom, going out in a carriage to take the air, attended by one domeſtic, was, in the night, at a ſolitary place near Belem, attacked by three men on horſeback, armed with blunderbuſſes, one of whom fired his piece at the coachman without effect. The man, however, terrified both on his own account and that of his ſovereign, drove the mules at full ſpeed; a circumſtance which, in ſome meaſure, diſconcerted the other two conſpirators, who purſued him at full gallop; and having no leiſure to take aim, diſcharged their pieces at random through the back of the carriage. The ſlugs with which they were loaded happened to paſs between the king's right arm and his breaſt, dilacerating the parts from the ſhoulder to the elbow, but without damaging the bone, or penetrating into the cavity of the body.

Finding himſelf grievouſly wounded, and the blood flowing apace, he, with ſuch preſence of mind as cannot be ſufficiently admired, inſtead of proceeding to the palace, which was at ſome diſtance, ordered the coachman to return to Junqueira, which was at ſome diſtance, where his principal ſurgeon reſided, and there his wounds were immediately dreſſed. By this reſolution, ſolution, he not only prevented the irreparable miſchief that might have ariſen from an exceſſive effuſion of blood, but, without all doubt, ſaved his life from the hands of other aſſaſſins poſted on the road to accompliſh the murder, in caſe he ſhould eſcape alive from the firſt attack. This inſtance of the king's recollection was magnified into a miracle, on the ſuppoſition that it muſt have been the effect of divine inſpiration; and indeed, among a people addicted to ſuperſtition might well paſs for a favourable interpoſition of Providence.

The king being thus diſabled in his right arm, beſtowed, by a public decree, the abſolute power of government upon the queen his conſort. In the mean time, no perſon had acceſs to his preſence but herſelf, the firſt miniſter, the cardinal de Saldanha, and the phyſicians and ſurgeons. An embargo was immediately laid on all the ſhipping in the port of Liſbon. Rewards were publicly offered, together with a promiſe of pardon to the accomplices, for diſcovering any of the aſſaſſins; and ſuch other meaſures taken, that in a little time the whole conſpiracy was unfolded: a conſpiracy the more dangerous, as it appeared to have been formed by perſons of the firſt quality and influence; ſeveral of whom, immediately after the attempt, were arreſted, and confined as principals in the deſign.

The chief conſpirator, Don Joſeph Maſcarenhas and Lencaſtre, duke of Aveiro, marquis of Torres Novas, and conde of Santa Cruz, was hereditary lord-ſteward of the king's houſhold, and preſident of the palace court, or laſt tribunal of appeal in the kingdom; ſo that he poſſeſſed the firſt office in the palace, and the ſecond of the realm. Franciſco de Aſſiz, marquis of Tavora, conde of St. John and Alvor, was general of the horſe, and head of the third noble houſe of the Tavoras, the moſt illuſtrious family in the kingdom, deriving their origin from the antient kings of Leon: he married his own kinſwoman, who was marchioneſs of Tavora in her own right, and by this marriage acquired the marquiſate. Louis Bernardo de Tavora was their eldeſt ſon, who, by virtue of a diſpenſation from the pope, had eſpouſed his own aunt, Donna Thereſa de Tavora. Joſeph Maria de Tavora was alſo involved in the guilt of his parents. The third principal concerned was Don Jeronymo de Attiade, conde of Attouguia, himſelf a relation and married to the eldeſt daughter of the marquis of Tavora. The characters of all theſe perſonages were unblemiſhed and reſpectable, until this machination was detected.

In the courſe of inveſtigating this dark affair, it appeared that the Duke de Aveiro had conceived a perſonal hatred to the king, who had diſappointed him in a projected match between his ſon and a ſiſter of the duke of Cadaval, a minor, and prevented his obtaining ſome commanderies which the late duke of Aveiro had poſſeſſed; that this nobleman, being determined to gratify his revenge againſt the perſon of his ſovereign, had exerted all his influence and addreſs in procuring the aſſiſtance of the malcontents: that, with this view, he had reconciled himſelf to the Jeſuits, with whom he had been formerly at variance, knowing they were at this time implacably incenſed againſt the king, who had diſmiſſed them from their office of penitentiaries at court, and branded them with other marks of diſgrace, on account of their illegal and rebellious practices in South-America: that the duke had, moreover, inſinuated himſelf into the confidence of the marchioneſs of Tavora, notwithſtanding an inveterate rivalſhip of pride and ambition, which had long ſubſiſted between the two families: that her reſentment againſt the king was inflamed by the mortification of her pride in repeated repulſes, when ſhe ſolicited the title of duke for her huſband: that her paſſions were artfully fomented and managed by the Jeſuits, to whom ſhe had reſigned the government of her conſcience; and they had perſuaded her, that it would be a meritorious action to take away the life of a prince who was an enemy to the church, and a tyrant to his people: that ſhe, being reconciled to the ſcheme of aſſaſſination, had exerted her influence in ſuch a manner, as to inveigle her huſband, her ſons, and ſon-in-law, into the ſame infamous deſign; and yet this lady had been always remarkable for her piety, affability, and ſweetneſs of diſpoſition: that many conſultations were held by the conſpirators at the college of the Jeſuits, St. Antao and St. Roque, as well as at the houſe of the duke and marquis: at laſt they reſolved, that the king ſhould be aſſaſſinated; and employed two ruffians, called Antonio Alvarez and Joſeph Policarpio, for the execution of this horrid deſign.

Before the circumſtances of the conſpiracy were known, the counts de Oberos and de Rabeira Grande were impriſoned in the caſtle of St. Julian, on a ſuſpicion ariſing from their freedom of ſpeech. The ducheſs of Aveiro, the counteſs of Attouguia, and the marchioneſs of Alorna, with their children, were ſent to different nunneries; and eight Jeſuits were taken into cuſtody.

A council being appointed for the trial of the priſoners, the particulars we have related were brought to light by the torture; and ſentence of death was pronounced on the convicted criminals. On the day of execution eight wheels were fixed upon a ſcaffold, raiſed in the ſquare oppoſite to the houſe where the priſoners had been confined. At one corner of the ſcaffold was a ſtake, to which was faſtened Antonio Alvarez Ferreira, one of the aſſaſſins who fired into the king's equipage; and at the other was placed the effigy of his accomplice, Joſeph Policarpio de Azevedos, who had made his eſcape. The marchioneſs of Tavora, being brought upon the ſcaffold between eight and nine in the morning, was, in compliment to her ſex, beheaded at one ſtroke, and then covered with a linen cloth. Her two ſons, and her ſon-in-law the count of Attouguia, with three ſervants of the duke de Aveiro, were firſt ſtrangled at one ſtake, and afterwards broke upon wheels, where their bodies remained covered; but the duke and the marquis, as chiefs of the conſpiracy, were broke alive, and underwent the moſt excruciating torments.

The laſt that ſuffered was the aſſaſſin Alvarez, who being condemned to be burnt alive, the combuſtibles, which had been placed under the ſcaffold, were ſet on fire, the whole machine with their bodies conſumed to aſhes, and theſe aſhes thrown into the ſea. The eſtates of the three unfortunate noblemen were confiſcated, and their dwelling-houſes razed to the ground. The name of Tavora was ſuppreſſed for ever by a public decree; but that of Maſcarenha ſpared, becauſe the duke de Aveiro was but a younger branch of the family. A reward of 10,000 crowns was offered to any perſon who ſhould apprehend the aſſaſſin that had eſcaped; and then the embargo was taken off the ſhipping. The king and royal family aſſiſted at a public Te Deum, ſung in the chapel of Noſſa Senhora de Livramento; on which occaſion the king, for the ſatisfaction of his people, waved his handkerchief with both hands, to ſhew he was not maimed by the wounds he had received.

Nor were the Portugueſe miniſtry ſatisfied with theſe examples of juſtice. Without waiting for a bull from the pope, they ſequeſtered all the eſtates and effects of the Jeſuits in that kingdom, which amounted to conſiderable ſums, and reduced the individuals of the ſociety to a very ſcanty allowance. Complaints of their conduct having been made to the pope, he appointed a congregation to examine into the affairs of the jeſuits in Portugal. In the mean time, the court of Liſbon ordered a conſiderable number of them to be embarked for Italy, and reſolved that no jeſuit ſhould hereafter reſide within its realms. When theſe tranſports arrived at Civita Vecchia, they were, by the pope's order, lodged in the Dominican and Capuchin convents of that city, until proper houſes could be prepared for their reception at Tivoli and Freſcati. The moſt guilty of them, however, were detained cloſe priſoners in Portugal.

Let us now direct our attention to affairs at home.

The parliament met on the 23d of November, and the ſeſſion was opened by commiſſion, his majeſty being then indiſpoſed. In the ſpeech which the lord-keeper made to both houſes, he told them, that his majeſty had directed the lords named in the commiſſion to aſſure his parliament, of his having always received the higheſt ſatisfaction in being able to lay before them any events that tended to promote the honour and intereſt of his kingdom: that in conſequence of their advice, and enabled by their aſſiſtance, his majeſty had exerted his endeavours to carry on the war with the utmoſt vigour, in order to obtain a ſafe and honourable peace: that it had pleaſed the divine providence to bleſs his meaſures with ſucceſs in ſeveral parts, and to make the enemies of the nation feel, that the ſtrength of Great Britain is not to be provoked with impunity: that the conqueſt of the ſtrong fortreſs of Louiſbourg, with the iſlands of Cape Breton and St. John; the demolition of fort Frontinac, of the higheſt importance to his operations in America, together with the reduction of Senegal; could not fail of bringing diſtreſs on the colonies and commerce of the French; and, in proportion, to procure large advantages to thoſe of Great Britain. He obſerved, that France had alſo been made ſenſible, that while her forces had been ſent out to invade and to ravage the dominions of her neighbours, her own coaſts were not inacceſſible to his majeſty's fleets and armies; a truth which ſhe had experienced in the demolition of the works at Cherbourg, erected at a great expence, with a view to annoy England; as well as in the loſs of a great number of ſhips and veſſels; but no treatment, however injurious to his majeſty, could prevail upon him to make retaliation on the innocent ſubjects of that crown. He told them, that in Germany, his majeſty's good brother the king of Pruſſia, and prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, had found full employment for the armies of France and her confederates, from which the Engliſh operations, both by ſea and land, in America, had derived the moſt evident advantages; their ſucceſſes owing, under God, to the able conduct, and the bravery of his majeſty's troops, and thoſe of his allies, having been ſignal and glorious. The lord-keeper added, that the king had alſo commanded them to declare, that the common cauſe of liberty and independence was ſtill making noble and glorious efforts againſt the unnatural union formed to oppreſs it: that the commerce of his ſubjects, the ſource of national riches, had, by the vigilant protection received from his majeſty's fleet, flouriſhed in a manner not to be paralleled during ſuch troubles. In this ſtate of things he ſaid, the king in his wiſdom thought it unneceſſary to uſe many words to perſuade them to bear up againſt all difficulties, effectually to ſtand by and defend his majeſty, vigorouſly to ſupport the king of Pruſſia and the reſt of his majeſty's allies, and to exert themſelves to reduce their enemies to equitable terms of accommodation. He obſerved to the houſe of commons, that the uncommon extent of this war, in different parts, occaſioned it to be uncommonly expenſive: that the king had ordered him to declare to the commons, that he ſincerely lamented, and deeply felt, the burdens of his people: that the ſeveral eſtimates were ordered to be laid before them; and that he deſired only ſuch ſupplies as ſhould be thought neceſſary to puſh the war with advantage, and be adequate to the neceſſary ſervices. In the laſt place he aſſured them, that the king took ſo much ſatisfaction in that good harmony which ſubſiſted among his faithful ſubjects, that it was more proper for him now to thank them for it, than to repeat his exhortations to it: that this union, neceſſary at all times, was more eſpecially ſo in ſuch critical conjunctures; and his majeſty doubted not but the good effects the nation had found from it would be the ſtrongeſt motive to induce them to purſue it.

To this ſpeech both houſes returned addreſſes to the throne, aſſuring his majeſty of their unſhaken zeal and loyalty to his perſon; congratulating him on the ſucceſs of his arms, and declaring, that they would readily ſupport his meaſures and allies with ſteadineſs and alacrity.

The miniſtry, encouraged by this approbation of their conduct, reſolved to proſecute the war in every quarter, and particularly to ſupport the king of Pruſſia with ſtill greater vigour than ever. With this view, on the ſeventh day of December, a new treaty was concluded at London between that prince and the Britiſh nation, importing, that as the burthens of war in which the king of Pruſſia was engaged laid him under the neceſſity of making freſh efforts to defend himſelf againſt the multitude of enemies who had attacked his dominions, he was obliged to take new meaſures with the king of England for their reciprocal defence and ſafety; and as his Britannic majeſty had at the ſame time ſignified his earneſt deſire to ſtrengthen the friendſhip ſubſiſting between the two courts, and, in conſequence thereof, to conclude a formal convention for granting to his Pruſſian majeſty ſpeedy and powerful aſſiſtance, their majeſties had nominated and authoriſed their miniſters to concert and ſettle the following articles:

All former treaties between the two crowns are confirmed by the preſent convention in their whole tenor, as if they were herein inſerted word for word. The king of Great Britain ſhall cauſe to be paid at London, to ſuch perſons as ſhall be authoriſed by the king of Pruſſia for that end, the ſum of four millions of rix dollars, making 670,000l. ſterling, at one payment, immediately on the exchange of the ratifications, if the king of Pruſſia ſhall ſo require. His Pruſſian majeſty ſhall employ the ſaid ſum in ſupporting and augmenting his forces, which ſhall act in ſuch a manner as ſhall be of the greateſt ſervice to the common cauſe, and contribute moſt to the mutual defence and ſafety of their ſaid majeſties. The king of Great Britain, both as king and elector, and the king of Pruſſia, reciprocally bind themſelves not to conclude, with the powers that have taken part in the preſent war, any treaty of peace, truce, or other ſuch like convention, but by common advice and conſent, each expreſly including therein the other. The ratifications of the preſent convention ſhall be exchanged within ſix weeks, or ſooner, if poſſible.

The addreſſes of thanks were no ſooner preſented, than the commons proceeded, with the utmoſt alacrity, to grant the ſupplies for the enſuing year, the whole of which amounted to upwards of twelve millions. Out of this the ſum of 200,000l. was voted towards the building and repairing ſhips of war; 600,000l. for the charge of tranſports; 25,000l. for maintaining the colonies of Nova Scotia and Georgia; gia; and one million on account, for enabling the king to defray any extraordinary expence of the war, and to take all ſuch meaſures as might be neceſſary for diſappointing or defeating any enterprizes or deſigns of his enemies, as the exigencies of affairs ſhould require.

A. D. 1759. The parliament having granted the neceſſary ſupplies for a vigorous proſecution of the war, the military preparations were carried on with the moſt diſtinguiſhed alacrity. The royal navy was repaired, and the number of ſhips augmented; and in order to man the different ſquadrons fitting out, the preſs for ſeamen was vigorouſly proſecuted. At the ſame time a proclamation was iſſued, offering a very conſiderable bounty to ſuch ſailors and landmen as ſhould voluntarily offer, before a certain day, to ſerve his majeſty. The government was joined in this declaration by many cities, towns, corporations, and even individuals, who alſo offered bounties to ſeamen. In a word, the people were ſo univerſally animated with a deſire of humbling effectually the diſturbers of the public peace, that they laboured ſincerely to effect it.

The navy of France was at this time ſo reduced, that the French reſolved upon making one bold puſh; but as their whole finances were exhauſted, they were obliged to oppreſs the ſubjects in the moſt cruel manner. Great preparations were made by them along the coaſts of Normandy and Bretagne; forces were collected together, and ſeveral new ſhips were built. There was not the leaſt doubt but they intended to invade England, for they had provided a great number of flat-bottomed boats at Havre de Grace and ſome other ports. A ſmall ſquadron was to be fitted out at Dunkirk, and the command given to Mr. Thurot, a perſon of obſcure birth, but poſſeſſed of ſuch abilities as would have done honour to the higheſt ſtation in the navy. It was ſuppoſed that ſquadron was intended for making a deſcent on Scotland; but every thing was conducted with ſuch ſecrecy that the public were left merely to conjecture. Another ſquadron was to make a deſcent on Ireland; and the whole was to be eſcorted by M. de Conflans, who, with the duke de Aguillon, was then at Breſt, giving the neceſſary orders.

The Engliſh miniſtry, who attended to the intereſts of the nation with the greateſt integrity, took care to be beforehand with their enemies. A ſquadron, under commodore Boys, was ordered to lie oppoſite the harbour of Dunkirk: the fleet in Breſt was blocked up by admiral Hawke; and captain Duff watched Vannes, another of their ports: ſo that it ſeemed almoſt impoſſible for them to get their ſhips out of their harbours.

On the ſecond of July admiral Rodney came to an anchor before Havre de Grace, in order to prevent the flat-bottomed boats from joining the fleet, and ſo fruſtrate the whole ſcheme. Next day he attacked the town with two veſſels, and threw ſuch a number of bombs into it, that moſt of their magazines were deſtroyed. The bombardment continued fifty hours without intermiſſion, and was ſo dreadful that the town was three times ſet on fire. The flat-bottomed boats were likewiſe ſet on fire, and continued burning ſix hours; ſo that it took ſeveral hundred men to extinguiſh it.

The conſternation of the inhabitants was greater than can be imagined; many of them forſook their dwellings, while the military continued erecting batteries, and throwing up entrenchments; for they imagined that the admiral intended to land. The conduct of the admiral on this occaſion ſtruck ſuch a terror into the French miniſtry, that they became divided in their councils; for they found it almoſt impoſſible that ever they could make a deſcent on England, while our navy did their duty.

In the mean time the brave admiral Boſcawen was ſent into the Mediterranean, to block up the harbour of Toulon, where the French had a fleet under the command of M. de la Clue. Three Engliſh men of war were ſent to burn two of the French ſhips that guarded the mouth of the harbour; but a calm coming on, the enemy took the advantage, and fired ſo briſkly, that the Engliſh veſſels were greatly damaged, and the Engliſh admiral was obliged to return to Gibraltar. The French ſeized that opportunity of getting out of the harbour, thinking to get through the gut of Gibraltar without being ſeen by the Engliſh. Admiral Boſcawen ordered one of his ſhips to cruize, and to keep a good look out, that he might have timely notice of their arrival. Accordingly, on the 17th of Auguſt, the cruizing veſſels brought notice to the admiral, that the French fleet were ſteering along the coaſt of Barbary, ſeeming as if they intended to paſs the gut, and ſo get into the ocean. The whole fleet were immediately ordered to weigh anchor, and get under ſail: and next day, about two in the afternoon, they came up with the French; but it was ſome time longer before they could engage, the wind dying away. The Engliſh admiral came up with M. de la Clue, in a large French firſt-rate called the Ocean, about four in the afternoon, and the engagement began in the moſt furious manner; the French, according to their uſual cuſtom, aiming all their fire at our ſails and rigging. By this method of fighting, the Namur, admiral Boſcawen's ſhip, was ſo much damaged, that he was obliged to hoiſt his flag on board the Newark; and ſoon after, the Centaur, a ſhip of 74 guns, ſtruck to the Engliſh.

The French admiral ſtood in for the land, which admiral Boſcawen ſeeing, ordered the America and Intrepid to go and deſtroy his ſhip; but the French admiral ſaved them the trouble: for having one of his legs broke, he got on ſhore, and then the ſhip ſtruck. Admiral Boſcawen ordered her, as ſhe was little better than a wreck, to be ſet on fire; while he burnt another, and two were brought off with very little damage; ſo that the Engliſh obtained this important victory with the loſs of only fifty-ſix men.

This was a moſt fatal blow to the French, for beſides the loſs of four capital ſhips, their two fleets were prevented from joining; but ſtill they carried on their preparations at Breſt, like broken gameſters, who, when they have borrowed a trifle, will venture all upon it. A large body of land forces, with the Iriſh brigades, were kept in readineſs in order to embark on board the tranſports; and a train of artillery was to be ſent along with them. Thurot had made his eſcape out of the harbour of Dunkirk, in order to ſail round the coaſt of Scotland, to divide our fleet, by obliging ſome of them to ſail that way; but all their projects were defeated by the vigilance of Sir Edward Hawke.

That brave admiral continued to block up the harbour of Breſt, with a fleet of 23 ſhips of the line; while another ſquadron, under the command of commodore Duff, cruized along the coaſt to keep the people in continual alarm, and to prevent any of their privateers putting out to ſea. The French miniſtry were out of all patience, becauſe of their fleet in Breſt lying inactive; and therefore, in the month of November, poſitive orders were ſent to M. de Conflans to make an attempt to get out.

A great ſtorm ariſing on the coaſt, the Engliſh fleet were driven out to ſea, and on the tenth of November they came to an anchor in Torbay road.

This gave the French admiral an opportunity of making out of the harbour, his deſign being to attack and deſtroy the ſmall ſquadron under the command of commodore Duff, and ſo prevent his junction with the grand fleet. In the mean time, the weather being more favourable, Sir Edward Hawke ſet ſail for his former ſtation, and diſpatched the Coventry and Maidſtone frigates a-head of the ſquadron, to give proper ſignals of the approach of the enemy. About ten in the morning of the 20th of November the Maidſtone gave the ſignal, upon which Sir Edward ordered all the ſhips to draw near and form a-breaſt. The enemy were juſt at that inſtant in purſuit of Duff's ſquadron; but ſeeing the Engliſh fleet, they hoiſted all the ſail they could, by which Duff had an opportunity of joining the admiral. Sir Edward ordered ſeven of the ſhips to give them chace; and in the mean time, that no opportunity ſhould be loſt, he bore down upon them with the reſt of the fleet, keeping all the ſhips formed in the line of battle.

Future ages will regard with admiration the conduct of the Engliſh admiral on this memorable occaſion. The coaſt was full of rocks and ſhallows, the wind was blowing towards the ſhore; he had few pilots to give him proper directions, and the enemy had a great number of land forces. But no fear of danger could make him neglect that duty he owed to his country; he knew that our enemies were forming ſchemes to make the Britiſh as abject ſlaves as themſelves; and therefore he was determined either to conquer or periſh in the attempt. The two fleets came up together near the iſland of Belliſle, about half an hour after two in the afternoon, and the engagement began between the van of the Engliſh and the rear of the French. The admiral in the mean time continued in purſuit of the van, and came up with the French admiral's ſhip, into which he poured a broad-ſide. A large French ſhip named the Theſee came up to the aſſiſtance of admiral Conſlans ſhip the Soliel; but the Royal George, on board of which was admiral Hawke, ſunk her in an inſtant, and every perſon on board periſhed, affording a moſt ſhocking ſpectacle to thoſe who ſaw it.

Notwithſtanding the weather was very tempeſtuous, the battle was carried on with great fury. The Superb, a large French ſhip, was ſunk ſoon after the Theſee, and the formidable ſtruck their colours. The Heros, another of the French ſhips, ſubmitted, and came to an anchor about four in the afternoon; but the ſea continued running ſo high, that the boats could not get up to man her. The night coming on, the ſhattered remains of the French fleet made their eſcape, except the Soliel, in which was the admiral; but when morning came, he diſcovered that he had lain all night at anchor in the midſt of the Engliſh, and therefore ſlipped his cable to make his eſcape. Sir Edward Hawke ordered the Eſſex to purſue her; but unfortunately ſhe happened to ſtick on a ſand-bank; ſo that the Vengeance, Portland and Chatham, were ordered upon the ſame ſervice. The French admiral ſeeing no methods to be uſed in order to ſave his ſhip, got with his men into what boats he had, and then ſet her on fire; while the Engliſh did the ſame to two large ſhips which they had driven upon the ſand-banks.

Seven large ſhips of the French ſquadron were ſtill riding at anchor, which the Engliſh admiral ſeeing, ordered the fleet to weigh, but the weather being very tempeſtuous, he was a ſecond time obliged to come to an anchor. The French, ſeeing nothing leſs than immediate deſtruction before them, threw overboard all their ammunition, guns and ſtores, and then took ſhelter in the mouth of the river Vilaine, where they were protected by ſeveral batteries erected for the purpoſe.

In this engagement only one lieutenant and thirty-nine men were killed, and about 200 wounded; a trifling loſs, when put in competition with the amazing victory we obtained; by which the projected invaſion, that had ſo long alarmed the apprehenſions of Great Britain, was rendered abortive, and a finiſhing blow given to the naval power of France.

Sir Edward Hawke continued cruiſing off the coaſt of Bretagne for a conſiderable time after he had defeated Conſlans, taking particular care to block up the mouth of the river Vilaine, that the French ſhips might not come out, and join the ſhattered remains of their ſquadron, which had found means to reach Rochfort. At laſt, the Engliſh admiral was recalled home, and gratified by his ſovereign with a conſiderable penſion for the courage and conduct he had ſo often and ſo eminently diſplayed in the ſervice of his country.

A plan having been laid for improving the ſucceſs of our arms in North America, by carrying them up the river St. Lawrence, and attacking Quebec, the capital of Canada, a fleet deſtined for this important undertaking ſailed from St. Helen's, on the 12th of November, in the preceding year, under the command of captain Hughes, conſiſting of eight ſail of the line, one frigate, three bomb-ketches, and a fleet of tranſports, having on board ſix regiments of infantry, and a detachment of artillery, beſides 800 marines diſtributed among the ſhips of war; the whole forces being under the command of major general Hopſon, aſſiſted by major-general Barrington, the colonels Armiger and Haldane; and the lieutenant-colonels Trapand and Clavering, acting in the capacity of brigadiers. After a voyage of ſeven weeks and three days, the fleet arrived at Barbadoes, and anchored in Carliſle-bay, where they joined commodore Moore, who had received orders to aſſume the command of the united ſquadrons, amounting to ten ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and bomb-ketches. Having ſpent ſome time in ſupplying the fleet with wood and water, and taking in a number of negroes to aſſiſt in drawing the artillery, they ſailed from Carliſle-bay on the 13th of January: but by this time the troops, unaccuſtomed to a hot climate, were conſiderably weakened and reduced by fevers, diarrhœas, the ſcurvy and the ſmall pox, which laſt diſorder had unfortunately broke out on board the tranſports. Next morning the ſquadron came within ſight of Martinico, the place of its deſtination. The chief fortification on this iſland was the citadel of Port Royal, a regular fort, garriſoned by four companies, which did not exceed 150 men, thirty-ſix bombardiers, eighty Swiſs and fourteen officers. Their whole ſtore of proviſions conſiſted of only 100 barrels of beef, and they were in want of all other neceſſaries. The only preparations they had made for defence were ſome trifling entrenchments thrown up at St. Pierre, and at a place called Caſenavire, where they ſuppoſed the deſcent would be attempted.

On the 15th of January our ſquadron entered the great bay of Port-Royal, ſome of the ſhips being expoſed to the ſhot of a battery erected on Pidgeon Iſland, ſituated about half way up the bay. Next day three ſhips of the line were ordered to attack Fort Negro, a battery at the diſtance of three miles from the citadel, mounted with ſeven guns only, which were ſoon ſilenced. The marines and ſailors then landed in flat bottomed boats, and took poſſeſſion of the fort, the enemy having abandoned it with the utmoſt precipitation. The Britiſh colours were immediately hoiſted, and the detachment ordered to keep poſſeſſion of the battery. Three ſhips were now detached to Caſenavire, and that battery, conſiſting only of four guns, was likewiſe deſtroyed. Some French troops, who had been ſent from the citadel to oppoſe the landing, obſerving the whole Britiſh ſquadron already within the bay, and Fort Negro poſſeſſed by the marines, deſerted the beach, and withdrew to Port Royal, ſo that the Engliſh troops were diſembarked without oppoſition, and advanced towards Fort Negro. By ten the next day the Engliſh officers had brought up ſome field pieces to a hill, and ſcoured the woods, from whence our troops had been greatly annoyed by the enemy's ſmall ſhot, during the beſt part of the night, and all that morning. At noon the Engliſh forces advanced towards an eminence that overlooks the town and citadel of Port Royal, and ſuſtained a terrible fire from the French militia, who were entirely concealed among the trees and buſhes. The general now found that he ſhould meet with much greater obſtruction from the nature of the ground than from the ſtrength of the enemy; the whole country being interſected with a number of gullies, incloſed by ſteep and almoſt perpendicular precipices, which rendered it extremely difficult for the troops to advance, and abſolutely impoſſible for them to tranſport their artillery: he, therefore, informed the commodore, that he could not maintain his ground, unleſs the ſquadron would ſupply him with heavy cannon, landed near the town of Port Royal, or aſſiſt him in attacking the citadel by ſea, while he ſhould make his approaches by land; but both theſe expedients were deemed impracticable, the attempt upon Port Royal was given up, and the troops being recalled from their advanced poſts, were reimbarked in the evening without moleſtation.

A council of war being now held, it was reſolved to make an attack on St. Pierre, and the fleet proceeding to that part of the iſland, entered the bay on the 19th; when the commodore told the general, that he could undoubtedly reduce the iſland, but as the ſhips might be ſo diſabled in the attack as not to be in a condition to proceed immediately on any other material ſervice; and as the reduction of the iſland of Guadaloupe would be of great ſervice to the ſugar colonies, he thought it would be moſt adviſeable for them to conduct the armament to that iſland. The general having agreed to this propoſal, they immediately ſteered for Guadaloupe, which lies about thirty leagues to the weſtward of Martinique. This iſland is divided into two parts by a ſmall arm of the ſea, or more properly a narrow paſſage, thro' which no ſhip can venture, but the inhabitants always paſs it in a ferry boat. The country on the weſt ſide is called Baſſa-terre, and here the metropolis ſtands, defended by the citadel and other fortifications. The eaſtern part, diſtinguiſhed by the name of Grand-terre, is defended by Fort Louis, and a redoubt, which commands the road in the diſtrict of Goſier. The gut, or canal, that ſeparates the two parts, is called the Salt River, having at each end a road or bay, one of which is termed the great Cul de Sac, and the other the ſmall Cul de Sac. The country is populous and flouriſhing, and the government comprehends two ſmaller iſlands, called All Saints and Deſeada, which appears at a ſmall diſtance from the coaſt on the eaſtern ſide of the iſland.

The Engliſh ſquadron being arrived at Baſſa-terre, the chief engineer reconnoitered the town, and pronounced it abſolutely impregnable to ſhipping; notwithſtanding which, the commodore reſolved to attack it early next morning. At nine the engagement was begun by captain Trelawney, in the Lyon, and the reſt of the ſhips continuing to draw up a-breaſt of the citadel and batteries, the action ſoon became general, and was maintained with equal vivacity on both ſides for ſeveral hours. About five in the afternoon the fire of the citadel was exhauſted, and at ſeven all the batteries were ſilenced. Four bomb-ketches were then anchored near the ſhore, and began to ply the town with ſhells and carcaſes; ſo that in a little time the houſes were in flames, the magazines of gunpowder blew up, and about ten at night the whole place was involved in one general conflagration.

The next day the fleet came to an anchor in the road of Baſſa-terre, where they found the hulls of ſeveral ſhips which the enemy had ſet on fire at their approach. Some veſſels turned out and endeavoured to eſcape, but were taken by our men of war. At five in the afternoon the troops landed without oppoſition, and took poſſeſſion of the town and citadel, which they found entirely abandoned. A deſerter coming in, informed them, "that the regular "troops on the iſland conſiſted of five companies "only, and that they had laid a train to blow up the "powder magazine in the citadel; but had been "obliged to retreat with ſuch precipitation, as pre-"vented their putting this deſign in execution." Immediate orders were given to cut off the train, and ſecure the magazine. The nails with which the enemy had ſpiked up their cannon were drilled out, and the Britiſh colours hoiſted upon the parapet. Part of the troops took poſſeſſion of an advantageous poſt on an eminence, and part entered the town, which ſtill continued burning with great violence. At day-break the enemy, to the number of 2000, appeared about four miles from the town, and began to throw up entrenchments near a houſe where the governor had fixed his head quarters, declaring he would maintain this poſt to the laſt extremity. The nature of the ground ſeems to have inſpired him with this reſolution, it being in the neighbourhood of a paſs called the Dos d'Ane. The aſcent from Baſſa-terre to this paſs was ſo very ſteep, and the way ſo broken and interrupted by rocks and gullies, that there was no proſpect of attacking it with ſucceſs, except at the firſt landing, when the inhabitants were ſeized with the moſt terrible panic; which, however, was but of ſhort duration, for they afterwards behaved with great ſpirit and activity in defence of their country. They very prudently avoided coming to a general engagement with our troops, in which they muſt undoubtedly have been defeated, but reſolved to weary them out, by maintaining a kind of war in ſeparate parties, which alarmed and haraſſed our men with hard duty in a ſultry climate, where they were but ill ſupplied with proviſions and refreſhment; and in conſequence of which both the army and navy were attacked with fevers and other diſeaſes, whereby the regimental hoſpitals were ſo crouded, that it was judged neceſſary to ſend 500 ſick to the iſland of Antigua, where they might be properly attended.

General Hopſon, finding it would be impoſſible to conquer the inhabitants on the ſide of Guadaloupe, reſolved to make an attempt on Grand-terre, in conſequence of which the great ſhips were ſent round to that place, and on the 13th of February attacked Fort Louis. After a ſevere cannonading, which laſted ſix hours, a body of marines, and one of Highlanders, were landed, who, ſword in hand, drove the enemy from their entrenchments, took poſſeſſion of the fort, and hoiſted the Britiſh colours.

General Barrington now ſucceeded to the chief command, in the place of general Hopſon, who died at Baſſa-terre a few days after Fort Louis was taken, and he determined to proſecute the entire reduction of the iſland with the utmoſt vigour and diſpatch. This, however, he was not able to effect till the firſt of May, on which day the inhabitants, thinking it in vain to hold out any longer, ſurrendered the whole iſland of Guadaloupe by capitulation. A fortunate circumſtance for the Engliſh forces: for the agreement was but juſt ſigned, when a meſſenger arrived to inform the natives, that M. de Beauharnois, general of the French iſlands, had landed at St. Ann, with a reinforcement from Martinico, under convoy of a ſquadron commanded by M. de Bompart, who no ſooner heard that a capitulation was ſigned, than he reimbarked his troops with all poſſible expedition and ſailed back to Martinico.

The iſlands of Deſeada, Los Santos and Marigalante were now ſummoned to ſurrender, and they accordingly ſubmitted upon the ſame terms as were granted to Guadaloupe. General Barrington having thus happily concluded the preſent deſigns of this expedition, acquainted the commodore, that he propoſed to ſend back part of the troops, with the tranſports, to England, about the beginning of July. In conſequence of this intimation Mr. Moore ſailed with his ſquadron to Baſſa-terre road; where he was joined the next day by two ſhips of the line from England, which rendered him much ſuperior in ſtrength to M. de Bompart, who had retired with his ſquadron to the iſland of Granada about eight leagues from Guadaloupe, where he was diſcovered by one of our men of war, who ſent advice of it to commodore Moore, but before he could get under ſail, a frigate arrived with information that the French admiral had quitted Granada, and was ſuppoſed to have directed his courſe to Hiſpaniola; upon which Mr. Moore immediately diſpatched the Ludlow-caſtle with this intelligence to admiral Cotes, who commanded the Engliſh ſquadron at Jamaica.

General Barrington having made the tour of Guadaloupe, ordered that the fortifications which he thought neceſſary to be maintained ſhould be immediately repaired. He then finiſhed every thing requiſite for the ſupport of the iſland, and ſettled the affairs relating to the inhabitants; after which he ſent the highlanders, with a body draughted out of other regiments, to North America, under convoy; garriſoned the principal towns of the iſland, and left the chief command to colonel Crump. Colonel Melville was appointed governor of the citadel at Baſſaterre, and the command at Grand-terre was given to colonel Delgarno. Three regiments were aſſigned as a guard for the whole iſland, and the other three were embarked for England. In the latter end of June general Barrington himſelf went on board the Roebuck, and with the tranſports, under convoy of a ſmall ſquadron, ſet ſail for Great Britain, while commodore Moore, with the greater part of the fleet, directed his courſe to Antigua.

While theſe things were tranſacting in the Weſt-Indies, the war in America was carried on with equal vigour. In October of the preceding year a grand aſſembly had been held at Eaſton, about ninety miles from Philadelphia; and there peace was eſtabliſhed by a formal treaty concluded between Great Britain and fifteen nations of Indians, inhabiting the country between the Apalachian mountains and the lakes. The Twightees, another Indian nation, did not aſſiſt at this aſſembly, though ſome ſteps had been taken towards forming an alliance with that people. The deputies from the ſix nations did not fail to expreſs their reſentment on this occaſion, for ſome exceſſes committed by the Engliſh on the inhabitants of their nation. At the ſame time the Delawares and Miniſinks complained that the Engliſh had encroached upon their lands and given the firſt occaſion for hoſtilities. There was alſo a miſunderſtanding between the Indians themſelves, ſo that the principal buſineſs of the Britiſh governors was to aſcertain the limits of the lands in diſpute, reconcile the Indians to each other, remove every cauſe of complaint againſt the Engliſh, and detach thoſe ſavages from the French intereſt. The conferences continued eighteen days, when every article being ſettled to the mutual advantage of all parties, the Indians were gratified with valuable preſents, and returned the next day to their reſpective homes.

The Indians being, by this treaty, once more reconciled to the Engliſh, every method was taken for reducing the French ſettlements in Canada. Inſtead of employing the whole ſtrength of the Britiſh arms in North America, upon one object, our miniſtry reſolved to divide the forces, and make an attack on three places at once, which could not fail of diſtracting and weakening the enemy, by which means the conqueſt of Canada would be accompliſhed in one campaign, Accordingly three different expeditions were planned in ſuch a manner as to aſſiſt each other. General Wolfe was ordered to proceed up the river St. Lawrence, as ſoon as the navigation ſhould be free from ice, with a body of 8000 men, and a conſiderable ſquadron of ſhips from England, to undertake the ſiege of Quebec, the capital of Canada. General (now lord) Amherſt, at the head of 12,000 regular and provincial troops, had inſtructions to reduce Ticonderoga and Crown Point, then croſs lake Champlain, and, proceeding along the banks of the river Richelieu to the river St. Lawrence, join general Wolfe before Quebec: and brigadier-general Prideaux, with a third body of troops, reinforced by a conſiderable number of friendly Indians, aſſembled by the influence and under the command of Sir William Johnſon, had orders to inveſt the French fort near the fall of Niagara, which commanded all the interior part of that continent. As ſoon as this fort was reduced, general Prideaux was to embark on the lake Ontario, fall down the river St. Lawrence, make himſelf maſter of Montreal, and then join the army of general Amherſt. Beſides theſe larger armaments, colonel Stanwix was intruſted with a ſmaller detachment for ſubduing the more trifling forts belonging to the French, and ſcouring the banks of the lake Ontario.

General Amherſt's army was the firſt ſet in motion, but, owing to the ſhameful impediments thrown in his way by the Americans, the ſummer was far gone before he could paſs lake George with his forces, and reach the neighbourhood of Ticonderoga. The enemy ſeemed at firſt determined to defend this fortreſs, but perceiving the Engliſh general was at once both prudent and reſolute, they thought proper to abandon the works; purſuant to orders they had received from their general, whereby they were ſtrictly charged not to run the leaſt hazard of being made priſoners of war, but retreat from place to place towards the centre of all the military operations before Quebec: therefore they retired from the ſtrong poſt of Ticonderoga to Crown Point, a fort ſituated on the banks of Lake Champlain. General Amherſt immediately took poſſeſſion of Ticonderoga, which not only effectually ſecured the frontiers of New York, but likewiſe afforded to himſelf a ſafe retreat in caſe of neceſſity; and the joy this acquiſition occaſioned would have been compleat, had it not been damped by the loſs of colonel Roger Townſhend, who was killed by a cannon ſhot as he was reconnoitring the fort. The general now detached ſeveral ſcouting parties into the neighbourhood of Crown Point, in order to watch the motions of the enemy; and, on the firſt of Auguſt, one of theſe detachments brought him intelligence, that the enemy had ſuddenly left Crown Point. In conſequence of this information he ſent a body of rangers to take poſſeſſion of the place, while he himſelf, leaving a ſtrong garriſon at Ticonderoga, embarked with the reſt of the army, and on the fourth landed at the fort, where the troops were immediately encamped. His next care was to lay the foundation of a new fort, to be maintained for the ſecurity of the Britiſh dominions in that part of the country, and totally prevent the incurſions of ſcalping parties, by whom the plantations had been terribly infeſted.

General Amherſt now received advice that the enemy had retired to the Iſle Aux Noix, at the other end of the lake Champlain: that their force encamped upon that iſland, under the command of M. de Burlemaque, conſiſted of three battalions and five piquets of regular troops, beſides Canadians and marines, amounting in the whole to 3500 effective men, provided with a numerous train of artillery; and that the lake itſelf was defended by four large veſſels mounted with cannon, and manned with piquets of different regiments, under the command and direction of M. le Bras, a captain in the French navy, aſſiſted by M. de Rigal and other ſea officers.

Determined to have the ſuperiority on the lake, general Amherſt no ſooner received this intelligence, than he ordered captain Loring, whom he had for ſome time employed to ſuperintend the building of veſſels at Ticonderoga, to build, with all poſſible diſpatch, a ſloop of 16 guns, and a redeau of 84 feet in length, capable of carrying ſix pieces of large cannon. Theſe, together with a brigantine, being finiſhed, victualled, and manned, by the 11th day of October the general embarked with the whole army in batteaus, in order to attack the enemy; but next day, the weather being tempeſtuous, he was obliged to take ſhelter in a bay on the weſtern ſhore, where the men were landed; and only captain Loring, with his ſmall ſquadron, ſailed down the lake; where he gave chace to a French ſchooner, and drove three of their ſhips into a bay, where two of them ſunk, and the other was run a-ground by her own crew, who then deſerted her; after which ſhe was got off by captain Loring, and brought with him to the bay.

Having continued ſome days wind-bound, general Amherſt re-imbarked his troops and proceeded down the lake; but the ſtorm which had abated beginning to blow again with redoubled fury, he found the ſeaſon was too far advanced for him to execute his deſign; therefore returning back to the bay where he had before taken ſhelter, he landed the troops and began his march to Crown Point, where he arrived on the 21ſt day of October. All his thoughts were now employed in completing the new fortreſs at Crown Point, together with three ſmall out-forts for its better defence; in opening roads of communication with Ticonderoga, the ſettlements in Maſſachuſet's-bay and New Hampſhire; and in making diſpoſitions for the winter-quarters of his troops, ſo as to protect the back colonies from the inroads of the enemy.

The only intelligence which general Amherſt had received, during the whole ſummer, of the operations before Quebec, was by ſome intercepted letters from Montcalm, the French general, who gave his correſpondent to underſtand, "That Mr. Wolfe had landed in the neighbourhood of Quebec, and ſeemed determined to undertake the ſiege of that city; that he (Montcalm) had been honoured with ſeveral notes from him, ſometimes in ſoothing terms, and at others filled with menaces; but that the French were determined to give him battle, and a few days would determine the fate of the capital of Canada."

All this time a free communication was preſerved between the forces employed againſt Niagara and thoſe under general Amherſt; and he had the pleaſure of hearing, before he left Ticonderoga, that Niagara had ſubmitted to the Engliſh arms: for general Prideaux, with his body of troops, having been reinforced by the Indian auxiliaries under Sir William Johnſon, advanced to the cataract of Niagara without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition. About the middle of July he inveſted the fortreſs, and carried on his approaches with the utmoſt vigour till the 20th of that month, when, viſiting the trenches, he was unfortunately killed by the burſting of a cohorn. Information of this accident was immediately ſent to general Amherſt, who detached brigadier-general Gage to aſſume the command of that army. In the mean time the French, alarmed at the apprehenſion of loſing a place of ſuch importance, determined to exert themſelves for its relief. They aſſembled a body of regular troops from different places, amounting to 1200 men, and theſe, with a number of Indian auxiliaries, were detached, under the command of M. d'Aubry, to reinforce the garriſon of Niagara.

Sir William Johnſon, apprized of their deſign, reſolved to intercept them in their march, and for this purpoſe, in the evening, the light infantry and piquets were poſted on the road leading from the fall of Niagara to the fort. In the morning they were reinforced by the grenadiers and part of the 46th regiment, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Maſſey; and another regiment, under lieutenant-colonel Farquhar, was poſted at the tail of the works, in order to ſupport the guard of the trenches. About eight in the morning the enemy appeared in ſight, upon which the Indians, in our ſervice, advanced to ſpeak with their countrymen, who had enliſted under the French banners: but this conference was declined by the latter, who immediately uttered the war-whoop, and the enemy began the action with great impetuoſity. In leſs than an hour victory declared in favour of the Engliſh, and the French general, with the greateſt part of his men, were killed; for the Indians, who had concealed themſelves in the wood, galled them in the ſevereſt manner. Seventeen officers were taken priſoners, a liſt of whom Sir William ſent to the French governor of the fort, requeſting him to ſurrender, as it would be in vain to attempt any reſiſtance. The governor, conſcious that he could not long defend himſelf, agreed to capitulate; and the articles being drawn, the garriſon were ſuffered to march out with all the honours of war. They were then ſent to Newark, in order to embark for France; and as for the women, with the ſick and wounded, they were treated in the moſt humane and compaſſionate manner.

Thus, by the valour and intrepidity of the Engliſh troops, Crown Point and Niagara were reduced in a very ſhort time; but the conqueſt of Quebec proved a much more difficult and hazardous enterprize. The fleet deſtined for this expedition ſailed from England about the middle of February, under the command of the admirals Saunders and Holmes. By the 21ſt of April they were in ſight of Louiſburgh, but the harbour being blocked up with ice, they were obliged to bear away for Halifax in Nova Scotia. From thence rear-admiral Durell was detached with a ſmall ſquadron to ſail up the river St. Lawrence as far as the iſle de Condres, in order to intercept any ſupplies ſent from France to Quebec. Two ſtore-ſhips, however, were all that fell into his hands, for he had the mortification to learn that 17 ſail of ſhips, freighted with proviſions, ſtores and ſome recruits, had already reached the capital of Canada, under convoy of three frigates. Admiral Saunders being now arrived at Louiſburgh, the troops were embarked on board the tranſports, and proceeded up the river St. Lawrence. The commander in chief of the forces was major-general Wolfe, and under him were the generals Monckton, Townſend and Murray, young gentlemen of approved abilities, and brought up to all the hardſhips of a military life.

About the latter end of June the troops were landed in two diviſions on the iſland of Orleans, ſituated a little below Quebec. General Wolfe immediately diſtributed a manifeſto among the inhabitants, importing, "That the king of England, his maſter, juſtly exaſperated againſt the French monarch, had equipped a powerful armament, in order to humble his pride, by reducing the moſt conſiderable French ſettlements in America: that it was not againſt the induſtrious peaſants, their wives and children, nor againſt the miniſters of religion, that he intended to make war; on the coutrary, he lamented the misfortunes to which they muſt be expoſed by the quarrel: he offered them his protection, and promiſed to maintain them in their temporal poſſeſſions, as well as in the free exerciſe of their religion, provided they would remain quiet, and take no part in the difference between the two crowns. He obſerved, that the Engliſh were maſters of the river St. Lawrence, ſo as to intercept all ſuccours from Europe, and had beſides a powerful army on the continent, under the command of general Amherſt: that the reſolution they ought to take was neither difficult nor doubtful, as the utmoſt exertion of their valour would be uſeleſs, and ſerve only to deprive them of the advantages which they might reap from their neutrality: that the cruelties exerciſed by the French upon the ſubjects of Great Britain in America would excuſe the moſt ſevere repriſals; but Britons were too generous to follow ſuch barbarous examples: that he offered the Canadians the ſweets of peace amidſt the horrors of war; and left it to themſelves to determine their own fate by their own conduct: but whatever reſolution they might take, he expreſſed his hope, that the world would do juſtice to his conduct, which ſhould be regulated by the ſtricteſt rules of juſtice. If they choſe peace, he would protect them; but if they rejected theſe favourable terms, he muſt adopt violent meaſures. He expatiated upon the ſtrength and power, as well as the generoſity of Great Britain, in thus ſtretching out the hand of humanity; a hand ready to aſſiſt them on all occaſions, even when France was, by her weakneſs, compelled to abandon them in the moſt critical conjuncture."

Notwithſtanding the nervous manner in which this harangue was delivered, it was far from producing the deſired effect. The Canadians would repoſe no confidence in a people, whom their prieſts had repreſented as their moſt ſavage and cruel enemies; for which reaſon they choſe to abandon their habitations, and expoſe themſelves and families to inevitable ruin, by provoking the Engliſh with the moſt cruel hoſtilities, than remain quiet, and confide in the general's promiſe of protection. They even joined the ſcalping parties of Indians, who ſkulked among the woods, and iſſuing forth upon the Engliſh ſtragglers, butchered them with the moſt inhuman barbarity.

General Wolfe, whoſe noble nature was ſhocked at ſuch horrid proceedings, wrote a letter to the French general, wherein he repreſented, that ſuch enormities were repugnant to the rules of war obſerved by civilized nations, diſhonourable to the ſervice of France, and diſgraceful to human nature; he therefore requeſted, that the Canadians and Indians might be reſtrained within due bounds, otherwiſe he ſhould be under the diſagreeable neceſſity of burning their villages, deſtroying their plantations, and retaliating on the perſons of his priſoners whatever cruelties ſhould in the ſequel be committed on the ſoldiers and ſubjects of his maſter.

Whether Montcalm the French general countenanced theſe brutal exceſſes, or found his authority too weak to reſtrain the ſavage ferocity of the Indians, is uncertain; but this letter produced no effect; the moſt horrid barbarities were ſtill committed, and Mr. Wolfe, in order to intimidate the enemy into a ceſſation of theſe outrages, found it neceſſary to connive at ſome irregularities in the way of retaliation.

The city of Quebec was ſtrongly fortified, defended by a numerous garriſon, and plentifully ſupplied with proviſion and ammunition. The troops of the colony were reinforced with five regular battalions, formed out of the principal inhabitants: the Canadians of the neighbourhood, capable of bearing arms, were compleatly diſciplined, and reinforced with ſeveral tribes of ſavages. With this army the French general had taken poſt, in a very advantageous ſituation, along the ſhore of Beaumont, from the river St. Charles to the falls of Montmorenci, every acceſſible part of his camp being deeply intrenched.

General Wolfe was no ſtranger to the difficulties which muſt attend an attempt on Quebec, but he knew that it would be always in his power to retreat, in caſe of neceſſity, while the Britiſh ſquadron maintained its ſtation in the river; and he was likewiſe in great hopes of being joined by general Amherſt. Theſe conſiderations induced him to undertake the hazardous enterprize. Having received advice, that a detachment of the enemy with a train of artillery was poſted at Point Levi, on the ſouth ſhore, oppoſite to the city of Quebec, he detached brigadier Monckton againſt them, at the head of four battalions, who after ſome ſkirmiſhes obliged them to quit the poſt, which he immediately took poſſeſſion of; as did colonel Carlton, with another detachment, of the weſtern point of the iſland of Orleans; and both theſe poſts were ordered to be fortified; for had the enemy kept poſſeſſion of either, it would have rendered it impoſſible for any ſhip to lie at anchor within two miles of Quebec; and what rendered the acquiſition of Point Levi ſtill more valuable was, its being within cannon ſhot of the city, againſt which a battery of mortars and artillery was immediately erected.

The French general, who foreſaw the execution this battery would do, detached a body of 1600 men acroſs the river to attack and deſtroy the works before they ſhould be completed: but this detachment fell into diſorder, fired upon each other, and fled in the utmoſt confuſion. The battery was now finiſhed without farther interruption, and the cannon was employed with ſuch ſucceſs, that in a ſhort time the lower part of the town was entirely demoliſhed, and the upper part received conſiderable damage.

During theſe tranſactions the Engliſh fleet was expoſed to the moſt imminent danger. The troops were no ſooner landed on the iſland of Orleans, than the wind increaſed to a furious ſtorm, which blew with ſuch violence that many of the tranſports ran foul of each other, and were diſabled; a number of boats and ſmall craft foundered, and ſeveral large ſhips loſt their anchors. The enemy, ſuppoſing this ſtorm muſt have produced great confuſion among the Britiſh ſquadron, reſolved to take advantage of it, for which purpoſe they prepared ſeven fire ſhips, and at midnight ſent them down from Quebec among the tranſports. This ſcheme, however, was entirely defeated by the vigilance of the Engliſh admiral, and the courage of the ſailors, who undauntedly boarded the fire ſhips, and towed them faſt on ſhore with incredible expedition, where they lay burning to the water's edge, without having done the leaſt part of that execution for which they were deſigned.

The works for the ſecurity of the hoſpital, and the ſtores on the iſland of Orleans being now completed, the Britiſh forces croſſed the north channel in boats, and landing under the cover of two ſloops, encamped on the ſide of the river Montmorenci, which ſeparated them from the left of the enemy. Next morning a company of rangers, poſted in a wood to cover ſome workmen, were attacked by the French Indians and put to flight; but our neareſt troops advancing, the Indians were, in their turn, repulſed with great loſs. In a letter to the ſecretary of ſtate, general Wolfe fully explained the reaſons why he choſe to encamp near the falls of Montmorenci. He obſerved, "That the ground was high, and in ſome "meaſure commanded the oppoſite ſide, on which "the enemy was poſted: that there was a ford below "the falls, paſſable for ſome hours every tide, at "the latter part of the ebb and beginning of the "flood; and he hoped that means might be found "of paſſing the river higher up, ſo as to fight the "French general upon leſs diſadvantageous terms "than thoſe of directly attacking his intrenchments." Accordingly, in reconnoitering the river Montmorenci, a ford was diſcovered about three miles above; but the oppoſite bank, which was naturally ſteep and covered with woods, had been fortified by the enemy in ſuch a manner as to render it almoſt inacceſſible. Twice the eſcorte was attacked by the French Indians, and as often repulſed; but theſe ſkirmiſhes coſt the Engliſh upwards of forty men killed and wounded, among whom were ſeveral officers.

General Wolfe now thought it would be moſt adviſeable to defer attacking the French army till he had ſurveyed the river St. Lawrence above Quebec, where he hoped to find a place more favourable for a deſcent. Having made the admiral acquainted with his deſign, two men of war, two armed ſloops, and ſeveral tranſports, with troops on board, were ſent up the river, and they paſſed the city without receiving any damage. The general himſelf being on board of this little armament, carefully ſurveyed the banks on the ſide of the enemy, which the nature of the ground rendered extremely difficult; and theſe difficulties were farther increaſed, by the works which the French general had cauſed to be thrown up.

Thus diſappointed in his expectation, general Wolfe returned to Montmorenci, where, during his abſence, brigadier Townſhend had, by maintaining a ſuperior fire acroſs the river, prevented the enemy from erecting a battery, which would have commanded the Engliſh camp. Wolfe was now reſolved to attack the French, and as the men of war could not, for want of a ſufficient depth of water, come near enough their intrenchments to do any execution, the admiral prepared two tranſports, which, on occaſion, might be run aground to favour a deſcent. Theſe veſſels the general intended ſhould aſſiſt him in making himſelf maſter of a detached redoubt, near the water's edge, ſeemingly ſituated within gun-ſhot of the intrenchment on the hill. If the enemy ſhould offer to defend this redoubt, he foreſaw that he ſhould be able to bring on a general engagement; or, on the other hand, ſhould they remain tame ſpectators of its reduction, he might then examine their ſituation at leiſure, and fix upon the place at which they could be moſt eaſily attacked.

In conſequence of theſe reſolutions, every neceſſary ſtep was taken for ſtorming the redoubt. On the 31ſt of July, in the forenoon, part of brigadier Monckton's brigade was embarked in the boats of the fleet to be tranſported from Point Levi. The two brigades commanded by the brigadiers Townſhend and Murray were held in readineſs to croſs the ford whenever it ſhould be found neceſſary. To facilitate their paſſage, the admiral had placed the Centurion in the channel, ſo that ſhe might check the fire of the lower battery, by which the ford was commanded. A numerous train of artillery was placed upon the eminence, to batter and enfilade the enemy's intrenchments: at the ſame time the two tranſports, prepared for this purpoſe, were run a-ground near the redoubt, to favour the deſcent of the troops.

The viſible agitation produced among the French by theſe previous ſteps, and by the fire of the Centurion, which was very judiciouſly directed, determined Mr. Wolfe to ſtorm the entrenchment without delay; and orders were given that the three brigadiers ſhould, at a certain ſignal, put their troops in motion, which was accordingly made at a proper time of the tide; but, in rowing towards the ſhore, many of the boats grounded upon a ledge that runs off a conſiderable diſtance from it; in conſequence of which miſtake ſo much time was loſt, that the general was obliged to ſend an officer to ſtop Mr. Townſhend's corps, which he perceived was in motion.

As ſoon as the boats were floated, and ranged in proper order, the general, aſſiſted by ſeveral ſea-officers, ſounded the ſhore, in order to find a place where the troops might diſembark with the greateſt ſafety. This being diſcovered, 13 companies of grenadiers, and 200 men of the ſecond American battalion, were the firſt who landed. The grenadiers were ordered to form into four diſtinct bodies, and begin the attack, ſuſtained by brigadier Monckton's corps, as ſoon as the troops had paſſed the ford, and were at hand to aſſiſt. From ſome miſunderſtanding, however, theſe orders were entirely neglected. Before Mr. Monckton had landed, and while brigadier Townſhend was on his march, at a conſiderable diſtance, the grenadiers, without waiting to be drawn up in any regular form, ran towards the enemy's entrenchments in the utmoſt confuſion; but the firſt fire of the enemy having checked them, they were obliged to ſhelter themſelves under the redoubt, which the French had abandoned at their approach. Here they continued for ſome time, being unable to form under ſo hot a fire, notwithſtanding the efforts of their officers, who were many of them wounded, and ſome of them even loſt their lives in endeavouring to bring them into ſome kind of order. Wolfe then ordered them to retreat and form behind Monckton's brigade, which was by this time come up. This occaſioned ſo long a delay, that the day was far advanced before any remedy could be thought of. The wind began to blow with unuſual violence, and the tide to make, therefore the general thought proper not to perſiſt in an attempt, which every circumſtance contributed to render hazardous. In conſequence of this reſolution, the troops returned without farther moleſtation to the other ſide of the river Montmorenci; and the admiral ordered the two veſſels, which were a-ground, to be ſet on fire, that they might not fall into the hands of the enemy. In this engagement, above 500 men were killed, among whom were ſeveral officers.

General Murray was now ſent with 1200 men in tranſports above the town, to act in concert with rear-admiral Holmes, whom admiral Saunders had ſent up with ſome force to deſtroy the French ſhipping. Mr. Murray was likewiſe ordered to let no opportunity eſcape of engaging the enemy's detachments, and even of provoking them to battle. In conſequence of theſe inſtructions, he twice endeavoured to land on the north ſhore, but found it impracticable: a third attempt, however, proved more ſucceſſful: he made a ſudden deſcent at Chambaud, and burnt a conſiderable magazine, filled with arms, cloathing, proviſion, and ammunition; after which, Mr. Holmes finding the enemy's ſhips were moored in ſuch a manner as to be out of all danger, he returned to the camp, where he received the firſt news of the reduction of Niagara and Crown Point, and that general Amherſt was employed in making preparations for an attack on the corps poſted at the iſle Aux Noix, under M. Bourlemaque.

Though this intelligence gave the utmoſt ſatisfaction to general Wolfe, yet it at the ſame time convinced him, that the hope he had entertained of aſſiſtance from general Amherſt was now no longer to be depended on. At laſt, a continual ſucceſſion of care, watching, and fatigue, produced a fever and dyſentery, by which this truly great man was for ſome time rendered incapable of performing his duty. His mind, however, was not in a ſtate of inactivity; for during the whole time of his confinement he held conſultations with his officers for the public utility. They agreed in opinion, that any farther attempts at Montmorenci would be of no effect, and that their principal operations ought to be carried on above the town, in order, if poſſible, to draw the enemy to an engagement.

In conſequence of this reſolution, as ſoon as the general was ſomewhat recovered, the troops quitted their camp at Montmorenci, and, with the artillery were reimbarked, and landed at Point Levi. They then paſſed up the river in tranſports, while admiral Holmes made a movement with his ſhips, to amuſe the enemy poſted on the north ſhore. The weather being extremely bad, and the tranſports very much crouded, the general ordered half of the men to be landed on the ſouth ſhore, for refreſhment.

The plan of operations was now entirely changed, there appearing no poſſibility of attacking the enemy above the town. A ſcheme was formed, and preſented, by the three brigadiers, for conveying the troops farther down in boats, and landing them in the night, within a league of Cape Diamond, in hopes of aſcending the heights of Abraham, which riſe abruptly with a ſteep aſcent from the banks of the river, that they might take poſſeſſion of the ground on the back of the city, in which place the fortifications were but indifferent.

Hazardous as this undertaking was, Wolfe reſolved to attempt it; accordingly, the time was fixed, and the neceſſary preparations made. Admiral Holmes with his ſquadron was ordered to move three leagues higher up the river than the place appointed for the diſembarkation, in order to amuſe M. de Bougainville, whom the marquis de Montcalm had detached to attend the motions of this ſquadron; but as ſoon as night came on he was to return down the river, that he might be ready to protect the landing of the forces.

On the twelfth of September, about one in the morning, the firſt embarkation, conſiſting of four complete regiments of light infantry, commanded by colonel Howe, a detachment of highlanders, and the American grenadiers, was made in flat-bottomed boats, under the immediate command of the brigadiers Monckton and Murray, though general Wolfe accompanied them, and was one of the firſt who landed. They then fell down with the tide to the intended place of diſembarkation, rowing cloſe to the north ſhore, in order to find it the more eaſily, but by the rapidity of the tide, and the darkneſs of the night, the boats overſhot the mark, and the troops landed a little below the place intended. This was no ſooner accompliſhed than the boats were ſent back for a ſecond embarkation, which was ſuperintended by brigadier Townſhend. In the mean time colonel Howe, with the light infantry and highlanders, aſcended the precipices with amazing courage and activity; and in their way diſlodged a captain's guard, which defended a paſs, by which alone the reſt of the troops could reach the ſummit. The whole army then mounted without moleſtation, and the general drew them up in order as they arrived.

As ſoon as the French general was informed that the Engliſh had gained the heights of Abraham, he reſolved to give them battle; and, having collected his whole force from the ſide of Beauport, immediately ſet forward on his march. General Wolfe perceived them croſſing the river St. Charles, upon which he began to form his own line, which conſiſted of ſix battalions and the Louiſburgh grenadiers; the right commanded by brigadier Monckton, and the left by brigadier Murray. Colonel Howe, with his light infantry, was poſted in the rear of the left. The manner in which Montcalm advanced plainly ſhewed that his deſign was to flank the left of the Engliſh, and accordingly brigadier Townſhend was ſent thither with the regiment of Amherſt, which he formed en potence, preſenting a double front to the enemy. He was afterwards reinſorced by two battalions; and the reſerve conſiſted of one regiment drawn up in eight ſubdiviſions, with large intervals. About nine in the morning the enemy advanced to the charge with great order and reſolution, though their fire was both irregular and ineffectual. The Engliſh reſerved all their ſhot till the French approached within forty yards of their line, when they poured in a violent diſcharge, and continued the fire with ſuch ſpirit and activity as could not fail of doing terrible execution. The general had fixed himſelf where the attack was moſt warm; and ſtanding conſpicuous in the very front of the line, he was aimed at by the enemy's markſmen, and received a ſhot in the wriſt, which did not, however, oblige him to quit the field; for wrapping his handkerchief about it, he continued to give his orders without the leaſt emotion, and advanced at the head of the grenadiers with their bayonets fixed, when another ball unfortunately entered the breaſt of this young hero, who fell at the moment when victory was crowning all his labours with ſucceſs: for at this very inſtant every regiment of the Britiſh army ſeemed to exert itſelf for the honour of its own peculiar character. While the right puſhed on with their bayonets, brigadier Murray advanced briſkly with the troops under his command, and ſoon broke the centre of the enemy; the highlanders then drawing their broad ſwords, fell in among them with irreſiſtable fury, and drove them, with great ſlaughter, into the town and works they had raiſed at the bridge over the river St. Charles.

By the death of general Wolfe, and Mr. Monckton's having received a dangerous wound, the command devolved on brigadier Townſhend, who haſtened to the center; and finding the troops diſordered by the purſuit, formed them again with great expedition. This taſk was ſcarce accompliſhed when M. de Bougainville, with a body of 2000 freſh men, appeared in the rear of the Engliſh. He had begun his march from cape Rouge as ſoon as he received intelligence that the Britiſh troops had gained the heights of Abraham, but could not arrive time enough to have any ſhare in the action. Two battalions, with two pieces of artillery, were immediately ordered to advance againſt him; but on their approach he retired into the woods, where general Townſhend did not think proper to follow him. He had already gained a complete victory, and was poſted in ſo advantageous a ſituation, that to have quitted it would have been an act of the higheſt imprudence.

The French general M. de Montcalm was mortally wounded in the battle, and taken to Quebec, where he died. His ſecond in command was left wounded on the field, and next day expired on board an Engliſh ſhip, to which he had been conveyed, about 1000 of the enemy were made priſoners, including a great number of field officers, and about 500 were ſlain on the field of battle. The remains of their army, after they had reinforced the garriſon of Quebec, retired to Port au Tremble, from whence they proceeded to Jaques Quartiers, where they remained intrenched, till the ſeverity of the weather compelled them to make the beſt of their way to Trois Rivieres.

This important victory was obtained at the expence of 56 men killed, including nine officers, and of 506 men wounded; but the death of general Wolfe was a national loſs univerſally lamented. This gentleman was formed by nature for military greatneſs; his memory was retentive, his judgment ſound, and his comprehenſion amazingly quick and clear: his conſtitutional courage was not only uniform and daring, perhaps in the extreme, but he poſſeſſed that higher ſpecies of it, if we may be allowed the expreſſion, that ſtrength, ſteadineſs, and activity of mind, which no difficulties can obſtruct, nor dangers deter. With an unuſual liveline ſs, almoſt to impetuoſity of temper, he was not ſubject to paſſion; with the greateſt independence of ſpirit, free from pride; generous almoſt to profuſion, he contemned every little art for the acquiſition of wealth, whilſt he ſearched after objects for his charity and beneficence: the deſerving ſoldier never went unrewarded; and even the needy inferior officer frequently taſted of his bounty. Conſtant and diſtinguiſhing in his attachments; manly and unreſerved; yet gentle, kind and conciliating in his manners: he enjoyed a large ſhare of the friendſhip, and almoſt the univerſal goodwill of mankind; and to crown all, ſincerity and candour, a true ſenſe of honour, juſtice, and public liberty, ſeemed the inherent principles of his nature, and the uniform rule of his conduct.

He betook himſelf, when very young, to the profeſſion of arms; and with ſuch talents, joined to the moſt unwearied aſſiduity, no wonder that he was ſo ſoon ſingled out as a moſt promiſing military genius. Even ſo early as the battle of La Feldt, when ſcarce twenty years of age, he exerted himſelf in ſo maſterly a manner, and at a very critical juncture, that it drew the higheſt encomiums from the great officer then at the head of our army. During the whole of that war he went on forming the military character; was preſent at every engagement, and never paſſed undiſtinguiſhed. Even after the peace, whilſt others lolled on pleaſure's downy lap, he was cultivating the arts of war. He introduced, without one act of ſeverity, ſuch regularity and exactneſs of diſcipline in his corps, that as long as the ſix Britiſh battalions on the plains of Minden are recorded in the annals of Europe, ſo long will Kingſley's regiment ſtand amongſt the foremoſt of that day. Of that regiment he continued lieutenant-colonel, till the great miniſter, who rouſed the ſleeping genius of his country, called him forth to higher ſpheres of action. He was early in the moſt ſecret conſultations for the attack of Rochefort; and what he would have done there, and what he afterwards did at Louiſbourg, are ſtill freſh in the remembrance of many.

He was ſcarce returned from thence when he was appointed to command the important expedition againſt Quebec. There his abilities ſhone forth in their brighteſt luſtre; in ſpite of many unforeſeen difficulties, from the nature of the ground, from the great ſuperiority of the enemy, the ſtrength of the place itſelf, and his own bad ſtate of health, he perſevered with unwearied diligence, practiſing every ſtratagem of war to effect his purpoſe: at laſt, in conjunction with his ſubordinates in command, he formed that great, that dangerous, yet neceſſary plan, which drew out the French to their defeat, and will for ever denominate him the conqueror of Canada. But there---tears will flow---there, when within the graſp of victory, he received a wound, firſt in his wriſt, and then in his breaſt, which obliged him to be carried off to a ſmall diſtance, in the rear; where, rouſed from fainting in the laſt agonies, by the ſound of THEY RUN, he eagerly aſked, "Who run?" and being told, the French, and that they were defeated, he ſaid, "Then I thank God; I die contented;" and almoſt inſtantly expired, in the 32d year of his age. *

On the 5th day after the battle of Quebec, admiral Saunders, having firſt ſent up all the boats of the fleet with artillery and ammunition, ſailed with the ſhips of war, in order to attack the lower town; while general Townſhend ſhould be employed in aſſaulting the upper, for which he had been making the neceſſary preparations ever ſince the action. But before either of theſe deſigns could be put in practice, a flag of truce was ſent from the town with propoſals of capitulation, which being well conſidered by the general and admiral, were accepted and ſigned at eight next morning; when the Britiſh forces took immediate poſſeſſion of the place. Next day about 1000 French ſoldiers were, according to the articles of capitulation, embarked on board ſome tranſports and ſent to France; while numbers of the inhabitants delivered up their arms, and took the oath of fidelity to the Engliſh government. General Townſhend having left a garriſon of 5000 effective men at Quebec, under the command of brigadier Murray, embarked with admiral Saunders, and about the

* The remains of this gallant hero were depoſited in that country for the defence of which he had loſt his life. On Sunday, November 17, at ſeven o'clock in the morning, his majeſty's ſhip Royal William (in which his corpſe was brought from Quebec to Portſmouth) fired two ſignal guns for the removal of his remains. At eight o'clock the body was lowered out of the ſhip into a twelve-oared barge, towed by two twelve-oared barges, and attended by twelve others, to the bottom of the point, in a train of gloomy ſilent pomp, ſuitable to the melancholy occaſion. Minute guns were fired from the ſhips at Spithead, from the time of the body's leaving the ſhip to its being landed at Portſmouth, which was one hour. The regiment of invalids was ordered under arms before eight, and being joined by a company of the train at Portſmouth, marched from the parade there to the bottom of the point, to receive the remains. At nine the body was landed, and put into a hearſe, attended by a mourning coach, (both ſent from London) and proceeded through the garriſon. The colours on the fort were ſtruck half flag ſtaff; the bells were muffled, and rung in ſolemn concert with the march; minute guns were fired on the platform, from the entrance of the corpſe to the cloſe of the proceſſion; the company of the train led the van with their arms reverſed; the corpſe followed; and the invalid regiment followed the hearſe, their arms reverſed. They conducted the body to the Land-port gates, where the train opened to the right and left, and the hearſe proceeded through them in the way to London. Although there were many thouſands of people aſſembled on this occaſion, not the leaſt diſturbance happened; nothing was to be heard but murmuring broken accents, in praiſe of the dead hero. On the 20th at night his remains were depoſited in the burial-place belonging to his family at Greenwich.---A noble monument was afterwards erected for him in Weſtminſter-abbey; on the front of which is the following inſcription, the beginning of winter arrived in England. Brigadier Monckton was conveyed to New York, where he happily recovered of his wounds.

The arms of Great Britain were no leſs ſucceſsful in the Eaſt than in the Weſt-Indies. Towards the cloſe of the preceding year the French general, Lally, had made an unſucceſsful attempt upon Madraſs: after which, the Engliſh being too weak to meet the enemy in the field, they planned little expeditions, which were executed with great vigour. Colonel Ford, who commanded the troops in Bengal, obtained a complete victory over M. de Conflans, in the neighbourhood of Muſulipatam, which he afterwards entered in triumph. At the ſame time colonel Maitland was detached from Bombay, with 1300 ſeapoys, and 900 Europeans, againſt the town and caſtle of Surat; which ſurrendered in a very ſhort time. Soon after the main body of the Engliſh forces, which had been ſtationed at Madraſs for the preſervation of that important ſettlement, took the field, and made themſelves maſters of the fort of Schengelpel, which commanded all the adjacent country, and ſecured the Britiſh ſettlements to the northward. Senſible of the importance of this poſt, M. Lally endeavoured to diſlodge them, but finding all his efforts ineffectual, he retired towards Wandewaſh, where his troops were put into quarters of cantonment.

On the 1ſt of September vice-admiral Pocock ſailed from Madraſs in queſt of the enemy, and next day diſcovered their fleet, conſiſting of fifteen ſail, ſtanding to the northward; but his endeavours to bring them to an engagement proved ineffectual till the 10th, about two in the afternoon, when the French admiral made the ſignal for battle. The engagement was maintained with great fury on both ſides for two hours, and then the whole French ſquadron bore away to the South-eaſt with all the canvas they could ſpread. The Britiſh fleet had ſuffered ſo much in their maſts and rigging that they could not purſue; and the admiral returned to Madraſs, where his ſhips, being refitted, he once more ſailed in queſt of M. d'Ache whom he found lying at anchor in the road of Pondicherry. He immediately made the line of battle a-head, in which ſituation he continued for ſome time, but finding the enemy was reverſe to a ſecond engagement, he again returned to the harbour of Madraſs. The French ſquadron then ſailed to the iſland of Mauritius, in order to be refitted; by which means they left the Engliſh maſters of the Indian coaſt. Soon after admiral Corniſh, who had ſailed from England in the beginning of the year, with four ſhips of the line, joined admiral Pocock at Madraſs.

During the whole courſe of the war the Dutch had maintained a moſt puſillanimous, and, in ſome reſpects, a moſt inſidious neutrality, but they now proceeded to open acts of hoſtility in the Eaſt-Indies. The great extenſion of our trade in the kingdom of Bengal had excited the envy and jealouſy of the Dutch factory, who poſſeſſed a ſtrong fort at Chinchura, in the river of Bengal, and reſolved, if poſſible, to engroſs the whole trade of ſalt-petre. There remains no doubt of their having tampered with the nabob, who lay under great obligations to the Engliſh, and obtained his connivance. Their ſcheme was likewiſe approved by the governor of Batavia, who undertook to put it in execution. Accordingly, under pretence of reinforcing the Dutch garriſons in Bengal, he equipped an armament of ſeven ſhips, on board which he embarked 500 European troops and 600 Malayeſe, under the command of colonel Ruſſel, who, with this armament, arrived in the river of Bengal about the beginning of October.

Colonel Clive, who at this time reſided at Calcutta, having received intimation of their deſign, determined at all events to defeat the execution of it. He therefore complained to the nabob, who thought it moſt prudent to iſſue an order forbidding this armament to proceed up the river. At the ſame time the colonel ſent a letter to the Dutch commodore, telling him, that having been informed of his intention, he could not permit them to land forces and march to Chinchura.

The whole of the Dutch fleet was not yet arrived, therefore the commodore thought proper to aſſure Mr. Clive, that he had no intention to ſend forces to Chinchura, and only begged ſome troops might be landed for refreſhment; which requeſt was complied with, on condition that they ſhould not advance. But no ſooner was the reſt of the ſhips arrived, than, contrary to his word given, and the nabob's order, he proceeded up the river to the neighbourhood of Tannah fort, where his troops were landed and began their march to Chinchura. Not contented with this, as a revenge for the affront he pretended the Dutch had received in being denied a paſſage to their own factory, he took ſeveral ſmall veſſels on the river belonging to the Engliſh company; and the Calcutta, a homeward bound Indiaman, commanded by captain Wilſon, ſailing down the river, the commodore ſent him word, that if he attempted to paſs he would ſink him, and immediately run out his guns as if he intended to put his threats in execution; upon which captain Wilſon returned to Calcutta, and informed colonel Clive of what had happened; who ordered him, with two other ſhips, then at anchor there, to prepare for battle, and attack the Dutch ſquadron. Accordingly they fell down the river, and found the enemy drawn up in line of battle to oppoſe their paſſage. The duke of Dorſet, commanded by captain Forreſter, began the engagement with a broadſide, which was immediately returned. A ſevere fire was now maintained on both ſides, till two of the Dutchmen, ſlipping their cables, bore away, and a third was driven aſhore. Their commodore being thus weakened, after a few broadſides, ſtruck his flag to captain Wilſon, and the other three followed his example. The victory being thus obtained without the loſs of one man on our ſide, captain Wilſon took poſſeſſion of the prizes, and ſent the priſoners to Calcutta. In the mean time colonel Clive had detached colonel Ford, with 500 men, in purſuit of the Dutch forces who were on their march to Chinchura, but he did not overtake them till they arrived near that place; when, on the 25th of November, he attacked, and totally defeated them. Propoſals of accommodation were now ſent to colonel Ford, by the directors and council of the Dutch factory at Chinchura, upon which a negotiation enſued, and a treaty was concluded to the ſatisfaction of all parties.

During theſe tranſactions the council and governor of Madraſs having received intelligence that M. Lally had detached a ſtrong body of troops to the ſouthward, taken Syringham, and threatened Trichunopoly with a ſiege, it was reſolved that colonel Coote, who had lately arrived from England, ſhould take the field, and endeavour to ſtop his progreſs. Accordingly he began his march, at the head of 2,100 Europeans, including cavalry, and 3000 blacks, with 14 pieces of cannon, and one howitz. On the 27th of November he laid ſiege to the fort of Wandewaſh, and having made a practicable breach, the garriſon ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war. He then inveſted the fortreſs of Carangoly, which he likewiſe ſubdued, but the garriſon was allowed to march out with the honours of war.

Alarmed at the progreſs of the Engliſh, M. Lally collected his forces at Arcot, and began his march to recover Wandewaſh. In their way they reduced Conjiveram, of which colonel Coote having been informed, formed, he made a forced march towards that place. On his approach, the French abandoned it, and continuing their rout to Wandewaſh, inveſted the fort. They were cloſely followed by Mr. Coote, who hearing that a breach was already made, determined to give them battle. This was accordingly done, and the Engliſh obtained a compleat victory.

The French general, not thinking it proper to hazard a ſecond attack, retired with the remains of his army to Pondicherry. In the mean time the Engliſh commander made himſelf maſter of Chittiput, Timmery, and Arcot; in the latter of which places he found twenty-two pieces of cannon, four mortars, and a large quantity of all kinds of military ſtores.

The conqueſt of Arcot cloſed the campaign in the Eaſt-Indies, which was rendered ſucceſsful to the Engliſh by the diligence of colonel Coote, whoſe courage, conduct and activity gained him the moſt reſpectful and deſerved honour.

In Germany the war was carried on with various ſucceſs. The king of Pruſſia was ſo ſurrounded by enemies on all hands, that it was imagined he muſt be inevitably deſtroyed; but perſeverance enabled him to ſurmount every difficulty. Prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, who commanded the allied army, had been conſiderably reinforced by freſh troops from England; and on the 13th of April he came within ſight of the French, commanded by marſhal Broglio, at Bergen, a ſmall village in the neighbourhood of Frankfort. No general could have done more than prince Ferdinand in order to procure victory; but ſuch was the ſituation of the French, that although he attacked them three different times, yet he was, in the end, obliged to retreat, but did it in ſuch excellent order, that the French were not able to purſue him. This action was a ſevere ſtroke to the allied army, who were greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions; while the French, who had taken the city of Gottingen, enjoyed them in great plenty, and were every day marching farther into the electorate of Hanover, exacting of the inhabitants very heavy contributions.

It was now become, in a manner, abſolutely neceſſary for the allies to venture on an engagement, otherwiſe the French would have once more made good their winter quarters in Hanover. The French general had made himſelf maſter of the city of Minden, and ordered a camp to be formed in its neighbourhood. On the other hand, prince Ferdinand, whoſe army lay encamped at Peterſhagen, acted with ſo much prudence, and diſplayed ſuch military ſkill, that the French could not perceive from his motions, whether he intended to advance or retreat. He had received advice, that a large convoy of proviſions was coming from Paderborn for the uſe of the French, and he deſigned, if poſſible, to prevent its joining the army. At the ſame time, he made as if he intended to divide his forces, and this led the French generals into a ſnare. The duke de Broglio marched, in order to attack general Wangenheim; but when he came to the top of an eminence, he was ſurprized to ſee the whole of prince Ferdinand's army drawn up in order of battle.

It was now too late to think of retiring, for on one ſide was the river Weſer, and on the other a deep moraſs, both ſtrongly guarded by the allies; ſo that the French were in great danger of being ſurrounded. The engagement was begun by the French cavalry, who came upon the Engliſh infantry with great fury. Nothing could equal the courage of the Engliſh on this occaſion; for although they were only aſſiſted by a ſmall party of the Hanoverian army, yet they cut in pieces two bodies of the French horſe who had repeatedly attempted to break through them. The Engliſh regiments of Walgrave and Kingſley cut in pieces two French battalions who attempted to ſupport the horſe; upon which the center of the French army being broken, and the reſt beginning to retreat, prince Ferdinand ſent an expreſs order to lord George Sackville, who commanded the Engliſh horſe, to come up at full gallop; but a miſunderſtanding having, for ſome time, ſubſiſted between the prince and lord George, the latter did not arrive time enough to ſhare in the glory of the victory. Had the Engliſh cavalry come up in time, the French would have been totally routed; but, by this fatal miſunderſtanding, they made good their retreat in tolerable order, the Engliſh not being able to haraſs their rear without the aſſiſtance of the horſe. As the glory of this victory was chiefly owing to the courage and bravery of the Engliſh, ſo the prince did not neglect to acknowledge it, and only regretted that the marquis of Granby had not commanded the horſe.

Great rejoicings were made in England when the news of this important victory arrived: but the ſpirits of the people were damped when they conſidered that the conduct of their own general had prevented it from being deciſive. Lord George Sackville, whoſe conduct expoſed him to great cenſure, left the army, and returned to England; on which the command of the Britiſh forces was conferred on the brave marquis of Granby, a young nobleman, who, to the moſt liberal and diſtinguiſhed benevolence, joined the moſt undaunted courage, and was obeyed by the ſoldiers from motives of love rather than fear.

The French were ſo much incenſed at their loſs of this memorable battle, that the marſhal de Belleiſle, who was at the head of the war department, loſt the whole of his reputation, while the duke de Broglio and the marſhal de Contades mutually upbraided each other. Broglio, who had gone to Paris in order to vindicate his own character, took care to repreſent that of M. de Contades in ſuch an odious light, that the latter was recalled, and the former inveſted with the chief command, partly by the intrigues of madam Pampadour, and partly by the antipathy his ſovereign had conceived againſt him.

When Broglio returned to the camp, the ſeaſon was too far advanced for action; but notwithſtanding, he reſolved to attack prince Ferdinand's lines, who was well prepared to receive him. In this, however, he miſcarried, and was obliged to return to his camp, leaving the prince at full liberty to ſecure all his cantonments, while the army went into winter quarters.

Having thus given a particular detail of the operations of this year's campaign, ſo far as they relate to us, we ſhall now direct our attention to affairs at home.

On the 14th of November the parliament met by commiſſion; and the lord-keeper informed the members, that his majeſty had called them together in order that all public affairs ſhould be laid before them; that their advice ſhould be taken in every thing of importance; and that they might beſtow ſome marks of their favour on thoſe generals and admirals who, during the ſummer, had diſtinguiſhed themſelves with ſo much honour. He added, that nothing could give him greater pleaſure than to ſee the public tranquillity reſtored; but that he would never make peace on terms which were diſhonourable. He rejoiced to find that his beloved ſubjects lived in harmony under his government; and aſſured the commons, that although great ſums of money had been granted for carrying on the war, yet none of them had been appropriated to private purpoſes, but the whole laid out in the uſes for which they were deſigned.

ſigned. He concluded by recommending to them the general ſtate of Europe, ſo far as the flames of war had been lighted; that all theſe nations had their eyes fixed upon them; and that he doubted not but they would contribute in the moſt liberal manner towards ſupporting the army and navy.

Both houſes preſented the moſt dutiful and loyal addreſſes to his majeſty's ſpeech; and a perfect union took place between the miniſtry and the parliament.

In the courſe of this year death curtailed the royal family of two of its members. The firſt of theſe was the princeſs dowager of Orange and Naſſau, governante of the United Provinces, and eldeſt daughter of his Britannic majeſty, who was informed of this melancholy event by a letter from the ſtates-general, wherein they condoled with him on the irreparable loſs which he, as well as they, had ſuſtained; and aſſured him they would employ all their care and attention in ſecuring and defending the rights and intereſts of the young ſtadtholder and the princeſs his ſiſter, whom they conſidered as children of the republic.—This princeſs was poſſeſſed of many perſonal accompliſhments and exemplary virtues; being pious, moderate, ſenſible and circumſpect. She had exerciſed her authority with equal ſagacity and reſolution; was reſpected even by thoſe who were no friends to the houſe of Orange; and died with great fortitude and reſignation, in the 50th year of her age. In her will ſhe appointed the king her father, and the princeſs-dowager of Orange, her mother-in-law, honorary tutors, and prince Louis of Brunſwic acting tutor to her children.

The death of this amiable princeſs was ſoon followed by that of the princeſs Elizabeth-Carolina, ſecond daughter of his late royal highneſs Frederic prince of Wales, a lady of the moſt engaging manners. She died at Kew in the month of September, before ſhe had attained the 19th year of her age.

In the ſpring of this year * the liberal arts received a ſevere blow in the death of George Frederic Handel,

* The year 1759 is remarkable for having produced ſeveral murders which were attended with the moſt unparalleled inſtances of barbarity. Though theſe incidents are not immediately connected with a general hiſtory, yet they deſerve not to be paſſed unnoticed, more eſpecially as they are ſtill in the memory of a great part of the preſent age. The moſt remarkable of theſe were the following:

One Halſey, who commanded a merchant ſhip in the voyage from Jamaica to England, having conceived ſome perſonal diſlike againſt a poor ſailor, named Davidſon, inſulted him with ſuch abuſe, expoſed him to ſuch hardſhips, and puniſhed him with ſuch wantonneſs of cruelty, that the poor wretch leaped overboard in deſpair. His inhuman tyrant envying him that death, which would have reſcued a miſerable object from his brutality, plunged into the ſea after him, and brought him on board, declaring he ſhould not eſcape while there were any torments left to inflict. Accordingly, he exerciſed his tyranny upon him with redoubled rigour, tied him to the ſhrouds with a cord, and beat him for ſome time with ſuch violence, that in a few hours after the poor creature expired. This ſavage ruffian was likewiſe indicted for the murder of another mariner called Edwards; but being convicted on the firſt trial, the ſecond was found unneceſſary, and the criminal ſuffered death according to the law, which is perhaps too mild for malefactors convicted of ſuch aggravated cruelty.

Another barbarous murder was committed in the country near Birmingham, upon a ſheriff's officer, by the ſons of one Darby, whoſe effects the Bailiff had ſeized on a diſtreſs for rent. The two young aſſaſſins, encouraged by the father, attacked the unhappy wretch with clubs, and mangled him in a terrible manner, ſo that he hardly retained any ſigns of life. Not contented with this cruel execution, they ſtripped him naked, and dragging him out of the houſe, ſcourged him with a waggoner's whip, until the fleſh was cut from his bones. In this miſerable condition he was found weltring in his blood, and conveyed to a neighbouring houſe, where he immediately expired. The three barbarians were apprehended, after having made a deſperate reſiſtance. They were tried, convicted, and executed: the ſons were hung in chains, and the body of the father diſſected.

In the month of April five French priſoners, confined on board the king's ſhip the Royal Oak, were convicted of having murdered one Jean de Manaux, their countryman and fellow-priſoner, in revenge for his having diſcovered that they had forged paſſes to facilitate their eſcape. Enraged at this detection, they ſeized this unfortunate informer in the place of their confinement, gagged his mouth, ſtripped him naked, tied him with a ſtrong cord to a ring-bolt, and ſcourged his body with ſuch ſavage cruelty, as almoſt put an end to his life. By dint of ſtruggling the poor wretch diſengaged himſelf from the cord with which he had been tied; and being unable to ſtand, fell upon his back; they then finiſhed the tragedy, by leaping and ſtamping on his breaſt, till the cheſt was broke, and he expired. They afterwards divided the body into ſmall pieces, and conveyed it through the neceſſary into the ſea, becauſe the throwing it over-board would have alarmed the centry. Next day 27 of the French priſoners being carried on ſhore, one of them gave information of the murder; in conſequence of which the criminals were ſecured, brought to trial, condemned, and puniſhed with death.

A miſcreant, whoſe name was Haines, having eſpouſed the daughter of a farmer in the neighbourhood of Glouceſter, who poſſeſſed an eſtate of eighty pounds a year, which he intended to divide among ſeven children, was ſo abandoned as to form the deſign of poiſoning the whole family, that, in right of his wife, he might enjoy the whole inheritance. For the execution of this infernal ſcheme, he employed his own father to procure him a quantity of arſenic; part of which he adminiſtered to three of the children, who were immediately ſeized with the dreadful ſymptoms produced by this mineral, and the eldeſt expired. He afterwards mixed it with three apple-cakes which he bought for the purpoſe, and preſented to the other three children, who underwent the ſame terrible convulſions which had proved fatal to the eldeſt brother. The inſtantaneous effects of the poiſon occaſioned a ſuſpicion of Haines, who being ſeized and examined, the whole ſcene of villany was diſcloſed. Nevertheleſs, the villain found means to eſcape.

Nor were the inſtances of cruel aſſaſſination which prevailed at this time confined to Great Britain. An atrocious maſſacre was perpetrated by two Genoeſe mariners, upon the maſter and crew of an Engliſh veſſel, among whom they were inrolled. Theſe monſters of cruelty were in different watches, a circumſtance that favoured the execution of the horrid plan they had concerted. When one of them retired to reſt with his fellows of the watch, conſiſting of the mate and two ſeamen, he waited till they were faſt aſleep, and then butchered them all with a knife. Having ſo far ſucceeded without diſcovery, he returned to the deck and communicated the exploit to his aſſociate; they then ſuddenly attacked the maſter of the veſſel, and cleft his head with an hatchet, which they likewiſe uſed in murdering the man who ſtood at the helm; a third was likewiſe diſpatched, and no Engliſhman remained alive but the maſter's ſon, a boy, who lamented his father's death with inceſſant tears and cries for three days; at the expiration of which he was likewiſe ſacrificed, becauſe the aſſaſſins were diſturbed by his clamour.---This barbarous tragedy was acted within 60 leagues of the rock of Liſbon; but the veſſel was taken between the capes Ortugal and Finiſterre by the captain of a French privateer called La Favourite, who ſeeing the deck ſtained with blood, and finding all the papers of the ſhip deſtroyed, began to ſuſpect that the maſter and crew had been murdered. He accordingly taxed them with the murder, and they confeſſed the particulars. The privateer touched at Vigo, where the captain imparted the detail to the Engliſh conſul; but the prize, with the two villains on board, was ſent to Bayonne in France, where they were brought to condign puniſhment, notwithſtanding the war that ſubſiſted at this time between the two nations.

A maſſacre, if poſſible ſtill more ſhocking and horrid, was committed about the ſame time by a negro at St. Euſtatia. This man being at work on a ſhip in the harbour, and having had ſome words with a white perſon, ſtabbed him in his paſſion; upon which another negro told him that he would certainly be put to death for this cruel murder, and that he could be ſubjected to no greater puniſhment if he had killed twenty more. The fellow, rendered deſperate by this intimation, ſnatched up a knife, and throwing himſelf into the water, ſwam immediately to ſhore. The firſt perſon he met happened to be an Engliſh ſailor, and him he cut acroſs the belly in ſuch a manner that his bowels came out. This done, he ruſhed in a moment into a woollen-draper's ſhop, and ſtabbed the apprentice, who was ſitting behind the counter: he then ran into the ſtreet, and dangerouſly wounded two or three others. By this time the people were greatly alarmed; but the fellow being deſperate, every body ſhunned him. The governor offered a reward to any one who would ſeize him alive, and a ſailor undertook it, armed with a muſket; but if he found it impracticable, he was ordered to ſhoot him The negro, who was then at the wharf-ſide, alone, ſaw him coming, and met him with great reſolution. He made an eſſay to ſtab the ſailor, by giving a ſudden leap upon him; but the tar avoided the blow, and ſtruck him with the butt end of the muſket ſo as to break his arm. Upon this the negro, with great agility, ſeized the knife in the one hand, and made another puſh at the ſailor, but with as little ſucceſs as before; and by another blow he was, with the aſſiſtance of ſome other Handel, the moſt celebrated maſter in muſic which this age has produced. He was by birth a German; but had ſtudied in Italy, and afterwards ſettled in England, where he met with the moſt favourable reception, and reſided above half a century, univerſally admired for his ſtupendous genius in the ſublime parts of muſical compoſition.

A. D. 1760. The firſt matters that engage our attention on the opening of this year are, the proceedings of the parliament, which were in all reſpects ſatisfactory to the miniſtry. They voted 70,000 men for the ſervice of the royal navy; and 3,640,000l were granted for maintaining them. It is unneceſſary to mention all the particulars which were taken into conſideration during this ſeſſion of parliament; but certain it is, nothing was aſked by the miniſtry that the commons refuſed. They granted a ſupply of 15,003,563l. 15s. and 9d$\frac{1}{2}$; more than could have been raiſed by any nation beſides Britain; but however enormous, yet it was no more than what was neceſſary. The militia were this year raiſed in ſeveral counties, and put under proper regulations; ſo that there was no reaſon to apprehend that any circumſtance would ariſe that could in the leaſt diſturb the internal peace of the kingdom.

The ſupplies being granted, the commons took into conſideration the ſtatute of the 9th of queen Anne, by which it is enacted, that no perſon ſhall be elected a knight of the ſhire, unleſs he is poſſeſſed of 600l. per ann. nor any one returned to ſerve as a burgeſs, unleſs he had 300l. It ſeems that this act, however ſalutary, and calculated to promote the intereſt of the people, by ſupporting the dignity of parliament, had been proſtituted to the baſeſt purpoſes. Methods had been found out to elude the force of it, and many perſons had procured ſeats in the houſe of commons, who were not, according to law, properly qualified.

In order to remedy an evil of ſo dangerous a nature, a bill was brought in, and paſſed both houſes, by which it was enacted, that every perſon duly elected ſhall, previous to his taking the oaths, deliver in to the clerk a true eſtimate of his eſtate, and that ſhall be left to be inſpected by any member who chuſes, and the newly elected member ſhall ſwear to the truth of the contents.

Several other acts were paſſed, particularly one for the regulation of the payment of prize-money due to ſeamen, which before had been left to the diſcretion of the commiſſioners of the navy. A bill was brought in and paſſed for regulating weights and meaſures, and proper proviſion was made for raiſing the ſums granted to his majeſty. After which, the parliament was prorogued by commiſſion.

We have already obſerved that a ſmall ſquadron, under the command of M. de Thurot, had, in the month of October of the preceding year, taken ſhelter at Gottenburgh in Sweden. From thence he proceeded to Bergen in Norway, and this year, about the latter end of January, he ſailed again for the northern part of Ireland, with an intention to make a deſcent about Derry; but before this deſign could be put in execution, they were driven out to ſea by a violent ſtorm, and in the night loſt ſight of one of their ſhips, which never joined them again. As ſoon as the tempeſt would permit, Thurot ſteered to the iſland of Iſla, where he landed his troops in hopes of finding ſome refreſhment, and accordingly they were ſupplied with ſome black cattle and a little oatmeal, for which they paid a reaſonable price. By this time his arrival in the Britiſh ſeas had filled the whole nation with alarm. Bodies of regular troops and militia were poſted along the coaſts of Ireland and Scotland; and beſides the ſquadron under commodore Boys, who ſailed to the northward in purſuit of Thurot, ſeveral ſhips of war were ordered to ſcour the Briſtol channel, and cruize between Scotland and Ireland. In the mean time Thurot ſailed from Iſla to the bay of Carrickfergus in Ireland, where, on the 21ſt of February, he actually made a deſcent with 600 men, and meeting with no oppoſition they advanced towards the town, which they found as well guarded as the nature of the place, and the circumſtances of lieutenant colonel Jennings, who at this time commanded four companies of raw undiſciplined troops there, would admit. A regular attack was made, and a ſpirited defence maintained, till the ammunition of the Engliſh failed, which for ſome time they ſupplied the want of with ſtones and rubbiſh. But colonel Jennings, finding it would be in vain to reſiſt, ſurrendered, on condition that neither he nor his troops ſhould be ſent priſoners to France, but be ranſomed by ſending thither an equal number of French priſoners from Great Britain or Ireland. The enemy, however, were ſoon obliged to abandon their conqueſt, for a conſiderable body of regular troops were by this time collected, which Thurot having received intelligence of, ordered his men to re-imbark immediately. In the mean time intelligence had been diſpatched to captain Elliot, who commanded the Æolus, Pallas, and Brilliant frigates, at Kingſale, that three French ſhips lay at anchor in the bay of Carrickfergus. He immediately ſailed, and on the 28th of February diſcovered the enemy. About nine in the morning, captain Elliot in the Æolus engaged the Belleiſle, commanded by Thurot, the other two being attacked by the Pallas and Brilliant. After a warm action, maintained with equal ſpirit on all ſides for two hours and a half, in which time M. de Thurot was killed, one of captain Elliot's lieutenants boarded the Belleiſle, and ſtruck her colours himſelf, upon which the commander ſubmitted. This example was followed by the other French ſhips, and captain Elliot conveyed his prizes to the Iſle of Man.

other perſons who had gathered round, ſecured alive. He was immediately brought to trial, and condemned; and next day hung alive in irons upon a gibbet, where he continued in the moſt violent agonies, and ſhrieking in the moſt terrible manner for the ſpace of three days. His greateſt cry was for water, the weather being then extremely hot, and the ſun being full upon him.

To the above melancholy events we ſhall add one of an accidental nature, which was truly ſurprizing and deplorable in all its circumſtances.

A ſloop, called the Dolphin, bound from the Canaries to New York, met with ſuch unfavourable weather, that ſhe was detained 165 days in the paſſage, and the proviſion of the ſhip was altogether expended before the firſt 50 days were elapſed. The wretched crew had devoured their dog, cat, and all the ſhoes on board: at length, being reduced to the laſt extremity, they agreed to caſt lots for their lives, that the body of him upon whom the lot ſhould fall might ſerve for ſome time to ſupport the ſurvivors. The wretched victim was one Antonio Galatia, a Spaniſh gentleman and paſſenger. Him they ſhot with a muſquet; and having cut off his head, threw it overboard; but the intrails and the reſt of the carcaſe they greedily devoured. This horrid banquet having, as it were, fleſhed the famiſhed crew, they began to talk of another ſacrifice; from which, however, they were diverted by the influence and remonſtrance of their captain, Mr. Baron, who prevailed upon them to be ſatisfied with about an inch and a half ſquare of leather to each man per diem, cut from a pair of breeches that were found in the cabin. Upon this calamitous pittance, together with the graſs which grew plentifully upon the deck, theſe poor objects made ſhift to ſubſiſt for twenty days; at the expiration of which they were relieved by one captain Bradſhaw, who happened to fall in with them at ſea, and took them on board his ſhip. By this time the whole crew, conſiſting of ſeven men, were ſo ſqualid and emaciated, as to exhibit an appearance at once piteous and terrible; and ſo reduced in point of ſtrength, that it was found neceſſary to uſe ropes and tackle for hoiſting them from one ſhip to another.

During the courſe of this year the war in America was carried on with equal vigour as in the preceding. The French emiſſaries from the province of Louiſiana had, by their arts, induced the Cherokees, a numerous and powerful nation of the Indians, ſettled on the confines of Virginia and Carolina, to break out into open acts of hoſtility againſt the Engliſh, which they began by plundering, maſſacring and ſcalping ſeveral Britiſh ſubjects of the more ſouthern provinces. Mr. Lyttelton, governor of South Carolina, having received information of theſe outrages, obtained the neceſſary aids from the aſſembly of his province for maintaining a conſiderable body of forces, which was raiſed with great expedition. In the beginning of October he marched at the head of 800 regular troops, and penetrated into the heart of the country poſſeſſed by the Cherokees, who were ſo much intimidated by his vigorous proceedings, that they ſent a deputation of their chiefs to ſue for peace, which was re-eſtabliſhed by a new treaty, dictated by the Engliſh governor. But theſe ſavages were far from intending to perform the articles of this treaty; for Mr. Lyttelton had hardly returned from their country, before they made an attempt to ſurprize the Engliſh fort at Prince George, near the frontiers of Carolina: but this ſcheme proving abortive, they wreaked their vengeance upon the Engliſh ſubjects trading in their country, all of whom they butchered without mercy. They then made incurſions into the Britiſh ſettlements at the Long Lanes, and the forks of the Broad river, and maſſacred about forty coloniſts. Theſe horried cruelties alarmed all the ſouthern colonies of the Engliſh, upon which general Amherſt was applied to for aſſiſtance; and 1200 men were detached to South Carolina, under the command of colonel Montgomery. Immediately after his arrival at Charles Town, he advanced to Ninety-ſix, and proceeded to Twelve Mile River, which he paſſed in the beginning of June without oppoſition, and arrived in the neighbourhood of an Indian town, called Keowee, where he encamped in an advantageous ſituation, reſolving to ruſh upon the enemy in the night, as he had reaſon to believe they were ignorant of his arrival. Accordingly he began his march through the woods towards the Cherokee town of Eſtatoe, about twenty-five miles diſtant from his camp, which they reached early in the morning; but it had been abandoned about half an hour before their arrival. The town, however, was deſtroyed; and colonel Montgomery followed his blow with ſuch amazing rapidity, that in the ſpace of a few hours he deſtroyed Sugar Town, and every village and houſe in the lower nation.

Having thus taken ample revenge on this perfidious people, he returned to fort Prince George, with about forty Indian women and children, whom he made priſoners. Two of their warriors were ſet at liberty, and ordered to inform their nation, that though they were now in the power of the Engliſh, they might ſtill, on their ſubmiſſion, enjoy the bleſſings of peace. This meſſage, however, produced no effect, upon which colonel Montgomery reſolved to make a ſecond irruption into the middle-ſettlements of the Cherokees, and began his march on the 24th of June. Having ſuſtained a very troubleſome fire from the enemy in their way, they at length arrived at the town of Etchowee, which the inhabitants had forſaken, after having removed every thing of value. Here they encamped on a ſmall plain ſurrounded by hills, from whence they were terribly incommoded by vollies from the Indians, which wounded ſome men and killed ſeveral horſes, the loſs of which was of infinite conſequence; and colonel Montgomery, ſenſible that he could proceed no further, without leaving his proviſions behind, or abandoning the wounded men to the brutal revenge of a ſavage enemy, reſolved to return, and in the beginning of July arrived at Fort Prince George; this expedition having coſt him about 75 men killed and wounded, including five officers. The Cherokees now aſſembled to a conſiderable number, and formed the blockade of Loudon, a ſmall fortification on the confines of Virginia, defended by an inconſiderable garriſon, ill ſupplied with proviſion and neceſſaries, notwithſtanding which they ſuſtained a long ſiege, but were at length obliged to capitulate, on condition that the whole garriſon ſhould retire; which the Indians conſented to, and deſired, that when they arrived at Keowee, the Cherokee priſoners confined at that place might be releaſed, all hoſtilities ceaſe, a laſting accommodation be re-eſtabliſhed, and a regular trade revived. In conſequence of this treaty, the garriſon evacuated the fort, but they had not marched above 15 miles before they were ſurrounded by a large body of Indians, who maſſacred all the officers except captain Stuart, and ſlew 25 of the ſoldiers: the reſt were made priſoners, and diſtributed among the different towns and villages of the nation. Captain Stuart owed his life to the generous interceſſion of the Indian chief Attakullakulla, or the Little Carpenter, who had done the Engliſh many good offices ſince the renovation of the war, and now ranſomed Mr. Stuart at the expence of all he could command, and conducted him ſafe to Halſtan river, where major Lewes had advanced with a body of Virginians.

While theſe things were tranſacting in the ſouthern colonies of America, the military operations in the northern were carried on with equal vigour and alacrity. But the garriſon which had been left the preceding year at Quebec, under the command of general Murray, ſuffered greatly during the winter from the intenſe cold, and the want of vegetables and freſh proviſions. Before the end of April 1000 of the ſoldiers periſhed with the ſcurvy, and twice that number were rendered unfit for ſervice.

Such was the ſituation of the garriſon, when general Murray received intelligence that the French commander, the chevalier de Levy, was employed in aſſembling his army, which had been cantoned in the neighbourhood of Montreal, and that he was determined to undertake the ſiege of Quebec, as ſoon as the river St. Lawrence was free from ice. Every precaution was now taken for the defence of the place, and the reception of the enemy, who, on the night of the 26th of April, landed at Point au Tremble. General Murray was not willing, by ſhutting up his troops at once within the walls, to riſque his whole ſtake on the ſingle chance of defending a wretched fortification; he therefore determined to hazard an engagement. In conſequence of this reſolution he attacked the enemy; but his ſucceſs was not equal to his courage; for after an obſtinate diſpute, which laſted about an hour and three quarters, he was obliged to abandon the field, with the loſs of about 1000 men killed and wounded, and the greater part of his artillery. The enemy, however, loſt twice that number of men, without gaining any eſſential advantage from their victory. On the very evening of the battle, the French opened the trenches before the town, which general Murray, having made the neceſſary preparations, reſolved to defend to the laſt extremity.

Lord Colvil, who, with a ſtrong ſquadron of ſhips, had wintered at Halifax, ſailed from thence on the 22d of April; but was retarded in his paſſage by thick fogs, contrary winds, and great ſhoals of ice floating down the river. Commodore Swanton, who ſailed from England with a ſmall reinforcement, arrived, about the beginning of May, at the Iſle of Bec in the river St. Lawrence, with two ſhips, where he propoſed to wait for the reſt of his ſquadron, which had ſeparated from him in his paſſage. One of theſe had, on the 9th of May, ſafely entered the harbour of Quebec, and communicated the agreeable intelligence of a ſquadron being arrived in the river. As ſoon as commodore Swanton received advice that Quebec was beſieged, he ſailed up the river, and on the 15th in the evening anchored above Point Levi, when general Murray ſent him word, that he was very deſirous the French ſquadron above the town ſhould be removed. Accordingly captain Schomberg of the Diana, and captain Deane of the Loweſtoffe, were ordered to ſlip their cables early the next morning, and attack the enemy's fleet, conſiſting of two frigates, two armed ſhips, and a great number of ſmaller veſſels. They were no ſooner in motion than the French ſhips fled in the utmoſt diſorder. One of their frigates was driven on the rocks above Cape Diamond, the other ran aſhore, and was burnt at Point au Tremble, about ten leagues above the town; and all the other veſſels were taken or deſtroyed. The enemy were ſo diſpirited by this misfortune, and the intelligence that a ſtrong fleet was already arrived in the river St. Lawrence, that in the following night they raiſed the ſiege of Quebec, and retreated with great precipitation, leaving their proviſions, implements and artillery behind them. They retired to Jaques Quartier, where their ammunition beginning to fail, they gave over all thoughts of ſucceeding againſt Quebec, and began to prepare for the preſervation of Montreal, againſt which the force under Mr. Amherſt was deſigned. That general had paſſed the winter at New York, and was at this time employed in taking meaſures for the execution of a plan he had projected, for completing the conqueſt of Canada. He ſent inſtructions to general Murray, directing him to advance by water towards Montreal, with all the troops that could be ſpared from the garriſon of Quebec. He then detached colonel Haviland, with a body of troops from Crown Point, to take poſſeſſion of the iſle au Noix, in Lake Champlain, and from thence penetrate the ſhorteſt way to the bank of the river St. Lawrence; while he himſelf, with the main body of the army, amounting to above 10,000 men, including Indians, ſhould proceed from the frontiers of New York, by the rivers of the Mohawks and Oneidas, to the lake Ontario, and ſail down the river St. Lawrence to the iſland of Montreal.

In purſuance of this plan, general Amherſt had provided two armed ſloops to cruize on the lake Ontario, commanded by captain Loring; as well as a great number of batteaus, or ſmaller veſſels, for the tranſportation of the troops, artillery, ammunition, implements, and baggage. Several regiments were ordered to advance from Albany to Oſwego; and the general taking his departure from Schenectady, with the reſt of the troops, in the latter end of June, arrived at the ſame place on the ninth of July; when having received advice that two French veſſels had appeared off Oſwego, he diſpatched ſome batteaus to Niagara with intelligence to captain Loring, who immediately ſet ſail in queſt of them; but they eſcaped his purſuit. The army being aſſembled, and reinforced by a conſiderable body of Indians, under the command of Sir William Johnſon, the general detached colonel Haldimand with the light infantry, the grenadiers, and one battalion of Highlanders, to take poſt at the bottom of the lake, and aſſiſt the armed veſſels in finding a paſſage to La Galette. On the tenth of Auguſt the army embarked on board the batteaus and whale boats, and proceeded on the lake towards the mouth of the river St. Lawrence. Hearing that one of the enemy's veſſels had run a-ground, and was diſabled, and that the other lay off La Galette, the general determined to make the beſt of his way down the river to Swegatchie, and attack the French fort at Iſle Royale, one of the moſt important places on the river St. Lawrence. In their way they fell in with a French ſloop, commanded by M. de la Broquerie, who, after a warm engagement, ſurrendered. Mr. Amherſt having detached ſome engineers to reconnoitre the coaſts and iſlands in the neighbourhood of Iſle Royale, he made a diſpoſition for attacking that fortreſs. Batteries being raiſed on the neareſt iſlands, the fort was cannonaded, and a diſpoſition made for giving the aſſault, when Mr. Pouchant, the governor, thought proper to beat a parley, and ſurrender on capitulation: upon which the general took poſſeſſion of the fort, and having repaired the fortifications, left a garriſon in it.

The navigation down the river St. Lawrence, from this place, is rendered extremely difficult and dangerous, by a great number of violent riffs, or rapides, and falls; among which the general loſt above fourſcore men, forty-ſix batteaus, ſeventeen whale-boats, one row-galley, with ſome artillery, ſtores, and ammunition. On the ſixth of September the troops were landed on the iſland of Montreal, without any other oppoſition than what they met with from ſome flying parties, who, having exchanged a few ſhot, fled with the utmoſt precipitation. After a march of two leagues, the general drew up his army on a plain before Montreal. He then ordered ſome pieces of artillery to be brought up immediately from the landing place, and determined to undertake the ſiege in form; but the next morning the marquis de Vandreuil demanded a capitulation, which, after ſome letters had paſſed between the two generals, was granted upon as favourable terms as the French had reaſon to expect, conſidering that general Murray, with the troops from Quebec, had, by this time, landed on the iſland; and colonel Haviland, with the body under his command, had likewiſe juſt arrived. General Amherſt now took poſſeſſion of Montreal, the acquiſition of which finiſhed the conqueſt of all Canada; and nothing now remained to be done in North America, but the demolition of the fortifications of Louiſburg on the iſland of Cape Breton; for which purpoſe ſome able engineers had been diſpatched from England. By means of mines artfully diſpoſed and well conſtructed, the fortifications were reduced to a heap of rubbiſh, the glacis was levelled, and the ditches were filled. All the artillery, ammunition, and implements of war, were tranſported to Halifax; but the barracks were repaired ſo as to accommodate 300 men occaſionally; and the hoſpital, with the private houſes, were left ſtanding.

The Britiſh arms were no leſs ſucceſsful in the Eaſt Indies than in America. After the reduction of Arcot, the garriſons of Permacoil and Allumparva ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war, in the beginning of May. The important ſettlement of Carical was reduced by the ſea and land forces commanded by rear-admiral Corniſh and major Monſon, and the French garriſons made priſoners of war. Colonel Coote, having defeated the French general Lally in the field, and ſubdued ſeveral of the enemy's ſettlements on the coaſt of Coromandel, at length ſhut them up within the walls of Pondicherry, which was well fortified, and defended by a numerous garriſon. Five ſhips of the line, commanded by captain Haldane, blocked it up by ſea, while colonel Coote carried on the ſiege by land; which was delayed for ſome time by the exceſſive rains; but on the eighth of December four batteries, which colonel Coote had erected, were all opened at midnight, and, though placed at a conſiderable diſtance, they did great execution. The garriſon defended the town with aſtoniſhing reſolution till about the middle of January, when all the inhabitants being in danger of periſhing by hunger, the principal of the Jeſuits, accompanied by two civilians, came out, and offered terms of capitulation; which conduct the governor was far from approving of; for he ſent out at the ſame time a paper full of invectives againſt the Engliſh, for the breach of treaties relative to India: adding, that theſe breaches rendered him incapable of propoſing any conditions. It may therefore be ſaid, that he rather ſuffered the Engliſh forces to take poſſeſſion of the place, than, that he ſurrendered it; as he refuſed to capitulate, the propoſals of the inhabitants were little regarded; and the city of Pondicherry, with a garriſon of about 1400 European ſoldiers, a vaſt quantity of military ſtores, and great riches, were given up at diſcretion to the conqueror. Soon after the acquiſition of Pondicherry, a little French ſettlement on the coaſt of Malabar, called Mahie, was reduced, by which means Great Britain commanded the whole trade of the vaſt peninſula of India, from the Ganges to the Indies, the moſt extenſive and profitable ſphere of commerce in the univerſe.

The war in Germany this year was carried on with equal ſpirit on both ſides, and each vied with the other in their endeavours to augment their forces. The enemy's corps, under M. Broglio, conſiſted of near 100,000 effective men; beſides 30,000 drawn out of their quarters in Duſſeldorp, Cleves, Cologn, and Weſel, which, being completed by draughts from France, formed a ſeparate army on the Rhine, under the count de St. Germain. At the opening of this campaign, we had in Germany twelve regiments of heavy, and one of light horſe; and twelve regiments with two Highland battalions of foot; the whole amounting to about 22,000 men, but in the courſe of the ſummer they were further reinforced to near 25,000. The allied army fell very ſhort of the French army in numbers; but they exceeded it in quality of the troops; thoſe newly arrived from England were freſh, but not undiſciplined; and the old, though haraſſed, were accuſtomed to victory.

It was very late before the campaign was opened; for the allied army did not march from their cantonments till the fifth of May, when they proceeded by the way of Paderborn to Fritzlar, where, on the 20th, they encamped: part of the troops having been left in the biſhopric of Munſter, under general Sporcken, with orders to form a camp at Dulmen, to make head againſt the French corps commanded by the count de St. Germain. General Imhoff was ſent with a detachment to Kirchayn on the Orme; and general Gilſoe, with another corps, advanced to the neighbourhood of Hirchfield on the Fulda. By the 24th of June prince Ferdinand quitting his camp at Fritzlar, advanced to Frillendorf, and took poſt on the hills between Ziegenheim and Freyſa, general Imhoff commanding at a ſmall diſtance on the right, while the hereditary prince was ſtationed on the left of the army. In the mean time, the duke de Broglio aſſembling his forces between Merlan and Laubach, advanced to Neuſtadt, where on the 28th he encamped, and at the ſame time occupied a ſtrong poſt at Waſſemburg. His ſcheme was to penetrate through the country of Heſſe into Hanover, and make himſelf entirely maſter of that electorate. With this view he reſolved to effect a junction with the count de St. Germain, whom he ordered to advance towards Brilau and Corbach; while he himſelf decamping from Neuſtadt, on the 8th of July, advanced by the way of Frankenberg. Prince Ferdinand having received advice that the count de St. Germain was in motion, began his march from Ziegenheim, and on the 9th of July reached the heights of Brunau, in the neighbourhood of Wildurgen, while the hereditary prince, at the head of the advanced corps, reinforced with ſome battalions and ſquadrons under major-general Griffin, was ſent forwards to Saxenhauſen, whither the army followed the next morning. The hereditary prince continuing to advance, found the enemy already formed at Corbach; but ſuppoſing their whole force did not exceed 10,000 infantry and 17 ſquadrons, he reſolved to give them battle. Accordingly he attacked them, and the action became very warm and obſtinate: but the ſuperiority of the enemy rendered all the efforts of the prince ineffectual, and prince Ferdinand was at too great a diſtance to aſſiſt him. He, therefore, made the proper diſpoſitions for a retreat, which proved a very difficult taſk, for ſome bodies of the German troops, both horſe and foot, fell into great confuſion, which the enemy perceiving, puſhed forward upon them with irreſiſtable fury, and in all probability the whole infantry of the allies would have been cut off, had not the hereditary prince put himſelf at the head of Bland's and Howard's regiments of dragoons, and charged the enemy with ſuch impetuoſity as ſoon ſtopped their career, and enabled the allies to make an undiſturbed retreat. In this engagement the hereditary prince was wounded; and about 500 men were killed beſides the loſs of fifteen pieces of cannon.

Prince Ferdinand having received intelligence that a body of the enemy, commanded by major-general Glaubitz, had advanced on the left of the allies to Ziegenheim, detached the hereditary prince, at the head of ſix battalions of Hanoverians and Heſſians, with Elliot's regiment of light horſe, Luckner's huſſars, and two brigades of Chaſſeurs, to oppoſe them. On the 16th of July he attacked the enemy near the village of Exdorff, and, after a warm diſpute, victory declared for the allies. Five battalions of the enemy, including the commander in chief, and the prince of Anhalt Cothen, were taken, with ſix pieces of cannon, and all their arms, baggage and artillery. All this time the duke de Broglio remained encamped on the heights of Corbach, during which ſome detachments, he had ſent for that purpoſe, reduced the caſtles of Marpurg and Dillemburg, the garriſons of both theſe places being obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war.

The allied army now advanced to the village of Halle, near Caſſel, where they remained till the 30th of July, when the troops were again put in motion, and both armies having paſſed the Dymel, prince Ferdinand reſolved to give the French corps under M. de Muy battle. The proper diſpoſitions were accordingly made, and, almoſt at the ſame inſtant, the enemy were attacked both in flank and in rear, with equal ſucceſs, and unable to withſtand the fury of the Britiſh cavalry they betook themſelves to flight, leaving about 1500 men killed or wounded in the field of battle, with ten pieces of cannon; and the ſame number were taken priſoners. On the evening of the battle, the marquis of Granby, with twelve battalions, and ten ſquadrons, received orders to paſs the river in purſuit of the enemy, but they had retired to Wolfſhagen, and the marquis encamped at Wilda, about four miles from Warbourgh, the heights of which were occupied by the grand army of the enemy.

In conſequence of this victory prince Ferdinand was enabled to maintain his communication with Weſtphalia, and prevent the enemy from approaching Hanover; but at the ſame time he was obliged to ſacrifice the country of Caſſel; for prince Xavier of Saxony, at the head of a detached body, advanced towards that city, which he made himſelf maſter of; he then reduced Munden, Gottingen, and Elmbeck, in the electorate of Hanover, and it was not long before the garriſon of Ziegenheim, conſiſting of 700 men, were obliged, after a vigorous reſiſtance, to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war.

In the mean time prince Ferdinand employed himſelf in ſecuring poſts and paſſes, in order to retard the progreſs of the enemy, and in ſending detachments to haraſs and ſurprize their advanced parties, which ſervice was performed with the greateſt ſucceſs. On the fifth of Auguſt the prince received intelligence, that a conſiderable body of the French, amounting to upwards of 20,000 men, were preparing to make a general forage in the neighbourhood of Geiſmar; upon which he reſolved to defeat their intention. For this purpoſe he paſſed the Dymel early in the morning, with a body of troops and ſome artillery, and ſoon forced the enemy to abandon their purpoſe. The hereditary prince had, that ſame morning, ſet out to beat up the quarters of a French detachment cantoned at Zierenberg, and who, he had been informed, paſſed their time in the utmoſt ſecurity. In his way he was joined by the light troops under major Bulow, and when they had arrived within two miles of the town, the forces divided into three bodies, which took three different routs, by which the place was entirely ſurrounded. Notwithſtanding the precaution with which they had advanced, a guard of the enemy's dragoons took the alarm, and began to fire, which the Britiſh forces, who had received orders to proceed as quietly as poſſible, did not return, but puſhing on with their bayonets, drove the French piquets, killed the guard at the gate, and entered the town along with the fugitives, without the leaſt hurry or noiſe. They then advanced through the two ſtreets that lead to the church-yard, which being the only open part of the town ſerved the French as a place of arms; here they formed by the ſide of the enemy, who, the night being very dark, took them for their own piquets: but they were ſoon undeceived, for the Engliſh grenadiers making uſe of their bayonets, ſoon obliged the French to give way, and two regiments of their dragoons endeavoured to reach their camp, but they found it occupied by 400 grenadiers, who drove them back with their bayonets. They then made an attempt at another gate, but were repulſed with a ſharp fire of ſmall arms, and, finding no other way left for eſcape, they ſeparated, and got out of the town through ſeveral breaches of the wall. Thus, in about an hour the prince was maſter of the place, but the vicinity of the French camp and the approach of day, prevented his ſtaying long enough in the town to reap the full fruits of his victory. About three in the morning he began his retreat, carrying off two pieces of canon, 36 officers, and about 500 private men. In this hazardous expedition the allies loſt only ten men.

Prince Ferdinand now perceived that whilſt the enemy's communication with the Rhine, and with Frankfort on the Maine, continued open, it would be to very little purpoſe to attempt any thing either for the relief of Gottingen or Caſſel. He had, indeed, checked their progreſs into Hanover, but while they continued in ſo advanced a poſition it was evidently impoſſible to prevent their making very ruinous inroads into that country. He did not think it prudent to force them to a battle; ſo that the only reſource left was to make frequent and ſtrong detachments into the ſouthern parts of Heſſe and Wetteravia, and thus render the enemy's communication with the Rhine and Maine, from whence they drew the greateſt part of their ſupplies of all kinds, precarious. Accordingly he detached major Bulow, at the head of a ſtrong corps, towards Marpurg, which place he ſurprized, deſtroyed the French ovens, and brought off a conſiderable quantity of ſtores and baggage, with ſome priſoners. The ſame ſucceſs attended him at Butzbach, where he ſurprized and took two companies belonging to the regiment of Raugrave; after which he retired to Frankenberg, where he joined colonel Forſen. On the 12th of September they made a movement towards Frankenau; when M. de Stainville, who was poſted with a body of Frenck troops at Merdenhagen, advanced to check their progreſs. He overtook their rear in the neighbourhood of Munden, and attacked them with great vigour. Colonel Forſen with ſome of his cavalry was taken, and major Bulow obliged to abandon ſome pieces of cannon.

In the month of September the hereditary prince quitted the grand army of the allies, and with twenty battalions and ten ſquadrons, having traverſed Weſtphalia, he appeared on the Lower Rhine, marching by Schermbech and Duſſeldorp. On the 29th he ſent a large detachment over the river at Rocroot, which ſurprized part of the partizan Fiſcher's corps at Rhynberg, and ſcoured the country. Some other parties croſſing at Rees and Emerick, the next day took poſſeſſion of ſome redoubts which the French had raiſed along the banks of the river; and here they found a ſufficient number of boats to tranſport the reſt of the forces. The prince then advanced to Cleves, the garriſon of which he obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. He next inveſted Weſel, but here he met with a warmer reception than he expected; beſides which his operations were retarded by heavy rains, which, ſwelling the river, endangered two bridges that he had thrown over, one above the other below Weſel, to preſerve a communication with the other ſide; and the difficulties and delays occaſioned by this circumſtance entirely diſappointed his ſcheme. In the mean time the French, being informed of his motions detached M. de Caſtres after him, with thirty battalions and thirty-eight ſquadrons, and on the 14th of October they arrived at Rhynberg where the prince's light troops were poſted. Theſe they immediately attacked and compelled them to retreat, notwithſtanding all the efforts of the prince, who commanded in perſon. Leaving five battalions at Rhynberg, the enemy proceeded by the left, and encamped behind the convent of Campen, where de Caſtres intended to wait for ſome reinforcements, then on their march. But the hereditary prince reſolved to attack his camp that very night, and having left four battalions and five ſquadrons under general Bock, with orders to obſerve Rhynberg, and attack that poſt in caſe his attempt ſhould prove ſucceſsful, he began his march at ten in the evening. Before the allied forces could reach the enemy's camp, they were under the neceſſity of over-powering Fiſcher's corps of irregulars. This ſervice occaſioned ſome firing, the noiſe of which alarmed the French army: upon which their commander formed them with amazing expedition, and poſted them in a wood, where they were inſtantly attacked, and at firſt obliged to give ground; but they ſoon recovered their ranks, and ſuſtained an unceaſing fire of muſquetry, from five in the morning till nine at night, when the hereditary prince thought proper to retreat. His loſs on this occaſion amounted to 1600 choice men, killed, wounded and taken priſoners; and the chief of theſe were the troops of Great Britain. Several Engliſh officers were dangerouſly wounded, and the wounds of lord Downe, an amiable young nobleman, proved mortal. By this time, the Rhine was ſo exceedingly ſwelled by the rains, and the banks of it were overflowed in ſuch a manner, that it was judged neceſſary to repair and move the bridges which had been thrown over the river lower down. This work was accordingly performed in the preſence of the enemy, and the prince paſſing over without moleſtation, proceeded to Brynan, where he fixed his head quarters. Here he received advice that a body of the enemy intended to ſurprize him, upon which he called in his advanced poſts, and made preparations for giving them a warm reception. He abandoned the tents that were in front of his camp, and poſted his infantry in ambuſcade behind thoſe that were in the rear; at the ſame time he ordered ſome regiments of horſe and huſſars to take a compaſs, and fall upon the back of the enemy. The deſired ſucceſs attended this ſtratagem; for the French detachment thinking the allies had actually abandoned their camp, broke all order, and began to pillage the tents. The infantry then ſallied from their places of concealment, and fell upon them with irreſiſtible fury; the artillery opened, and the cavalry charged them in flank; and of 1200 of the enemy, who marched from Weſel, ſcarce 200 eſcaped. The ſeaſon being now too far advanced, Prince Ferdinand did not think proper to make any farther attacks on the enemy, and therefore withdrew his army into winter quarters.

While the arms of Great Britain were ſucceſsful in every part of the world where they were engaged, an event happened, which for a time obſcured the ſplendor of her triumphs, and damped the joy which theſe occaſioned. The venerable George II. who had been bleſſed with a longer life than any king of England ſince the Norman conqueſt, was, on the morning of the 25th of October, ſeized with a fit in his palace at Kenſington, and expired without either pangs or convulſions. His majeſty had got up at his uſual hour, and having drank a diſh of chocolate, he enquired of the page concerning the weather, being anxious for the arrival of the foreign mails. He then ſignified his intention of walking in the garden; but had ſcarce uttered the words when he fell down, and before his daughter, the princeſs Amelia, could come to aſſiſt him, according to his deſire, he died in the arms of his ſervants. Such was the unexpected, though not premature death of George the Second, king of Great Britain, in the 77th year of his age, and 34th of his reign!

King George II. was in perſon rather lower than the middle ſize, well ſhaped, erect, with eyes remarkably prominent, a high noſe, and fair complexion. In his natural temper as a man, he was apt to be paſſionate and haſty; but in his public conduct no prince acted with more deliberation and coolneſs. In all his intentions he appears to have been ſincere; for when he entered into any public treaty, nothing could induce him to recede from his engagements. The ſervants in his houſhold, particularly thoſe who were more immediately about his perſon, were ſeldom changed, they lived to have grey hairs like their royal maſter. From this circumſtance we may infer, that whatever he was in his private character as a man of a paſſionate diſpoſition, yet notwithſtanding he muſt have been a good maſter. That he was a tender and an indulgent parent, is evident from the whole of his behaviour to his children; and to his royal conſort, who, indeed, was an ornament to her ſex. In public, with reſpect to party diſputes, the king was, during the firſt years of his reign, ſtrongly attached to a miniſter, whoſe converſation he delighted in, and whoſe abilities he eſteemed; but when he found it neceſſary, in order to ſilence the public clamour, to diſmiſs him from his ſervice, he never afterwards gave himſelf much concern who were to be his miniſters. He was perfectly well acquainted with the intereſts of the ſeveral courts of Europe, and never took up arms till in a manner he was forced to it. By his conduct, the dominions of the houſe of Auſtria were prevented from being diſmembered, and many millions were expended for that purpoſe; his majeſty well knowing that the ſafety of Europe, and the intereſt of the proteſtant religion depended on preventing the French coming into Germany. But notwithſtanding his zeal in favour of the Auſtrian family, yet he remained no longer their friend than they were the friends of the empire; from which we may conclude that he had a good heart, and a clear as well as a ſolid underſtanding.

At the time of his death all party diſtinctions were buried in oblivion; and thoſe unfortunate young gentlemen, whoſe fathers had been concerned in the rebellion, were provided for either in the army or the navy. Such as were diſaffected to the government blamed his majeſty for a partial attachment to his German dominions, without conſidering that he never neglected to attend to the affairs of Britain. Born and educated in Hanover, it was natural for him to love that country. He lived in it till he was in the thirty-ſecond year of his age, ſo that he never attained a perfect knowledge of the Engliſh language; a circumſtance that has been much dwelt on by ſome late authors, who from thence infer, that he was not a friend to learning. Nothing, however, can be more falſe; for it is well known that he eſtabliſhed the famous univerſity of Gottingen, on the moſt extenſive plan, and filled the chairs with profeſſors of ſuch abilities, that he lived to ſee it the moſt ſhining ſeminary in Europe. He ordered all the books that had been collected by the kings of England ſince the time of Henry VII. to be depoſited in the Britiſh Muſeum; and there he ordered to be depoſited all the manuſcript letters written by any of our ſovereigns, from the death of Edward III. to the death of queen Anne. Queen's College in Oxford was in a manner almoſt rebuilt at his expence, and many new profeſſorſhips were added both to the Engliſh and Scotch univerſities. Let hiſtory be ranſacked from the moſt early ages, few princes will be found like George II. who could unite, in his own perſon, two virtues totally oppoſite, namely, that of being able to conduct the affairs of two different governments. In Hanover, though poſſeſſed of abſolute unlimited power, yet he exerted that power in making his ſubjects happy, and was conſidered by them as an indulgent parent. In Britain, where his conduct was circumſcribed by law, he acted like a wiſe magiſtrate, and never undertook any thing of importance, till he had firſt conſulted his parliament, by whoſe advice he was conſtantly directed. On the whole, if he was not ſo brilliant in what was commonly called wit, yet he had the moſt ſolid judgment, which, perhaps, is a thouſand times ſuperior. He grew up, as it were, to an advanced age in the love of his ſubjects both at home and abroad; every year made him more beloved than the laſt; and when he paid the debt of nature, one tear was ſhed for him; or, in other words, the whole nation mourned at once.

George II. had, by his queen Caroline, two ſons and five daughters, who attained the age of maturity, viz. Frederic prince of Wales, father to his preſent majeſty George III. William, late duke of Cumberland; Anne, the princeſs-royal, married to the late prince of Orange; Mary, landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel; Louiſa, late queen of Denmark; and Amelia and Caroline, who were never married.

Before we relate the remarkable occurrences that happened during the courſe of this monarch's reign, we ſhall take notice of two things which particularly engaged the attention of the public a ſhort time before his death.

The firſt of theſe was the caſe of lord George Sackville, who had reſigned his command in Germany, and returned to England, where his character was repreſented in the moſt odious and deteſtable colours. With the firſt news of the battle of Minden arrived the defamation of this officer, who was accuſed of having diſobeyed orders, and of having been guilty of the moſt ſhameful cowardice. On his arrival rival in London he was made acquainted with the particulars of this imputed guilt, which he had before indiſtinctly learned. He was accuſed of having diſobeyed three ſucceſſive orders he had received from prince Ferdinand, during the action at Minden, to advance with the cavalry of the right wing, which he commanded, and ſuſtain the infantry that were engaged; and after the cavalry were put in motion, of having halted them unneceſſarily, and marched ſo ſlow, that they could not reach the place of action in time to be of any ſervice; by which conduct the opportunity was loſt of purſuing the enemy when they gave way, and rendering the victory more glorious and deciſive.

The firſt ſtep which lord George took towards the vindication of his own character, was in preſenting to the public the following addreſs: "The various reports, ſaid he, that have been propagated to my diſadvantage, and the many falſhoods which have been aſſerted to ruin my character, lay me under the neceſſity of remaining not entirely ſilent, though I am debarred at preſent from ſtating my caſe to the public as I ſhould have done, had I not aſſurances of obtaining a court-martial for my trial; the only legal and effectual method of convincing the world how little foundation there has been for the torrent of calumny and abuſe which has been ſo maliciouſly thrown out againſt me.

"I had rather, upon this occaſion, ſubmit myſelf to all the inconveniences that may ariſe from the want of ſtile, than borrow aſſiſtance from the pens of others, as I can have no hopes of eſtabliſhing my character, but from the force of truth. I ſhall, therefore, as plainly and diſtinctly as poſſible, relate a few circumſtances, which will, at leaſt, ſhew that no body could be more deſirous than I am to bring truth to light, and ſubject my conduct to the ſtricteſt ſcrutiny.

"The inſtant I found, by the implied cenſure given out in orders the ſecond of Auguſt, that my conduct had appeared in an unfavourable light to prince Ferdinand, on the day of action, I endeavoured to inform myſelf what particular I had either failed in or neglected my duty; I heard in general of diſobedience of orders; but I could fix no certain period of time to my ſuppoſed crime, till colonel Fitzroy acquainted me with what had paſſed between his ſerene highneſs and him upon my ſubject, in regard to the orders delivered to me by him (colonel Fitzroy) that day. Whenever my trial comes I ſhall endeavour to clear up that point to the ſatisfaction of the public: my own aſſertions may have little weight, but the oaths of witneſſes, whoſe veracity cannot be called in queſtion, will, I truſt, prove my innocence beyond the poſſibility of doubt.

"Under theſe circumſtances, I immediately applied for his majeſty's permiſſion to return England, that I might anſwer any accuſation that ſhould be brought againſt me; for, as commander in chief of the Britiſh forces in Germany, no perſon there could order a court-martial for my trial, had there been an accuſation laid; the power of ſummoning courts-martial, and approving their ſentences, was veſted in me by my commiſſion, and no Britiſh officer or ſoldier could be tried by any other authority.

"As ſoon as I arrived in London, I inſtantly wrote the following letter to the ſecretary of ſtate.

"My lord,

"I have the honour of acquainting your lordſhip with my arrival in England, in purſuance of his majeſty's permiſſion, ſent to me, at my requeſt, by your lordſhip.

"I thought myſelf much injured abroad, by an implied cenſure upon my conduct; I find I am ſtill more unfortunate at home, by being publickly repreſented as having neglected my duty in the ſtrongeſt manner, by diſobeying the poſitive orders of his highneſs prince Ferdinand: as I am conſcious of neither neglect nor diſobedience of orders; as I am certain I did my duty to the utmoſt of my abilities; and as I am perſuaded that the prince himſelf would have found that he had no juſt cauſe of complaint againſt me, had he condeſcended to have enquired into my conduct, before he had expreſſed his diſapprobation of it, from the partial repreſentation of others; I therefore moſt humbly requeſt, that I may at laſt have a public opportunity given me of attempting to juſtify myſelf, to his majeſty, and to my country, by a court-martial being appointed; that, if I am guilty, I may ſuffer ſuch puniſhment as I may have deſerved; and, if inncocent, that I may ſtand acquitted in the opinion of the world: but it is really too ſevere to have been cenſured unheard; to have been condemned before I was tried; and to be informed neither of my crime, nor of my accuſers.

I am, my lord, &c. &c.

GEORGE SACKVILLE."

"I received an anſwer to this letter on Monday the tenth, in which I was aſſured that a court-martial, upon my application, would be granted, as ſoon as the officers capable of giving evidence could leave their poſts; but previouſly to the receipt of that letter I was diſmiſſed from all my military employments; notwithſtanding which diſmiſſion, I ſtill hope, and am informed, that I may have the advantage of a legal trial.

"In the mean time, the only indulgence I have to aſk is, that the public will ſuſpend its judgment till ſuch facts can be produced, from which alone the truth can appear; but if plans of a battle are to be referred to, which can give no juſt idea of it: if diſpoſitions of the cavalry and infantry are ſuppoſed, which never exiſted; if orders for attacks and purſuits are quoted, which never were delivered; and if diſobedience to thoſe imaginary orders are aſſerted as a crime, what can an injured officer, under ſuch circumſtances, have recourſe to, but claiming that juſtice, which is due to every Engliſhman, of being heard before he is condemned: the ſooner that happens, the happier I ſhall be; as I am conſcious my innocence muſt appear, when real facts are truly ſtated and fully proved.

GEORGE SACKVILLE."

This addreſs was not able to ſtem the torrent of popular prejudice, which flowed againſt him with irreſiſtible impetuoſity. He might, therefore, have retired in quiet and ſafety, and left it to ebb at leiſure. But, ſeemingly impatient of the imputation under which his character laboured, he inſiſted upon the privilege of a legal trial, which was granted accordingly, after the judges had given it as their opinion that he might be tried by a court-martial, though he no longer retained any commiſſion in the ſervice. A court of general officers being appointed and aſſembled to enquire into his conduct, the judge-advocate informed the court, that lord George was charged with having diſobeyed the orders of prince Ferdinand, relative to the battle of Minden.

In order to give the reader a more diſtinct view of the charge, it is neceſſary to remind him that lord George Sackville commanded the cavalry of the right wing, conſiſting of Hanoverian and Britiſh horſe, diſpoſed in two lines, the Britiſh being at the extremity on the right, extending to the village of Hartum; the Hanoverian cavalry forming the left, that reached almoſt to an open wood or grove, which divided the horſe from the line of infantry, particularly from that part of the line of infantry conſiſting of two brigades of Britiſh foot, the Hanoverian guards, and Hardenberg's regiment. This was the body of troops which ſuſtained the brunt of the battle with the moſt incredible courage and perſeverance. They, of their own accord, advanced to attack the left of the enemy's cavalry, through a moſt dreadful fire of artillery and ſmall arms, to which they were expoſed in front and flank; they withſtood the repeated attacks of the whole French gendarmerie, whom, at length, they totally routed, together with a body of Saxon troops on their left; and to their valour the victory was chiefly owing. The ground from whence theſe troops advanced was a kind of heath or plain, which opened a conſiderable way to the left, where the reſt of the army was formed in order of battle; but on the right it was bounded by the wood, on the other ſide of which the cavalry of the right wing was poſted, having in front the village of Halen, from whence the French had been driven by the piquets in the army there poſted, and in front of them a windmill, ſituated in the middle ſpace between them and a battery placed on the left of the enemy.

Early in the morning captain Malhorti had, by order of prince Ferdinand, poſted the cavalry of the right wing in the ſituation we have juſt deſcribed, the village of Hartum with incloſures on the right, a narrow wood on the left, the village of Halen in their front, and a windmill in the middle of an open plain, which led directly to the enemy. In this poſition lord George Sackville was directed to remain until he ſhould receive further orders; and here it was thoſe orders were given which he was accuſed of diſobeying. Indeed, he was previouſly charged with having neglected the orders of the preceding evening, which imported, that the horſes ſhould be ſaddled at one in the morning, though the tents were not to be ſtruck, nor the troops under arms, until they ſhould receive further orders. He was accuſed of having diſobeyed theſe orders, and of having come late into the field, after the cavalry was formed.

Captain Winchingrode, aid-du-camp to prince Ferdinand, declared upon oath, that while the infantry of the right wing were advancing towards the enemy for the ſecond time, he was ſent with orders to lord George Sackville to advance with the cavalry of the right wing, and ſuſtain the infantry, which was going to engage, by forming the horſe under his command, upon the heath, in a third line behind the regiments: that he delivered theſe orders to lord George Sackville, giving him to underſtand, that he ſhould march the cavalry through the wood or trees on his left, to the heath where they were to be formed: that, on his return to the heath, he met colonel Fitzroy at full gallop towards lord George; and that he (Winchingrode) followed him back in order to haſten the march of the cavalry.

Colonel Ligonier, another of the prince's aids-du-camp, depoſed, that he carried orders from the general to lord George to advance with the cavalry, in order to take advantage of the diſorder which appeared in the enemy's cavalry: that lord George made no anſwer to theſe orders, but turning to the troops, commanded them to draw their ſwords and march: that the colonel ſeeing them advance a few paces on the right forwards, told his lordſhip that he ſhould march to the left: that, in the mean time, colonel Fitzroy arriving with orders for the Britiſh cavalry only to advance, lord George ſaid the orders were contradictory, and colonel Ligonier replied they differed only in numbers; but the deſtination of his march was the ſame, to the left.

Colonel Fitzroy, the third aid-du-camp to prince Ferdinand, gave evidence, that when he told lord George it was the prince's order for the Britiſh cavalry to advance towards the left, his lordſhip obſerved, that it was different from the order brought by colonel Ligonier, and he could not think the prince intended to break the line: that he aſked which way the cavalry was to march, and who was to be their guide: that when he (the aid-du-camp) offered to lead the column through the wood on the left, his lordſhip ſeemed ſtill diſſatisfied with the order, ſaying it did not agree with the order brought by colonel Ligonier, and deſired to be conducted in perſon to the prince, that he might have an explanation from his own mouth; a reſolution which was immediately executed. The next evidence, a colonel in the army, made oath, that, in his opinion, when the orders were delivered to lord George, his lordſhip was alarmed to a very great degree, and ſeemed to be in the utmoſt confuſion.

A nobleman, of high rank and unblemiſhed reputaion, declared, that captain Winchingrode having told him it was abſolutely neceſſary that the cavalry ſhould march and form a line to ſupport the foot, he had given orders to the ſecond line to march: that, as ſoon as they arrived at the place where the action began, he was met by colonel Fitzroy, with an order for the cavalry to advance as faſt as poſſible: that, in marching to this place, an order came to halt, until they could be joined by the firſt line of cavalry: that afterwards, in advancing, they were again halted by lord George Sackville: that, in his opinion, they might have marched with more expedition, and even come up in time enough to act againſt the enemy. Some other officers, who were examined on this ſubject, agreed with the marquis in theſe ſentiments.

Lord George in his defence ſaid, that he never received the orders iſſued on the eve of the battle, nor any ſort of intimation or plan of action, although he was certainly entitled to ſome ſuch communication as commander in chief of the Britiſh forces; that, nevertheleſs, the orders concerning the horſes were obeyed by thoſe who received them: that inſtead of loitering or loſing time while the troops were forming, he prepared to put himſelf at the head of the cavalry, on the firſt notice that they were in motion: that he was ſo eager to perform his duty, as to ſet out from his quarters without even waiting for an aid-du-camp to attend him, and was in the field before any general officer of his diviſion: that, when captain Winchingrode delivered the order to form the cavalry in one line, making a third, to advance and ſuſtain the infantry, he neither heard him ſay he was to march by the left, nor ſaw him point with his ſword to the wood through which he was to paſs: that neither of theſe directions were obſerved by the aids du camp or officers then preſent, except one gentleman, the perſon who bore witneſs to the confuſion in the looks and deportment of his lordſhip: that the neareſt and moſt practicable way of advancing againſt the enemy was by the way of the windmill, to the left of the village of Halen: that he imagined this was the only way by which he could be ordered to advance: that, in this perſuaſion, he had ſent an officer to reconnoitre the village of Halen, as an object of importance, as it would have been upon the flank of the cavalry in advancing forwards: that when he received the order from Winchingrode to form the line and advance, he ſtill imagined this was his route, and on this ſuppoſition immediately detached an aid du camp to remove a regiment of Saxe Gotha, which was in the front: that he ſent a ſecond to obſerve the place where the infantry were, and a third to reconnoitre the enemy: that, in a few minutes, colonel Ligonier coming up with an order from prince Ferdinand to advance the cavalry, his lordſhip immediately drew his ſword, and ordered them to march forward by the windmill: that, with regard to what the colonel ſaid, that, upon his delivering the order, he added “ by the left!” he heard no ſuch directions; nor did it reach the ears of any other perſon then preſent, except of that officer who witneſſed to the ſame direction given by Winchingrode: that immediately after the troops were put in motion, colonel Fitzroy arrived with an order from prince Ferdinand, importing, that the Britiſh cavalry only ſhould advance by the left: that he declared their orders were contradictory, and ſeemed the more puzzled, as he underſtood that both theſe gentlemen came off nearly at the ſame time from the prince, and were probably directed to communicate the ſame order: that it was, therefore, natural to ſuppoſe there was a miſtake, as there might be great danger in breaking the line, as the route by the wood appeared more difficult and tedious than that by the windmill, which led directly through open ground to the enemy; and as he could not think that if a body of horſe was immediately wanted, the general would ſend for the Britiſh, that were at the fartheſt extremity of the wing, rather than for the Hanoverian cavalry, who formed the left of the line, and conſequently were much nearer the ſcene of action: that he, in this uncertainty, reſolved to apply for an explanation to the prince in perſon, who he underſtood was at a ſmall diſtance: that, with this view, he ſet out with all poſſible expedition: that having entered the wood, and perceived that the country beyond it opened ſooner to the left than he imagined, and captain Smith, his aid du camp, adviſing that the Britiſh cavalry ſhould be put in motion, he ſent back that gentleman with orders for them to advance by the left with all poſſible diſpatch: that he rode up to the general, who received him without any marks of diſpleaſure, and ordered him to bring up the whole cavalry of the right wing in a line upon the heath; that as the marquis of Granby had already put the ſecond line in motion, according to a ſeparate order which he had received, and the head of his column was already in view coming out of the wood, he thought it neceſſary to halt the troops on the left until the right ſhould come into the line, and afterwards ſend them orders to march ſlower, that two regiments which had been thrown out of the line might have an opportunity to replace themſelves in their proper ſtations.

The court-martial having examined the evidence, and heard the defence, gave judgment in theſe words: “The court, upon due conſideration of the whole matter before them, is of opinion, that lord George Sackville is guilty of having diſobeyed the orders of prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic, whom he was by his commiſſion and inſtructions directed to obey as commander in chief, according to the rules of war; and it is the farther opinion of this court, that lord George Sackville is, and he is hereby adjudged, unfit to ſerve his majeſty in any military capacity whatſoever.” This ſentence was confirmed by the king, who moreover ſignified his pleaſure, that it ſhould be given out in public orders, not only in Britain, but in America, and every quarter of the globe where any Engliſh troops happened to be, that officers, being convinced that neither high birth nor great employments can ſhelter offences of ſuch a nature; and that ſeeing they are ſubject to cenſures, much worſe than death to a man who has any ſenſe of honour, they may avoid the fatal conſequences ariſing from diſobedience of orders. To complete the diſgrace of this unfortunate general, his majeſty in council called for the council-book, and ordered the name of lord George Sackville to be ſtruck out of the liſt of privy-counſellors.

This trial was ſucceeded by another of a very remarkable nature, and which no leſs attracted the attention of the public. Laurence Shirley, earl Ferrers, a nobleman of a violent ſpirit, who had committed many outrages, and, in the opinion of all who knew him, given manifold proofs of inſanity, at length perpetrated a murder which ſubjected him to the cognizance of the law. His deportment to his lady was ſo brutal, that application had been made to the houſe of peers, and a ſeparation effected by act of parliament. Truſtees were nominated; and one Mr. Johnſon, who had, during the beſt part of his life, been employed in the family, was now appointed receiver of the eſtates, at the earl's own requeſt. The conduct of this man in the courſe of his ſtewardſhip gave umbrage to lord Ferrers, whoſe diſpoſition was equally jealous and vindictive. He imagined all his own family had conſpired againſt his intereſt, and that Johnſon was one of their accomplices; that he had been inſtrumental in obtaining the act of parliament, which his lordſhip conſidered as a grievous hardſhip; that he had diſappointed him in regard to a certain contract about coal-mines: in a word, that there was a colluſion between Johnſon and the earl's adverſaries. Inflamed with theſe ſuppoſitions, he firſt expreſſed his reſentment by giving Johnſon notice to quit the farm which he poſſeſſed on the eſtate; but finding the truſtees had confirmed the leaſe, he determined to gratify his revenge by aſſaſſination, and laid his plan accordingly.

On Sunday the 13th of January he appointed this unhappy man to come to his houſe on the Friday following, in order to peruſe papers, or ſettle accompts; and Johnſon went thither without the leaſt ſuſpicion of what was prepared for his reception: for although he was no ſtranger to his lordſhip's dangerous diſpoſition, and knew he had ſome time before incurred his diſpleaſure, yet he imagined his reſentment had entirely ſubſided, as the earl had of late behaved to him with remarkable complacency. He therefore at the time appointed repaired to his lordſhip's houſe of Stanton in Leiceſterſhire, at the diſtance of a ſhort mile from his own habitation, and was admitted by a maid ſervant. The earl had diſmiſſed every perſon in the houſe, upon various pretences, except three women who were left in the kitchen. Johnſon advancing to the door of the apartment, was received by his lordſhip, who deſired him to walk into another room, where he joined him in a few minutes, and then the door was locked on the inſide. After a great deal of warm expoſtulation, the earl inſiſted upon his ſubſcribing a paper, confeſſing himſelf a villain; and on his refuſing to comply with this demand, declared he would put him to death. In vain the unfortunate man remonſtrated againſt this cruel reſolution, and deprecated the indignation of this furious nobleman. He remained deaf to all his intreaties, drew forth a piſtol which he had loaded for the purpoſe, and commanding him to implore heaven's mercy on his knees, ſhot him through the body while he remained in that ſupplicating poſture. The conſequence of this violence was not immediate death; but his lordſhip ſeeing the wretched victim ſtill alive and ſenſible, though agonized with pain, felt a momentary emotion of pity. He ordered his ſervants to convey Mr. Johnſon up ſtairs to a bed, to ſend for a ſurgeon, and give immediate notice of the accident to the wounded man's family. When Mr. Johnſon's daughter came to the houſe, ſhe was met by the earl, who told her he had ſhot her father on purpoſe, and with deliberation.

The ſame declaration he made to the ſurgeon at his arrival. He ſtood by him while he examined the wound, deſcribed the direction of the ball, and ſeemed ſurpriſed that it had not penetrated through the body. When he demanded the ſurgeon's opinion of the wound, the operator thought proper to temporize, for his own ſafety as well as for the ſake of the public, leſt the earl ſhould take ſome other deſperate ſtep, or endeavour to eſcape. He therefore amuſed him with hopes of Johnſon's recovery, about which he now ſeemed extremely anxious. He ſupported his ſpirits by immoderate drinking, after having retired to another apartment with the ſurgeon, whom he deſired to take all poſſible care of his patient. He declared, however, that he did not repent of what he had done; that Johnſon was a villain, who deſerved to die; that in caſe of his death he (the earl) would ſurrender himſelf to the houſe of peers, and take his trial. He ſaid he could juſtify the action to his own conſcience; and owned his intention was to have killed Johnſon outright; but as he ſtill ſurvived, and was in pain, he deſired that all poſſible means might be uſed for his recovery.

Nor did he ſeem altogether neglectful of his own ſafety: he endeavoured to tamper with the ſurgeon, and enquired what evidence he would give when called before a court of juſtice. He continued to drink himſelf into a ſtate of intoxication, and the cruelty of his hate ſeemed to return. He would not allow the wounded man to be removed to his own houſe, ſaying, he would keep him under his own roof that he might plague the villain. He returned to the chamber where Johnſon lay, inſulted him with the moſt opprobrious language, threatened to ſhoot him through the head, and could hardly be reſtrained from committing further acts of violence on the poor man, who was already in extremity. After he retired to bed, the ſurgeon procured a ſufficient number of armed men to ſeize the murderer, who at firſt threatened reſiſtance, but was ſoon apprehended, endeavouring to make his eſcape, and committed to the county priſon. From thence he was conveyed to London by the gaoler of Leiceſter, and conducted by the uſher of the black rod and his deputy into the houſe of lords, where the coroner's inqueſt, and the affidavits touching the murder being read, the gaoler delivered up his priſoner to the care of the black rod, and he was immediately committed to the Tower. He appeared very calm, compoſed, and unconcerned, from the time of his being apprehended; converſed cooly on the ſubject of his impriſonment; made very pertinent remarks upon the nature of the habeas corpus act of parliament, of which he hoped to avail himſelf; and when they withdrew from the houſe of peers, deſired he might not be viſited by any of his relations or acquaintances. His underſtanding, which was naturally good, had been well cultivated; his arguments were rational, but his conduct was frantic.

The circumſtances of this aſſaſſination appeared ſo cruel and deliberate, that the people cried aloud for juſtice; and the government gave up the offender to the laws of his country. The lord-keeper Henley was appointed lord high-ſteward for the trial of earl Ferrers, and ſat in ſtate with all the peers and judges in Weſtminſter-hall, which was for this purpoſe converted into a very auguſt tribunal. On the 16th day of April the delinquent was brought from the Tower in a coach, attended by the major of the Tower, the gentleman-gaoler, the wardors, and a detachment of the foot-guards. He was brought into court about ten; and the lord ſteward with the peers taking their places, he was arraigned aloud, in the midſt of an infinite multitude of people, including many foreigners, who ſeemed wonderfully ſtruck with the grandeur and magnificence of the ſcene. The murder was fully proved by unqueſtionable evidence: but the earl pleaded inſanity of mind; and, in order to make good this plea, called many witneſſes to atteſt his lunacy in a variety of inſtances, which ſeemed too plainly to indicate a diſordered imagination: unfounded jealouſy of plots and conſpiracies, unconnected ravings, fits of muſing, incoherent ejaculations, ſudden ſtarts of fury, denunciations of unprovoked revenge, frantic geſticulations, and a ſtrange caprice of temper, were proved to have diſtinguiſhed his conduct and deportment.

It appeared that lunacy had been a family taint, and affected ſeveral of his lordſhip's relations; that one of them in particular, a ſolicitor of reputation, had renounced his buſineſs, on the full perſuaſion of his being diſordered in his brain; that, long before this unhappy event, his neareſt relations had deliberated upon the expediency of taking out a commiſſion of lunacy againſt him, and were prevented by no other conſideration than the fear of being ſued for ſcandalum magnatum, ſhould the jury find his lordſhip compos mentis; a circumſtance which in all probability would have happened, inaſmuch as the earl's madneſs did not appear in his converſation, but in his conduct. A phyſician of eminence, whoſe practice was confined to perſons labouring under this infirmity, declared that the particulars of the earl's deportment, and perſonal behaviour, ſeemed to indicate lunacy. Indeed, all his neighbours and acquaintance had long conſidered him as a madman; and a certain noble lord is ſaid to have declared in the houſe of peers, when the bill of ſeparation was on the carpet, that he looked upon him in the light of a maniac; and that, if ſome effectual ſtep was not taken to deprive him of the power of doing miſchief, he did not doubt but that they would one day have occaſion to try him for murder.

The lawyers for the crown endeavoured to invalidate the proofs of his lunacy, by obſerving, that he was never ſo much deprived of his reaſon but that he could diſtinguiſh between good and evil: that the murder he had committed was the effect of revenge, for a conceived injury of ſome ſtanding: that the malice was deliberate, and the plan artfully conducted: that immediately after the deed was perpetrated, the earl's converſation and reaſoning was cool and conſiſtent, until he drank himſelf into a ſtate of intoxication: that, in the opinion of the greateſt lawyers, no criminal can avail himſelf of the plea of lunacy, provided the crime was committed during a lucid interval; but his lordſhip, far from exhibiting any marks of inſanity, had, in the courſe of his trial, diſplayed uncommon underſtanding and ſagacity in examining the witneſſes, and making many ſhrewd and pertinent obſervations on the evidence which was given.

Theſe ſentiments coincided with the opinion of the peers, who unanimouſly declared him guilty. The trial laſted two days; and on the third the lord-ſteward, after having made a ſhort ſpeech concerning the heinous nature of the offence, pronounced the ſame ſentence of death upon the earl which malefactors of the loweſt claſs undergo; namely, that from the Tower, in which he was impriſoned, he ſhould on the Monday following, be led to the common place of execution, there to be hanged by the neck, and his body be afterwards diſſected and anatomized. This laſt part of the ſentence ſeemed to ſhock the criminal extremely; he changed colour, his jaw quivered, and he appeared to be in great agitation; but during the remaining part of his life he behaved with ſurpriſing compoſure, and even unconcern. After he had received ſentence, the lords his judges, by a power veſted in them, reſpited his execution for one month, that he might have time to ſettle his temporal and ſpiritual concerns.

Before ſentence was paſſed, the earl read a paper, in which he begged pardon of their lordſhips for the trouble he had given, as well as for having, againſt his own inclination, pleaded lunacy at the requeſt of his friends. He thanked them for the candid trial with which he had been indulged, and intreated their lordſhips to recommend him to the king for mercy. He afterwards ſent a letter to his majeſty, remonſtrating, that he was the repreſentative of a very ancient and honourable family, which had been allied to the crown; and requeſting that, if he could not be favoured with the ſpecies of death which in caſes of treaſon diſtinguiſhes the nobleman from the plebeian, he might at leaſt, out of conſideration of his family, be allowed to ſuffer in the Tower, rather than at the common place of execution: but this indulgence was refuſed. From his return to the Tower, to the day of his execution, he betrayed no mark of apprehenſion or impatience; but regulated his affairs with preciſion, and converſed without concern or reſtraint.

On the 5th day of May, his body being demanded by the ſheriffs at the Tower-gate, in conſequence of a writ under the great ſeal of England, directed to the lieutenant of the Tower, his lordſhip deſired permiſſion to go in his own landau, and appeared gaily dreſſed in a light coloured ſuit of cloaths, embroidered with ſilver. He was attended in the landau by Mr. ſheriff Vaillant and the chaplain of the Tower, followed by the chariots of the ſheriffs, a mourning coach and ſix filled with his friends, and a hearſe for the conveyance of his body. He was guarded by a poſſe of conſtables, a party of horſe grenadiers, and a detachment of infantry; and in this manner the proceſſion moved from the Tower, through an infinite concourſe of people, to Tyburn, where the gallows, and a ſcaffold erected under it, appeared covered with black baiſe. The earl behaved with great compoſure to Mr. ſheriff Vaillant: he obſerved, that the gaiety of his apparel might ſeem odd on ſuch an occaſion; but that he had particular reaſons for wearing that ſuit of cloaths: he took notice of the vaſt multitude which crouded around him, brought thither, he ſuppoſed, by curioſity to ſee a nobleman hanged: he told the ſheriff he had applied to the king by letter, that he might be permitted to die in the Tower, where the earl of Eſſex, one of his anceſtors, had been beheaded in the reign of queen Elizabeth; an indulgence which, he ſaid, he had the greater reaſon to hope would be granted, as he had the honour to quarter part of his majeſty's arms. He expreſſed ſome diſpleaſure at being executed as a common felon, expoſed to the eyes of ſuch a multitude.

The chaplain, who had never been admitted to him before, obſerving that ſome account of his lordſhip's ſentiments on religion would be expected by the public, he made anſwer, that he did not think himſelf accountable to the public for his private ſentiments: that he had always adored one God, the creator of the univerſe; and, with reſpect to any particular opinions of his own, he had never propagated them, or endeavoured to make proſelytes, becauſe he thought it was criminal to diſturb the eſtabliſhed religion of his country, as lord Bolingbroke had done by the publication of his writings. He added, that the great number of ſects, and the multiplication of religious diſputes, had almoſt baniſhed morality. With regard to the crime for which he ſuffered, he declared that he had no malice againſt Mr. Johnſon; and that the murder was owing to a perturbation of mind, occaſioned by a variety of croſſes and vexations. When he approached the place of execution, he expreſſed an earneſt deſire to ſee and take leave of a certain perſon who waited in a coach; a perſon, he ſaid, for whom he had the moſt ſincere regard and affection; but the ſheriff prudently ſuggeſting that ſuch an interview might unman him, at a time when he had occaſion for all his fortitude and reſolution, he acquieſced in the juſtneſs of the remark, and delivered to him a pocket-book, a ring, and a purſe, deſiring they might be given to that perſon, whom he now declined ſeeing.

On his arrival at Tyburn he came out of the landau, and aſcended the ſcaffold with a firm ſtep and undaunted countenance. He refuſed to join the chaplain in his devotions; but, kneeling with him on black cuſhions, he repeated the Lord's Prayer, which he ſaid he had always admired; and added with great energy, "O Lord, forgive me all my errors, pardon all my ſins." After this exclamation, he preſented his watch to Mr. ſheriff Vaillant, thanked him and the other gentlemen for all their civilities; and ſignified his deſire of being buried at Breden, or Stanton in Leiceſterſhire. Finally, he gratified the executioner with a purſe of money; then the halter being adjuſted to his neck, he ſtepped upon a little ſtage, erected upon ſprings, on the middle of the ſcaffold; and, the cap being pulled over his eyes, the ſheriff made a ſignal, at which the ſtage fell from under his feet, and left him ſuſpended in the air. His body having hung an hour and five minutes, was cut down, placed in the hearſe, and conveyed to the public theatre for diſſection, where being opened, and lying for ſome days as the ſubject of a public lecture, at length it was carried off and privately interred.

Having thus related the particulars of two remarkable trials which engaged the public attention a ſhort time before the king's death, we ſhall now proceed to ſuch occurrences as are worthy of ſingular notice, which happened during the courſe of his reign.

In his eighth year (1735) on the 16th of February the tide in the Thames roſe ſo high, that the lawyers were obliged to be carried out of Weſtminſter-hall in boats: the parade in St. James's Park was under water, and by the great quantity of rains that fell on that day numbers of cattle were deſtroyed in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, particularly in the marſhes of Eſſex.

The year 1739 was remarkable for one of the ſevereſt froſts ever known in England. It began on Chriſtmas-day, and continued without intermiſſion upwards of ſeven weeks. The Thames was frozen over in ſuch a manner, that a public fair was held on it, and booths erected for the reception of all thoſe whoſe curioſity led them thither. The hardſhips of the poor were extreamly great; but, to the everlaſting honour of the Engliſh, let it be recorded, that they did every thing in their power to alleviate the diſtreſſes of their ſuffering fellow-ſubjects. From the king, down to the humble tradeſman, each ſeemed anxious to be moſt forward in acts of benevolence; ſo that a national calamity revived decaying charity.

During the courſe of the ſummer of 1741 the city of London, and places adjacent were viſited with an epidemic fever, which, for ſeveral months together, carried off great numbers of people. The cauſe of it was ſuppoſed to ariſe from the heat of the weather, which occaſioned a coagulation of the blood, or a ſtagnation thereof in the capillary arteries. This diſtemper ſpread all over the nation; and was alſo ſenſibly felt in Ireland.

On the 25th of March, 1748, early in the morning, a dreadful fire broke out at the houſe of Mr. Eldridge, a peruke-maker in Exchange-alley, Cornhill. The flames were ſo furious, that notwithſtanding there was the greateſt ſupply of water and engines, with every other poſſible aſſiſtance, yet before noon upwards of 80 houſes were entirely conſumed, beſides many others very conſiderably damaged. Mr. Eldridge and his family all periſhed in the flames: and Mr. Cook, a merchant, who lodged in the houſe, broke his leg by jumping out of the window, and died ſoon after. The damage occaſioned by this accident was eſtimated at 200,000l.

In the ſame year, in the evening of the 4th of Auguſt, many ſwarms of locuſts were ſeen in the air in different parts of London. They were ſuppoſed to have come from Poland and Hungary, where they had this ſummer ſettled in vaſt quantities, and deſtroyed all the fruits of the earth. The next day great numbers of them were found in Pall-mall, St. James's Park, and Southwark. They ſoon, however, diſappeared, as was ſuppoſed from the difference of our climate to that from whence they came; and this tranſient viſit rather produced an amuſement to exerciſe the curioſity of the people, than any preſage of danger.

On the 2d of December, in the ſame year, there aroſe a prodigious hurricane of wind, which continued for near eight hours. A great number of houſes were intirely blown down, others ſtripped of their roofs, and many trees torn up by the roots. Several perſons, in paſſing the ſtreets, were greatly hurt by the falling of chimnies and ſigns; and a child who was ſtanding by the fire was killed by the bricks of the chimney falling within-ſide the houſe. The moſt conſiderable damage was done to the ſhipping and ſmall craft in the river, and ſeveral perſons were drowned. Many ſhips were driven on ſhore, and great damage done on the coaſts of Kent and Suſſex.

In the beginning of the year 1750 two ſhocks of an earthquake were felt in London, the firſt of which happened on the 8th of February, and the ſecond on the 8th of March.----For the particulars of theſe ſee p. 717.

With reſpect to the ſtate of learning during the reign of George II. it continued advancing towards perfection. Many great men appeared in the literary world, and although they did not make ſuch a ſhining figure as ſome have done in the preſent reign, yet they laid a foundation for the nobleſt improvements in every art or ſcience. Simpſon, Saunderſon, and M'Laurin carried the knowledge of the mathematics to an height unknown before. Phyſic and natural hiſtory were cultivated by many learned gentlemen, among whom were Dr. Mead and Sir Hans Sloane, and the Doctors Warburton and Newton ſtood forth in defence of Divine Revelation. In a word, the reign of George II. produced many great men, ſome of whom are now bright ornaments to their country, while ſuch as are dead have left behind them the moſt illuſtrious examples.

BOOK XVII.

From the Acceſſion of

GEORGE III.

To the preſent Time.

NEVER, perhaps, did any prince aſcend the throne of his anceſtors with greater eclat, or under more happy circumſtances, than did his preſent majeſty king George III. who, at the time of his acceſſion, was only in the 23d year of his age.

As ſoon as the death of the late king was notified to Mr. Pitt, one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, he immediately repaired to Kew, (where his young ſovereign then was) and communicated to him the news of this important event. In the mean time the lords of the council aſſembled at Charlton-Houſe, and gave orders for proclaiming his majeſty, which was accordingly done the next day at the uſual places and with the accuſtomed ceremonies.

While the council was ſitting at Charlton-Houſe his majeſty arrived from Kew, and entering the room in which the members were, he addreſſed them as follows: "The loſs the nation and I have ſuſtained by the death of the king, my grandfather, would have been ſeverely felt at any time; but coming at ſo critical a juncture, and ſo unexpected, it is by many circumſtances augmented; and the weight now falling upon me is much increaſed: I feel my own inſufficiency to ſupport it as I wiſh; but, animated by the tendereſt affection for this my native country, and depending on the advice, experience, and abilities of your lordſhips, the ſupport and aſſiſtance of every honeſt man, I enter with chearfulneſs into this arduous ſituation; and ſhall make it the buſineſs of my life to promote, in every thing, the glory and happineſs of theſe kingdoms; to preſerve and ſtrengthen the conſtitution, both in church and ſtate; and as I mount the throne in the midſt of an expenſive but juſt and neceſſary war, I ſhall endeavour to proſecute it in a manner the moſt likely to bring about an honourable and laſting peace, in concert with my allies."

His majeſty then took the oaths to maintain the church of Scotland as by law eſtabliſhed; and having ſigned two inſtruments for that purpoſe, one of them was depoſited among the archives of the council, and the other tranſmitted to Edinburgh, to be recorded in the court of ſeſſion.

The next thing done by his majeſty was to aſſemble both houſes of parliament, not to tranſact any buſineſs but that of ſwearing in the members, whoſe oaths of allegiance were become abſolved by the death of the late king. The duke of Rutland, being conſtituted high-ſteward, ſwore in all the commons; and the lord-keeper adminiſtered the oaths to the peers.

In the mean time, addreſſes of condolence and felicitation, filled with the warmeſt profeſſions of duty and attachment, were preſented to his majeſty from moſt parts of the kingdom. The two houſes of parliament led the way, and were followed by the magiſtrates, merchants, &c. of London. Perhaps ſo great a number of addreſſes were never before ſeen, on any ſimilar occaſion. head, waited on his majeſty with their compliments on his acceſſion to the throne; and were followed by the two univerſities, and moſt of the bodies politic and corporate in the three kingdoms. In a word, the whole pepole ſeemed to vie with each other in expreſſions of loyalty and affection to their new ſovereign, who increaſed the pleaſing idea they had formed of him, by the condeſcending and affable manner in which he received them.

The parliament met on the 18th of November*, when his majeſty, after being conducted to the houſe amidſt the univerſal acclamations of his people, opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

" My lords and gentlemen,

" The juſt concern which I have felt in my own breaſt, on the ſudden death of the late king my royal grandfather, makes me not doubt but you muſt all have been deeply affected with ſo ſevere a loſs. The preſent critical and difficult conjuncture has made this loſs the more ſenſible, as he was the great ſupport of that ſyſtem, by which alone the liberties of Europe, and the weight and influence of theſe kingdoms can be preſerved, and give life to meaſures conducive to thoſe important ends.

" I need not tell you the addition of weight which immediately falls upon me, in being called to the government of this free and powerful country at ſuch a time, and under ſuch circumſtances. My conſolation is in the uprightneſs of my own intentions, your faithful and united aſſiſtance, and the bleſſing of heaven upon our joint endeavours, which I devoutly implore.

" Born and educated in this country, I glory in the name of Briton; and the peculiar happineſs of my life will ever conſiſt in promoting the welfare of a people, whoſe loyalty and warm affection to me I conſider as the greateſt and moſt permanent ſecurity of my throne; and I doubt not but their ſteadineſs in thoſe principles will equal the firmneſs of my invariable reſolutions to adhere to and ſtrengthen this excellent conſtitution in church and ſtate, and to maintain the toleration inviolable. The civil and religious rights of my loving ſubjects are equally dear to me with the moſt valuable prerogatives of my crown; and as the ſureſt foundation of the whole, and the beſt means to draw down the divine favour on my reign, it is my fixed purpoſe to countenance and encourage the practice of true religion and virtue.

" I reflect with pleaſure on the ſucceſſes with which the Britiſh arms have been proſpered this laſt ſummer. The total reduction of the vaſt province of Canada, with the city of Montreal, is of the moſt intereſting conſequence, and muſt be as heavy a blow to my enemies, as it is a conqueſt glorious to us; the more glorious becauſe effected without effuſion of blood, and with that humanity which makes an amiable part of the character of this nation.

" Our advantages gained in the Eaſt-Indies have been ſignal, and muſt greatly diminiſh the ſtrength and trade of France in thoſe parts, as well as procure the moſt ſolid benefits to the commerce and wealth of my ſubjects.

" In Germany where the whole French force has been employed, the combined army, under the wiſe and able conduct of my general, prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic, has not only ſtopped their progreſs, but has gained advantages over them, notwithſtanding their boaſted ſuperiority, and their not having hitherto come to a general engagement.

" My good brother and ally the king of Pruſſia, although ſurrounded with numerous armies of enemies, has, with a magnanimity and perſeverance almoſt beyond example, not only withſtood their various attacks, but obtained very conſiderable victories over them.

" Of theſe events I ſhall ſay no more at this time, becauſe the nature of the war in thoſe parts has kept the campaign there ſtill depending.

"As my navy is the principal article of our national ſtrength, it gives me much ſatisfaction to receive it in ſuch good condition; whilſt the fleet of France is weakened to ſuch a degree, that the ſmall remains of it have continued blocked up by my ſhips in their own ports: at the ſame time the French trade is reduced to the loweſt ebb; and with joy of heart I ſee the commerce of my kingdoms, that great ſource of our riches, and fixed object of my never-failing care and protection, flouriſhing to an extent never known in any former war.

" The valour and intrepidity of my officers and forces, both at ſea and land, have been diſtinguiſhed ſo much to the glory of the nation, that I ſhould be wanting to them if I did not acknowledge it. This is a merit which I ſhall conſtantly encourage and reward; and I take this occaſion to declare, that the zealous and uſeful ſervice of the militia, in the preſent arduous conjuncture, is very acceptable to me.

" In this ſtate I have found things at my acceſſion to the throne of my anceſtors; happy in viewing the proſperous part of it; happier ſtill ſhould I have been, had I found my kingdoms, whoſe true intereſts I have entirely at heart, in full peace: but ſince the ambition, injurious encroachments, and dangerous deſigns of my ememies, rendered the war both juſt and neceſſary, and the generous overture made laſt winter, towards a congreſs for a pacification, has not yet produced any ſuitable return, I am determined, with your chearful and powerful aſſiſtance, to proſecute this war with vigour, in order to that deſirable object, a ſafe and honourable peace. For this purpoſe it is abſolutely incumbent upon us to be early prepared; and I rely upon your zeal and hearty concurrence to ſupport the king of Pruſſia, and the reſt of my allies, and to make ample proviſion for carrying on the war, as the only means to bring our enemies to equitable terms of accommodation."

" Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

" The greateſt uneaſineſs which I feel at this time is in conſidering the uncommon burthens neceſſarily brought upon my faithful ſubjects. I deſire only ſuch ſupplies as ſhall be requiſite to proſecute the war with advantage; be adequate to the neceſſary ſervices; and that they may be provided for in the moſt ſure and effectual manner. You may depend upon the faithful and punctual application of what ſhall be granted. I have ordered the proper eſtimates for the enſuing year to be laid before you; and alſo an account of the extraordinary expences which, from the nature of the different and remote operations, have been unavoidably incurred.

" It is with peculiar reluctance that I am obliged to mention any thing which perſonally regards myſelf. But as the grant of the greateſt part of the civil liſt revenues is now determined, I truſt in your duty and affection to me, to make the proper proviſion for ſupporting my civil government with honour and dignity. On my part you may be aſſured of a regular and becoming œconomy."

---

* In the evening of the 10th of November, the body of his late majeſty was removed from Kenſington to the apartment called the Princes Chamber near the houſe of peers, where it lay in ſtate till the next night, when it was interred with great funeral pomp in Henry the VIIth's Chapel, Weſtminſter-abbey, the duke of Cumberland attending as chief mourner.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The eyes of all Europe are upon you. From your reſolutions the proteſtant intereſt hopes for protection, as well as all our friends for the preſervation of their independency; and our enemies fear the final diſappointment of their ambitious and deſtructive views. Let theſe hopes and fears be confirmed and augmented by the vigour and diſpatch of our proceedings.

"In this expectation I am the more encouraged by a pleaſing circumſtance, which I look upon as one of the moſt auſpicious omens of my reign: that happy extinction of diviſions, and that union and good harmony which continue to prevail amongſt my ſubjects, afford me the moſt agreeable proſpect. The natural diſpoſition and wiſh of my heart are to cement and promote them; and I promiſe myſelf that nothing will ariſe on your part to interrupt or diſturb a ſituation ſo eſſential to the true and laſting felicity of this great people."

Both houſes preſented the moſt dutiful and loyal addreſſes to this ſpeech; and the commons, as a proof of their affection, granted the ſum of 800,000l. to defray the expences of the civil liſt. They then proceeded to grant the ſupplies for the ſervice of the current year, the whole of which amounted to upwards of nineteen millions.

A. D. 1761. As it is cuſtomary, on the acceſſion of a new king, for ſomething to be done of a public nature for the benefit of diſtreſſed ſubjects, ſo the parliament, immediately on their meeting after the holidays, paſſed an act in favour of inſolvent debtors, who, in conſequence of giving up all their effects, were to be diſcharged by the juſtices at the quarter ſeſſion. No act was ever paſſed at a more ſeaſonable juncture; for the priſons were filled with poor unfortunate creatures whoſe wives and children were ſtarving. This act, however, had in it a clauſe, attended with ſuch conſequences, that it was found neceſſary to repeal it. It was imagined that every creditor might compel a debtor to give up his effects, and if he concealed any of them, to the amount of 20l. he was to ſuffer death as a felon. This clauſe was laid hold of by many of the lower ſorts of tradeſmen, who, in in order to cheat their creditors, got one of their own relations to compel them to account; ſo that a door was opened for perjury, and many perſons were deprived of their property under the proſtituted authority of an act of parliament. Indeed, the abuſe became ſo glaring, that the city of London preſented a petition to have it repealed; but it did not take place till the meeting of the new parliament.

In the beginning of March the king ſent a meſſage to both houſes, importing, that as nothing could contribute more towards promoting the intereſts of the people than that of rendering the judges independent, ſo he deſired they would grant him leave to advance their ſalaries, and that they ſhould hold their places by patent for life; for by the act of ſettlement at the revolution, they were to expire within ſix months after the death of the king. In conſequence of this meſſage, the ſalaries of the nine puiſne judges in England were advanced from 1500l. to 2000l. and the three chiefs in proportion. In Scotland, the lord preſident, inſtead of 1000l. a year, was allowed 1300; the lords of ſeſſion 700l. inſtead of 500; and the lords juſticiary, 1000 inſtead of 500l.

Mr. Onſlow, who had ſo long filled the ſpeaker's chair with equal candour and capacity, having ſignified his intention to retire from buſineſs, in conſequence of age, infirmities, and other motives of a private nature, the commons determined to beſtow upon him ſome ſignal marks of their eſteem and regard. They accordingly reſolved that the thanks of the houſe ſhould be given to Mr. Speaker, for his conſtant and unwearied attendance in the chair, during the courſe of above thirty-three years, in five ſucceſſive parliaments; for the unſhaken integrity and ſteady impartiality of his conduct there; and for the indefatigable pains he had, with uncommon abilities, conſtantly taken to promote the honour and dignity of parliament, and to preſerve inviolable the rights and privileges of the commons of Great Britain.

The houſe alſo reſolved to preſent an addreſs to the king, humbly to beſeech his majeſty, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to beſtow ſome ſignal mark of his royal favour upon the right honourable Arthur Onſlow, eſq. for his great and eminent ſervices performed to his country, for the ſpace of thirty-three years and upwards. This application was very agreeable to the king's own generous diſpoſition. He expreſſed a proper ſenſe of the ſpeaker's great ſervices and unblemiſhed character; and that gentleman was gratified with an annual penſion of 3000l. payable out of his majeſty's treaſure at the Exchequer, for his own life and that of his ſon.

All the public buſineſs being diſpatched, the king repaired to the houſe of lords on the 19th day of March, and having ſigned ſuch bills as were ready, cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne. Soon after which the parliament was diſſolved, and writs were iſſued for a new one to be choſen.

It is now time to direct our attention to affairs on the continent.

Early in this year the French king's ambaſſador at the court of Stockholm delivered a declaration to the Swediſh monarch, importing, that the moſt Chriſtian king, moved by the calamities of war, ſo widely diffuſed, and ſo ſeverely felt in different parts of the world, thought it his indiſpenſible duty to declare, that his humanity in general, and his regard to his own ſubjects in particular, prompted him to expreſs his deſire that his allies would concur with him in reſtoring the tranquillity of Europe: that in adjuſting the differences between France and England he would abundantly ſhew his moderation, whenever Great Britain ſhould be inclined to acquieſce in reaſonable terms: that common humanity required his allies to concert with him a plan of pacification, and he hoped every member of the alliance would labour to ſtrengthen, if poſſible, the bands of amity with which they were connected: that, in the mean time, an accumulation of diſtreſs among his unhappy ſubjects; an additional depopulation of countries; a diſorder in the finances of ſeveral powers; and the greateſt doubt whether an advantageous peace could be made in Germany, induced him to declare, that as the war had conſiderably diminiſhed his reſources, he was conſtrained to leſſen his ſubſidies, and even to give notice, that ſhould the war continue he could no longer promiſe an exact compliance with the letter of his engagements.

In conſequence of this declaration, four others were made by the courts of Peterſburgh, Vienna, Sweden, and Poland, which were ſigned at Paris on the 25th of March, and delivered at London on the 31ſt of the ſame month. The counter declaration of Great Britain and Pruſſia appeared on the third of April; and a congreſs was appointed to be held at Augſburgh, as the moſt proper ſituation for the contending powers.

But notwithſtanding theſe ſeeming diſpoſitions for peace, the war in Germany was carried on with great ſpirit. In the beginning of February prince Ferdinand aſſembled his army, and began his march towards Caſſel, on the 18th day of that month, in four columns, by the way of Warbourg, Liebelnau, Sielen, and Dringelbourg, the command of the vanguard being aſſigned to the marquis of Granby, who advanced to Kerkberg and Metze. In the mean time the hereditary prince having received intelligence that the French garriſon of Fritzlar was not prepared for a defence, he marched thither with a few battalions, in hopes of carrying the place by a ſudden aſſault, with muſquetry only: but he met with ſuch a warm reception, that he was obliged to wait for the arrival of ſome artillery, which was made uſe of with ſuch ſucceſs that the governor of the place was compelled to capitulate on honourable terms. In the interim, general Briedenback took poſſeſſion of a large magazine at Roſenthal, and made an unſucceſsful attempt upon Marpurg, in which he loſt his life; but this place was afterwards abandoned by the French at the approach of the marquis of Granby, who took poſſeſſion of it.

Prince Ferdinand now reſolved to reduce Ziegenheim and Caſſel before the duke de Broglio ſhould receive his reinforcements, and theſe two places were accordingly inveſted. The allied army was cantoned in two lines, with the right extending to Lahne, and the left ſtretched towards Fulda; while prince Ferdinand fixed his head quarters at Schwienſberg. Having left a garriſon at Marpurg, lord Granby marched into the neighbourhood of Lohr. Another body, under general Hardenberg, advanced to Kircham, while the detachment employed at the ſiege of Caſſel proceeded very ſlowly in their operations, and received ſome ſevere rebuffs from ſallies made by the garriſon.

By this time the duke de Broglio was joined by all the detachments he expected from the Lower Rhine, and advanced towards the army of the allies, which at this time was unable to meet him in the field. On the 21ſt day of March the detachment under the hereditary prince was, in its march from Heimbach, encountered by a numerous body of the enemy, near the village of Stangerode, in the neighbourhood of Gronberg. The attack was made by the enemy's dragoons, the very firſt ſhock of which broke the whole foot of the allies, conſiſting of nine regiments of Hanoverians, Heſſians, and Brunſwickers. Two thouſand were either killed or taken, together with eighteen pair of colours and twelve pieces of artillery.

After this blow the allied army could no longer think of making head againſt the French, or of maintaining their ground in Heſſe. They broke up the blockade of Zeigenheim, which was followed by raiſing the ſiege of Caſſel, after the trenches had been opened 27 days. They then evacuated the whole country of Heſſe, retiring behind the Dymel, and falling back nearly to the quarters they poſſeſſed before this attempt.

The enemy was now once more in poſſeſſion of the whole landgravate of Heſſe Caſſel; they were alſo maſters of Munden and Gottingen in Hanover, and at liberty to penetrate into the heart of that electorate. The ſituation of the allies appeared the more dangerous as the prince de Soubiſe, at the head of a ſecond French army, was encamped on the Lower Rhine. About the middle of May the hereditary prince of Brunſwic, at the head of a ſeparate body, advanced to Nettolen, in the neighbourhood of Munſter, to watch the motions of this army. Soubiſe had by this time formed three different camps at Duſſeldorp, Burich and Rees, though part of his forces ſtill continued in cantonment. In the mean time the war was proſecuted by detached parties, and ſkirmiſhes were fought with various ſucceſs. The army of the duke de Broglio, having, about the latter end of June, croſſed the Dymel, diſlodged general Sporcken from his poſt on the left of that river, with the loſs of 1800 men taken priſoners, 19 pieces of cannon, 400 horſes, and 200 waggons. The French next took poſſeſſion of Warburg, Padeborn and Dringlebroen, and on the 2d of July, compelled prince Ferdinand to paſs the Lippe. Theſe ſucceſſes, however, were over-balanced by the atchievements of ſmall parties of the allies, who, at different times, were diſpatched to haraſs them in their motions, and cut off their convoys of proviſion.

In the morning of the 13th of July general Luckner, with his detachment, advanced to Salme, where the count de Chabot was poſted with a ſtrong body of horſe and foot, which he attacked with ſuch fury, that they were forced to repaſs the Lippe in haſte, having loſt about 200 men, and as many horſes in their retreat. Other parties intercepted the French convoys in the neighbourhood of Caſſel, and did ſuch conſiderable damage to the enemy, that they reſolved to unite their armies and give battle to prince Ferdinand.

The allies formed their camp at a place called Hohenover. The right wing, at the extremity of which the hereditary prince was poſted, extended as far as the village de Buderich, and this was guarded by a detachment. The body of the army occupied the heights of Wambeln, and the prince of Anhalt poſſeſſed the ground between the Illengen, and Hohenover. The marquis of Granby maintained his poſition on the heights of Kirck-Denckern, and lieutenant general Wutgenau, advancing from the heath of Untrup, marched by his right in order to reach the village of Kirck-Denckern: the avenues and poſts on the little rivers Aſte and Sultzbah were defended by the piquets of the army. On the 15th of July, the army of Soubiſe, having ſtruck their tents, advanced on the left of the allies, and diſlodged the advanced poſt of lord Granby, againſt whoſe corps their chief efforts were directed. Prince Ferdinand now commanded the marquis of Granby to maintain his ground to the laſt extremity. Wutgenau was ordered to make a motion to the left to block up the high road from Lipſtadt to Ham, and act in concert with the marquis, whoſe right was likewiſe ſuſtained by the left of the body commanded by the prince of Anhalt, and this general's own right extended to the Aſte, above Kirck-Denckren. Lieutenant general Conway replaced the prince of Anhalt between Illengen and Hohenover. The hereditary prince ordered lieutenant general Boſe to ſecure the heights of Wambeln, leaving count Kilmanſiegge on the ſide of Buderich. The greateſt part of the artillery was placed on the front of the left. General Sporcken, who encamped with a ſeparate body at Hortzfeld, was ordered to detach ſix ſquadrons and as many battalions over the Lippe, to ſupport M. Wutgenau, and to co-operate with the reſt as he ſhould judge moſt effectual for the advantage of the whole.

In the evening of the 15th of July the enemy made a furious attack on lord Granby's poſt, which was ſuſtained with the moſt intrepid bravery and reſolution till the arrival of Wutgenau, who advancing on his left, and charging them in flank, obliged them to retire into the woods with precipitation. The priſoners having informed prince Ferdinand, that marſhal Broglio had decamped from Erwite by break of day, in order to join Soubiſe, and give battle to the allies, concluded that the ſtrongeſt efforts would be made upon his left, and formed his diſpoſitions accordingly. General Howard was ordered to bring up the brigade of infantry, commanded by lord Frederick Cavendiſh, and the cavalry of lord Pembroke. Colonel Grevendorff was detached with two battalions to barricade and fortify the village of Kirck-Denckern, and to be there, in caſe of neceſſity, ſupported by general Howard. At three in the morning the whole French army advanced again to the attack on the ſide where Wutgenau was poſted, and a terrible fire of cannon and muſquetry was maintained on both ſides for five hours, during which the enemy was not able to gain one inch of ground. About nine prince Ferdinand received advice that Broglio's deſign was to cannonade lord Granby's camp, from an oppoſite eminence; he therefore ordered immediately a body of troops to anticipate this operation by making a vigorous charge. Accordingly they advanced with the greateſt intrepidity, and attacked the enemy with ſo much fury, that the French were ſoon obliged to give way, and abandon the field of action. Their left, however, ſtill maintained a ſevere cannonade on the ſide where the hereditary prince commanded; but were no ſooner informed of their defeat on the right, than they deſiſted from the attack, and retreated in good order. They were purſued as far as Hiltrup, about a league from the field of battle, and would in all probability have ſuffered a total defeat had the nature of the ground permitted the artillery to act, but this being impoſſible, the French ſuſtained very little loſs. They had, however, about 5000 men killed and taken priſoners in this attack, ſome colours, and a few pieces of artillery. Prince Ferdinand's loſs did not exceed 500 men.

This was the greateſt action that happened during the whole campaign in Weſtphalia, and did immortal honour to the commander in the diſpoſition, and to the bravery and intrepidity of the troops in the execution. It was, however, far from being deciſive; the French, notwithſtanding the conſiderable loſs they had ſuſtained, were ſtill ſuperior in number.

After this defeat, the two French generals, from a miſunderſtanding between them, divided their armies. Broglio, with his diviſion, marched towards Caſſel, and Soubiſe retreated to Dortmund, and croſſed the Roer, in order to ſecure a great number of barges then paſſing down the Rhine with proviſions for his army. He did not, however, take this ſtep, before he had ſent off two large detachments to reinforce Broglio. Nor did he continue any longer on the other ſide of the Roer, than was neceſſary to receive his proviſions, when he repaſſed both that river and the Lippe, advancing as far as Dulmen. In the mean time Broglio penetrated ſtill farther into the electorate of Hanover, took poſſeſſion of Keſter, and fortified the place.

The allied army being greatly inferior to the French, prince Ferdinand retired to Dumolt, and called in moſt of his detachments. The French encamped near him on the heights of Neim, and ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened between the two armies, in one of which prince Henry, brother to the hereditary prince, was mortally wounded.

In the mean time general Lucker gained a conſiderable advantage at Caſſel. He attacked and routed a large body of the enemy, and took many priſoners, together with ſome horſes, and a large quantity of ammunition.

Nor were the French idle. Broglio, having croſſed the Weſer with his whole army, prince Ferdinand made a forced march, paſſed the Dymel, and advanced to Caſſel. Broglio perceiving that he could not now advance to the city of Hanover, without bringing on a general engagement with the allied army, thought proper to retreat. The French being thus retired, prince Ferdinand proceeded to Paderborn, and eſtabliſhed his head quarters at Buhne.

The duke de Broglio, having re-croſſed the Weſer, encamped his army at Eimbeck, where he laid the whole country under contribution. In the mean time Soubiſe erected his ovens at Dorſten, and garriſoned the place with one battalion, but the hereditary prince found means to attack and reduce the town. The garriſon were made priſoners; the ovens demoliſhed, and large quantities of proviſions deſtroyed. This obliged Soubiſe to retreat to the other ſide of the Lippe: but he ſoon after repaſſed that river, and advanced again to Coesfelt, ravaging, with his detachments, all the northern parts of the country.

Towards the end of September a detachment from the army of Soubiſe, under the command of the count de Conſlans, advanced to the gates of Embden, which was garriſoned by two companies of Engliſh invalids, who obtained an honourable capitulation, and embarked for Bremen. The French did not, however, continue long in the town: they laid the neighbouring country under contribution, and immediately evacuated the place. But the country boors, flying to arms, and ſinking the pontoons, on which the enemy had paſſed the river, it was ſome time before the detachment could return to their camp. Another party of the army entered the city of Oſnaburg, and pillaged the place, the inhabitants not being in a condition to pay the enormous contributions demanded by the enemy. A third party made an attempt upon Bremen: but the inhabitants joining the garriſon, the French were obliged to retire with the utmoſt precipitation.

During theſe tranſactions Broglio lay inactive in his camp at Eimbeck, nor was he at all diſturbed, till the beginning of November; when prince Ferdinand formed a plan for attacking him unexpectedly, before he could call in his detachments. In order to this he ordered the hereditary prince and general Luckner, reinforced by the garriſon of Wolfenbuttle, to advance from their reſpective poſts, ſo as to be in the neighbourhood of Eimbeck by a certain hour on the 5th of November. He commanded the marquis of Granby to force the French poſt at Cappelnhagen on the fourth; to proceed next day to Wickenſen, and block up a defile in that neighbourhood, on the road from Elcherſhauſen to Eimbeck. He ſent general Hardenberg with a detachment to paſs the Weſer at Badenwerder, that he might at the appointed time take poſſeſſion of a defile at Amelunxhorn, on the other road from Elcherſhauſen to Eimbeck. On the 4th he, with the main body of his army, croſſed the river near Haſtenbeck, and advanced towards Eimbeck. When he approached Wickenſen, he found part of his orders already executed, the road being occupied by a ſtrong body of Britiſh grenadiers and highlanders: for the marquis of Granby had bravely forced the enemy's poſt at Cappelnhagen, and, by the hour appointed, blocked up the defile. In the mean time M. de Chabot finding he was intercepted, immediately retreated towards Eſcherſhauſen, and ſtruck into the road to Eimbeck, which general Hardenberg had been ordered to ſecure: but, unfortunately for that officer, ſome of his pontoons were overturned, and this accident retarded him ſo long, that he did not arrive at the place appointed till ſeven in the morning; by which time Chabot had paſſed the defile on his way to Eimbeck, and by noon reached that place without farther interruption.

Prince Ferdinand, being thus diſappointed in the miſcarriage of his plan, advanced towards the French camp; but he found it too ſtrong to be attacked with any probability of ſucceſs. He therefore reſolved to turn their flanks, as if he deſigned to cut off their communication with Gottingen, a motion which, he was well aſſured, would either bring Broglio to an engagement on equal terms, or oblige him to retreat. He choſe, however, the latter, and on the ninth of November the whole French army retired.

After this no tranſaction of conſequence happened in Germany. The duke de Broglio quartered his forces in and about Caſſel; while thoſe of Soubiſe were diſtributed at Duſſeldorp and along the Lower Rhine. The allies fixed their quarters at Hilderſham, Munſter, Hamelen, and Eimbeck. The Britiſh cavalry wintered in Eaſt Frieſland, and the infantry in the biſhopric of Oſnaburg.

During the courſe of this year ſeveral ſucceſsful exploits were performed in the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies. After the reduction of Pondicherry, an armament was equipped againſt the French ſettlement of Mahie, ſituated on the coaſt of Malabar, about thirty miles to the northward of Tillicherry. A body of forces for this expedition was embarked at Bombay, under the command of major Hector Monro, who acted with ſuch ſpirit, that in the beginning of February, M. Loner, the French governor at Mahie, was obliged to ſurrender the place with all it dependencies.

But the French officers in the Eaſt Indies had exerted themſelves with ſo much induſtry, as to intereſt in their cauſe a prince of the Mogul empire, named Shah Zadda, who at the head of 80,000 men, took the field againſt the forces of the Eaſt India company, commanded by major John Carnack, and reinforced by the ſuba of Bengal. This army conſiſted of 500 Europeans, 2500 ſepoys, and 20,000 black troops, with 12 pieces of cannon. Both armies advanced to the neighbourhood of Guya, where, on the 15th of January, the Mogul's troops were routed in a pitched battle. All their artillery was taken, together with part of their baggage, and a number of French officers.

About this time a revolution happened in favour of Mir Coſſim Ali Kawn, who was placed on the throne of Bengal in the room of his father-in-law Jaffier Ali Kawn, raiſed to that dignity by lord Clive, and now depoſed for his cruelty and mal-adminiſtration. This change, however, did not affect the intereſt of the Engliſh Eaſt India company: on the contrary, the new nabob confirmed and enlarged their privileges and immunities.

In the month of June the iſland of Dominico, in the Weſt-Indies, was taken from the French, by a party of Engliſh forces under the command of lord Rollo, and aſſiſted by commodore Sir James Douglas, with four ſhips of the line. At firſt the inhabitants would have ſubmitted, but M. de Longprie, the governor, ſtirred them up to hold out, under pretence that ſome ſhips would ſoon arrive to their aſſiſtance. Lord Rollo, finding him obſtinate, landed with a party of grenadiers, commanded by colonel Melville, and drove the enemy from their advanced poſts, after which they proceeded to the head quarters of the governor, whom they took priſoner with all his officers. Next day the magiſtrates, and indeed all the inhabitants of the iſland, except the ſoldiers, took the oaths to our government. The forts that had been damaged were repaired, and every thing ſettled in a proper manner; after which lord Rollo and Sir James Douglas ſet ſail for the iſland of Guadaloupe.

The Engliſh navy was this year remarkably ſucceſsful; ſeveral engagements happened in different parts of the ſeas, and many of the enemy's ſhips were taken. But the following is juſtly eſteemed one of the moſt remarkable and gallant actions which diſtinguiſhed this war, and fully evinced the vaſt ſuperiority poſſeſſed by the Engliſh navy over that of France. On the tenth of Auguſt, captain Faulkner of the Bellona, a ſhip of the line, and the Brilliant, a frigate of thirty guns, ſailed from the river Tagus for England, having on board a conſiderable ſum of money for the merchants of London. On the 13th in the afternoon, being then off Vigo, they deſcried three ſail of ſhips ſtanding in for the land, one of the line of battle, and two frigates. As ſoon as they perceived captain Faulkner, they bore down upon him, till within the diſtance of ſeven miles, when they took both the Bellona and frigate for two decked ſhips, and not chuſing to ſtand an engagement, they ſuddenly wore round, filled all their ſails, and crouded away. Captain Faulkner being by this time convinced of their ſize, and, from the intelligence he had received, conjecturing that the large ſhip was the Courageaux, as it actually proved to be, he hoiſted all the ſail he could carry, and gave chace till ſun-ſet, when one of the French frigates hauling out in the offing, he threw out a ſignal to the Brilliant to purſue in that direction, which order was immediately obeyed. They did not loſe ſight of the enemy all night, but at ſun-riſe had gained only two miles upon them in a chace of fourteen hours, ſo that the French commodore might ſtill have avoided an engagement had he thought proper; but he no longer declined the action, for by this time he plainly perceived that one of the Engliſh ſhips was a frigate, and the Bellona, at that diſtance, appeared to him much ſmaller than ſhe really was. He now hoiſted a red enſign on the mizen ſhrouds, as a ſignal for his two frigates to cloſe with, and engage the Brilliant; at the ſame time he hauled down his ſtudding ſails, wore round, and ſtood for the Bellona under his top-ſails, while captain Faulkner advanced towards him with an eaſy ſail, and ordered his quarters to be manned. The two ſhips were equal in burthen, in number of guns, and in weight of metal. The crew of the Courageux amounted to 700 men, commanded by M. du Guy Lambert. The Bellona's complement conſiſted of 550 men, all the officers were perſons of known merit, and the commander had, on ſeveral occaſions, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery and conduct. The fire on both ſides was ſuſpended till they were within muſquet ſhot of each other, when the engagement began with a terrible diſcharge of fire-arms and artillery. In leſs than nine minutes all the Bellona's braces, bowlings, ſhrowds, and rigging were cut and ſhattered by the ſhot, and the mizzen-maſt fell over the ſtern, with all the men on the round top, who, nevertheleſs ſaved their lives, by clambering into the port-holes of the gun-room. Apprehenſive that the enemy might ſeize this opportunity of eſcaping, captain Faulkner gave orders to board them immediately; but this attempt was ſoon rendered impracticable, by the poſition of the two ſhips. The Courageux was now fallen athwart the bows of the Bellona, in which ſituation ſhe muſt have raked the latter fore and aft with great execution. The haul-yards and moſt of the other ropes by which the Bellona could be worked, were already ſhot away. Captain Faulkner, however, with the aſſiſtance of his maſter, made uſe of the ſtudding ſails with ſuch ſucceſs, as to wear the ſhip quite round, and fall upon the oppoſite quarter of the Courageux. The officers and men now flew to the guns on that ſide of the ſhip oppoſed to the enemy, from whence they poured in a moſt dreadful diſcharge, and maintained it without intermiſſion or abatement. Every ſhot took place. The ſides of the Courageux were terribly ſhattered, and her decks ſtrewed with carnage. The enemy ſuſtained this fire for about twenty minutes, when the enſign was hauled down, and the engagement ceaſed; but in a ſhort time after a ſhot was fired from the lower tier of the Courageux; upon which the Britiſh ſeamen ran to their quarters, and, without waiting for orders, poured in two broadſides upon the enemy, who now called out for quarter, which was granted them. The Bellona ſuffered greatly in her rigging, but very little in the hull, and her number of killed and wounded did not exceed forty. The caſe was very different with the Courageux. Nothing was left ſtanding but her foremaſt and bowſprit; large breaches were made in her ſides; her decks were torn up in ſeveral parts; many of her guns were diſmounted; and her quarters were filled with mangled bodies of the dying and the dead. Above 220 were killed outright, and half that number were brought aſhore wounded, at Liſbon, to which place the prize was conducted.

The ſucceſs of the Bellona was, in a great meaſure, owing to the brave conduct of captain Logie, who finding it would be impoſſible for him to acquire any thing but laurels from two ſhips, the leaſt of which was equal in ſtrength to the frigate he commanded, he reſolved to amuſe them in ſuch a manner as to prevent either from aſſiſting the Courageux. Accordingly, he began the attack on the Malicieuſe, but the other coming up immediately, he ſtood their whole fire all the time the great ſhips were engaged, and near an hour after ſhe had ſtruck her colours; when they both thought proper to ſeek for ſafety in flight, having ſuffered conſiderable damage in their maſts and rigging.

The miniſtry were this year determined to attempt the reduction of Belleiſle, the largeſt of all the European iſlands belonging to the French king; being between twelve and thirteen leagues in circumference. It contains only one ſmall city called Le Palais; has three country towns, one hundred and three villages, and about five thouſand inhabitants. A ſquadron was accordingly equipped under the command of commodore Keppel, conſiſting of ten ſhips of the line, ſeveral frigates, two fire ſhips, and two bomb ketches, beſide tranſports. The troops deſtined for this expedition amounted to ten battalions, under the command of major-general Hodgſon, aſſiſted by major-general Crawford, with proper engineers, ſome troops of light horſe, and a detachment of artillery. On the 29th of March the whole armament ſailed from Spithead; and on the 7th of April came to an anchor in Belleiſle-road. The commanders having agreed that the deſcent ſhould be made on the ſandy beach, near the point of Lomaria, towards the ſouth eaſt end of the iſland, a feint was made to attack the citadel of Palais, while two large ſhips convoyed the troops to the landing-place, and ſilenced a battery which the enemy had erected there. This ſervice being performed, the flat-bottomed boats advanced to the ſhore, and a ſmall body of troops was landed under the command of major Purcel and captain Oſborne, which was no ſooner effected than the enemy, who had entrenched themſelves on the heights, appeared above them, and poured down ſuch a ſevere fire, as threw them into diſorder: nevertheleſs captain Oſborne, at the head of ſixty grenadiers, advanced near enough to exchange ſeveral thruſts with the French officer, till having received three ſhots in the body, he fell dead on the ſpot. Major Purcel ſhared the ſame fate, which was alſo extended to ſeveral other officers. The men were totally routed, and either killed or taken priſoners; ſo that this attempt was attended with the loſs of near 500 men.

It was ſome time before the weather would permit a ſecond attempt to be made, but when it did the Prince of Orange man of war ſailed round the iſland, in order to ſurvey the coaſt, and diſcover, if poſſible, ſome other place more favourable for a deſcent; but the whole ſeemed to be ſecured in ſuch a manner, by rocks and batteries, as precluded all acceſs. Far from being diſcouraged by theſe difficulties, the commanders only thought of the moſt proper methods to remove them, and at length fixed on the following, which met with all the ſucceſs they could wiſh. On the twenty-ſecond in the morning the troops were diſpoſed in the flat-bottomed boats, and rowed to different parts of the iſland, as if they intended to land in ſeveral places; by which means the attention of the enemy was ſo diſtracted, that they knew not where to expect the deſcent, and were obliged to divide their forces at random. In the mean time, brigadier Lambert pitched upon the rocky point of Lomaria, where captain Paterſon, at the head of Beauclerk's grenadiers, and captain Murray with a detachment of marines, climbed the precipice with amazing intrepidity, and ſuſtained the fire of a ſtrong body of the enemy, till they were ſupported by the reſt of the troops, who now landed very faſt, when the French were obliged to abandon their batteries. But this advantage was not gained without loſs. About forty men were killed, and many more wounded, among whom were colonel Mackenzie, and the captains Murray and Paterſon.

M. de Croix, the French governor, finding that the Engliſh troops were diſembarked, to the number of 8000 men, recalled all his detachments to Palais, and prepared for a vigorous defence. On the 23d of April the Engliſh troops were formed in columns, and began their march towards the capital. Next day general Hodgſon ordered a detachment of light horſe to take poſt at Sanzon; and on the 25th a corps of infantry took poſſeſſion of a village called Bordilla, where they began to throw up an intrenchment, but were diſlodged by a party of the enemy's grenadiers; the whole army, however, intrenched itſelf in the neighbourhood. The artillery and implements of ſiege being ſtill on board the fleet, and the ſtormy weather rendering it impoſſible to get them aſhore, M. de St. Croix took this opportunity to erect ſix redoubts for defending the avenues of Palais; and theſe works were finiſhed before general Hodgſon had it in his power to begin his operations. In the mean time he publiſhed a manifeſto, which was delivered to the inhabitants, importing, that if they would put themſelves under the protection of the Britiſh government, they ſhould be indulged with the free exerciſe of their religion, and retain all the rights and privileges which they had ever enjoyed. This promiſe had a great effect on the natives, for many of them immediately accepted the propoſal.

The French having now taken ſhelter within the walls of the town, and ſome mortars being brought up about the latter end of April, general Hodgſon began to play upon it. On the ſecond of May the beſiegers broke ground; but next night the garriſon made a ſally, and attacked the trenches with ſuch vigour, that the piquets on the left were put into diſorder. Major-general Crawford, who commanded the trenches, rallied the troops, and endeavoured, by his own example, to animate them; but on this occaſion they did not act with their uſual ſpirit; ſome hundreds were killed, and the major-general, with his two aids du camp, fell into the hands of the enemy. The engineers giving it as their opinion, that the works could not be properly advanced till the enemy's redoubts ſhould be taken, the general made the proper diſpoſitions for the attack, which began on the 13th at day-break. A terrible fire from four pieces of cannon, and above thirty cohorns, was poured into the redoubt on the right of the enemy's flank; after which a detachment of marines, ſupported by part of Loudon's regiment, advanced to the parapet, drove the French from the works, and, after a very obſtinate diſpute, took poſſeſſion of the place. The other five redoubts were all reduced in the ſame manner, and great ſlaughter was made of the enemy, who withdrew into the citadel; and ſuch was was the ardour of the aſſailants, that they entered the ſtreets of Palais with the fugitives, a great number of whom were made priſoners, and took poſſeſſion of the town, in which they found the French hoſpital, and ſome Engliſh priſoners, who had been taken in different ſallies. Every endeavour was now exerted for the reduction of the citadel, and by the end of May a breach was made, which by the 7th of June became practicable, when M. de St. Croix, being apprehenſive of a general aſſault, demanded a capitulation. This being granted him on the moſt honourable terms, the articles were immediately ſigned and executed, and Beauclerk's grenadiers took poſſeſſion of the citadel.

During theſe tranſactions, the congreſs already mentioned at Augſburgh was intended to be opened for a general peace; but the Engliſh miniſtry finding in the mean time that no faith could be placed in the proceedings of the French; and at the ſame time the Spaniſh ambaſſador preſenting a very unſeaſonable and even unprecedented interpoſition of Spain, the intention was rendered abortive, and the intended congreſs at Augſburgh never took place. The Spaniſh ambaſſador was called upon to diſavow ſo ſtrange a proceeding; but he returned a verbal, and was ſoon after authoriſed by his court to return a written anſwer, in which he openly avowed and juſtified the ſtep he had taken as entirely agreeable to the ſentiments of his maſter. He declared that the kings of France and Spain were united, not only by the ties of blood, but by a mutual intereſt. He applauded the humanity and greatneſs of mind which his moſt Chriſtian majeſty demonſtrated in the propoſition that was complained of. He inſiſted much on the ſincere deſire of peace, the only motive which influenced the conduct of the two monarchs; and he haughtily added, "That if his maſter had been governed by any other principles, his Catholic majeſty, giving full ſcope to his greatneſs, would have ſpoken for himſelf, and as became his dignity."

It plainly appeared, from the whole of this paper, that the court of Spain, as a ſort of party, was regularly appriſed of every ſtep that was taken in the negotiation; that her judgement was appealed to upon every point, and her authority called in aid to force the acceptance of the terms offered by France; that there was a perfect union of affections, intereſts and councils between thoſe two courts; and the miniſter of the former, ſo far from denying or palliating this conduct, ſeemed to glory in it.

Mr. Pitt was fully ſatisfied the intentions of Spain were by no means equivocal, and this partiality, which they ſtrongly avowed, not only by declarations but by facts, would drive them into all the meaſures of France. That a war on that account was abſolutely inevitable; and if, for the preſent moment, the Spaniards had rather delayed their declaration of war, than laid aſide their hoſtile intentions, it was in order to ſtrike the blow at their own time, and with the greater effect; that therefore their reaſons for delaying to act were the very motives, which ought to induce us to act with the utmoſt ſpeed and vigour: that we ought to conſider the evaſions of that court as a refuſal of ſatisfaction, and that refuſal as a declaration of war: that we ought from prudence, as well as from ſpirit, to ſecure to ourſelves the firſt blow; and to be practically convinced, that the early and effective meaſures, which had ſo large a ſhare in reducing France to the dependence upon Spain, would alſo be the fitteſt for deterring or diſabling Spain from affording any protection to France; that to carry on this war with vigour, it was only neceſſary to continue our preſent efforts; no new armament would be neceſſary; and that, if any war could provide its own reſources, it muſt be a war with Spain: that their flota had not yet arrived, and that the taking of it would at once diſable their hands and ſtrengthen ours. This procedure ſo ſuited to the dignity of the nation, and the inſults it had received, would be a leſſon to Spain, and to every other power, how they preſumed to dictate in our affairs, and to intermeddle with a menacing mediation, and an officiouſneſs as inſidious as it was audacious: and that we would allow our enemies, whether ſecret or declared, no time to think and recollect themſelves.

The ſentiments of moſt of the other miniſters, on this occaſion, were very different from thoſe of Mr. Pitt. They admitted that we ought not to be terrified from the aſſertion of our juſt demands, by the menaces of any power. They acknowledged that Spain had taken a very extraordinary and unjuſtifiable ſtep, but that we ought to allow, and even to wiſh for, an explanation. That this court, upon a ſober, yet ſpirited remonſtrance, might recall that raſh propoſition, into which they had been, perhaps, unwarily ſeduced by the artifices of France: that to ſhun a war upon a juſt occaſion was cowardice, but to provoke or court it was madneſs; and if to court a war was not in general a very wiſe meaſure, to deſire it with Spain, if poſſibly it could be avoided, was to overturn the moſt fundamental principles of the policy of both nations: that this deſire of adding war to war, and enemy to enemy, whilſt we had our hands already as full as they could hold, and whilſt all our faculties were ſtrained to the utmoſt pitch, was to over-calculate the national ſtrength of our country, which, however great, had its limits, and was not able to contend with all the world: that whilſt we were calling for new enemies, no mention was made of new allies, nor indeed of any new reſource whatever. To plunge into ſuch meaſures, in the manner propoſed, and upon no better grounds, could not fail to ſcandalize and to alarm all Europe; and we could poſſibly derive no advantage from this precipitate conduct, which could not be counter-balanced by the jealouſy and terror it would neceſſarily create in every nation near us. As to the ſeizure of the flota, it was not to be depended upon, as at the very time of that deliberation it might probably be ſafe in its harbour; and perhaps if we could ſucceed in ſeizing it, we might perform a ſervice not very agreeable to neutral nations, and as little advantageous to our own commerce. That if Spain, blind to her true intereſts, and miſled by French councils, ſhould, in a more deciſive manner, give into the deſigns of that court, and obſtinately refuſe a reaſonable ſatisfaction, it would be then true time to declare war, when all the neighbouring and impartial powers were convinced that we acted with as much temper as reſolution, and when every thinking man at home would be ſatisfied that we were not hurried into the hazards and expences of war, from an idea of chimerical heroiſm, but from inevitable neceſſity; and that in ſuch a caſe, we might depend upon the utmoſt ſupport which the nation could give to an adminiſtration that depended upon its ſtrength, and yet dreaded to waſte it wantonly, or to employ it unjuſtly.

Fired with indignation at this oppoſition, Mr. Pitt declared, "That this was the time for humbling the whole houſe of Bourbon: that if this opportunity was let ſlip, it might never be recovered; and if he could not prevail in this inſtance, he was reſolved it ſhould be the laſt time of his ſitting in that council. He thanked the miniſters of the late king for their ſupport: ſaid he was himſelf called to the miniſtry by the voice of the people, to whom he conſidered himſelf accountable for his conduct; and that he would no longer remain in a ſituation which made him reſponſible for meaſures he was no longer allowed to guide."

On the diviſion Mr. Pitt and lord Temple were the only voices in favour of the immediate declaration of war againſt the Spaniards, upon which, having declared their reaſons in writing, they reſigned their employments. Certain it is, that no man was ever better qualified to conduct the affairs of government than Mr. Pitt. To a liberal education, he had joined an extenſive reading; and his conduct in parliament convinced the Britiſh ſenate, that his memory was equal to his judgment and eloquence. His majeſty was ſo ſenſible of the vaſt abilities of this great man, that he ſettled on him a penſion of 3000l. per annum, for life, and for the life of his ſon, his lady being, at the ſame time, created a peereſs in her own right.

The moſt diſtinguiſhed domeſtic tranſactions of this year were the marriage and coronation of their preſent majeſties. The king, deſirous of giving all poſſible permanency to the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, reſolved to chuſe a conſort, whoſe participation might ſweeten the cares of government, and whoſe virtues ſhould make his private happineſs coincide with the ſatisfaction of his people. Struck with the character of the princeſs Charlotta-Sophia, princeſs of Mecklenburg-Strelitz *, he privately employed perſons, in whom he could confide, to aſcertain the report of her engaging qualifications: and being fully convinced of her perſonal attractions, her amiable diſpoſition, and ſuperior underſtanding, he made a formal demand of her in marriage. The propoſal of ſuch an illuſtrious alliance could not but be acceptable to the court of Mecklenburg; and the princeſs herſelf was not inſenſible of the extraordinary accompliſhments of the young monarch, who had thus diſtinguiſhed her by his affection and eſteem.

On the 8th of July, the members of the privy council being aſſembled to a very conſiderable number, the king acquainted them in a formal ſpeech, that, "having nothing ſo much at heart as to procure the welfare and happineſs of his people, and to render the ſame ſtable and permanent to poſterity, he had, ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne, turned his thoughts towards the choice of a princeſs for his conſort; and now, with great ſatisfaction, acquainted them, that, after the fulleſt information, and mature deliberation, he had come to a reſolution to demand in marriage the princeſs Charlotte of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, a princeſs diſtinguiſhed by every eminent virtue, and amiable endowment, whoſe illuſtrious line had conſtantly ſhewn the firmeſt zeal for the Proteſtant religion, and a particular attachment to his family: that he had judged it proper to communicate to them theſe his intentions, that they might be fully apprized of a matter ſo highly important to him and to his kingdoms, and which he perſuaded himſelf would be moſt acceptable to all his loving ſubjects."

This declaration was ſo agreeable to the council, that they unanimouſly requeſted it might be made public for the ſatisfaction of the nation in general. The earl of Harcourt was appointed ambaſſador plenipotentiary to the court of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, to demand the princeſs, and ſign the contract of marriage; and the royal yatchts were prepared, under convoy of a large ſquadron, commanded by lord Anſon, to convoy the future queen to England. In the mean time, her houſhold being eſtabliſhed, the ambaſſador ſet out for the continent on this important affair. The dutcheſſes of Ancaſter and Hamilton, and the counteſs of Effingham were appointed ladies of the bed-chamber, to attend her from the court of Mecklenburg in her paſſage to England; and embarking at Harwich, the whole fleet ſet ſail for Stade on the 8th day of Auguſt. The contract of marriage being ſigned by the earl of Harcourt at Strelitz, her royal higneſs was complimented by the ſtates of the country, and the deputies of the town. The ambaſſador and the ladies were magnificently entertained; and the event was celebrated with the moſt ſplendid rejoicings.

On the ſeventeenth day of the ſame month, the princeſs, accompanied by the reigning duke her brother, ſet out for Mirow, amidſt the tears and prayers of all ranks of people, the poor in particular, whoſe zealous patroneſs ſhe had always ſhewn herſelf. Next day ſhe arrived at Perleberg, where the count de Gotter complimented her in the name of the Pruſſian monarch. From thence ſhe continued her journey by Leutzen to Gourde, and on the 22d reached Stade, under a general diſcharge of cannon, and amidſt the acclamations of the people. She was received by all the burgeſſes in arms: the whole town was illuminated: triumphal arches were erected; ſeveral of the principal ladies preſented her with verſes on her approaching nuptials; and the public joy was expreſſed by every poſſible demonſtration. On the twenty-third ſhe embarked in the yacht at Cuxhaven, where ſhe was ſaluted by the Britiſh ſquadron aſſembled for her convoy. The moment ſhe entered the cabin, ſhe ſaluted the officers of the different ſhips, who had crouded the deck, in order to have the pleaſure of ſeeing her, and were all charmed with her polite and eaſy behaviour.

In the interval the minds of the Engliſh people were wound up to the higheſt pitch of expectation. The king having ſignified his intention that the princeſs ſhould land at Greenwich, both ſides of the Thames were for ſeveral days lined with innumerable multitudes. The river itſelf was covered with pleaſure-boats, wherries, and other veſſels filled with ſpectators, and cruiſing between Blackwall and Graveſend, in order to meet and welcome their future queen's arrival. Seats and ſcaffolds were prepared along the ſhore for ſeveral miles; and all the publicans reſiding near the banks of the river, both in Kent and Eſſex, were enriched by an amazing conflux of company. Every individual obſerved the wind as earneſtly as if his whole fortune had depended upon the firſt change of weather; and London poured forth her ſwarms like an immenſe hive during the firſt gleams of vernal ſunſhine. All the medicinal wells, to which wealthy people reſort in the ſummer, either for health or pleaſure, were now deſerted; and numbers flocked to the metropolis from all parts of the united kingdom to ſee their ſovereign's bride, and be eye-witneſſes of the enſuing coronation. After a tedious voyage of ten days, during which the fleet was expoſed to three different ſtorms, and often in danger of being driven on the coaſt of Norway, the princeſs landed on the ſeventh day of September in the afternoon at Harwich, where ſhe was received by the the mayor and aldermen in their formalities. She advanced with her attendants by the way of Colcheſter to Witham, and lodged at a houſe belonging to the earl of Abercorn, where ſhe gratified the curioſity of the people with the moſt obliging condeſcenſion.

In the mean time, the king, whoſe ardour far ſurpaſſed the impatience of his ſubjects, being apprized by couriers of her arrival, diſpatched his own coaches, with a party of the horſe-guards, who met her at Rumford, and conducted her to London, through innumerable crouds of people, aſſembled on the road to gratify their curioſity and welcome her arrival. Their applauſe was ſignified in tumultuous acclamations, which attended her ſeveral miles; and the eagerneſs of the populace was even carried to a degree of licentious zeal, which the guards could hardly reſtrain within the bounds of decent reſpect.

Thus accompanied by great numbers in carriages, on horſeback and on foot, this amiable princeſs proceeded by Shoreditch-church, up Old-ſtreet to the city-road, acroſs Iſlington, along the new road into Hyde-park, and down Conſtitution-hill, to the garden-gate of the palace of St. James, where ſhe was handed out of her coach by the duke of Devonſhire, in quality of lord-chamberlain. At the gate ſhe was received by the duke of York, and in the garden ſhe was met by the king himſelf, whoſe looks declared the tranſports of his joy. When ſhe made her obeiſance, he raiſed her by the hand, which he kiſſed, and then led her up ſtairs to the palace, where they dined together, with the whole royal family. At nine the nuptial ceremony was performed by Dr. Secker, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the royal chapel, which had been magnificently decorated for the occaſion. Beſides the royal family, all the great officers of ſtate, the nobility, peers and peereſſes, and the foreign miniſters, attended at the ſervice, the concluſion of which was announced to the people by the diſcharge of the artillery at the Park and the Tower; and the cities of London and Weſtminſter were illuminated in honour of this auſpicious event. Nothing was now ſeen at court but ſplendor and ſatisfaction. The great acceſſion of domeſtic happineſs that the king enjoyed in this connection, enabled him to ſupport the fatigue of receiving freſh addreſſes of felicitation, which were uſhered in as uſual by the city of London, and preſented to him by the clergy, the univerſities, the diſſenters, the cities, towns, and corporations in all parts of the Britiſh dominions.

The ceremony of the nuptials was ſoon ſucceeded by that of the coronation. Weſtminſter-hall was prepared for the royal banquet, by removing the courts of judicature, boarding the floor, erecting canopies, and building three rows of galleries for the accommodation of ſpectators. A platform was laid between the Hall and Weſtminſter-abbey, where the king is actually crowned. All the houſes and ſtreets within ſight of the proceſſion were faced and crowded with benches and ſcaffolding, which extended on both ſides within the Abbey from the weſtern entrance almoſt up to the choir. The proſpect formed by theſe occaſional erections, which were ſupriſingly calculated for ſecurity and convenience, could not fail to awaken the expectation of the ſpectator for ſomething ſolemn and ſublime: but when all theſe benches were occupied by above 200,000 people, of both ſexes, arrayed in gay apparel, they filled the mind with an aſtoniſhing idea of the wealth and populouſneſs of Great Britain, and almoſt outvied the proceſſion, notwithſtanding the incredible profuſion of jewels and finery, and all the other circumſtances of pomp by which it was diſtinguiſhed. The principal objects, however, ſtill maintained their importance in the eyes and boſoms of all the ſpectators, who could not, without the moſt lively emotions of admiration and joy, behold ſuch attractive accompliſhments in the royal pair, whoſe virtues adorned the crowns they were deſtined to wear.

The oſtentation of this year was cloſed with the anniverſary pageants that celebrate the election of a new lord mayor in the city of London. As the kings and queens of Great Britain are always entertained at Guildhall by the magiſtrate who happens to be choſen in the year of the coronation, extraordinary preparations were made for the reception of their majeſties; who, with a great number of the nobility, honoured the banquet, in the midſt of the moſt tumultuous expreſſions of loyalty and attachment that ever were known on any like occaſion.

The new parliament met on the 3d of November, and, as no miniſterial influence had been uſed in electing the members of which it was compoſed, it undoubtedly deſerved the appellation of a free parliament. The king, being ſeated on the throne, commanded the attendance of the commons; to whom he ſignified his pleaſure, by the mouth of the lord-chancellor, that they ſhould return to their houſe, and chuſe a new ſpeaker. Accordingly their unanimous choice fell upon Sir John Cuſt, a gentleman of extenſive knowledge and diſtinguiſhed probity. His majeſty, repairing again to the houſe of peers on the ſixth, approved of the ſpeaker, and harangued the parliament as follows:

" My lords and gentlemen,

" At the opening of the firſt parliament, ſummoned and elected under my authority, I with pleaſure take notice of an event, which has made me completely happy, and given univerſal joy to my loving ſubjects. My marriage with a princeſs, eminently diſtinguiſhed by every virtue, and amiable endowment, whilſt it affords me all poſſible domeſtic comfort, cannot but highly contribute to the happineſs of my kingdoms; which has been, and always ſhall be, my firſt object in every action of my life.

" It has been my earneſt wiſh that this firſt period of my reign might be marked with another felicity; the reſtoring of the bleſſings of peace to my people, and putting an end to the calamities of war, under which ſo great a part of Europe ſuffers. But though overtures were made to me, and my good brother and ally the king of Pruſſia, by the ſeveral belligerant powers, in order to a general pacification, for which purpoſe a congreſs was appointed; and propoſitions were made to me by France, for a particular peace with that crown, which were followed by an actual negotiation; yet that congreſs hath not hitherto taken place, and the negotiation with France is entirely broken off.

" The ſincerity of my diſpoſition to effectuate this good work has been manifeſted in the progreſs of it; and I have the conſolation to reflect, that the continuance of the war, and the farther effuſion of Chriſtian blood, to which it was the deſire of my heart to put a ſtop, cannot with juſtice be imputed to me.

" Our military operations have been in no degree ſuſpended or delayed; and it has pleaſed God to grant us farther important ſucceſſes, by the conqueſts of the iſlands of Belleiſle and Dominico; and by the reduction of Pondicherry, which hath in a manner annihilated the French power in the Eaſt-Indies. In other parts, where the enemy's numbers were greatly ſuperior, their principal deſigns and projects have been generally diſappointed, by a conduct which does the higheſt honour to the diſtinguiſhed capacity of my general prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, and by the valour of my troops. The magnanimity and ability of the king of Pruſſia have eminently appeared in reſiſting ſuch numerous armies, and ſurmounting ſuch great difficulties.

“ In this ſituation, I am glad to have an opportunity of receiving the trueſt information of the ſenſe of my people, by a new choice of their repreſentatives. I am fully perſuaded you will agree with me in opinion, that the ſteady exertion of our moſt vigorous efforts, in every part where the enemy may ſtill be attacked with advantage, is the only means that can be productive of ſuch a peace, as may with reaſon be expected from our ſucceſſes. It is, therefore, my fixed reſolution, with your concurrence and ſupport, to carry on the war, in the moſt effectual manner, for the intereſt and advantage of my kingdoms; and to maintain, to the utmoſt of my power, the good faith and honour of my crown, by adhering firmly to the engagements entered into with my allies. In this I will perſevere, until my enemies, moved by their own loſſes and diſtreſſes, and touched with the miſeries of ſo many nations, ſhall yield to the equitable conditions of an honourable peace; in which caſe, as well as in the proſecution of the war, I do aſſure you, no conſideration whatever ſhall make me depart from the true intereſts of theſe my kingdoms, and the honour and dignity of my crown.”

“ Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

“ I am heartily ſorry, that the neceſſity of large ſupplies appears ſo clearly from what has already been mentioned. The proper eſtimates for the ſervices of the enſuing year ſhall be laid before you; and I deſire you to grant me ſuch ſupplies as may enable me to proſecute the war with vigour, and as your welfare and ſecurity, in the preſent critical juncture, require, that we may happily put the laſt hand to this great work. Whatſoever you give ſhall be faithfully applied.

“ I dare ſay your affectionate regard for me and the queen makes you go before me in what I am next to mention; the making an adequate and honourable proviſion for her ſupport, in caſe ſhe ſhould ſurvive me. This is what not only her royal dignity, but her own merit calls for, and I earneſtly recommend it to your conſideration.

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ I have ſuch confidence in the zeal and good affections of this parliament, that I think it quite ſuperfluous to uſe any exhortations to excite you to a right conduct. I will only add, that there never was a ſituation in which unanimity, firmneſs, and diſpatch, were more neceſſary for the ſafety, honour, and true intereſt of Great Britain.”

To this ſpeech each houſe preſented to his majeſty a moſt loyal and affectionate addreſs, in which they aſſured him he might rely on their exerting themſelves, in the moſt effectual manner, to maintain the dignity of his crown, and oblige the enemy to accept of an honourable peace; that they would make ſuch ample and honourable proviſion for his illuſtrious conſort, as might enable her to ſupport her royal dignity with proper luſtre, in caſe ſhe ſhould ſurvive his majeſty: and that his faithful commons would grant ſupplies adequate to the ſeveral ſervices that his majeſty's wiſdom ſhould think neceſſary. “ That, ſenſible of the difficult criſis in which they were aſſembled, they were determined to concur with the greateſt firmneſs and unanimity, in whatever might contribute to the public welfare, might tend to defeat the views and expectations of their enemies, and convince the world, that there are no difficulties which his majeſty's wiſdom and perſeverance, with the aſſiſtance of his parliament, could not ſurmount.”

The commons, after preſenting their addreſs, immediately proceeded to ſettle the ſupplies, which amounted to 18,229,135l. 18s. and 11d.½. But they had hardly ſettled this important meaſure, when advice arrived from the earl of Briſtol, his majeſty's ambaſſador at Madrid, importing, that having demanded a categorical declaration with reſpect to the part his majeſty intended to act in the diſputes between the courts of London and Verſailles, he had received at firſt a very evaſive and unſatisfactory anſwer. He added, that on repeating his remonſtrance, he was anſwered, that the Spaniſh monarch had already taken his meaſures in concert with the court of Verſailles, and that war was that moment declared againſt Great Britain; and therefore, that he might retire home, and when he thought proper.

Soon after the count de Fuentes, ambaſſador from Spain at the court of London, delivered to the earl of Egremont, who had ſucceeded Mr. Pitt as ſecretary of ſtate for the ſouthern department, a paper calculated for ſowing jealouſies and fomenting diviſions among the ſubjects of Great Britain, and might properly be ſtiled, “ His Catholic majeſty's declaration of war againſt Mr. Pitt.”

A. D. 1762. The firſt thing of national importance this year was, a declaration of war againſt Spain, which was performed with the uſual ceremonies on the 4th of January. In conſequence of which letters of marque were iſſued, and preparations made, with the greateſt diligence and diſpatch, to humble the pride and inſolence of the Spaniſh monarch.

On the 19th of January the king went to the houſe of peers, and delivered a ſpeech to both houſes; in which he obſerved, that he had aſſured his parliament of his ſincere diſpoſition to put an end to the calamities of war, and to reſtore the public tranquillity on ſolid and laſting foundations, that no impartial perſon either at home or abroad could ſuſpect him of unneceſſarily kindling a new war in Europe. But notwithſtanding this he acquainted them, “ That ſince their receſs, he had found himſelf indiſpenſibly obliged to declare war againſt Spain. He obſerved, that his own conduct, ſince his acceſſion to the throne, as well as that of the late king his grandfather, had been ſo full of good-will and friendſhip, ſo averſe to the laying hold of ſeveral juſt grounds of complaint, which might have been alledged, and ſo attentive to the advantage of the Catholic king and his family, that it was matter of the greateſt ſurprize to find that engagements had, in this conjuncture, been entered into between that crown and France; and a treaty made to unite all the branches of the houſe of Bourbon in the moſt ambitious and dangerous deſigns againſt the commerce and independency of the reſt of Europe, and particularly of theſe kingdoms. He expreſſed his reliance on the divine bleſſing on the juſtice of his cauſe, on the zealous and powerful aſſiſtance of his faithful ſubjects, and the concurrence of his allies, who muſt find themſelves involved in the pernicious and extenſive projects of his enemies. He added, that he left theſe conſiderations with his parliament, full of the juſteſt confidence, that the honour of his crown, and the intereſts of his kingdoms were ſafe in their hands.”

Both houſes immediately took this ſpeech into conſideration, and each preſented an addreſs full of the moſt endearing expreſſions, aſſuring his majeſty that they would afford him the moſt conſtant and adequate ſupport.

The public buſineſs being finiſhed, on the 4th of June the king went to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he expreſſed the higheſt approbation of the zeal, unanimity and diſpatch, which had ſo ſignally appeared in the courſe of their proceedings.

Having thus mentioned the principal domeſtic tranſactions of this year, let us now attend to affairs abroad.

A ſhort time before Mr. Pitt's reſignation, he had determined to employ a very conſiderable part of the Britiſh forces againſt the French colonies in the Weſt Indies. Nor was this reſolution merely ſpeculative; a ſtrong ſquadron was fitted out, and ſailed from Spithead in the month of October in the preceding year. This armament had under their convoy a number of tranſports with four battallions from Belleiſle, to join at Barbadoes a ſtrong body of forces from North America, together with ſome regiments and volunteers from Guadaloupe and the Leeward Iſlands, and proceed in concert with the fleet already on that ſtation, and make a conqueſt of Martinico, which, ſince the attempt of general Hopſon, had been ſtrengthened with new fortifications, and a ſtrong body of troops.

The armament from North-America and England, under the command of major-general Monckton and rear-admiral Rodney, amounting to eighteen battalions, and as many ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, bombs, and fireſhips, having rendezvouſed at Barbadoes, ſailed from thence on the 5th of January, and on the 8th the fleet and tranſports anchored in St. Ann's bay, in the eaſtern part of Martinico, the men of war having firſt ſilenced ſome batteries which the enemy had erected on that part of the coaſt. In the courſe of this ſervice, the Raiſonable, a ſhip of the line, was, by the ignorance of the pilot, run upon a reef of rocks, from whence ſhe could not be got off; but the men were happily ſaved, together with her ſtores and artillery.

General Monckton, not thinking this a proper place for diſembarking, detached two brigades under the command of the brigadiers Haldimand and Grant, to the bay of Petite Anſe, where a battery was cannonaded, and taken, by the ſeamen and marines. Theſe brigades were ſoon followed by the whole army, and the reſt of the ſquadron; when ſome other batteries being ſilenced, general Monckton, with the forces, landed, on the 16th, in the neighbourhood of the Cas des Navires, and having received a reinforcement of two battalions of marines from the ſquadron, he determined to beſiege the town of Fort Royal; but previous to this attempt, he found it neceſſary to attack the heights of Garnier and Tortueſon, which the enemy had fortified, and ſeemed reſolved to defend to the laſt extremity. For this purpoſe he raiſed a battery to protect the paſſage of a ravine that ſeparated him from thoſe heights, and made every other diſpoſition for the attack, which began on the 24th of June. Early in the morning brigadier Grant, at the head of the grenadiers, ſuſtained by lord Rollo's brigade, attacked the advanced poſts of the enemy under the briſk fire of the batteries; while brigadier Rufane, with his brigade, reinforced by the marines, marched up on the right to attack the redoubts that were raiſed along the ſhore; and the light infantry under colonel Scot, ſupported by the brigade of Walſh, advanced on the left of a plantation, in order, if poſſible, to turn the enemy; in which attempt they ſucceeded, and by nine in the morning they were in poſſeſſion of the Morne Tortueſon, and all the redoubts and batteries with which it was fortified. The enemy retired in confuſion to the town of Fort Royal, and to the Morne Garnier, which being more high and inacceſſible than the other, was deemed impregnable. During the conteſt for the poſſeſſion of Tortueſon, brigadier Haldimand, at the head of his brigade, with two battalions of Highlanders, and a corps of light infantry under major Leland, were ordered to paſs the ravine ſome way to the left, and turn a body of the enemy poſted on the oppoſite heights, hoping, by that method to divide their forces; but the country being difficult of acceſs, it was late before this paſſage was effected. In the mean time, the general, perceiving the enemy giving way on all ſides, ordered colonel Scot's light infantry, with Walſh's brigade, and a diviſion of the grenadiers, to advance on the left to a plantation, from whence they drove the enemy, and then took poſſeſſion of an advantageous poſt oppoſite to the Morne Garnier. Next day batteries were began to be erected againſt the citadel of Fort Royal, but in the execution of this work our troops were greatly haraſſed by the enemy's fire from Morne Garnier; and on the 27th, about four in the afternoon, they made a furious attack with the greateſt part of their forces, on the poſts defended by the light infantry and brigadier Haldimand; but met with ſo warm a reception, that they ſoon retired in diſorder. Such was the ardour of the Engliſh troops, that they paſſed the ravine with the fugitives, ſeized their batteries, and took poſſeſſion of the ground, being ſuſtained by the brigade of Walſh, and the grenadiers under Grant, who, at the beginning of the attack, marched up to their aſſiſtance. Major Leland, with his light infantry, finding no reſiſtance on the left, advanced to the redoubt, which was abandoned, and the brigadiers Walſh, Grant, and Haldimand, moved up in order to ſupport him; thus by nine at night the Britiſh troops were in poſſeſſion of this ſtrong poſt. Next day the governor, perceiving the Engliſh employed in erecting batteries on the different heights which commanded the citadel, ordered the chamade to be beat, and ſurrendered by capitulation. On the 4th of February, the gate was delivered up to the victors, and next morning the garriſon, amounting to 800 men, marched out with all the honours of war. Immediately after the reduction of Fort Royal, deputations were ſent from different parts of the iſland, requeſting a capitulation: but M. de la Touche, the governor general, retired with his forces to St. Pierre, which he propoſed to defend to the laſt extremity. On the 7th, Pidgeon iſland, which was ſtrongly fortified, and eſteemed one of the beſt defences of the harbour, ſurrendered at the firſt ſummons. This conqueſt was obtained at the ſmall expence of about 400 men, including a few officers, killed and wounded in the different attacks; but the loſs of the enemy was very conſiderable.

General Monckton was juſt ſetting out for the reduction of St. Pierre, when two deputies arrived from M. de la Touche, with propoſals of capitulation for the whole iſland, which being agreed to, on the 14th the terms were ſettled, and the capitulation ſigned. On the 16th the Engliſh commander took poſſeſſion of St. Pierre, and all the poſts in that neighbourhood; while the French governor-general with M. Rouille, the lieutenant-governor, the ſtaff officers, and about 320 grenadiers, were embarked on board ſome tranſports, and conveyed to France.

The ſurrender of Martinico was followed by that of all the dependent iſlands, by which means the Engliſh were the ſole poſſeſſors of all the Caribbees, and held that chain of innumerable iſlands which form an immenſe bow, extending from the eaſtern point of Hiſpaniola almoſt to the continent of South-America.

An important object now preſented itſelf to the Britiſh miniſtry, namely, that of carrying the war againſt Spain into the Weſt-Indies, from whence all their riches are derived. The Havannah, the center of their Indian commerce, was at this time ſtrongly defended. and it was reckoned impoſſible to take it; but nothing was too difficult for the Britiſh forces to undertake. Nineteen ſhips of the line, with many ſmaller veſſels, were fitted out, under the command of admiral Pocock; and about 10,000 land forces, commanded by the earl of Albemarle.

Perhaps no expedition was ever attended with more dangerous conſequences, nor any conducted with greater prudence. At firſt, the admiral intended to have landed on the ſouth ſide of the iſland of Cuba, where it was ſuppoſed he might fall in with the Spaniſh galleons; but that opinion was over-ruled in a council of war, and the fleet continued on a courſe of 700 miles, in a very dangerous ſea. The admiral had no pilot to direct him; but being in poſſeſſion of an excellent chart of thoſe ſeas, taken by lord Anſon, he depended on his own judgment, and diſpatched a ſhip to make proper enquiries whether there was a probability of paſſing. On the return of the ſhip, the admiral ordered the fleet to weigh anchor, and hoiſt ſail, continuing under way, in three diviſions, conſiſting of the ſhips of the line, the frigates, and the tranſports. On the 9th of June, they got out of theſe dangerous ſeas, and came within ſight of St. Jago, on the eaſtern extremity of the iſland of Cuba. St. Jago is the capital of Cuba; but although the courts of juſtice are held there, yet the Havannah is the ſeat of commerce, and, conſequently, of the utmoſt importance. From St. Jago the fleet continued their voyage to the Havannah; but when they arrived there, they found they had more difficulties to encounter than they had as yet imagined.

The paſſage to the harbour is extremely narrow, and above half a mile in length, at the end of which is a large baſon, where a thouſand ſhips may ride in ſafety. On one ſide of the narrow paſſage is the Moro Caſtle, a ſtrong fort built for the defence of the place, and to prevent any ſhips from coming in but ſuch as have paſſports. To the weſtward of the harbour ſtands the town, ſtrongly fortified with a parapet, redoubts and baſtions; the whole being ſurrounded by a ditch, and cannon placed in proper diviſions. The difficulties they had to encounter ſeemed inſurmountable; and the admiral, in order to divert the attention of the enemy, bore away, with a large part of the fleet, to the weſtward, where he made as if he would have landed; while commodore Keppel and captain Hervey landed the forces on the eaſt of the harbour, without the loſs of a man, although the Spaniards had a conſiderable fleet then lying at anchor, which might have done them great damage.

The earl of Albemarle divided the army into eight brigades; one of which, under the command of general Elliot, was ordered to march up the country, in order to prevent any ſupplies being ſent to the town, and to cover the ſiege in the rear. General Keppel and colonel Howe were ordered to make a diverſion on the weſt of the town; while the earl of Albemarle, with the main body of the forces, attacked the Moro Caſtle, that being the grand object in view, becauſe it defended the entrance to the harbour.

Thoſe who will compare the account of this famous ſiege with the retreat of Xenophon, or the paſſage of Hannibal over the Alps, will prefer the valour of the Britiſh troops to either that of the Greeks or Carthaginians. There was no freſh water to be had; and as the men were obliged to cut their way through woods, and drag the cannon along with them, ſo many of them died on the ſpot through the heat of the climate, and the fatigues they underwent in the ſervice of their country. But courage and perſeverance overcame all difficulties; for batteries were erected in the night on the riſing grounds, to cover the approaches, and make way for the reduction of the place. To do juſtice to the Spaniards, it muſt be acknowledged that they defended the place with great bravery, and, for ſome time, the fire was, in a manner, equal on both ſides. On the 29th of June, in the evening, they made a ſally; but although they acted with great courage and reſolution, they were obliged to retreat, with the loſs of above 300 men.

All the batteries being now opened, the admiral ordered the Cambridge, the Dragon, and the Marlborough, to ſail up to the fort, under the command of captain Hervey; and then a moſt dreadful firing began. The Spaniſh artillery was well conducted, and it appeared that the beſt officers under their government were at this time at the Havannah. As the Moro Caſtle was ſituated on a high rock, the ſhips could not, after ſeven hours firing, make the leaſt impreſſion on it. In the attempt the Engliſh loſt 130 men, which is not to be wondered at when we conſider that, beſides the Moro Caſtle, they had another battery playing upon them from an oppoſite fort, which galled them exceſſively; ſo that they were obliged to retire, otherwiſe they would have been deſtroyed. Among thoſe killed in this hazardous attempt, was captain Gooſtrey, a brave officer, who had, on many former occaſions, given the moſt ſignal proofs of his courage; but duty, and the love of glory were the ſole objects he had in view.

As ſoon as the Engliſh men of war were gone to rejoin the fleet, the Spaniards turned their attention to the eaſtern part of the fort, and reſolved to hold out to the laſt extremity; ſo that the Engliſh officers found the reduction of the place would be a work of time. Indeed, an unforeſeen accident happened at this time, which tended, in a great meaſure, towards retarding their operations, namely, the reduction of a battery, which took fire by the exploſion of a mortar. Sickneſs likewiſe rendered many of the men incapable of acting, and the few who remained in health were fatigued beyond deſcription. Add to this, the want of freſh proviſions, the heat of the climate, and the inſupportable fatigue which both officers and men underwent, by which many gave themſelves up to deſpair, and ſunk under the load of their miſery.

About this time, however, they received a very ſeaſonable ſupply; for a fleet arrived from New York, and another from Jamaica, having on board a large quantity of proviſions, which gave new life and ſpirits both to the army and navy.

It was now evident that no time was to be loſt, and that, unleſs an immediate attack was made, the men would become diſpirited, and the whole enterprize ſink into nothing. It was therefore agreed that the miners ſhould be employed; but they had a deep ditch to croſs, ſo that it was with the utmoſt difficuly they got over it, and entrenched themſelves under a rock, where they were not perceived by the enemy.

The governor of the Havannah, ſenſible that the Engliſh would make themſelves maſters of the Moro Caſtle, unleſs he could ſend freſh reinforcements to it, ordered 1200 men to be put on board the boats in the harbour, and to land and attack the Engliſh. Accordingly, theſe men landed, and attacked our forces in three different places, but with ſo little ſucceſs, that upwards of 400 were left dead on the ſpot; ſome were drowned, and the reſt, with much difficulty, ſaved themſelves by getting into their boats.

On the 30th of July the miners blew up a part of the wall, by which a breach was made; and although it was ſmall, yet the engineers were of opinion that the army might attack it. The Engliſh troops now mounted the breach in ſuch good order, that the enemy became intimidated, after above 400 of them had been killed, among whom was the marquis de Goulales, the ſecond in command, a brave officer, who had exerted himſelf to the utmoſt during the ſiege, and died animating the ſoldiers to defend the place. The ſame fate attended Don Lewis de Velaſco, the commander in chief, who diſdaining to aſk quarter, collected as many men as yet remained, and making a ſtand with them, received a mortal wound while holding out his ſword to the conquerors.

The Engliſh being now in poſſeſſion of the fort, which had coſt the lives of many brave men, during a ſiege of 44 days, turned the cannon againſt the town. Several batteries were, at the ſame time, erected on the riſing grounds near the town; and the earl of Albemarle being willing to ſave as many lives as poſſible, ſent a meſſage to the governor, deſiring him to ſurrender, as it would be in vain to hold out any longer; but the governor, though he returned a polite anſwer to the earl, yet refuſed to comply, declaring that he would hold it out to the laſt extremity. In conſequence of this the firing immediately began on both ſides; but in a little more than ſix hours all the artillery belonging to the enemy were ſilenced, and the north baſtion of the city was almoſt diſabled. This reduced the Spaniard to reaſon; and, accordingly, about two in the afternoon, white flags were diſplayed all round the place, and in a ſhort time a flag of truce arrived at the head quarters with propoſals for a capitulation. The terms, however, which the Spaniſh governor thought proper to tranſmit, were not granted: he demanded, that the ſhips in the harbour ſhould be ſent to Spain, and that the harbour ſhould be declared neutral. Theſe appeared rather the demands of a conqueror than a fallen enemy: they were, therefore, refuſed, and hoſtilities were ordered to be renewed. This produced the deſired effect; the enemy thought proper to recede from their demands, and to treat upon very different terms.

The capitulation was ſigned on the 13th of Auguſt, by which the inhabitants were ſecured in the enjoyment of their own laws and religion, as well as in their private property; and next day the Engliſh took poſſeſſion of this important conqueſt. The Spaniſh garriſon, which was reduced to about 700 men, including officers, was permitted to march out with the honours of war; and it was ſtipulated that they and the ſailors ſhould be conveyed to Old Spain. About 500 of the Britiſh troops, including fifteen officers, were killed, or died of their wounds, during the progreſs of this ſiege, and about ſeven hundred, among whom were nine officers, were carried off by ſickneſs. The conquerors found in the place great quantities of artillery, ſmall arms, ammunition, and warlike ſtores. Twelve ſhips of the line, two upon the ſtocks, and ſeveral trading veſſels likewiſe fell into the hands of the Engliſh. But beſides theſe captures they acquired to the amount of about three millions ſterling in ſilver, tobacco and valuable merchandize, collected on his catholic majeſty's account; which at once rendered the enemy's loſs irreparable, and indemnified the Britiſh nation for the expence of this expedition, which was carried into execution with the utmoſt alacrity, and afforded many inſtances of true courage and capacity.

The conqueſt of the Havannah was not the only inſtance in which the arms of Great Britain triumphed over thoſe of Spain. A ſcheme had been projected by the miniſtry for making a deſcent on the iſland of Manilla in the Eaſt-Indies. The city of Manilla, ſituated on an iſland of the ſame name, is extenſive, populous, and well fortified. It is the center of the Spaniſh trade, and the port from whence two large ſhips are annually ſent acroſs the vaſt Pacific Ocean to the port of Acapulco, one of the ſea-ports of Mexico, laden with ſpices, ſtuffs, jewels, and other rich merchandize of India.

The attempt was to be made on this iſland by part of the ſquadron of vice-admiral Corniſh, and the troops deſtined for the expedition were to be under the command of brigadier-general Draper. The latter conſiſted of one regiment, with a company of the royal artillery; to which were added, by the governor of Madraſs, ſome able officers, about thirty men of the company's artillery, 600 ſeapoys, one company of caffres, one of topazes, one of pioneers, and two companies of French deſerters, together with a few hundreds of laſcars, for the uſe of the engineers. The preparations being fully compleated, captain Grant, in the Sea-horſe, was detached to the entrance of the Chineſe ſea, with orders to intercept all veſſels bound for Manilla, that the enemy might not get any information of their deſign, and conſequently be unprepared for reſiſting the attack.

Theſe precautions being taken, admiral Corniſh ſailed about the beginning of Auguſt, in two diviſions, and on the 19th arrived at Malacca, where the fleet was watered, and a large quantity of rattans collected for making gabions. On the 23d of September they anchored in the bay of Manilla, where they found the enemy but ill prepared for a defence, and greatly alarmed at this unexpected viſit. The governor was the archbiſhop, who aſſumes the title of captain-general of the Philippine iſlands: but the garriſon, conſiſting of 800 men, was commanded by the marquis de Villa Medina, who now reinforced it with a body of 10,000 Indians, from the province of Pampanga; but theſe were undiſciplined, and formed rather a rude rabble of people, than an army.

The admiral, on ſounding the coaſt, was fortunate enough to find a convenient place for landing the troops, about two miles to the ſouthward of the city of Manilla; and immediately made the proper diſpoſitions for that purpoſe. The three frigates, Argo, Sea-horſe and Seaford, were ſtationed very near the ſhore, to cover the deſcent, three diviſions of the forces were put on board the boats of the fleet, conducted by the captains Parker, Pempanſeldt, and Brereton of the navy, and ſoon landed at the church and village of Malata. This was the time for the enemy to have rendered the attempt abortive, and they accordingly aſſembled in great numbers to oppoſe the deſcent; but the covering frigates kept ſuch a continual fire of cannon and ſmall arms, that they ſoon diſperſed and ſought their ſafety in a precipitate flight; ſo that the troops were diſembarked without the loſs of a ſingle man. Next day the general took poſſeſſion of the Polveriſta, a ſmall fort deſerted by the enemy, and which now proved an excellent place of arms for covering the landing of the ſtores and artillery. The curate's houſe was made the head quarters, and guarded by the 79th regiment. The church of the Hermita was occupied by colonel Monſon, with an advanced party of 200 men. The marines were left at the Malata, in the neighbourhood of the Polveriſta, to ſecure the communication with the fleet, and protect the ſtores and artillery. In the mean time a body of men approached within an hundred yards of the town, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the church of St. Jago, which they maintained, notwithſtanding it was expoſed to the continual fire of the enemy. The admiral, on the 26th, landed a battalion of ſeamen, who were poſted between the head quarters and marines. Nor were the Spaniards idle on this occaſion. They were determined, if poſſible, to prevent the deſtruction of their city: and, accordingly, 400 of their troops, under the command of the chevalier Fayette, with two field pieces, marched up on the right of the Engliſh advanced poſt, the flank of which they began to cannonade; but their attempt was ſoon rendered abortive: Colonel Monſon, at the head of the piquets, and a ſmall reinforcement of marines, attacked them with ſo much fury, that they retreated with the greateſt precipitation, leaving one of their field pieces behind them.

The Engliſh general, from the ſmallneſs of his army, was obliged to confine his operations to one part of the town; and therefore determined to make his attack in the front. This part was ſecured by the baſtions of St. Diego and St. Andrew, a ravelin covering the royal gate, a wet ditch, a covered way, and a glacis. The baſtions were in good order, furniſhed with a great number of braſs cannon; but the ravelin was not mounted with cannon, nor the covered way in ſufficient repair to reſiſt the attempts of a regular army; the glacis was too low, and the ditch was carried round the capital of St. Diego. The breadth of the ditch was about thirty yards, but the depth of water did not exceed five feet. It was therefore determined to ford the ditch; and accordingly a detachment, under the command of captain Fletcher, attempted and happily performed this dangerous enterprize, with the loſs of three men only, though expoſed to the whole fire of the enemy.

The ſoldiers had no ſooner paſſed the ditch, than the bombardment was begun, and continued day and night without intermiſſion, and on the 29th the admiral ordered the Elizabeth and Falmouth to lie as near the city as the depth of water would permit, and enfilade the enemy's front, in order to ſecond the operations of the beſiegers. The taſk was executed with great intrepidity; the ſhallows indeed kept the ſhips at too great a diſtance to anſwer the purpoſe entirely; but their fire was ſo terrible to the inhabitants, that they were thrown into the utmoſt confuſion.

On the 1ſt and 2d of October the weather became ſo ſtormy that the whole ſquadron was in danger of being loſt. The South-Sea-Caſtle ſtoreſhip was driven aſhore, but even in this ſituation ſhe continued to perform very great ſervice, by enfilading the whole beach to the ſouthward, and over-awing a large body of Indians, who threatened to attack the Polveriſta and the magazines of the beſiegers, at the Malata. The heavy rains now deſcended in torrents, but did not prevent the troops and ſeamen from erecting batteries. At the ſame time they drew a parallel and communication from thence to the advanced poſt at the church, and eſtabliſhed a ſpacious place of arms on the left of it, not far from the ſea beach. They alſo opened a battery againſt the left face of St. Diego's baſtion, and kept ſuch an inceſſant fire, and pointed their cannon in ſo maſterly a manner, that, in a ſhort time, twelve pieces of ordnance mounted on the baſtion were totally ſilenced, and the enemy obliged to abandon the works. In the evening a battery of three guns was begun, on the left of the place of arms, in order to ſilence thoſe that were in barbette, upon the orillon of the St. Andrew baſtion, which annoyed the flank of the beſiegers. A cloſe fire of grape ſhot and muſquetry was kept up during the whole night, to prevent the enemy from repairing their embraſures, and remounting their cannon; while ſeven mortars played, without intermiſſion, upon the gorge of the baſtion, and the neighbouring defences. This had the deſired effect; the enemy was intimidated, and the works continued in their defenceleſs condition.

But notwithſtanding this, the cantonment of the ſeamen was attacked early in the morning of the 4th, by a ſtrong body of Indians. Their approach was facilitated by a number of thick buſhes growing on the ſide of the rivulet, through which they paſſed in the night unobſerved by the patroles; but the alarm was no ſooner given than colonel Monſon and captain Fletcher advanced with the piquets to the aſſiſtance of the ſeamen, who had continued firm within their light poſts, chooſing to act upon the defenſive only, till light ſhould diſcover to them friend from foe. The Indians advanced with the moſt determined countenance to the attack, and fought with incredible fury; but about day-break a freſh piquet of the ſeventy-ninth regiment appearing upon their right flank, they gave way, and fled with the utmoſt precipitation. In this attempt the enemy loſt 300 men. About the ſame time another body of theſe ſavages, reinforced by a few of the Spaniſh troops, made a furious aſſault upon the church, part of which they gained, and mounting on the roof, fired down among the Engliſh ſoldiers; but this was far from intimidating the Britiſh forces; though now expoſed to a continual ſhower of bullets and miſſiles, they maintained their poſt behind the church, and, after an obſtinate diſpute, diſlodged the enemy, who, confounded by ſuch a ſevere check, made no further attempts for the relief of the place: the Indians returned to their own habitations; the fire from the garriſon diminiſhed very faſt; and all their defences appeared to be ruined.

A conſiderable breach was now made in the wall, and it was hoped the garriſon would demand a capitulation; but finding they made no propoſitions of that nature, the Engliſh general reſolved to ſtorm the town. Accordingly, on the 6th, at four in the morning, the troops allotted for this ſervice marched off from their quarters in ſmall bodies to avoid ſuſpicion, and while they were aſſembling, a cloſe fire was maintained in order to clear thoſe places where the enemy might be lodged or intrenched.

Every thing being in readineſs for the aſſault, lieutenant Ruſſel, at the head of ſixty volunteers, ſuſtained by the grenadiers, led the way. The engineers, pioneers, and other workmen followed in order to clear and widen the breach; and after them the remainder of the army was conducted in proper order. As ſoon as the aſſailants mounted the breach, the enemy fled in the utmoſt confuſion, and the troops entered the town with very little difficulty; the only oppoſition of conſequence which they met with being from 100 Spaniards, who, with ſome Indians, were poſted at the royal guard-houſe, and, upon their refuſal to ſubmit, were all cut to pieces. The governor, with the principal magiſtrates, withdrew into the citadel, but that being, ſoon after, entirely demoliſhed, they were obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. The Spaniſh officers, on giving their parole of honour, were enlarged, and all the Indians diſmiſſed in ſafety. This important conqueſt coſt the Engliſh only 100 men, including officers. By the capitulation it was agreed, that the town and port of Cavite, with the iſlands and forts depending upon Manilla, were to be delivered up to his Britannic majeſty, and four millions of dollars paid as a ranſom for the city of Manilla, and the effects of the inhabitants, who, in return, were to be protected in their religion and private property.

During the ſiege, admiral Corniſh having intercepted ſome letters to the Spaniſh governor, informing him, that the galleon, St. Phillipina, was arrived from Acapulco at Cajayagan, he determined to ſend in queſt of her. Accordingly the Panther man of war, and Argo frigate, commanded by the captains Parker and King, were detached on this ſervice; and on the 30th of October, being off the iſland of Capul, they diſcerned a ſail, ſtanding to the northward. Unfortunately the Panther was drove by the current among the Narangoes, and obliged to come to an anchor, but captain King in the frigate continuing the chace came up with and engaged her for near two hours, during which his rigging ſuffered conſiderable damage, and obliged him to give over the attack till it could be repaired. In the mean time the Panther got under ſail again, and in her turn engaged the enemy, who ſoon ſurrendered; but when captain Parker came to take poſſeſſion, he was ſurprized to find that inſtead of the St. Phillipina, his prize proved the Santiſſima Trinidada, which had departed from Manilla for Acapulco on the firſt of Auguſt; but meeting with a hard gale of wind, wherein ſhe was diſmaſted, had been obliged to put back and refit. The merchandize on board this ſhip was valued at one million and a half of dollars, and the whole cargo ſuppoſed to be worth double that ſum.

Many other exploits were performed by the Britiſh arms at ſea during the courſe of this year. The Hermione, a Spaniſh regiſter ſhip, bound from Lima to Cadiz, laden with treaſure and valuable effects to the amount of one million ſterling was taken in the month of May by two Engliſh frigates, which were on a cruiſe off cape St. Vincent, and brought from Gibraltar to England.

About the latter end of May Sir Edward Hawke ſailed from Spithead with ſeven ſhips of the line and two frigates, in hopes of falling in with a ſquadron, under the command of M. de Ternay, who had, taking advantage of a fog, eſcaped from Breſt, and his deſtination not even conjectured. He found means, however, to elude the admiral's vigilance, who having viſited the coaſt of France, and cruiſed for ſome weeks in the chops of the channel, returned to Portſmouth. In the mean time M. de Ternay ſteered his courſe to Newfoundland, and on the 24th of June landed ſome troops at the bay of Bulls, with which he immediately advanced to the town of St. John's, and this place being in no condition of defence was obliged to ſurrender. But the triumph of France on this occaſion was of ſhort duration, for Sir Jeffery Amherſt and lord Colville, who commanded by land and ſea in North America, were no ſooner informed of this loſs than the latter ſailed thither from Halifax, and blocked up the harbour. Being ſoon after reinforced with about 800 men, commanded by colonel Amherſt, they reſolved to diſembark the forces, which, after a very ſlight oppoſition, was effected. On the 16th of September colonel Amherſt took poſt in the neighbourhood of St. John's fort, and next day erected a battery. But contrary winds having driven lord Colville ſome diſtance from the coaſt, M. de Ternay, availing himſelf of his abſence, made his eſcape. M. de Hauſſonville, commander of the French forces at St. John's, who had been ſummoned, but refuſed to ſurrender, thought proper to agree to a capitulation, by which himſelf and the garriſon were to be conveyed to Breſt the firſt opportunity, and accordingly, when lord Colville returned to the harbour, he appointed ſome ſhips, in which they were tranſported to France.

Having thus related the principal actions performed by the Engliſh navy, let us take a view of affairs on the continent, where the war was ſtill carried on with the utmoſt vigour.

It was ſtrongly ſuſpected that the family treaty would ſoon produce ſome alarming, perhaps fatal conſequences to the reſt of Europe. It was not, however, known, where the gathering ſtorm would ſpread its baleful influence. Some thought the peace of Italy would ſuffer: others, that Holland would be the firſt object attacked by the houſe of Bourbon: but Portugal ſeemed to be the moſt in danger, becauſe ſhe was more cloſely connected with Great Britain, and, at the ſame time, expoſed to an invaſion both from Spain and France.

While the politicians were thus divided in their opinions, a joint memorial was preſented by the French and Spaniſh ambaſſadors at the court of Liſbon to the Portugueſe miniſtry, importing, That the two ſovereigns of France and Spain, having found it neceſſary to take every method in their power to curb the pride of the Britiſh nation, had thought proper to eſtabliſh ſeveral mutual and reciprocal obligations between them, in order to prevent that nation from becoming deſpotic over all the maritime commerce of Europe: that the firſt meaſure planned by the kings of France and Spain was to engage his Portugueſe majeſty in their offenſive and defenſive alliance, and to join his forces with theirs: that they expected his moſt Faithful majeſty would not heſitate a moment to acquieſce in ſo reaſonable a requeſt, when he conſidered what he owed to himſelf, to his kingdom, and to his ſubjects, who more ſeverely felt the yoke which Great Britain had laid upon them, than thoſe of any other nation, and which ſhe was deſirous of extending over all thoſe who had any poſſeſſions in the New World: that it would be unjuſt for France and Spain alone to ſupport a war, and ſacrifice their ſubjects for an object in which Portugal was equally intereſted with themſelves: that in order to this, the ambaſſador of Spain, and the miniſter plenipotentiary of France, deſired his moſt Faithful majeſty to renounce the neutrality, and declare himſelf united in the preſent war againſt the Engliſh, with the kings of France and Spain: that this declaration was made by thoſe two monarchs, as being agreed and concerted between them: that his Catholic majeſty had alſo inſtructed his ambaſſador to obſerve, that it was the brother of the queen, wife to his moſt Faithful majeſty, a true friend, a moderate and quiet neighbour, who had made this propoſal to him, and who, conſidering the intereſt of his Portugueſe majeſty as his own, wiſhed to unite the one with the other, ſo that either in peace or war, Spain and Portugal might be conſidered as belonging to one maſter. To this extraordinary memorial the two miniſters added, That they were commanded, by their reſpective courts, to demand in four days a categorical anſwer, and that any delay, beyond that period, would be conſidered as a negative.

Notwithſtanding the ſituation of Portugal was at this time truly alarming, yet the firmneſs of the king was ſuch as muſt tranſmit his name with the moſt diſtinguiſhed advantage to poſterity. He anſwered this inſulting propoſition with a moderate but intrepid reſolution. He obſerved, that the ties, which equally united him to Great Britain, and the crowns of France and Spain, rendered him a proper mediator to them all, and conſequently improper for him to declare himſelf an enemy to either: that his alliance with England was ancient, and conſequently incapable of giving offence at this juncture: that it was merely defenſive, conſequently innocent: that the late calamities of Portugal had abſolutely diſabled her from taking part in any offenſive war, into which neither the love his moſt Faithful majeſty bore his ſubjects as a father, nor the duty by which he was bound to them as a king, could ſuffer him to plunge them.

But this anſwer, however reaſonable and moderate, was far from ſatisfying the princes of the Bourbon confederacy. They denied that the alliance with England was either purely defenſive, or purely innocent: they aſſerted that the Britiſh ſquadrons could not keep the ſea at all ſeaſons, nor cruize on the principle coaſts of France and Spain, without the aſſiſtance of the harbours of Portugal: that the Engliſh could not carry on the war, without the riches of that kingdom; therefore the Portugueſe furniſhed them with the means of making war; conſequently their defenſive alliance was changed into an offenſive one. They added, that if the king of Portugal did not comply with their requiſition, the Spaniſh troops which were already marched to the frontiers ſhould enter his country, ſeize his forts, and ſhut them up; and that no choice was therefore left to his majeſty, but that of receiving them as friends, or treating them as enemies.

But even this extraordinary treatment could neither divert his Portugueſe majeſty from the firmneſs of his reſolution, nor provoke him to depart from the moderation of his language. He declared he would keep his treaties with England inviolate, and mentioned, that they were ſuch as the law of God, of nature, and of nations, had always deemed innocent. He intreated the monarchs of France and Spain to conſider the crying injuſtice of purſuing againſt Portugal the war kindled againſt Great Britain. He deſired them to reflect for a moment on the conſequences of ſuch proceedings, which would be nothing leſs than the deſtruction of mankind; for if neutral nations were to be attacked becauſe they had defenſive alliances with the belligerant powers, there muſt be an end of the public ſafety, and, conſequently, the moment a war was kindled between any two ſtates, it would ſpread deſolation over all Europe. He therefore declared, that if their troops ſhould enter his dominions, he would, in defence of his neutrality, repulſe them with all his forces, joined by thoſe of his allies; and concluded with this noble reſolution, "That it would affect him leſs, though "reduced to the laſt extremity, of which the "great Judge was the ſole arbiter, to let the laſt tile "of his palace fall, and to ſee his faithful ſubjects "ſpill the laſt drop of their blood, than to ſacrifice, "together with the honour of his crown, all that "Portugal held moſt dear; and to ſubmit, by ſuch "extraordinary means, to become an unheard-of example to all pacific powers, who would no longer "be able to enjoy the benefit of neutrality, whenever a war ſhould be kindled between other powers "with which the former were connected by defenſive treaties." On receiving this final reſolution, the ambaſſadors of the two crowns demanded paſſports, which being granted them, they ſet out for their reſpective courts; and France and Spain, in the month of June, publiſhed a joint declaration of war againſt Portugal.

In the mean time about 8000 troops, with large ſupplies of ſtores and ammunition, and a fine train of artillery, arrived in Portugal from England. The command of the Portugueſe army had ſome time before been conferred upon count de la Lippe Buckebourg, an officer of great abilities, and who, during the whole courſe of the war, had directed the Britiſh artillery in Germany. The Engliſh forces were conducted by lord Tyrawley and the earl of Loudon, aſſiſted by ſeveral officers of great experience. Theſe forces had not been long in Portugal before lord Tyrawley, diſguſted at the behaviour of the court of Liſbon, deſired to be recalled: his requeſt was granted, and the earl of Loudon ſucceeded to the chief command.

The Spaniſh army, which had for ſome time encamped near the frontiers of Portugal, was divided into three ſeparate bodies, in order to penetrate into the territories of Portugal by three different avenues. The principal body of their army, conſiſting of thirty-ſix battalions and thirty-five ſquadrons, under the command of the marquis de Sarria, croſſed the river Eſſa and Douro, a little below Zamora. The ſecond body of forces, amounting to eight battalions of regular troops, ſix of militia, and two ſquadrons of horſe, were poſted in Galicia; and the third, conſiſting of four battalions of regulars, an equal number of militia, and eight ſquadrons of cavalry, were encamped in Andaluſia.

The firſt attempt of conſequence made by the Spaniſh army was the ſiege of Miranda, which they inveſted in the beginning of May. They immediately began to erect batteries againſt the place; but before the firſt was finiſhed, the magazine of the beſieged accidentally blew up, by which misfortune two large breaches were made in the walls, upwards of 500 Portugueſe were killed by the exploſion; and the garriſon obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war.

Though the taking of this place was owing more to accident than courage, yet it inſpired the Spaniards with an oſtentatious pride: they looked down with contempt on the Portugueſe; and, inſtead of marching with his whole army, the marquis de Sarria thought it ſufficient to ſend a ſmall party to attack the town of Braganza. In this he ſucceeded, for the garriſon retired with precipitation at their approach; and the magiſtrates preſented the keys of the town to the commander of the Spaniſh forces. The loſs of this and ſeveral other places was, however, principally owing to the bad condition of the works, no care having been taken to repair them, notwithſtanding the Spaniſh army had lain ſo long in the neighbourhood. Chaves ſhared the ſame fate, the garriſon, though it conſiſted of 2000 effective men, having abandoned the town at the firſt appearance of the enemy.

The Spaniſh general now made an attempt to enter the province of Minho, through the paſſes of Monte Allegre; but finding thoſe poſts occupied by ſome regiments of Portugueſe militia, he changed his route, and attempted to croſs the mountains of Maran and Amarante. The city of Oporto is ſituated at the foot of theſe mountains, and the garriſon had taken proper precautions to obſtruct the paſſage of the Spaniards. In the mean time, part of the enemy that remained at Miranda had been repulſed by the inhabitants of Nova de Foſcoa, ſupported by ſome militia, in attempting to paſs the river Douro. On the ſide of Almeida, 8000 Spaniards paſſed the frontier in the beginning of June, and encamped between Val-de-la-mula and Val-de-Coelha, detaching parties to lay waſte the whole adjacent country. The third diviſion of the Spaniſh army, now encamped in the province of Tra-los-montes, was ſeparated into three bodies, of which the principal was encamped in the neighbourhood of Miranda.

In the month of July, that body of the Spaniſh forces, which had encamped near Val-de-la-mula, inveſted Almeida; and before they had finiſhed their trenches they were joined by 8000 French auxiliaries. The garriſon, however, made a much better defence than could be expected; but was at laſt obliged to ſurrender on capitulation.

Count de la Lippe, ever ſince his arrival in Portugal, had taken every ſtep that could be taken by military ſkill and prudence, to diſcipline and regulate the Portugueſe troops, by the example of the Engliſh auxiliaries. He mingled in due proportions the native and the allied ſoldiers; and poſted, in different parts of the kingdom, various detachments formed in this manner, in order to guard the paſſes of the mountains, haraſs the enemy in their progreſs, intercept their convoys, and cut off their foraging parties.

The count having received advice that the enemy had eſtabliſhed large magazines of flour and forage at Valencia d'Alcantara, on the frontiers of Portugal, he determined to attack the place. Brigadier Burgoyne was intruſted with the execution of this enterprize, and on the 25th of July, at midnight, he croſſed the Tagus at the head of all the Britiſh grenadiers, commanded by lord Pulteney, and eleven companies of Portugueſe grenadiers. On the 25th at night he reached Caſtel-Vida, where he was joined by ſome infantry, and irregular cavalry. Here he made his final diſpoſitions, agreeable to the advices he had received reſpecting the ſituation and ſtation of the place he was ſent to attack. This being compleated he marched with the utmoſt expedition, but could not reach Valencia before break of day, when he entered the town with the cavalry, ſword in hand, diſperſed the guards in the great ſquare, and placed a detachment at the end of every ſtreet. This was done with very little reſiſtance, except by a few deſperate parties, who attacked the troops when drawn up in the ſquare; but were ſoon diſperſed, and the greater part of them either killed or taken. Some priſoners and a large number of horſes were taken by a detachment of dragoons ſent out to ſcour the country. Nor muſt we forget the noble exploit of a Britiſh ſerjeant, who at the head of ſix men only, fell in with a ſubaltern of the enemy at the head of 25 dragoons, unbroken and prepared for action, killed ſix, made all the reſt priſoners, and took the horſes of the whole party. The priſoners taken in the town were major-general Don Michael d'Truniberry, and Kalanca his aid du camp, one colonel, with his adjutant, ſeventeen ſubalterns, and fifty-nine ſoldiers. Three pair of colours, with a great quantity of arms and ammunition, fell into the hands of the victors.

This ſucceſsful enterprize animated the allied army, and intimidated that of Spain, which was now commanded by the Conde de Arnda. That general, after leaving garriſons in Almida and Caſtel-Rodrigo, advanced by the way of Alſayates to Caſtel Branco. This motion obliged the count de la Lippe to abandon his ſtrong camp at Ponte de Murcella in the Baira, and return into Eſtramadura. He reached Abrantes on the 18th of September, and Lord Loudon with a ſeparate corps encamped in the neighbourhood. This plan was purſued in order to prevent the Spaniards from forcing a paſſage through the paſſes of the mountains in their front, or croſſing the Tagus at Villa-velha. The count St. Jago, with four batallions, ſix companies of grenadiers, and a regiment of cavalry, was ſent to occupy the ſtrong paſs of Alvito; and Burgoyne, with part of his own regiment, and the Engliſh grenadiers, to encamp on the ſouthern bank of the Tagus, oppoſite Villa-velha.

No ſooner were theſe diſpoſitions formed than the enemy made ſeveral motions towards the advanced corps of the allies; 6000 men encamped over-againſt the body commanded by the count St. Jago, and attacked Villa-velha, an old Mooriſh caſtle ſituated on his right, while another body aſſaulted a poſt on his left in the defile of St. Simon. The caſtle of Villa-velha was for ſome time protected by the cannon of Burgoyne, placed on the oppoſite bank of the river; but the caſtle, as well as the poſt at the defile of St. Simon, were at laſt both taken by the enemy, who, in conſequence of this ſucceſs, made themſelves maſters of the paſſes in the mountains, and the count St. Jago was obliged to retire.

As this officer was in the utmoſt danger of being attacked both in front and rear by a ſuperior force, lord Loudon was ordered to advance and cover his retreat. He accordingly marched with the utmoſt expedition to Soubrira formoſa, where he was joined by major Macbean of the artillery, with four regimental field pieces. A ſtrong body of the enemy had croſſed the river in order to attack the rear-guard, which conſiſted of four Engliſh regiments, ſix companies of Portugueſe grenadiers, a few light dragoons, a regiment of Portugueſe cavalry, and the four field pieces already mentioned. But their attempt was rendered abortive by the good order and firmneſs of the Engliſh; for notwithſtanding all the efforts of the enemy, not a ſingle man was loſt; and the Spaniards being terribly galled by the artillery, thought proper to retire, and ſuffer the count to purſue his march unmoleſted.

In the mean time the Spaniſh corps at Villa-velha being weakened by the detachments ſent againſt the count St. Jago, a deſign was formed of ſurpriſing them in their camp. Accordingly lieutenant-colonel Lee, at the head of a detachment of Britiſh troops, was ordered to ford the Tagus in the night, and attack the Spaniſh forces. He obeyed his orders, and fell upon the enemy with the utmoſt fury, while the brigadier pointed his cannon, and made a falſe attack on the other ſide, to amuſe and diſtract the Spaniards. The enemy, being at length alarmed, began to make a confuſed and irregular defence; but the grenadiers puſhed them ſo vigorouſly, that, finding it impoſſible to form, they ſubmitted. The greater part of the Spaniſh officers were killed in endeavouring to rally their men; four pieces of cannon were ſpiked up in their camp; their magazines were deſtroyed; and many priſoners taken, together with a conſiderable number of horſes and mules, and a large quantity of valuable baggage.

The ſafety of Portugal was, in a great meaſure, owing to this important advantage: for the ſeaſon was now far advanced; the rain fell in torrents; the roads were deſtroyed; and the country, in many places, rendered impaſſable. The Spaniards, therefore, who had not ſecured any advanced poſt, where they could maintain themſelves during the winter; deſtitute of magazines for their ſupport, and their convoys continually cut off by the enemy, were obliged to retreat to their own country.

Having thus given an account of the military tranſactions in Portugal, we ſhall now direct our attention to the war in Germany, which was ſtill proſecuted with great ſpirit and activity.

Before the armies had began their operations, a detachment of 4000 men was ſent from the French garriſon of Gottingen, to ſurprize the eaſt chain of the allied cantonments. The enterprize, however, was rendered abortive by the timely retreat of the troops; ſo that the French could only make a very ſmall impreſſion upon their rear. Prince Ferdinand, to prevent a ſimilar attempt, ſent 3000 men to take poſt at Eimbeck, which effectually anſwered the purpoſe.

On the other hand general Luckner, a famous Hanoverian partiſan, and who had made ſeveral ſucceſsful invaſions into the country poſſeſſed by the enemy, obtained a conſiderable advantage over the marquis de Lortange, who had marched out of Gottingen, at the head of 1800 horſe and 2000 infantry, to intercept Luckner. But the latter falling unexpectedly on the marquis, forced him to retire, with great loſs and precipitation, to Gottingen. About the ſame time a party of French irregulars were made priſoners at Eichffeld, by major Wingerode, commander of the Heſſian huſſars.

The French had for ſome time occupied the caſtle of Roer, in order to maintain a communication between their forces poſted on the Rhine and thoſe encamped on the Weſer. This caſtle the hereditary prince of Brunſwic determined to beſiege; accordingly, in the month of April, he ſet out at the head of a ſtrong detachment and a train of artillery, in order to carry his deſign into execution. He ſoon inveſted the caſtle; and his batteries had ſcarce begun to play before the fort was ſet on fire. Every method was purſued by M. de Muret, who commanded in the caſtle, to ſtop the progreſs of the flames; but finding all his endeavours ineffectual, he was obliged, with his whole garriſon of 230 men, to leap over the walls, and ſurrender at diſcretion.

Towards the latter end of April, the French generals Soubiſe and d'Etrees arrived at Frankfort, and immediately applied themſelves to aſſemble their forces on the banks of the Weſer; while the prince of Conde commanded a ſeparate army encamped at Duſſeldorp on the Lower Rhine. The main body of the allied army, commanded by prince Ferdinand, was poſted behind the Dymel, to make head againſt the two marſhals, while the hereditary prince, at the head of a conſiderable corps, was encamped in the biſhopric of Munſter, to watch the motions of Conde. Prince Xavier of Saxony had taken poſt, with a corps de reſerve, between the river Werra and the town of Gottingen, and general Lukner encamped near Eimbeck on the Leine, to obſerve that prince's motions.

On the 24th of June prince Ferdinand made the proper diſpoſitions for attacking the French camp, ſituated between Graebenſtein and Meinbrexen. In order to execute this plan with ſucceſs, general Luckner left his camp in the morning of the 23d, croſſed the Weſer in the evening, and by three o'clock the next morning arrived between Mariendorff and Undenhauſen. General Sporcken paſſed the Dymel at Sielem about four in the morning, at the head of twelve Hanoverian battalions and part of the cavalry of the left wing, in order to fall upon the enemy's flank, while Luckner attacked them in the rear. Prince Ferdinand paſſed the river about the ſame time, at the head of twelve Britiſh battalions, eleven of the Brunſwic troops, eight regiments of Heſſians, the Engliſh cavalry, and part of the German horſe of the left wing. On his gaining the bank on the oppoſite ſide, he drew up his forces in order of battle, behind the ponds of Kalſe. The vanguard on the right was compoſed of the chaſſeurs, of the Engliſh and German infantry commanded by lord Frederick Cavendiſh, and Treytag's Hanoverian chaſſeurs, who had orders to occupy the mountain of Langenberg; while the left conſiſted of the piquets of the army. The body of reſerve conducted by the marquis of Granby croſſed the Dymel at Warburg, and marched to an eminence oppoſite to Furſtenwalde, in order to fall upon the left wing of the enemy. All theſe preparations were made with ſuch judgment, activity and good order, that the French were attacked with the utmoſt impetuoſity in front, flank and rear, before they knew any thing of the approach of the allied army. Terrified at this vigorous and unexpected aſſault, a very precipitate retreat was the immediate conſequence, and would probably have ended in a total defeat of the whole army, had not M. de Stainville, at the head of a choſen body of troops, conſiſting of the grenadiers of France, the royal grenadiers, the regiment of Aquitaine, and ſome other forces which conſtituted the flower of the French infantry, thrown himſelf into the woods of Willemſtahl, where he made a noble ſtand, and effectually covered the retreat of the French marſhals, who retired, in the utmoſt confuſion, under the cannon of Caſſel. Stainville was attacked by lord Granby with his uſual impetuoſity, and the whole body, except two battalions, either killed or taken. Two thouſand five hundred and fifty of the enemy, including 162 officers, were made priſoners: ſome ſtandards and colours were alſo taken, while the whole loſs of the allied army did not exceed 300 men. Colonel Townſhend was the only officer of diſtinction who loſt his life in the action.

From this ſucceſs prince Ferdinand was encouraged to purſue the bold and maſterly plans he had formed againſt the enemy. His firſt attempt was to cut off the communication of the French with Franckfort, while they continued in their ſtrong camp under the cannon of Caſſel. This communication was preſerved by M. Rochambeau, who, at the head of a body of horſe and ſome brigades of infantry, had poſſeſſed himſelf of a very ſtrong poſt near Hamburg. The marquis of Granby and lord Frederick Cavendiſh advanced, with a ſtrong detachment, to diſlodge them. At their approach the enemy began to retreat, upon which the marquis ordered his horſe to attack them in the rear. In performing this ſervice they were in imminent danger of being overpowered by the French cavalry, who, facing about ſuddenly, fell upon them ſword in hand; but the infantry coming to their aſſiſtance, the enemy were obliged to fly in their turn, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty they effected a retreat with the loſs of 400 men.

The French marſhals having withdrawn to their camp at Melſungen, in order to maintain their communication with Franckfort, and facilitate their junction with the prince of Conde, who had received orders to advance from the Lower Rhine, prince Ferdinand reſolved to attack them. Accordingly, on the 25th of July, he croſſed the Eder, and joined the marquis of Granby on the heights of Falkenberg, after which he reconnoitred the enemy's ſituation, when he found there was no probability of engaging them with ſucceſs: and, having contented themſelves with cannonading their camp, he re-croſſed the Eder, leaving the marquis of Granby on the heights of Falkenberg. The French now croſſed the Fulda, and retired to Caſſel, having left a body of troops under M. de Guerchy, oppoſite to the camp they abandoned: at the ſame time the marquis of Granby took poſſeſſion of Melſungen, by which means the enemy's communication with Franckfort was once more cut off. Immediately after a body of their dragoons advancing towards Ruthenburn, under M. de Stainville, fell into an ambuſcade at Morſchen, and were entirely routed. This was followed by the loſs of Gottingen, which place they relinquiſhed, after having deſtroyed the fortifications.

The French now ſecured themſelves in a ſtrong camp on the banks of the Fulda, from whence they ſent repeated orders to the prince of Conde to haſten to their relief. That general began his march from Coeſfeldt on the 16th of July, and paſſed the Lippe at Halderen. He was followed by the hereditary prince, at the head of a ſtrong detachment from the allied army; who, having received intelligence, that a large body of the enemy were on their march to meet the prince of Conde, he determined to attack him before their arrival. In the beginning of this action the French were drove from the heights into the plain; but while the allies were eagerly purſuing their advantage, the main army of the enemy arrived. Such a powerful reinforcement could not fail of turning the balance in their favour. The allies were totally defeated, having loſt about 3000 men. This misfortune was greatly increaſed by a wound which the hereditary prince received, from a muſquet-ball, in his hip-bone, by which, for a conſiderable time, his life was in the moſt imminent danger.

The vigilance of prince Ferdinand was remarkable on this occaſion, and it was ſufficiently evident, that his meaſures after a defeat were equal to his conduct in war: for the allies, notwithſtanding the misfortune of the hereditary prince, did not loſe an inch of ground, nor did the French obtain the leaſt advantage from their victory.

Part of the French army under the command of the generals de Caſtries and Saarsfeldt being poſted on the one ſide of the Ohme, and oppoſite to them a ſtrong detachment commanded by the marquis of Granby and general Zaſtrow on the other, a furious cannonade was carried on between them. In the neighbourhood of the allies was the caſtle of Ameneburg, which they had furniſhed with a garriſon conſiſting of ſeven hundred men under the command of captain Cruſe. This fortreſs the enemy determined to take; but, in order to conceal their real intention, they attacked a poſt of the allies called Brucker-mulk, which defended the paſſage of a bridge over the Ohme. This poſt was defended by a detachment of 200 men, the greater part of whom were poſted in a ſmall redoubt which they had erected to defend them againſt the random ſhot of the enemy. The attack on this poſt was made by the French with muſquetry and cannon, by a detachment placed on an eminence, a little beyond the bridge. This attack brought on a moſt violent cannonade on both ſides; while a warm diſpute with ſmall arms was maintained between the French and Hanoverians, who defended the redoubt. The latter having expended all their ammunition, and ſuffered a conſiderable loſs from the conſtant fire of the enemy, general Waldegrave was detached with the firſt battalion of guards, to relieve the Hanoverians. In the mean time prince Ferdinand obſerving that the enemy were continually throwing in freſh troops, and increaſing the number of cannon that played inceſſantly upon the allies, thought proper to reinforce his artillery with ſix pieces of heavy cannon, and three howitzers from the army; and ordered four Heſſian regiments to advance, in order to ſuſtain thoſe who were ſo warmly engaged. A terrible fire both of ſmall arms and artillery was now maintained for fifteen hours; both ſides fighting with the moſt determined reſolution, though neither made the leaſt attempt to paſs the bridge. At length the darkneſs put an end to the action, in which 1100 men of the enemy, and 600 of the allies, were killed.

A few days after this action. prince Ferdinand inveſted Caſſel; and notwithſtanding all the activity and reſolution of a numerous garriſon, commanded by the baron de Dieſbach, the operations were carried on with ſuch remarkable vigour, that, on the 10th of October, the city was taken by capitulation.

This was the laſt action between the French and the allies in Germany. Prince Fredinand, indeed, was making preparations for laying ſiege to Ziegenheim, the only place the French were now poſſeſſed of in Heſſe; but before he could carry his deſign into execution, the preliminaries of peace were ſigned between France and Great Britain; in conſequence of which a ceſſation of arms took place between the two armies.

The preliminaries of peace being ſigned, and the definitive treaty in great forwardneſs, the parliament met on the 25th of November, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he obſerved, that the war with Spain, and the attack of his ally, the king of Portugal, having greatly affected the commerce of his ſubjects, multiplied the objects of his military operations, and added to the heavy burthens of his people, he had willingly embraced an occaſion that offered of renewing the negotiation for peace. He informed them that the preliminary articles were actually ſigned: that by the conditions in which all parties had acquieſced, an immenſe territory was added to the empire of Great Britain; and a ſolid foundation laid for the increaſe of commerce; that care had been taken to remove all occaſions of future diſputes; that the king of Portugal was ſecured in all his dominions; and that all the territories of his German allies were evacuated by the troops of France. He lamented that a great number of his ſubjects had been loſt in different parts of the world; a conſideration which reinforced the other reaſons he had to engage in the negotiation; and that he had haſtened the concluſion of it, to prevent the neceſſity of making preparations for another campaign. He deſired the commons to conſider of ſuch methods, in the ſettlement of the new acquiſitions, as ſhould moſt effectually tend to the ſecurity of thoſe countries, and to the improvement of the Britiſh trade and navigation. He recommended to their care and attention his gallant ſubjects by whom thoſe acquiſitions were made. He obſerved, that union at home was peculiarly neceſſary to lay the foundation of that œconomy which they owed to themſelves and their poſterity, and which alone could relieve the nation from the heavy burthens entailed upon it by the neceſſities of a long and expenſive war.

In anſwer to this ſpeech addreſſes were preſented by both houſes, containing general compliments of congratulation on the approach of peace, as well as upon the birth of the prince of Wales.[*] The next day a ceſſation of arms was proclaimed; and orders were iſſued for opening again all the channels of communication with France and Spain.

The preliminaries of the peace underwent a very ſevere examination by the parliament; but were at length approved of by a great majority in both houſes; and each preſented an addreſs to the king on the occaſion; in which they declared, "That they owed the utmoſt gratitude to his majeſty for the re-eſtabliſhment of the public tranquillity upon terms of honour to the crown, and of advantage to the people."[†]

[*] He was born on the 12th of Auguſt, and on the 17th was created prince of Wales, &c. On the 12th of September following he was baptized by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and named George Auguſtus Frederick.

[†] It would be unpardonable to paſs over the domeſtic tranſactions of the year 1762, without taking notice of an event that happened, of a very ſingular nature, and which, for a conſiderable time, almoſt wholly engaged the attention of the public. It was a maſter-piece of deception, and was then diſtinguiſhed, as it is ſtill remembered, by the name of the Cock-lane Ghoſt; the particulars of which were briefly as follow:

In 1759 one Mr. K---, a broker, married a young lady of Norfolk, who dying in child-bed, her ſiſter came to reſide with him in the character of a houſe-keeper. In this familiar ſituation they continued ſome time, during which they conceived ſuch an affection for each other, that they broke through the laws of prudence, and poſſeſſed thoſe enjoyments that were forbid by the ſtrictneſs of the canon law. Each of them made their will in the other's favour, and removing to town, lodged for ſome time in the houſe of one Parſons, (officiating pariſh-clerk of St. Sepulchre's) in Cock-lane, near Weſt Smithfield.

Some difference ariſing between Mr. K. and his landlord, the former ſuddenly left his lodgings, and removed to Clerkenwell. Here the young lady died of the ſmall pox, on the ſecond of February, 1760, and was buried in Clerkenwell church.

The ſcheme, ſuppoſed to have been concerted by Parſons, now began to ſhew itſelf. An alarm was ſpread that his daughter, a girl about eleven years of age, was viſited by a ſpirit, who having been interrogated, had declared itſelf to be the ſpirit of Fanny, which was the name of the deceaſed lady, and that ſhe had been poiſoned by K. when ill of the ſmall pox.---A worthy clergyman, however, who attended her ſeveral times, and who adminiſtered to her the laſt comforts of his office, declared, that the ſmall pox with which ſhe was ſeized was of the confluent ſort, and that the gentlemen of the faculty who attended her had pronounced her irrecoverable, ſome days before her death.

On the 13th of February, 1762, between ten and eleven at night, Parſons ſent for a gentleman in the neighbourhod to come to his houſe, in order to be witneſs of the ſtrange noiſe and extraordinary circumſtances that were ſuppoſed to proceed from this inviſible agent, which he ſaid had for two years paſt greatly terrified his family.

The gentleman accordingly attended, and found the child in bed; when ſeveral queſtions being put to the ſpirit, who was ſuppoſed to be preſent, by the father, they were reſpectively anſwered by an unaccountable noiſe like that of knocking and ſcratching. The gentleman not chuſing to pronounce too haſtily upon what appeared to him ſo extraordinary, left the houſe, and the next evening got together a number of his friends, among whom were two or three clergymen, all of whom went to the houſe

A. D. 1763. On the 10th of February the definitive treaty of peace was ſigned at Paris; and being tranſmitted to England, was immediately laid before the parliament. Though the ſubſtance of this treaty is ſtill recent in the memory of a great part of the preſent age, yet, for the ſatisfaction of poſterity, we ſhall preſent our readers with an exact copy of it.

The definitive Treaty of Peace and Friendſhip, between his Britannick Majeſty, the Moſt Chriſtian King, and the king of Spain. Concluded at Paris the 10th Day of February, 1763. To which the king of Portugal acceded on the ſame Day.

In the Name of the moſt Holy and Undivided Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt. So be it.

BE it known to all thoſe whom it ſhall, or may, in any manner, belong.

"It has pleaſed the Moſt High to diffuſe the ſpirit of union and concord among the princes, whoſe diviſions had ſpread troubles in the four parts of the world, and to inſpire them with the inclination to cauſe the comforts of peace to ſucceed to the misfortunes of a long and bloody war, which having ariſen between England and France, during the reign of the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, George the Second, by the grace of God king of Great Britain, of glorious memory, continued under the reign of the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, George the Third, ſucceſſor, and, in its progreſs, communicated itſelf to Spain and Portugal: conſequently, the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, George the Third, by the grace of God, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Duke of Brunſwick and Lunenburg, Arch Treaſurer, and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire; the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, Lewis the Fifteenth, by the Grace of God, the moſt Chriſtian King; and the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, Charles the Third, by the Grace of God, King of Spain and of the Indies, after having laid the foundation of peace in the preliminaries, ſigned at Fontainbleau the third of November laſt; and the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, Don Joſeph the Firſt, by the Grace of God, King of Portugal and of the Algarves, after having acceded thereto, determined to complete, without delay, this great and important work. For this purpoſe the high contracting parties have named and appointed their reſpective ambaſſadors extraordinary and miniſters plenipotentiary, viz. his Sacred Majeſty the King of Great Britain, the moſt illuſtrious and moſt excellent lord John Duke and Earl of Bedford, marquis of Taviſtock, &c. his Miniſter of State, Lieutenant General of his Armies, Keeper of his Privy Seal, Knight of the moſt Noble Order of the Garter, and his Ambaſſador Extraordinary and Miniſter Plenipotentiary to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty: his Sacred Majeſty the Moſt Chriſtian King, the moſt illuſtrious and moſt excellent lord Cæſar Gabriel de Choiſeul, Duke of Praſlin, Peer of France, Knight of his Orders, Lieutenant General of his Armies, and of the province of Brittany, Counſellor of all his Councils, and Miniſter and Secretary of State, and of his Commands and Finances: his Sacred Majeſty the Catholick houſe on a determination of ſatisfying themſelves by ſitting up during the courſe of the night.

On their firſt entering the room they examined the bed, bedcloaths, &c. and being ſatisfied there was not any viſible appearance of deceit, the child was put into bed, which was immediately found to ſhake extremely by the gentleman who had placed himſelf at the foot of it.

During the courſe of the night a prodigious number of queſtions were put to the ſuppoſed ſpirit, all of which were anſwered either by knocking or ſcratching. An affirmative was one knock, and a negative, two: and the ſcratching intimated diſpleaſure.

The ſound of the noiſes appeared to proceed occaſionally from the different parts of the room where the child lay; and as her preſence was neceſſary to the production of the noiſes, ſo the ſpirit declared it would follow her wherever ſhe went. The circumſtances of this ſtrange viſitation being reported, with many idle exaggerations, the public became ſo intereſted in it, that in all companies nothing was heard but remarks on the ghoſt in Cock-lane; and to this place ſuperſtition and curioſity brought a vaſt concourſe of people, of all ranks and conditions.

The farce was carried on for ſome time much to the advantage of the projectors. The girl was actually removed to other houſes, where the noiſes equally accompanied her; and ſuch an impreſſion did this ſtrange occurrence make, even on thoſe of ſuperior underſtanding, that two clergyman became the avowed patrons of this inarticulate revelation.

The ſuppoſed ſpirit, however, was at length decoyed into a promiſe that entirely deſtroyed its reputation. It had publickly declared, by an affirmative knock, that it would attend one of the gentlemen to the vault of St. John's church, Clerkenwell, where the body was buried, and then would give a token of its preſence by a knock upon the coffin. It was therefore determined to make this trial of the exiſtence or veracity of the ſuppoſed ſpirit.

While they were deliberating on this matter, they were ſummoned into the girl's chamber by ſome ladies who were near her bed, and had heard knocks and ſcratches. When the gentlemen entered, the girl declared that ſhe felt the ſpirit like a mouſe upon her back, and was required to hold her hands out of bed. From that time, though the ſpirit was very ſolemnly requeſted to manifeſt its exiſtence by appearance, by impreſſion on the hand or body of any preſent, by ſcratches, knocks, or any other agony, no evidence of any preternatural power was exhibited.

The ſpirit was then duly informed, that the perſon to whom the promiſe was made of ſtriking the coffin was then about to viſit the vault, and that the performance of the promiſe was then claimed. At one o'clock in the morning the company went to the church, and the gentleman, with the two credulous clergymen, went into the vault, where the ſpirit was ſolemnly required to fulfil her promiſe. Here, however, ſhe failed, and the company not ſeeing or hearing any thing beſide themſelves, returned back to the houſe.

It was now they began to ſuſpect ſome fraud, and ſtrictly examined the girl, but without obtaining any information. However, it was the general opinion of the aſſembly, that the child had ſome art of making or counterfeiting particular noiſes, and that there was not any agency of a higher cauſe.

The friends of the ghoſt, however, in order to retrieve their reputation, ſpread a report that the coffin and body had been removed out of the vault; but Mr. K. who began now feelingly to intereſt himſelf in defence of his reputation, deprived them of this laſt refuge, by ordering the coffin to be opened before ſufficient witneſſes. The coffin was ſoon diſcovered by the undertaker, and was opened before the clergyman of the pariſh, the clerk, the ſexton, Mr. K. and ſome others, when the contents of it exhibited the melancholy remains of mortality.

Mr. K. now thought it high time to vindicate his character in a legal manner; this affair appearing to be no more than a contrivance of Parſons, to be revenged on Mr. K. who had ſued Parſons for a ſmall ſum of money he had lent him while he lodged in his houſe; and which he found it impoſſible otherways to regain.

Accordingly Mr. K. preferred a bill of indictment againſt Parſons and his wife, Mary Frazer, (a woman who lived in the houſe and officiated as interpreter between the ghoſt and the ſpectators), one of the clergymen, and a tradeſman, who had been active dupes in the affair; for conſpiring againſt his life and character. On the 10th of July the cauſe was heard before lord chief juſtice Mansfield and a ſpecial jury, at the court of King's Bench, Guildhall; when, after a trial of twelve hours, the parties were all convicted of the crimes with which they were charged.

The court, however, being willing that the proſecutor, who had been ſenſibly injured by this iniquitous tranſaction, ſhould receive ſome reparation from the offenders, poſtponed their ſentence for ſome months, in hopes the parties would make it up in the interim. Accordingly the clergyman and tradeſman compromiſed their part of the matter by a large ſum of money, and were diſmiſſed with a ſevere reprimand. Parſons was ſentenced to ſtand in the pillory three times in one month, and to be impriſoned two years; his wife was impriſoned one year; and Mary Frazer was committed to Bridewell for ſix months.

Thus ended this myſterious affair, which had not only been prejudicial to the party to whom it was levelled, but alſo injurious to many people of reputation, who, by their credulity, had been led to place confidence, and were ſuppoſed to be active, in the proſecution of this diabolical contrivance. Happily, however, it was at length detected, and the real parties concerned met with that puniſhment their iniquity juſtly merited.

' Art. II. The treaties of Weſtphalia of 1648; ſe of Madrid between the two crowns of Great itain and Spain of 1667, and 1670; the treaties of ace of Nimeguen of 1678, and 1679; of Ryſwick 1697; thoſe of peace and of commerce of 1713;
t of Baden 1714; that of the tripple alliance of Hague of 1717; that of the quadruple alliance
London of 1718; the treaty of peace of Vienna
1738; the definitive treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle of 48; and that of Madrid between the crown of eat Britain and Spain, of 1750; as well as the aties between the crowns of Spain and Portugal, the 13th of February 1668; of the 6th of Febru-1715; and of the 12th of February 1716; and t of the 11th of April 1713; between France
d Portugal, with the guarantees of Great Britain; ve as a baſis and foundation to the peace, and the ſent treaty: and for this purpoſe they are all re-wed and confirmed in the beſt form, as well as all treaties in general, which ſubſiſted between the h contracting parties before the war, as if they re inſerted here word for word; ſo that they are be exactly obſerved, for the future, in their whole or, and religiouſly executed on all ſides, in all ir points, which ſhall not be derogated from by preſent treaty; notwithſtanding all that may have en ſtipulated to the contrary by any of the high ntracting parties: and all the ſaid parties declare, t they will not ſuffer any privilege, favour, or lulgence, to ſubſiſt, contrary to the treaties above nfirmed, except what ſhall have been agreed and ulated by the preſent treaty.

" Art. III. All the priſoners made on all ſides, well by land as by ſea, and the hoſtages carried away, or given during the war, and to this day, ſhall be reſtored, without ranſom, ſix weeks at lateſt, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, each crown reſpectively paying the advances which ſhall have been made for the ſubſiſtence and maintenance of their priſoners, by the ſovereign of the country where they ſhall have been detained, according to the atteſted receipts and eſtimates, and other authentic vouchers, which ſhall be furniſhed on one ſide and the other: and ſecurities ſhall be reciprocally given for the payment of the debts which the priſoners ſhall have contracted in the countries where they have been detained, until their entire liberty. And all the ſhips of war and merchant-veſſels, which ſhall have been taken ſince the expiration of the terms agreed upon for the ceſſation of hoſtilities by ſea, ſhall be likewiſe reſtored bona fide, with all their crews and cargoes: and the execution of this article ſhall be proceeded upon immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty.

" Art. IV. His Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty renounces all pretenſions which he has heretofore formed, or might form, to Nova Scotia, or Acadia in all its parts; and guarantees the whole of it, and with it all its dependencies, to the King of Great Britain: moreover, his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty cedes and guarantees to his ſaid Britannic Majeſty, in full right, Canada, with all its dependencies, as well as the iſland of Cape Breton, and all the other iſlands and coaſts in the gulph and river St. Lawrence, and, in general, every thing that depends on the ſaid countries, lands, iſlands, and coaſts, with the ſovereignty, property, poſſeſſion, and all rights acquired by treaty or otherwiſe, which the moſt Chriſtian King, and the crown of France, have had, till now, over the ſaid countries, iſlands, lands, places, coaſts, and their inhabitants, ſo that the moſt Chriſtian King cedes and makes over the whole to the ſaid King, and to the crown of Great Britain, and that in the moſt ample manner and form, without reſtriction, and without any liberty to depart from the ſaid ceſſion and guaranty, under any pretence, or to diſturb Great Britain in the poſſeſſions above mentioned. His Britannic Majeſty, on his ſide, agrees to grant the liberty of the Catholic religion to the inhabitants of Canada: he will, conſequently, give the moſt preciſe and moſt effectual orders, that his new Roman Catholic ſubjects may profeſs the worſhip of their religion, according to the rites of the Romiſh church, as far as the laws of Great Britain permit. His Britannic Majeſty further agrees, that the French inhabitants, or others who had been ſubjects of the moſt Chriſtian King in Canada, may retire, with all ſafety and freedom, wherever they ſhall think proper, and may ſell their eſtates, provided it be to the ſubjects of his Britannic Majeſty, and bring away their effects, as well as their perſons, without being reſtrained in their emigration, under any pretence whatſoever, except that of debts, or of criminal proſecutions: the term limited for this emigration ſhall be fixed to the ſpace of eighteen months, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratification of the preſent treaty.

" Art. V. The ſubjects of France ſhall have the liberty of fiſhing and drying on a part of the coaſts of the iſland of Newfoundland, ſuch as it is ſpecified in the XIIIth article of the treaty of Utrecht; which article is renewed and confirmed by the preſent treaty (except what relates to the iſland of Cape Breton, as well as to the other iſlands and coaſts in the mouth and in the gulph of St. Lawrence); and his Britannic Majeſty conſents to leave to the ſubjects of the moſt Chriſtian King the liberty of fiſhing in the gulph of St. Lawrence, on condition that the ſubjects of France do not exerciſe the ſaid fiſhery, but at the diſtance of three leagues from all the coaſts belonging to Great Britain, as well thoſe of the continent, as thoſe of the iſlands ſituated in the ſaid gulph of St. Lawrence. And as to what relates to the fiſhery on the coaſts of the iſland of Cape Breton out of the ſaid gulph, the ſubjects of the moſt Chriſtian King ſhall not be permitted to exerciſe the ſaid fiſhery, but at the diſtance of fifteen leagues from the coaſts of the iſland of Cape Breton; and the fiſhery on the coaſts of Nova Scotia or Acadia, and every where elſe out of the ſaid gulph, ſhall remain on the foot of former treaties.

" Art. VI. The King of Great Britain cedes the iſlands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, in full right, to his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, to ſerve as ſhelter to the French fiſhermen: and his ſaid moſt Chriſtian Majeſty engages not to fortify the ſaid iſlands: to erect no buildings upon them, but merely for the convenience of the fiſhery; and to keep upon them a guard of 50 men only for the police.

" Art. VII. In order to re-eſtabliſh peace on ſolid and durable foundations, and to remove for ever all ſubject of diſpute with regard to the limits of the Britiſh and French territories on the continent of America; it is agreed, that, for the future, the confines between the dominions of his Britannic majeſty and thoſe of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, in that part of the world, ſhall be fixed irrevocably by a line drawn along the middle of the river Miſſiſſippi, from its ſource to the river Iberville, and from thence, by a line drawn along the middle of this river, and the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, to the ſea; and for this purpoſe, the moſt Chriſtian King cedes in full right, and guarantees to his Britannic Majeſty, the river and port of the Mobile, and every thing which he poſſeſſes, or ought to poſſeſs, on the left ſide of the river Miſſiſſippi, except the town of New Orleans, and the iſland in which it is ſituated, which ſhall remain to France; provided that the navigation of the river Miſſiſſippi ſhall be equally free, as well to the ſubjects of Great Britain, as to thoſe of France, in its whole breadth and length, from its ſource to the ſea, and expreſsly that part which is between the ſaid iſland of New Orleans, and the right bank of that river, as well as the paſſage both in and out of its mouth. It is farther ſtipulated, that the veſſels belonging to the ſubjects of either nation ſhall not be ſtopped, viſited, or ſubjected to the payment of any duty whatſoever. The ſtipulations inſerted in the IVth article, in favour of the inhabitants of Canada, ſhall alſo take place with regard to the inhabitants of the countries ceded by this article.

" Art. VIII. The King of Great Britain ſhall reſtore to France, the iſlands of Guadaloupe, of Marie Galante, of Deſiderade, of Martinico, and of Belleiſle; and the fortreſſes of theſe iſlands ſhall be reſtored in the ſame condition they were in, when they were conquered by the Britiſh arms; provided that his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects who ſhall have ſettled in the ſaid iſlands, or thoſe who ſhall have any commercial affairs to ſettle there, or in the other places reſtored to France by the preſent treaty, ſhall have liberty to ſell their lands and their eſtates, to ſettle their affairs, to recover their debts, and to bring away their effects, as well as their perſons, on board veſſels, which they ſhall be permitted to ſend to the ſaid iſlands, and other places reſtored as above, and which ſhall ſerve for this uſe only, without being reſtrained on account of their religion, or under any other pretence whatſoever, except that of debts, or of criminal proſecutions: and for this purpoſe the term of eighteen months is allowed to his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty: but as the liberty granted to his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects, to bring away their perſons and their effects, in veſſels of their nation, may be liable to abuſes, if precautions were not taken to prevent them; it has been expreſsly agreed between his Britannic Majeſty and his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, that the number of Engliſh veſſels, which ſhall have leave to go to the ſaid iſlands and places reſtored to France, ſhall be limited, as well as the number of tons of each one; that they ſhall go in ballaſt; ſhall ſet ſail at a fixed time; and ſhall make one voyage only, all the effects belonging to the Engliſh being to be embarked at the ſame time. It has been further agreed, that his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty ſhall cauſe the neceſſary paſſports to be given to the ſaid veſſels; that, for the greater ſecurity, it ſhall be allowed to place two French clerks, or guards, in each of the ſaid veſſels, which ſhall be viſited in the landing places and ports of the ſaid iſlands and places reſtored to France, and that the merchandize which ſhall be found therein ſhall be confiſcated.

" Art. IX. The moſt Chriſtian King cedes and guarantees to his Britannic Majeſty, in full right the iſlands of Grenada, and of the Grenadines, with the ſame ſtipulations in favour of the inhabitants of this colony, inſerted in the IVth article for thoſe of Canada: and the partition of the iſlands called Neutral, is agreed and fixed, ſo that thoſe of St. Vincent, Dominica, and Tobago, ſhall remain in full right to Great Britain, and that of St. Lucia ſhall be delivered to France, to enjoy the ſame likewiſe in full right; and the high contracting parties guarantee the partition ſo ſtipulated.

" Art. X. His Britannic Majeſty ſhall reſtore to France the iſland of Goree in the condition it was in when conquered: and his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty cedes in full right, and guarantees to the King of Great Britain, the river Senegal, with the forts and factories of St. Lewis, Podor, and Galam; and with all the rights and dependencies of the ſaid river Senegal.

" Art. XI. In the Eaſt-Indies, Great Britain ſhall reſtore to France, in the condition they are now in, the different factories which that crown poſſeſſed, as well on the coaſt of Coromandel and Orixa, as on that of Malabar, as alſo in Bengal, at the beginning of the year 1749. And his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty renounces all pretenſions to the acquiſition which he had made on the coaſt of Coromandel and Orixa, ſince the ſaid beginning of the year 1749. His moſt Chriſtian Majeſty ſhall reſtore on his ſide, all that he may have conquered from Great Britain, in the Eaſt-Indies, during the preſent war; and will expreſsly cauſe Nattal and Tapanoully in the iſland of Sumatra, to be reſtored; he engages further not to erect fortifications, or to keep troops, in any part of the dominions of the Subah of Bengal. And in order to preſerve future peace on the coaſt of Coromandel and Orixa, the Engliſh and French ſhall acknowledge Mahomet Ally Khan for lawful Nabob of the Carnatick, and Salabat Jing for lawful Subah of the Decan; and both parties ſhall renounce all demands and pretentions of ſatisfaction, with which they might charge each other, or their Indian allies, for their depredations, or pillage, committed on the one ſide or on the other, during the war.

" Art. XII. The iſland of Minorca ſhall be reſtored to his Britannic Majeſty, as well as Fort St. Philip, in the ſame condition they were in, when conquered by the arms of the moſt Chriſtian King; and with the artillery which was there, when the ſaid iſland and the ſaid fort were taken.

" Art. XIII. The town and port of Dunkirk ſhall be put into the ſtate fixed by the laſt treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and by former treaties. The cunette ſhall be deſtroyed immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, as well as the forts and batteries which defend the entrance on the ſide of the ſea; and proviſion ſhall be made, at the ſame time, for the wholeſomeneſs of the air, and for the health of the inhabitants, by ſome other means, to the ſatiſfaction of the King of Great Britain.

“ Art. XIV. France ſhall reſtore all the countries belonging to the electorate of Hanover, to the Landgrave of Heſſe, to the Duke of Brunſwic, and to the count of La Lippe Buckebourg, which are or ſhall be occupied by his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's arms: the fortreſſes of theſe different countries ſhall be reſtored in the ſame condition they were in when conquered by the French arms; and the pieces of artillery, which ſhall have been carried elſewhere, ſhall be replaced by the ſame number, of the ſame bore, weight, and metal.

“ Art. XV. In caſe the ſtipulations contained in the XIIIth article of the preliminaries ſhould not be completed at the time of the ſignature of the preſent treaty, as well with regard to the evacuations to be made by the armies of France of the fortreſſes of Cleves, Weſel, Guelders, and of all the countries belonging to the King of Pruſſia, as with regard to the evacuations to be made by the Britiſh and French armies of the countries which they occupy in Weſtphalia, Lower Saxony, on the Lower Rhine, Upper Rhine, and in all the empire, and to the departure of the troops into the dominions of their reſpective ſovereigns: their Britannic and moſt Chriſtian Majeſties promiſe to proceed, bona fide, with all the diſpatch the caſe will permit of, to the ſaid evacuations, the entire completion whereof they ſtipulate before the 15th of March next, or ſooner if it can be done: and their Britannic and moſt Chriſtian Majeſties further engage and promiſe to each other, not to furniſh any ſuccours, of any kind, to their reſpective allies who ſhall continue engaged in the war in Germany.

“ Art. XVI. The deciſion of the prizes made in time of peace, by the ſubjects of Great Britain, on the Spaniards, ſhall be referred to the courts of juſtice of the admiralty of Great Britain, conformable to the rules eſtabliſhed among all nations, ſo that the validity of the ſaid prizes, between the Britiſh and Spaniſh nations, ſhall be decided and judged, according to the law of nations, and according to treaties in the courts of juſtice of the nation who ſhall have made the capture.

“ Art. XVII. His Britannic Majeſty ſhall cauſe to be demoliſhed all the fortifications which his ſubjects ſhall have erected in the Bay of Honduras, and other places of the territory of Spain in that part of the world, four months after the ratification of the preſent treaty: and his Catholic Majeſty ſhall not permit his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects, or their workmen, to be diſturbed, or moleſted, under any pretence whatſoever, in the ſaid places, in their occupation of cutting, loading, and carrying away, logwood: and for this purpoſe they may build without hindrance, and occupy without interruption, the houſes and magazines which are neceſſary for them, for their families, and for their effects: and his Catholic Majeſty aſſures to them, by this article, the full enjoyment of thoſe advantages, and powers, on the Spaniſh coaſts and territories, as above ſtipulated, immediately after the ratification of the preſent treaty.

“ Art. XVIII. His Catholic Majeſty deſiſts as well for himſelf as for his ſucceſſors, from all pretenſions which he may have formed in favour of the Guipuſcoans, and other his ſubjects, to the right of fiſhing in the neighbourhood of the iſland of Newfoundland.

“ Art. XIX. The King of Great Britain ſhall reſtore to Spain all the territory which he has conquered in the iſland of Cuba, with the fortreſs of the Havannah; and this fortreſs, as well as all the other fortreſſes of the ſaid iſland, ſhall be reſtored in the ſame condition they were in when conquered by his Britannic Majeſty's arms; provided that his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects who ſhall have ſettled in the ſaid iſland, reſtored to Spain by the preſent treaty, or thoſe who ſhall have any commercial affairs to ſettle there, ſhall have liberty to ſell their lands and their eſtates, to ſettle their affairs, to recover their debts, and to bring away their effects as well as their perſons, on board veſſels which they ſhall be permitted to ſend to the ſaid iſland reſtored as above, and which ſhall ſerve for that uſe only, without being reſtrained on account of their religion, or under any pretence whatſoever, except that of debts, or of criminal proſecution: and for this purpoſe the term of eighteen months is allowed to his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty: but as the liberty granted to his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects, to bring away their perſons and their effects, in veſſels of their nation, may be liable to abuſes, if precautions are not taken to prevent them; it has been expreſsly agreed, between his Britannic Majeſty and his Catholic Majeſty, that the number of Engliſh veſſels, which ſhall have leave to go to the ſaid iſland reſtored to Spain, ſhall be limited, as well as the number of tons of each; that they ſhall go in ballaſt; ſhall ſet ſail at a fixed time; and ſhall make one voyage only; all the effects belonging to the Engliſh being to be embarked at the ſame time: It has been further agreed, that his Catholic Majeſty ſhall cauſe the neceſſary paſſports to be given to the ſaid veſſels; that, for the greater ſecurity, it ſhall be allowed to place two Spaniſh clerks, or guards, in each of the ſaid veſſels, which ſhall be viſited in the landing places, and ports of the ſaid iſland reſtored to Spain, and that the merchandize, which ſhall be found therein, ſhall be confiſcated.

“ Art. XX. In conſequence of the reſtitution ſtipulated in the preceding article, his Catholic Majeſty cedes and guarantees, in full right, to his Britannic Majeſty, Florida, with Fort St. Aguſtin, and the bay of Penſacola, as well as all that Spain poſſeſſes on the continent of North-America, to the eaſt or to the ſouth-eaſt of the river Miſſiſſippi, and, in general, every thing that depends on the ſaid countries and lands, with the ſovereignty, property, poſſeſſion, and all rights, acquired by treaties or otherwiſe, which the Catholic King, and the crown of Spain have had, till now, over the ſaid countries, lands, places, and other inhabitants; ſo that the Catholic King cedes and makes over the whole to the ſaid King and to the crown of Great Britain, and that in the moſt ample manner and form. His Britannic Majeſty agrees, on his ſide, to grant to the inhabitants of the countries above ceded the liberty of the Catholic religion: he will conſequently give the moſt expreſs and the moſt effectual orders that his new Roman Catholic ſubjects may profeſs the worſhip of their religion, according to the rites of the Romiſh Church, as far as the laws of Great Britain permit: his Britannic Majeſty farther agrees, that the Spaniſh inhabitants, or others who had been ſubjects of the Catholic king in the ſaid countries, may retire, with all ſafety and freedom, wherever they think proper; and may ſell their eſtates, provided it be to his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects, and bring away their effects, as well as their perſons, without being reſtrained in their emigration, under any pretence whatſoever, except that of debts or of criminal proſecutions; the term limited for this emigration being fixed to the ſpace of eighteen months, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty. It is moreover ſtipulated, that his Catholic Majeſty ſhall have power to cauſe all the effects that may belong to him to be brought away, whether it be artillery, or other things.

" Art. XXI. The French and Spaniſh troops ſhall evacute all the territories, lands, towns, places, and caſtles, of his moſt Faithful Majeſty in Europe, without any reſerve, which ſhall have been conquered by the armies of France and Spain, and ſhall reſtore them in the ſame condition they were in when conquered, with the ſame artillery and ammunition, which were found there: and with regard to the Portugueſe colonies in America, Africa, or in the Eaſt-Indies, if any change ſhall have happened there, all things ſhall be reſtored on the ſame footing they were in, and conformably to the preceding treaties, which ſubſiſted between the courts of France, Spain and Portugal, before the preſent war.

" Art. XXII. All the papers, letters, documents and archives, which were found in the countries, territories, towns and places that are reſtored, and thoſe belonging to the countries ceded, ſhall be reſpectively and bona fide delivered, or furniſhed at the ſame time, if poſſible, that poſſeſſion is taken, or, at lateſt, four months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, in whatever places the ſaid papers or documents may be found.

" Art. XXIII. All the countries and territories, which may have been conquered, in whatſoever part of the world, by the arms of their Britannic and moſt Faithful Majeſties, as well as by thoſe of their moſt Chriſtian and Catholic Majeſties, which are not included in the preſent treaty, either under the title of ceſſions, or under the title of reſtitutions, ſhall be reſtored without difficulty, and without requiring any compenſation.

" Art. XXIV. As it is neceſſary to aſſign a fixed epoch for the reſtitutions, and the evacuations, to be made by each of the high contracting parties; it is agreed, that the Britiſh and French troops ſhall complete, before the 15th of March next, all that ſhall remain to be executed of the XIIth and XIIIth articles of the preliminaries, ſigned the 3d day of November laſt, with regard to the evacuation to be made in the empire, or elſewhere. The iſland of Belleiſle ſhall be evacuated ſix weeks after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done. Guadaloupe, Deſiderade, Mariegalante, Martinico, and St. Lucia, three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner if it can be done. Great Britain ſhall likewiſe, at the end of three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner if it can be done, enter into poſſeſſion of the river and port of the Mobile, and of all that is to form the limits of the territory of Great Britain, on the ſide of the river Miſſiſſippi, as they are ſpecified in the VIIth article. The iſland of Goree ſhall be evacuated by Great Britain, three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty; and the iſland of Minorca by France, at the ſame epoch, or ſooner if it can be done: and, according to the conditions of the VIth article, France ſhall likewiſe enter into poſſeſſion of the iſlands of St. Pierre and of Miquelon, at the end of three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty. The factories in the Eaſt Indies ſhall be reſtored ſix months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done. The fortreſs of the Havannah, with all that has been conquered in the iſland of Cuba, ſhall be reſtored three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done: and, at the ſame time, Great Britain ſhall enter into poſſeſſion of the country ceded by Spain, according to the XXth article. All the places and countries of his moſt Faithful Majeſty in Europe ſhall be reſtored, immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty; and the Portugeſe colonies, which may have been conquered, ſhall be reſtored in the ſpace of three months in the Weſt Indies, and of ſix months in the Eaſt Indies, after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done. All the fortreſſes, the reſtitution whereof is ſtipulated above, ſhall be reſtored, with the artillery and ammunition which were found there at the time of the conqueſt. In conſequence whereof, the neceſſary orders ſhall be ſent by each of the high contracting parties, with reciprocal paſſports for the ſhips that ſhall carry them, immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty.

" Art. XXV. His Britannic Majeſty, as Elector of Brunſwic Lunenburg, as well for himſelf, as for his heirs and ſucceſſors, and all the dominions and poſſeſſions of his ſaid Majeſty in Germany, are included and guaranteed by the preſent treaty of peace.

" Art. XXVI. Their Sacred Britannic, moſt Chriſtian, Catholic, and moſt Faithful Majeſties, promiſe to obſerve, ſincerely and bona fide, all the articles contained in the preſent treaty; and they will not ſuffer the ſame to be infringed, directly or indirectly, by their reſpective ſubjects; and the ſaid high contracting parties, generally and reciprocally, guarantee to each other all the ſtipulations of the preſent treaty.

" Art. XXVII. The ſolemn ratifications of the preſent treaty, expedited in good and due form, ſhall be exchanged, in this city of Paris, between the high contracting parties, in the ſpace of a month, or ſooner if poſſible, to be computed from the day of the ſignature of the preſent treaty.

" In witneſs whereof, we, the underwritten, the Ambaſſadors Extraordinary and Miniſters Plenipotentiary, have ſigned with our hand, in their name, and in virtue of our full powers, the preſent Definitive Treaty, and have cauſed the ſeal of our arms to be put thereto."

SEPARATE ARTICLES.

I. SOME of the titles made uſe of by the contracting powers, either in their full powers and other acts, during the courſe of the negotiation, or in the preamble of the preſent treaty, not being generally acknowledged; it has been agreed, That no prejudice ſhall ever reſult therefrom to any of the ſaid contracting parties, and that the titles taken or omitted on either ſide, on occaſion of the ſaid negotiation and of the preſent treaty, ſhall not be cited or quoted as a precedent.

II. It has been agreed and determined, That the French languague, made uſe of in all the the copies of the preſent treaty, ſhall not become an example, which may be alledged, or made a precedent of, or prejudice in any manner, any of the contracting powers: and that they ſhall conform themſelves, for the future, to what has been obſerved, and ought to be obſerved, with regard to, and on the part of, powers who are uſed, and have a right, to give and to receive copies of like treaties in another language than French; the preſent treaty having ſtill the ſame force and effect, as if the aforeſaid cuſtom had been therein obſerved.

III. Though the king of Portugal has not ſigned the preſent definitive treaty, their Britannic, moſt Chriſtian, and Catholic Majeſties, acknowledge, nevertheleſs, that his moſt Faithful Majeſty is formally included therein as a contracting party, and as if he had expreſsly ſigned the ſaid treaty; conſequently, their Britannic, moſt Chriſtian, and Catholic Majeſties, reſpectively and conjointly, promiſe to his moſt Faithful Majeſty, in the moſt expreſs and moſt binding manner, the execution of all and every the clauſes contained in the ſaid treaty, on his act of acceſſion.

The preſent ſeparate articles ſhall have the ſame force as if they were inſerted in the treaty.

Declaration of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's Plenipotentiary, with regard to the debts due to the Canadians.

THE King of Great Britain having deſired that the payment of the letters of exchange and bills, which have been delivered to the Canadians, for the neceſſaries furniſhed to the French troops, ſhould be ſecured; his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, entirely diſpoſed to render to every one that juſtice which is legally due to them, has declared, and does declare, that the ſaid bills and letters of exchange ſhall be punctually paid, agreeable to a liquidation made in a convenient time, according to the diſtance of the places, and to what ſhall be poſſible; taking care, however, that the bills and letters of exchange, which the French ſubjects may have at the time of this declaration, be not confounded with the bills and letters of exchange which are in the poſſeſſion of the new ſubjects of the King of Great Britain.

In witneſs whereof, we, the underwritten miniſter of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, duly authorized for this purpoſe, have ſigned the preſent declaration, and cauſed the ſeal of our arms to be put thereto.

Declaration of his Britannic Majeſty's Ambaſſador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, with regard to the limits of Bengal in the Eaſt Indies.

WE the underwritten Ambaſſador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the King of Great Britain, in order to prevent all ſubject of diſpute on account of the limits of the dominions of the Subah of Bengal, as well as the coaſt of Coromandel, and Orixa, declare, in the name, and by order of his ſaid Britannic Majeſty, that the ſaid dominions of the Subah of Bengal ſhall be reputed not to extend farther than Yanaon excluſively, and that Yanaon ſhall be conſidered as included in the north part of the coaſt of Coromandel or Orixa.

In witneſs whereof, &c.

BEDFORD, C. P. S.
(L. S.)

Such were the articles of this treaty of peace, both for and againſt which many ſtrong arguments were uſed by the different parties who countenanced or condemned it. On the one hand it was aſſerted, that as we had, at a great expence of blood and treaſure, reduced the French nation to a ſtate of beggary, ſo we ought, in order to keep them humble, to have retained all the conqueſts to ourſelves; for by ſo doing, their commerce being effectually ruined, they would not have been able for many years, to give us the leaſt diſturbance. On the other hand, it was urged, by ſuch as were friends to the peace, that the advantage to Britain was very great, and that we had not only regained the iſland of Minorca, but that we had acquired the moſt extenſive territories in North America and the Weſt-Indies, which, if cultivated in a proper manner, would turn out to the advantage of the mother country. It was urged further, that had we inſiſted on retaining all, we might have loſt all. The body would have been too large for the head, and the inhabitants being moſtly French, the Engliſh would have been obliged to keep up a large ſtanding army to enforce the execution of the laws, and promote good order among the people.

The parliament were no leſs divided in their opinions than the nation in general. The treaty, like the preliminaries, occaſioned very violent debates in both houſes, but was at length approved of by a great majority. The ſpirit of the minority was not, however, exhauſted in this attempt. They fell upon the miniſtry in the moſt critical juncture, and puſhed their arguments with the utmoſt force when the ſupplies came to be debated in the lower houſe. Several circumſtances favoured their deſign. The buſineſs of impoſitions is, in itſelf, unpopular; it is, therefore, no wonder that diſcontented and fertile minds ſhould very readily and plauſibly forebode ill conſequences from an untried tax: and there is ſcarce a public burthen which may not, with an appearance of reaſon, be ſpeculatively traced to the ruin of ſome branch of manufacture or commerce. It may alſo be obſerved, though taxes were full as neceſſary at the concluſion as during the war, that neceſſity was not ſo glaringly evident; conſequently they were not ſo well received as when victory and plunder ſeemed to pay, in glory and profit, for every article of national expence.

Senſible in what ſtate the minds of the people now were, the miniſtry determined to impoſe as few new taxes as the public ſervice could poſſibly admit. Accordingly, the ſupplies were to be raiſed, firſt, by taking two millions out of the ſinking fund; ſecondly, by ſtriking 1,800,000l. in exchequer bills; thirdly, by borrowing 2,800,000l. on annuities; and laſtly, by two lotteries, for 350,000l. each. To pay the intereſt on theſe loans, which, in the whole, amounted to 7,300,000l. an additional duty of eight pounds per ton was laid upon all wines of the growth of France, and four pounds per ton upon all other wines.

Thus far the ſcheme was wholly unexceptionable; but another duty was added, which put the whole nation into a ferment, viz. four ſhillings per hogſhead upon cyder, to be paid by the maker, collected by the officers, and ſubjected to all the laws of exciſe.

The heads of the oppoſition differed in opinion with the treaſury upon every particular in this plan. They firſt attacked the new taxation, upon which almoſt the whole ſcheme of ſupply was founded. In direct contradiction to the advocates of the miniſtry, they maintained that the nation was far from exhauſted: that there were reſources for carrying on the war at leaſt two years longer, and much more towards clearing off incumbrances on the peace: that as individuals abound in wealth, and as the public is loaded with ſo immenſe a debt, it was, in ſuch circumſtances, the dictates of the wiſeſt and moſt enlarged policy to add as much as poſſible, by bold and liberal grants, to the income of the nation; as the fund of payment would then be enlarged, and œconomy would have ſomething to operate upon: that, in any other method, the practice of frugality was mean and ſordid, and the effect would certainly prove trifling: that it might ſtarve many uſeful parts of public ſervice, but muſt ever be found a frivolous and fallacious reſource towards the diſcharge of the public debt. To the lottery loan they objected the enormous profit which was allowed to the ſubſcribers, exceeding that of former occaſions, without any alterations in the ſtate of public credit; two lotteries, for the firſt time, eſtabliſhed in one year, without any urgent neceſſity; and the incitement which muſt thence ariſe to the pernicious ſpirit of gaming, which cannot be too much diſcountenanced in every ſtate governed by wiſdom, and a ſober regard to the morals of the people. As to the money that was to be taken from the ſinking fund they obſerved, that ſcarce any neceſſity could, in our ſituation, be pleaded in favour of a perverſion of this fund from its original purpoſes to the current ſervices; that the appearance of tenderneſs for the people in this ſcheme was entirely deceitful, as they were exonerated for a time, only to be burthened more heavily hereafter, and that their preſent eaſe muſt infallibly cauſe their future weakneſs. As to the tax on cyder, they urged, that with regard to its object it was both partial and oppreſſive; with regard to the manner of collecting it, dangerous and unconſtitutional: that it lays the whole burthen of expences incurred in the general defence of the kingdom, and in defence of the national commerce, on a few particular counties, which in every other article of the public charge contribute at leaſt their full ſhare: they ſtated the diſproportion of this tax to the natural original value of the commodity: that it was oppreſſive both to farmers and landholders: to the latter in diminution of their rents, operating more ſeverely than the land-tax: to the former, becauſe, if they compounded, it would be in effect a heavy capitation, if they did not, it would be a ſubjection to new, unknown, and perplexed laws: they obſerved, that when new orders of men, by ſituation and profeſſion diſtinct from traders, are rendered objects of the exciſe laws, the precedent is formidable not to commerce only, but to more important objects; and had a fatal tendency, which they trembled to think on: they alſo lamented, that things were come to that melancholy paſs, that, beſides what might be dreaded for the future, the houſes of all orders of people, peers, gentlemen, freeholders and farmers, were rendered liable to be entered and ſearched at pleaſure.

In anſwer to theſe arguments, the friends of the adminiſtration obſerved, That to aim at increaſing the national income by any further taxes, than the moſt extreme neceſſity demanded, was a wild project: that every tax proved a diſcouragement to trade, becauſe, in its conſequences, it enhanced, more or leſs, in foreign markets, the price of our manufactures, which muſt always, in time of peace, depend for their vent principally on their cheapneſs; and that this muſt be the caſe, let the peace be made upon what terms they would: that every tax alſo, in order to be effectual, naturally implied ſome reſtraint upon liberty: that nothing demonſtrated more fully the ſolidity of theſe principles, than the oppoſition then made to the duty on cyder and perry, a moſt moderate and equitable impoſition; and that of all men it ill became thoſe who ſpoke ſo ſtrongly of continuing and enlarging the charge of the nation, to object to one of the leaſt diſtreſſing reſources which could be found for the public. They inſiſted that nothing could be leſs founded on reaſon than the charge, "That "this tax was unequal, and lay heavy upon ſome par"ticular counties," it being well known that it did not even bring them on a par with the charge on thoſe counties where the people drink beer. In ſuch counties all private, as well as public conſumption, is charged in the malt tax, which the charge on cyder is by no means equal to, beſides its having exemptions in favour of the poor, which are not indulged in the malt tax; ſo that the cyder counties ought to be rather thankful for their long immunity, than complain that they are at laſt obliged to contribute rather leſs than their proportion towards the ſupport of the national burthens.

Such were the principal arguments uſed in this remarkable debate; when the queſtion being put, it was carried in the affirmative by a very conſiderable majority. In the upper houſe alſo the bill was ſtrongly oppoſed; but after a ſmart debate the miniſtry carried their point, and the bill received the royal aſſent.

On the 22d of March peace was proclaimed in London at the uſual places, and with the accuſtomed ſolemnities.

On the 19th of April * the king went to the houſe of peers, and having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, he prorogued the parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he expreſſed his thanks for the zeal and diſpatch they had manifeſted in their proceedings: he told them, that, having ordered the preliminary

* On the day preceding this M. Querini, and M. Moroſini, ambaſſadors extraordinary from the republic of Venice to the court of London, made their public entry. As this ceremony is not very frequent, and as many of our readers muſt be ſtrangers to the nature of it, we ſhall lay before them a deſcription of the proceſſion.

The whole company aſſembled at Greenwich, from whence they ſet off, between twelve and one, in a number of barges, appointed for the purpoſe. About three they landed at the Tower, and, in the following order, proceeded through the Minories, Leadenhall-ſtreet, Cornhill, Cheapſide, Ludgate-ſtreet, Fleet-ſtreet, and along the Strand to Somerſet-houſe, which was appointed for their reſidence, at his majeſty's expence, till he granted them an audience.

Four king's under marſhalmen on horſeback.
City-marſhal on horſeback.
Aſſiſtant maſter of the ceremonies, in a coach and ſix.
Thirty-eight ſervants, two and two, on foot.
Eight gentlemen of the bed-chambers, belonging to ambaſſadors, on horſeback, two and two.
Houſe-ſteward, on horſeback.
Eight pages on horſeback, two and two.
Maſter of the horſe.
Ten muſicians on horſeback, two and two.
Kettle-drum.
Second maſter of the horſe.
King's ſtate coach drawn by ſix horſes, with the ambaſſadors, the earl of Guildford, and
The maſter of the ceremonies.
King's ſecond coach, drawn by ſix horſes, with the two ſecretaries to the embaſſy.
Six gentlemen of the privy-chamber, in the next royal coaches.
The coaches belonging to her majeſty, the princeſs of Wales, the duke of York, princeſs Auguſta, duke of Cumberland, and princeſs Amelia, drawn by ſix horſes each.
The ambaſſadors grand ſtate coach, empty, drawn by eight horſes.
The ſecond coach, empty, drawn by ſix horſes.
The third coach, with two Venetian noblemen, drawn by ſix horſes.
The peers coaches and ſix.

On the 21ſt their excellencies were conducted in great ſtate from Somerſet-houſe to St. James's, where they were received by the guards on duty, under arms. They were then conducted to the little council-chamber by the earl of Suſſex and Sir Charles Cotterel Dormer, maſter of the ceremonies. At the door of the guard-chamber they were received by the lord viſcount Falmouth, captain of the yeomen of the guard; at the drawing-room door by the earl of Litchfield, captain of the band of penſioners; and at the great council-chamber, where his majeſty gave them audience, by the duke of Marlborough, lord chamberlain.

M. Moroſini addreſſed the king in Italian, and his majeſty replied in Engliſh; after which their excellencies retired, and were admitted to an audience of the queen, with the ſame ceremony. They were then conducted to a houſe in Great Ormond-ſtreet, where they reſided during their ſtay in England.

preliminary articles to be laid before them, he had received the higheſt ſatisfaction at their grateful expreſſions of entire approbation: he acquainted them with his firm reſolution to form his government on a plan of ſtrict œconomy: aſſured the commons, that they might depend on the utmoſt frugality being obſerved in the diſpoſition of the ſupplies they had granted; and when the account of the money ariſing from the ſale of ſuch prizes, as were veſted in the crown, ſhould be cloſed, it was his intention to direct, that the produce ſhould be applied to the public ſervice; and concluded with declaring, that his future attention ſhould be directed to the extenſion of the commerce of his ſubjects, the improvement of the advantages they had obtained, and the increaſe of the public revenue.

We come now to the commencement of an event, which wholly engroſſed the attention of the public, and afterwards produced ſuch circumſtances as will not, in all probability, be ever paralleled.

A rule for an information was granted by the court of King's Bench againſt the author, printers and publiſhers of a periodical paper, called the North Briton, Nº 45; which contained a ſevere commentary on the king's ſpeech at the cloſe of the ſeſſion of parliament on the 19th of April.

John Wilkes, Eſq. member of parliament for Ayleſbury in Buckinghamſhire, was the gentleman pitched on as the ſuppoſed author of this performance. A warrant was therefore iſſued by the ſecretary of ſtate for taking Mr. Wilkes, together with the printer and publiſher, into cuſtody. Accordingly, on the evening of the 29th of April, the meſſengers went to Mr. Wilkes's houſe for that purpoſe. On their entrance he excepted to the generality of the warrant, as his name was not mentioned in it, and threatened the firſt who ſhould offer violence to his perſon in his own houſe, at that unſeaſonable hour of the night, upon any pretended verbal order which they might, or might not, have received for that purpoſe. Upon this the meſſengers thought proper to retire, and defer the execution of their warrant till next morning, when they took him into cuſtody, and carried him before the ſecretaries of ſtate for examination.

On the intimation of this event a motion was made in the court of Common-Pleas, then ſitting in Weſtminſter-hall, for a Habeas Corpus, which was granted, though by reaſon of the Prothonotary's office not being open, it could not be ſued out till four o'clock in the afternoon. In the mean time ſeveral gentlemen applied for admittance to him; which was refuſed, upon pretence of an order, from the ſecretaries of ſtate, which order, notwithſtanding many ſolicitations to that purpoſe, was never produced; and though it was well known that the court of Common-Pleas had granted an Habeas Corpus, and Philip Carteret Webb, Eſq. was aſſured of the fact, Mr. Wilkes was committed to the Tower, where many of his friends were alſo denied admittance to him.

On the 3d of May he was brought to the bar of the court of Common Pleas, where he addreſſed himſelf to the judges on the illegality and hardſhips of his commitment, in a very bold and animated ſpeech*.

The caſe was then learnedly argued by eminent lawyers on both ſides; but the court, after making a polite excuſe to Mr. Wilkes for the delay (requiring farther time to conſider of the affair) he was remanded to the Tower till the 6th of May, with orders that his friends and lawyers ſhould have free acceſs to him. In the mean time orders were given that Mr. Wilkes ſhould no longer continue colonel of the militia for the county of Buckingham.

On the day appointed Mr. Wilkes was again brought to Weſtminſter-hall, when, after another ſpirited addreſs † to the court, and many learned arguments on both ſides, the lord chief juſtice Pratt proceeded to give his opinion on the three following points, viz. The legality of Mr. Wilkes's commitment; the neceſſity for a ſpecification of thoſe particular paſſages in Nº 45 of the North Briton, which had been deemed a libel; and his privilege as a member of parliament. Theſe points were diſcuſſed by his lordſhip in a manner, which will redound to his honour to the lateſt poſterity: and his opinion having deſervedly met with the approbation of the whole court, Mr. Wilkes was diſcharged. Before, however, he had quitted the court, a gentleman of eminence in the law ſtood up, and informed the lord chief juſtice, that he had juſt received a note from the attorney and ſolicitor-general, to deſire his lordſhip would detain Mr. Wilkes till their arrival, as they had ſomething to offer againſt his plea of privilege. This requeſt, however, was not complied with; and Mr. Wilkes took his leave of the court with the following ſpeech:

---

* Mr. Wilkes's addreſs on this occaſion was as follows:

"My Lords,

"I feel myſelf happy to be at laſt brought before a court, and before judges whoſe characteriſtic is the love of liberty. I have many humble thanks to return for the immediate orders you were pleaſed to iſſue, to give me an opportunity of laying my grievances before you. They are of a kind hitherto unparalleled in this free country, and I truſt the conſequences will teach miniſters of Scottiſh and arbitrary principles, that the liberty of an Engliſh ſubject is not to be ſported away with impunity, in this cruel and deſpotic manner.

"I am accuſed of being the author of the North Briton, No. 45. I ſhall only remark upon that paper, that it takes off all load of accuſation from the ſacred name of a prince, whoſe family I love and honour as the glorious defenders of the cauſe of liberty, and whoſe perſonal qualities are ſo amiable, great, and reſpectable, that he is deſervedly the idol of his people. It is the peculiar faſhion and crime of theſe times, and of thoſe who hold high miniſterial offices in government, to throw every odious charge from themſelves upon majeſty: the author of this paper, whoever he may be, has, upon conſtitutional principles, done directly the reverſe, and is, therefore, in me, the ſuppoſed author, meant to be perſecuted accordingly; the particular cruelties of my treatment, worſe than if I had been a Scotch rebel, this court will hear, and I dare ſay, from your juſtice, in due time, redreſs.

"I may, perhaps, ſtill have the means left, to ſhew that I have been ſuperior to every temptation. They may, indeed, have flattered themſelves, that when they found corruption could not prevail, perſecution might intimidate. I will ſhew myſelf ſuperior to both. My papers have been ſeized, perhaps with a hope the better to deprive me of that proof of their meanneſs and corrupt prodigality, which it may poſſibly, in a proper place, be yet in my power to give."

† His ſpeech to the court at this time was as follows:

"My Lords,

"Far be it from me to regret that I have paſſed ſo many more days in captivity, as it will have afforded you an opportunity of doing, upon mature reflection and repeated examination, the more ſignal juſtice to my country. The liberty of all peers and gentlemen, and what touches me more ſenſibly, that of all the middling and inferior claſs of people, who ſtand moſt in need of protection, is, in my caſe, this day to be finally decided; a queſtion of ſuch importance, as to determine at once, whether Engliſh liberty be a reality or a ſhadow. Your own free-born hearts will feel with indignation and compaſſion all that load of oppreſſion under which I have ſo long laboured. Cloſe impriſonment, the effect of premeditated malice, all acceſs for more than two days denied to me, my houſe ranſacked and plundered, my moſt ſecret and private concerns divulged, every vile and malignant inſinuation, even of high treaſon itſelf, no leſs induſtriouſly than falſely circulated by my cruel and implacable enemies, together with all the various inſolence of office, form but a part of my unexampled ill treatment. Such inhuman principles of Star-chamber tyranny will, I truſt, by this court, upon this ſolemn occaſion, be finally extirpated; and henceforth every innocent man, however poor and unſupported, may hope to ſleep in peace and ſecurity in his own houſe, unviolated by king's meſſengers, and the arbitrary mandates of an overbearing ſecretary of ſtate.

"I will no longer delay your juſtice. The nation is impatient to hear, nor can be ſafe or happy till that is obtained. If the ſame perſecution is after all to carry me before another court, I hope I ſhall find that the genuine ſpirit of Magna Charta, that glorious inheritance, that diſtinguiſhing characteriſtic of Engliſhmen, is as religiouſly revered there as I know it is here, by the great perſonages before whom I have now the happineſs to ſtand; and, as in the ever-memorable caſe of the impriſoned biſhops, that an independent jury of free-born Engliſhmen will perſiſt to determine my fate, as in conſcience bound, upon conſtitutional principles, by a verdict of Guilty, or Not Guilty. I aſk no more at the hands of my countrymen."

“ My Lords,

“ Great as my joy muſt naturally be at the deciſion which this court, with a true ſpirit of liberty, has been pleaſed to make concerning the unwarrantable ſeizure of my perſon, and all the other conſequential grievances, allow me to aſſure you that I feel it far leſs ſenſibly on my own account, than I do for the public. The ſufferings of an individual are a trifling object, when compared with the whole; and I ſhould bluſh to feel for myſelf in compariſon with conſiderations of a nature ſo tranſcendently ſuperior.

“ I will not trouble you with my poor thanks. Thanks are due to you from the whole Engliſh nation, and from all the ſubjects of the Engliſh crown. They will be paid you, together with every teſtimony of zeal and affection to the learned ſerjeant, who has ſo ably and conſtitutionally pleaded my cauſe, and in mine, with pleaſure I ſay it, the cauſe of liberty. Every teſtimony of my gratitude is juſtly due to you, and I take my leave of this court with a veneration and reſpect, which no time can obliterate, nor the moſt grateful heart ſufficiently expreſs.”

Soon after Mr. Wilkes was releaſed from the Tower, he cauſed a printing-preſs to be ſet up, under his own direction, at his houſe in Great-George-ſtreet, Weſtminſter, where he advertiſed the proceedings of the adminiſtration, with all the original papers; and the North-Briton was re-publiſhed. In the mean time an information was filed againſt him in the court of King's Bench, at his majeſty's ſuit, as being author of the North Briton, No. 45; and on the meeting of the parliament a meſſage was ſent to the houſe of commons with the information his majeſty had received, that John Wilkes, Eſq. a member of that houſe, was the author of a moſt ſeditious and dangerous libel. The examinations and proofs of the ſaid libel, together wtth the meaſures that had been taken thereon, were alſo laid before the houſe; in conſequence of which, the North Briton, No. 45, was adjudged a falſe, ſcandalous, and ſeditious libel, and was ordered to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman.

On the 3d of December, the day appointed for this ſentence to be put in execution, a great mob aſſembled at the Royal Exchange, who inſulted the ſheriffs in a very groſs manner, and one of them received a ſlight wound in the fray, which obliged him to quit the place. The North-Briton, however, was partly conſumed, by means of a lighted link, but ſome ſcraps of it were carried off in triumph by the mob, who, in the evening, diſplayed them at Temple-Bar, where a bonfire was made, and the greateſt rejoicings exhibited on the occaſion.

A complaint had been made to the houſe of commons, by Mr. Wilkes, of a breach of their privilege, by the impriſonment of his perſon, the plundering of his houſe, the ſeizing of his papers, and the ſerving him with a ſubpœna upon an information in the court of King's-Bench, &c. Mr. Wilkes, however, not ſatisfied with this, commenced an action againſt Robert Wood, Eſq. under ſecretary of ſtate, for ſeizing his papers. The cauſe was tried on the 6th of December before lord chief juſtice Pratt, and a ſpecial jury; when, after a hearing of near fifteen hours, many arguments on both ſides, and a moſt maſterly, pathetic and eloquent charge given by his lordſhip, the jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff with one thouſand pounds damages, and full coſts of ſuit *.

Previous to this, a complaint had been exhibited againſt Mr. Wilkes in the houſe of lords, for affixing the name of a member of that houſe to a book entitled, “ An eſſay on woman;” which book was publicly produced, to the utter confuſion and eternal diſgrace of every perſon concerned in it; but Mr. Wilkes could not prefer his anſwer, being at that time indiſpoſed, in conſequence of a wound he had received in a duel with Samuel Martin, Eſq; late ſecretary of the treaſury; who, thinking himſelf groſsly inſulted in the North Britain, and, by what had paſſed, preſuming Mr. Wilkes was the author of that abuſe, he ſent him a challenge, which being readily accepted by Mr. Wilkes, he unfortunately received a dangerous wound in the belly; of which he ſent immediate notice to the houſe of commons, who thereupon gave him time for his appearance, and afterwards, on the report of his phyſician and ſurgeon, enlarged it: but at length beginning to ſuſpect ſome colluſion between him and them, on the 16th of December they ordered Dr. Heberden and Mr. Hawkins to attend him, in order to obſerve the progreſs of his cure, and make a report of the ſame to the houſe. This being made known to Mr. Wilkes by his phyſician, he ſent cards to the two gentlemen appointed to attend him, expreſſing his juſt ſenſe of the kind care of the houſe for his ſpeedy recovery, but at the ſame time intimated his perfect reliance on the gentlemen to whom he had committed his caſe, and aſſured them, that though he did not wiſh to ſee them at preſent, he was impatient for an opportunity of ſhewing the juſt regard he would ever pay to diſtinguiſhed merit.

We will not attempt to ſay whether the attention of the houſe had any happy effect on Mr. Wilkes's health, but he recovered ſo faſt, that on the 24th of December he ſet out for France on a viſit to his daughter, who was at this time very ill at Paris, and where for the preſent we ſhall leave him to attend to the tranſactions of the enſuing year.

A. D. 1764. The firſt event of a public nature that happened

* On the evening of the day on which this verdict was obtained, a perſon knocked at Mr. Wilkes's door, deſiring to ſpeak with him on particular buſineſs, but it appearing by his dialect that he was a Scotchman, and being beſides an entire ſtranger, he was refuſed admittance; on which he went to a coffee-houſe in Parliament-ſtreet, where a perſon made affidavit, that he heard him declare, himſelf and ten more were determined to cut off Mr. Wilkes, let the event be what it would. This perſon the next morning gave information to Mr. Wilkes, deſiring him to be on his guard. According to the information the perſon ſworn againſt, as was ſuppoſed, bringing a letter to Mr. Wilkes's houſe, ſigned Alexander Dun, (the purport of which was to beg an interview with him on buſineſs of the utmoſt importance) he was deſired to call again at one o'clock, which he did accordingly; and ſeven o'clock in the evening being then appointed, he again attended; but as he was going out of the parlour door two gentlemen, who had placed themſelves behind it for that purpoſe, ſeized him by the arms, and threw him on his back. On ſearching his pockets a new penknife was found, which he pretended he had purchaſed about nine months before; but after many equivocations he acknowledged to have bought it at Chatham within a fortnight. From theſe circumſtances he was taken into cuſtody, and the next morning carried before one of the judges: after which a complaint was exhibited againſt him in the houſe of commons, and he was ordered to be brought to the bar of the houſe, when, after an examination, he was diſcharged, being generally ſuppoſed to be inſane.

happened this year was, the marriage of her royal highneſs the princeſs Auguſta (eldeſt ſiſter to his majeſty) to his ſerene highneſs Charles William, hereditary prince of Brunſwick Lunenburg. The ceremony was performed on the evening of the 16th of January, in the great council-chamber at St. James's by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the preſence of a great number of peers, peereſſes, and foreign miniſters. Their ſerene highneſſes left London on the 26th, and on the 29th embarked at Harwich on board different yachts; but, from the badneſs of the weather, they did not reach Helvoetſluys, till the 4th day after their embarkation. Her royal highneſs's dowry was 80,000l. which was granted by the parliament.

On the 20th of January the commons expelled Mr. Wilkes, for a contempt of their authority, and publiſhing the North Briton, being adjudged an infamous libel, and iſſued out a writ of election for Ayleſbury in his room; and in the month of February his trial came on in the court of King's Bench, before lord chief juſtice Mansfield, for reprinting and publiſhing the North Briton, No. 45. at his own houſe; of which publication he was found guilty; as he was afterwards of printing and publiſhing the "Eſſay "on Woman." A letter received from Mr. Wilkes was then publiſhed, together with a certificate, ſigned by one of the French king's phyſicians, and a ſurgeon of eminence, which was atteſted by two notaries, and the earl of Hertford, our ambaſſador at the court of France, wherein it appeared that he was ſo bad with his wound as not to have been able, during the month of January, to return to England.

On the 18th of April his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, cloſed the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot put an end to this ſeſſion of parliament, without returning you my hearty thanks for the prudent and ſalutary meaſures which you have taken to extend the commerce, and ſecure the happineſs of my kingdoms.

"The aſſurances which I have received of the pacific diſpoſition of the ſeveral powers with whom we were lately at war, and of their reſolution to adhere inviolably to the terms of the late treaty, promiſe the continuance of peace abroad; and the firm and temperate exertion of your authority, joined to the conſtitutional and public-ſpirited conduct which you have manifeſted on every occaſion during the preſent ſeſſion will, I truſt, eſtabliſh at home due obedience to the laws, reverence to the legiſlature, and domeſtic union.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I thank you for the ſupplies which you have ſo chearfully and unanimouſly granted. The ample proviſion you have made for the ſeveral ſervices recommended to you, and eſpecially for maintaining my fleet in a reſpectable ſtate, will, I am confident, preſerve to this nation its proper weight and influence, and give ſtrength and ſecurity to all my dominions.

"The wiſe regulations which have been eſtabliſhed to augment the public revenues, to unite the intereſts of the moſt diſtant poſſeſſions of my crown, and to encourage and ſecure their commerce with Great Britain, call for my hearty approbation.

"Your regard to public credit, in diſcharging a part of the heavy debt contracted and unprovided for during the war, without impoſing on this kingdom the burthen of any new taxes, is particularly pleaſing to me, from the tender concern which I feel for my people.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is the proper employment of this ſeaſon of tranquillity to conſider of the moſt effectual means for perfecting thoſe works of peace, and plans of public utility, which have been ſo wiſely and happily begun.

"I recommend theſe important objects to your conſideration during the receſs. You may depend upon my conſtant endeavours for the ſucceſs of theſe good purpoſes; as I ſhall ever eſteem it my trueſt glory to employ that power with which the conſtitution has entruſted me, in promoting your real intereſts and laſting happineſs."

On the 23d of April a chapter of the moſt noble order of the garter was held at St. James's, where his majeſty was pleaſed to inveſt the reigning duke of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz, eldeſt brother to her majeſty, with one of the vacancies of that order, and the other was beſtowed on the right honourable the earl of Halifax. Theſe vacancies were occaſioned by the demiſe of the earls of Granville and Waldegrave.

In the month of Auguſt a circumſtance happened that gave manifeſt proof of the wonted humanity and beneficence of the inhabitants of London. One colonel Stumpel, an officious German Soldier of fortune, pretending authority from the Britiſh miniſtry, engaged about 600 proteſtant Wurtzburgers and Palatines to emigrate from their own country, by a promiſe of ſettling them in the iſlands of St. John and le Croix in America. After they had been ſhipped for England, the contractor, finding himſelf unable to fulfil his engagements, abandoned them, and they arrived at the port of London in the moſt imminent danger of periſhing for want. Thoſe who were able to pay their paſſage were permitted to come on ſhore, and retired to the fields adjoining to Whitechapel, where they continued ſome days in the moſt wretched ſtate, not having the leaſt ſhelter to preſerve them from the inclemency of the weather; while thoſe who remained on board the ſhip were nearly in as deſtitute a ſituation.

The only aſſiſtance theſe poor deluded people received for ſome days was what could be gathered from the different German churches and chapels about London; but this was far from being ſufficient to relieve ſo great a number. At length, however, Mr. Wachſel, miniſter of the German Lutheran church in Ayliffe-ſtreet, Goodman's-fields, laid their caſe before the public in the news-papers of the laſt day of Auguſt; and in ſo true and affecting a manner was it related, that it immediately attracted the attention not only of the great, but alſo of royalty itſelf. Before eleven o'clock on the ſame day 100 tents were ſent them from the Tower, by order of his majeſty; the paſſage of thoſe who were detained in the ſhip was defrayed, and 300l. was ſent for their immediate ſupport. Subſcriptions were opened, and prodigious ſums of money were gathered for their relief. Phyſicians, ſurgeons and midwives offered their ſervice for the ſick and thoſe in travail, for the latter of whom proper apartments were hired.

Thus happily relieved from the direful diſtreſs in which they had been placed, Mr. Wachſel, who with ſeveral other benefactors had formed themſelves into a committee for the management of the ſubſcriptions, waited on the king to know his pleaſure reſpecting their future diſpoſal. His majeſty communicated his intention of eſtabliſhing them in South Carolina, ordered 150 ſtand of arms to be delivered to them for their defence, and contracts to be immediately made for proper veſſels to convey them to that colony. When every thing was prepared for their embarkation, their camp was broke up, and they went on board ſinging hymns of thankſgiving in praiſe of their benefactors, whoſe beneficence had been ſo extenſive, that the committee were not only enabled to furniſh them with every neceſſary while on board, but even to make ſome proviſion for them after their landing in America.

Having thus related the principal domeſtic occurrences of this year, we ſhall now take notice of ſome material tranſactions that happened on the continent.

In the beginning of the year the Eaſt-India company received advice, that the diſputes between their ſervants and the reigning nabob, Coſſim Aly Kawn, had been productive of ſuch animoſities and jealouſies on the part of the latter, that it was judged highly neceſſary to uſe every means to allay them: and for this purpoſe Meſſrs. Amyatt and Hay, two gentlemen of the council were deputed to wait upon the nabob with inſtructions to endeavour to adjuſt the difference in an amicable manner. Accordingly, being arrived at Mongheer, the place of his reſidence, they held many conferences with him, in which he always ſhewed a great averſion to an accommodation upon the terms offered him; and, about this time, a ſupply of 500 arms going to Patna, was ſtopt by his officers. Other acts of hoſtility were likewiſe committed, by which affairs were brought to ſuch an extremity that a war with Coſſim Aly was unavoidable. Meſſrs. Amyatt and Hay were recalled, and the former of thoſe gentlemen having received the uſual paſſports ſet out for Calcutta, accompanied by Meſſrs. Amphlett, Wollaſton, and Hutchinſon; the lieutenants Jones, Gordon and Cooper, and Dr. Crooke; Meſſrs. Hay and Guiſton being left with the nabob as hoſtages.

As the boats were paſſing the city of Moorſhedabad, they were attacked by a number of troops, aſſembled on both ſides the river for that purpoſe, and ſome of the gentlemen in the boats being ſlain, Mr. Amyatt immediately landed with a few ſepoys, whom he forbad to fire. He then endeavoured to make the enemy underſtand that he was furniſhed with the nabob's paſſports, and had no deſign of committing hoſtilities; but the Mooriſh horſe advancing, ſome of the ſepoys inadvertently fired, and, in the confuſion which enſued, Mr. Amyatt, with moſt of his ſmall party, were killed.

In conſequence of this, Mr. Ellis, and the other gentlemen in council at Patna, agreed, with the approbation of captain Corſtairs, to attack the city of Moorſhedabad. This reſolution was executed with the utmoſt ſucceſs, on the 25th of June, and captain Corſtairs, with his party, were in poſſeſſion of the city for four hours, the Mooriſh governor, and his people having fled as far as Futwa. Here, however, he came to a reſolution of returning and making an effort to regain the city, in which he ſucceeded but too well, for moſt of the ſepoys and Europeans being engaged in plundering the place, they were not prepared to receive him, and conſequently eaſily diſpoſſeſſed of it. Hereupon they retired into the factory, but the men were ſo diſpirited, and the ſepoys deſerted in ſuch numbers, that it was found impoſſible to make any ſtand there; upon which a reſolution was taken to proceed to Sujah Dowlah's country. Accordingly they croſſed the river on the 26th in the evening, and met with no obſtruction till they paſſed Churpa; when, on the 30th, they were attacked by the phouſdar, with about 2000 men, whom they eaſily routed; but he being joined that evening by near 500 ſepoys from Bugepore, who brought ſix field pieces with them, he again attacked the Europeans, who, quitting their ranks at the firſt onſet, were entirely defeated. Fifty of them were killed, among whom was captain Corſtairs. Mr. Ellis and the reſt were all made priſoners.

From theſe and other acts of hoſtility committed by Coſſim Aly, in ſeveral of the company's ſettlements, it was determined to declare war againſt him, and to reſtore Meer Jaffier, the former nabob, (who had been depoſed) to the ſubahſhip; obliging him firſt to enter into the following treaty with the company:

1. The treaty which I formerly concluded with the company, upon my acceſſion to the nizamut (government) engaging to regard the honour and reputation of the company, the governor and council as my own, granting orders for the currency of the company's trade; the ſame treaty I now confirm and ratify.

2. I do grant and confirm to the company for defraying the expences of their troops, the chucklehs of Burdwan, Midnapoor, and Chittagong, which were before ceded for the ſame purpoſe.

3. I do ratify and confirm to the Engliſh the privilege granted them by their firmaund (a patent ſigned by the mogul) and ſeveral huſbullhookums, (patents ſigned by the vizir) of carrying on their trade, by means of their own duſtucks (orders) free from all duties, taxes, and impoſitions, in all parts of the country, excepting the article of ſalt, on which a duty of two and a half per cent. is to be levied on the rewana (ſtated) market price.

4. I give to the company half the ſalt-petre which is produced in the country of Purnea, which their gomaſtahs (factors) ſhall ſend to Calcutta; the other half ſhall be collected by my phouſdar (renter) for the uſe of my officers; and I will ſuffer no other perſons to make purchaſes of this article in that country.

5. In the chuckleh (juriſdiction) of Silet, for the ſpace of five years, commencing with the Bengal year 1170, my phouſdar and the company's gomaſtah ſhall jointly prepare chunam (lime) of which each ſhall defray half the expences; and half the chunam ſo made ſhall be given to the company, and the other half ſhall be for my uſe.

6. I will maintain 12,000 horſe, and 12,000 foot, in the three provinces; if there ſhould be occaſion for more, the number ſhall be increaſed by the conſent of the governor and council, proportionably to the emergency; beſides theſe the forces of the Engliſh company ſhall always attend me when wanted.

7. Wherever I ſhall fix my court, either at Moorſhedabad or elſewhere, I will adviſe the governor and council; and whatever number of Engliſh forces I may have occaſion for in the management of my affairs, I will demand them and they ſhall be allowed me: and an Engliſh gentleman ſhall reſide with me, to tranſact all affairs between me and the company; and a perſon ſhall alſo reſide on my part at Calcutta to negotiate with the governor and council.

8. The late perwannahs (orders) iſſued by Coſſim Aly Kawn, granting to all merchants the exemption of all duties for the ſpace of two years, ſhall be reverſed and called in, and the duties collected as before.

9. I will cauſe the rupees coined in Calcutta to paſs reſpect equal to the ſiccas (pieces of the pureſt gold) of Moorſhedabad, without any deſtruction of batta (an extraordinary allowance to the army when in the field, or in a garriſon where proviſions are ſcarce) and whoever ſhall demand batta ſhall be puniſhed.

10. I will give thirty lack of rupees (about 375,000l.) to defray all the expences and loſs accru-ing to the company from the war, and ſtoppage of their inveſtment: and I will reimburſe to all private perſons the amount of ſuch loſſes, proved before the governor and council, as they may ſuſtain in their trade in the country: if I ſhall not be able to diſcharge this in ready money, I will give aſſignments of lands for the amount.

11. I will confirm and renew the treaty which I formerly made with the Dutch.

12. If the French come into the country, I will not allow them to erect any fortifications, maintain forces, or hold lands, zemindaries, (freeholds) &c. but they ſhall pay tribute and carry on their trade as in former times.

13. Some regulations ſhall be hereafter ſettled between us for deciding all diſputes which may ariſe between the Engliſh gomaſtahs and my officers, in the different parts of the country.

This treaty was ſolemnly ſigned and ſealed at Fort William on the 10th of July 1763, and, a few days after, Meer Jaffier ſet out to join the army under major Adams, then on its march towards Moorſhedabad. On the 19th of July the firſt action happened oppoſite to Cutwa on the Coſſimbuzar ſide of the river. The preceding night major Adams had croſſed with the army, and in the morning came up with a large body of the enemy's troops who were ſtrongly poſted, in order to oppoſe his paſſage to the city. Theſe he attacked, and, after a ſhort reſiſtance, routed them. At the ſame time a detached party, under captain Long, poſſeſſed themſelves of the fort of Cutwa, on the other ſide of the river, together with all the enemy's artillery. Major Adams now purſued his march to Moorſhedabad, which place he entered on the 24th, at night, with very little oppoſition; and here the army halted for ſome days, during which Meer Jaffier was proclaimed in proper form. On the 28th of July the army was again put in motion, and on the 2d of Auguſt they arrived near a place called Sooty, at the head of the Coſſimbuzar river. At this place, a numerous army of the enemy's beſt troops, with artillery, occupied a very advantageous poſt. Major Adams immediately attacked them, and for four hours they made a reſolute defence, but then, being thrown into confuſion, they were eaſily defeated. In this engagement the loſs of the Engliſh conſiſted of ſix officers, and forty Europeans; together with 292 ſepoys and black cavalry, killed and wounded. Twenty-three pieces of cannon, and about 150 boats, laden with military and other ſtores, were taken.

Immediately after this battle major Adams advanced with the army near to Rajamant; about three or four miles from which place the enemy had thrown up a ſtrong entrenchment from the hills to the river. This the major was reſolved to attack, and every thing being ready for the aſſault by the 5th of September, it was carried on with ſuch vigour, that in a ſhort time the enemy were obliged to abandon the entrenchment to the conquerors. By this victory the province of Bengal was entirely ſecured to the Engliſh; and the letters which brought theſe accounts expreſſed their hopes, that by this action the fate of the war would be entirely decided.

In the month of July advices were received from North-America, by which it appeared that the military operations in that quarter had been carried on with great vigour; but that Sir William Johnſon had at laſt brought the Seneca nation to conceſſions highly advantageous to the ſubjects of Great Britain, and that they had entered into the following treaty of peace, friendſhip, and alliance, with the Engliſh, which was reciprocally ſigned in congreſs held for that purpoſe at Niagara.

1. That the Seneca nation do immediately ſtop all hoſtilities, and ſolemnly engage never more to make war upon the Engliſh, or ſuffer any of their people to commit any acts of violence on the perſons or properties of any of his Britannic majeſty's ſubjects.

2. That they forthwith collect all the Engliſh priſoners, deſerters, Frenchmen and negroes, amongſt them, and deliver them up to Sir William Johnſon, and that they engage never to harbour or conceal any deſerters; but ſhould any ſuch take refuge amongſt them, they are to be brought to the commanding officer of the next garriſon, and delivered up.

3. That they cede to his majeſty and his ſucceſſors, for ever, in full right, the lands from the fort of Niagara, to the Creek above fort Schloſſer, and down the ſame river or ſtreight, comprehending the whole carrying place, and containing a tract of about fourteen miles in length, and four in breadth.

4. That they allow a free paſſage through their country, from that of Cayugus to Niagara, or elſewhere, for the uſe of his majeſty's troops for ever; engaging never to obſtruct, or moleſt any of his majeſty's troops, or other his ſubjects who may make uſe of the ſame.

5. That they grant to his majeſty and his ſucceſſors for ever, a free uſe of the harbours for veſſels, within their country on Lake Ontario, or in any of the rivers, with liberty to land ſtores, and erect ſheds for their ſecurity.

6. That they immediately ſtop all intercourſe between any of their people and thoſe of the Shawaneſe and Delawares, or other his majeſty's enemies, whom they are to treat as common enemies, and to aſſiſt his majeſty's arms in bringing them to proper puniſhment; ſolemnly engaging never to be privy, or aſſiſt any of majeſty's enemies, or thoſe who may hereafter attempt to diſturb the public tranquillity.

7. That ſhould any Indian commit murder, or rob any of his majeſty's ſubjects, he ſhall immediately be delivered up to be tried and puniſhed, according to the equitable laws of England: and ſhould any white man be guilty of the like crimes towards the Indians, he ſhall be immediately tried and puniſhed if guilty: and the Senecas are never for the future to procure themſelves ſatisfaction, otherwiſe than as before mentioned, but to lay all matter of complaint before Sir William Johnſon, or his majeſty's ſuperintendant of Indian affairs for the time being, and ſtrictly to maintain and abide by the covenant claim of friendſhip.

8. For the due performance of theſe articles, the Senecas are to deliver up three of their chiefs, as hoſtages, who are to be well treated, and reſtored to them, ſo ſoon as the ſame are fully performed on their parts.

9. In conſequence of their perfect agreement to the foregoing articles, Sir William Johnſon doth, by virtue of the powers and authorities repoſed in him, in the name of his Britannic majeſty, promiſe and engage, that the ſaid Indians ſhall have a full pardon for paſt tranſgreſſions: that they ſhall be left in the quiet and peaceable poſſeſſion of all their rights not compriſed in the foregoing articles, and that on their duly performing the ſame, and ſubſcribing the definitive treaty of peace to be held in conſequence hereof, they ſhall be once more admitted into the covenant chain of friendſhip with the Engliſh, and be indulged with a free, fair, and open trade, ſo long as they abide by their engagements.

The forces commanded by the colonels Bradſtreet and Bouquet met with the ſame ſucceſs as thoſe under Sir William Johnſon. The Delawares and Shawaneſe had refuſed to meet Sir William at the congreſs of Niagara, but now, intimidated by the march of ſuch a number of troops towards their country, they met colonel Bradſtreet at Preſque Iſle, and, in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner, ſued for peace, which was granted them on the following conditions:

1. That all priſoners in their hands ſhould be delivered to colonel Bradſtreet at Sanduſky in twenty-five days.

2. That they ſhall renounce all claim to the poſts and forts the Engliſh now have in their country, and that the latter ſhall be left at liberty to erect as many as they ſhall judge proper to ſecure their trade; and that the Indians ſhall cede to them, for ever, as much land as a cannon ſhot can fly over, on which they may raiſe proviſions.

3 That if any Indian hereafter kill an Engliſhman, he ſhall be delivered up by his nation, and tried by the Engliſh laws, only to have half the jury of Indians: and if any one of the nations renew the war, the reſt ſhall join to bring them to reaſon.

4. That ſix of the deputies ſhall remain with colonel Bradſtreet as hoſtages, and the other four with an Engliſh officer, and one Indian in the Engliſh intereſt ſhould proceed immediately to acquaint the dependent nations with theſe terms of peace, and forward the collecting of the priſoners to be ready at the day appointed.

The Delawares and Shawaneſe, finding theſe were the only terms which colonel Bradſtreet would grant them, they were agreed to and ſolemnly ratified: but it was not long before theſe ſavages again revolted, and renewed their outrages with aggravated inſolence.

In conſequence of this perfidious behaviour, major-general Gage, commander in chief of his majeſty's forces in thoſe parts, determined to penetrate into the heart of their country. Accordingly the regular and provincial troops under colonel Bouquet, having been joined by a large body of volunteers from Virginia, Maryland and Penſylvania, in the beginning of October marched from Fort Pitt, and about the fifteenth arrived at Tuſcarowas. The ſight of the troops in their country threw the ſavages into the utmoſt conſternation, they having depended on their woods for protection, and had frequently boaſted that their ſituation ſecured them from the attacks of our army. Not chooſing to come to an engagement they had again recourſe to negotiation, and received for anſwer, that they might have peace, but every priſoner in their poſſeſſion muſt firſt be delivered up, upon which they brought up about twenty, and promiſed to deliver the reſt; but as their promiſes were not regarded, they engaged to ſend the whole on the 1ſt of November, to a fort about 250 miles from Fort Pitt, the centre of the Delaware towns, and near to the moſt conſiderable ſettlement of the Shawaneſe. Colonel Bouquet being determined not to loſe ſight of them, moved his camp to that place, and ſoon obliged the Delawares, together with ſome broken tribes, to bring in all their priſoners, even to children bought of white women. They were then told that they muſt appoint deputies to go to Sir William Johnſon, in order to receive ſuch terms as he might think proper to impoſe upon them, which the nations muſt agree to ratify; and they were obliged to leave a number of their chiefs in the hands of the Engliſh, as a ſecurity for the performance of this agreement. All the nations readily agreed to the above terms, except the Shawaneſe, who did not approve of the conditions, and were particularly averſe to the giving of hoſtages: but finding their obſtinacy would only bring on their deſtruction, they at laſt conſented, gave up forty principal chiefs as hoſtages, and appointed their deputies to go to Sir William Johnſon, in the ſame manner as the reſt. The number of priſoners delivered up by theſe ſavages exceeded 300, and it was expected that the Engliſh parties would bring in near 100 more from their different towns.

During the month of June various accounts were received from the bay of Honduras, complaining that our logwood cutters there had not only been diſturbed in their buſineſs, but ſuddenly ordered to remove from their uſual places of ſettlement, on pretence of their having nothing to prove that they were ſubjects of his Britannic majeſty; and granting they were, that they had roved too freely about the country, gathering the fruits of it as if it belonged to them. In conſequence of theſe proceedings, a remonſtrance was preſented to the court of Madrid by our ambaſſador there; and on the 27th of September a meſſenger arrived in London, with a duplicate of the orders which were immediately diſpatched to Don Felix Raming de Eſtenoz, governor of Jucatan. From the tenor of theſe it appeared, that his catholic majeſty diſapproved of the proceedings of the ſaid governor, with reſpect to the ſubjects of the king of Great Britain in the bay of Honduras: that he expreſſed his deſire of giving his majeſty the greateſt proofs of his friendſhip, and of preſerving peace with the Britiſh: that he had commanded the ſaid governor to re-eſtabliſh the ſaid Britiſh logwood cutters in the ſeveral places from which they had been obliged to retire, and to acquaint them, that they might return to their occupation of cutting logwood, without being diſturbed under any pretence whatſoever.

A. D. 1765. The parliament met on the 10th of January, when his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The ſituation of affairs, both at home and abroad, has enabled me to allow you that receſs, which has been uſual in times of public tranquillity. I have now the ſatisfaction to inform you, that I have agreed with my good brother the king of Denmark, to cement the union which has long ſubſiſted between the two crowns by the marriage of the prince royal with my ſiſter the princeſs Carolina Matilda, which is to be ſolemnized as ſoon as their reſpective ages will permit. I obſerve with pleaſure, that the events which have happened in the courſe of the laſt year, give us reaſon to hope for the duration of that peace which has been ſo happily eſtabliſhed, and which it is my reſolution ſtrictly to maintain. The courts of France and Spain have given me freſh aſſurances of their good diſpoſitions. The future quiet of the empire has been confirmed by the unanimous choice of a ſucceſſor to the imperial dignity; and the peaceable election of the king of Poland has prevented thoſe fatal conſequences which, upon ſimilar occaſions, have ſo frequently been deſtructive to the repoſe of Europe. I am happy, therefore, to meet my parliament, at a time when no foreign diſturbances interrupt their conſultations for the internal good order and proſperity of my kingdoms.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I ſhall aſk, for the current ſervice of the year, no other ſupplies but ſuch as are neceſſary for thoſe eſtabliſhments which have already met with your approbation, and I will order the proper eſtimates to be laid before you. I muſt, however, earneſtly recommend to you, the continuance of that attention which you have hitherto ſhewn to the improvement of the revenue, and the diminution of the public debt. For theſe deſirable and neceſſary ends, I am perſuaded that you will purſue every proper meaſure which the ſtate of my dominions, and the circumſtances of the times, require.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The experience which I have had of your former conduct, makes me rely on your wiſdom and firmneſs in promoting that obedience to the laws, and reſpect to the legiſlative authority of this kingdom, which is eſſentially neceſſary for the ſafety of the whole, and in eſtabliſhing ſuch regulations as may beſt connect and ſtrengthen every part of my dominions, for their mutual benefit and ſupport. The affection which I bear to my people excites my earneſt wiſhes that every ſeſſion of parliament may be diſtinguiſhed by ſome plan for the public advantage, and for their relief from thoſe difficulties, which an expenſive war has brought on them. My concurrence and encouragement ſhall never be wanting where their welfare is concerned; and I truſt that, for the attainment of that great object, you will proceed with temper, unanimity and diſpatch."

To this ſpeech both houſes preſented the moſt loyal and affectionate addreſſes: and the commons, in order to raiſe the ſupplies for the enſuing year, reſolved to put the Americans on the ſame footing as the inhabitants of Great Britain, by obliging them to pay ſtamp duties. Great oppoſitions were made to this bill; but it at length paſſed both houſes, and on the 22d of March received the royal aſſent.

Soon after this his majeſty was pleaſed to order, that America ſhould be divided into two diſtricts, viz. Northern and Southern by the river Potomack, and a due Weſt line drawn from the head of the main branch of that river, as far as his majeſty's dominions extend, and that a ſurveyor-general ſhould be appointed in each, to make general ſurveys both of the ſea-coaſt and the inland country, in order to facilitate the navigation, and to promote the ſpeedy ſettlement of the new acquiſitions.

Commiſſioners were likewiſe appointed to ſettle the new ceded iſlands in the Weſt-Indies, who received orders, firſt to divide each iſland into pariſhes and diſtricts: then in every pariſh to trace out a town, its ſtreets, market-place, and other public places; after which they were to parcel out the ground into proper allotments to build on, with a ſmall field annexed to each. It was alſo ordered, that where the land was cleared, the purchaſers, beſides the purchaſe money, ſhould pay a quit-rent of one penny per foot in front of each town lot, and ſixpence for every acre of the field that accompanied it. On the other hand, if the land was uncleared, it ſhould be granted by the governor, upon ſecurity given to build on, incloſe, and fence it in a reaſonable time, and to pay the ſame quit rent.

On the 24th of April * his majeſty, who had been for ſome time indiſpoſed, went to the houſe of peers, and, after ſigning ſuch bills as were ready, made the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The tender concern which I feel for my faithful ſubjects makes me anxious to provide for every poſſible event which might affect their future happineſs or ſecurity.

"My late indiſpoſition, though not attended with danger, has led me to conſider the ſituation in which my kingdoms and my family might be left, if it ſhould pleaſe God to put a period to my life, whilſt my ſucceſſor is of tender years.

"The high importance of this ſubject to the public ſafety, good order, and tranquillity; the paternal affection which I bear to my children, and to all my people; and my earneſt deſire that every precaution ſhould be taken which may tend to preſerve the conſtitution of Great Britain undiſturbed, and the dignity and luſtre of its crown unimpaired; have determined me to lay this weighty buſineſs before my parliament. And as my health, by the bleſſing of God, is now reſtored, I take the earlieſt opportunity of meeting you here, and of recommending to your moſt ſerious deliberation the making ſuch proviſion, as would be neceſſary, in caſe any of my children ſhould ſucceed to the throne before they ſhall reſpectively attain the age of eighteen years.

"To this end, I propoſe to your conſideration, whether, under the preſent circumſtances, it will not be expedient to veſt in me the power of appointing, from time to time, by inſtruments in writing, under my ſign manual, either the queen, or any other perſon of my royal family, uſually reſiding in Great Britain, to be the guardian of the perſon of ſuch ſucceſſor, and the regent of theſe kingdoms, until ſuch ſucceſſor ſhall attain the age of eighteen years; ſubject to ſuch reſtrictions and regulations as are contained in an act, paſſed upon a ſimilar occaſion, in the 24th year of the reign of the late king, my royal grandfather. The regent ſo appointed to be aſſiſted by a council, compoſed of the ſeveral perſons, who, by reaſon of their dignities and offices, are conſtituted members of the council eſtabliſhed by that act, together with thoſe whom you may think proper to leave to my nomination."

To this ſpeech each houſe preſented a loyal addreſs; and, in conformity to his majeſty's requeſt, a bill was ordered to be brought into the houſe of lords, where it was paſſed, and ſent to the houſe of commons. Here, however, it met with ſome oppoſion; but an amendment being made, which was approved of by the lords, on the 15th of May it received the royal aſſent.

By this act his majeſty was empowered to appoint the queen, with the princes of the blood, and all the great officers of ſtate jointly, regents during the minority of the prince; and that his majeſty ſhould further be allowed to add to the number of regents ſuch perſons as he thought proper, whoſe names ſhould be left, in caſe of his death, ſealed up in a deed, to be opened by the privy-council.

This affair being thus ſettled, on the 25th of May his majeſty prorogued the parliament by commiſſion, being

* A few days before this the attention of the lords was engaged in the trial of a member of that houſe for murder, the particulars of which were as follow:

In the month of January, at a meeting of the Nottinghamſhire club, a diſpute aroſe between lord Byron and Mr. Chaworth, a gentleman of that county, concerning the quantity of game on their reſpective eſtates. In conſequence of this diſpute a duel was fought between them, at the Star and Garter Tavern in Pall-mall, in which the latter was unfortunately killed; and ſome time after lord Byron ſurrendered himſelf to be tried by his peers. Accordingly, on the 26th of April, about half paſt nine in the morning his lordſhip was brought from the Tower to Weſtminſter Hall, where a court had been erected, as is uſual on ſuch occaſions. The number of witneſſes on behalf of the crown was ſo great that they could not be all examined that day. On the next the trial being reſumed, and the examinations againſt the priſoner finiſhed, the ſolicitor-general ſummed up the evidence; after which lord Byron, who declined examining any witneſſes on his own behalf, told their lordſhips, "That what he had to offer "in his own vindication he had committed to writing, and begged that it might be read by the clerk, as he feared his own "voice, conſidering his preſent ſituation, would not be heard." This requeſt being complied with, the clerk, in a very audible and diſtinct manner, read his ſpeech, which contained an exact detail of all the particulars relating to the melancholy affair between him and Mr. Chaworth. He ſaid, he declined entering into the circumſtances of Mr. Chaworth's behaviour farther than was neceſſary for his defence, expreſſed his deep and unfeigned ſorrow for the event, and repoſed himſelf with the utmoſt confidence on their lordſhip's juſtice and humanity, obſerving that he would with chearfulneſs acquieſce in the ſentence of the nobleſt and moſt equitable court of judicature in the world, whether it were for life or for death.

When the clerk had concluded, the peers adjourned to their own houſe; and, after ſome time, returned, when they found his lordſhip guilty of manſlaughter: and as, by an old ſtatute, peers are, in all caſes where benefit of clergy is allowed, to be diſmiſſed without burning in the hand, loſs of inheritance, or corruption of blood, his lordſhip was immediately diſmiſſed on paying his fees.

being ſo indiſpoſed as to be unable to attend in perſon.

Soon after the riſing of the parliament, accounts were received of the ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms in conjunction with the company's troops, in the Eaſt Indies. On the 22d of October, in the preceding year, major Monro, who, on the deceaſe of major Adams, had ſucceeded to the command of the king's forces in that part of the world, came up with the Indian army at a place called Buxard, on the river Camnaſſary, about 100 miles above Patna. They were moſt advantageouſly encamped, having a moraſs in their front, judiciouſly lined with cannon, ſo that which-ever way the Engliſh ſhould move, whether forward to paſs the moraſs, or ſideways to double it, they could greatly annoy them. This induced the major to encamp his forces that night; and the next morning, by day-break, he went out to reconnoitre the enemy, being reſolved to attack them the day following; but he found them already under arms; upon which he returned to his camp, called in his advanced poſts and grand guards, ordered the drums to arms, and in leſs than twenty minutes the line of battle was perfectly formed. About nine the Indians began to cannonade the Engliſh; and half an hour after the action became general. The moraſs in the front of our troops prevented their advancing for ſome time, during which they were greatly galled by the enemy's cannon. Major Monro perceiving this, ordered a battalion of ſepoys from the right of the firſt line to move forward, in order to ſilence one of the Indian batteries, which played upon his flank; he was ſoon obliged to detach another battalion to the ſupport of the firſt, which had the deſired effect. He then ordered both the lines to face to the right, and keep marching till they had cleared the left wing of the moraſs; and when that was accompliſhed to face to their former front; the right wing at the ſame time wheeling up to the left, in order to clear a ſmall wood that was upon their right: the firſt line then moved forward, keeping a very briſk cannonade; during which major Monro ſent orders to major Pemble, who commanded the ſecond line, to face to the right about, and follow the firſt. Immediately after the fire with ſmall arms began, and both lines puſhed forward with ſo much ardour and reſolution, that the enemy ſoon began to give way, and a little before twelve at noon their whole army was put to flight, leaving 6000 men on the ſpot, with 130 pieces of cannon, a proportionable quantity of military ſtores, and all their tents ready pitched. The loſs of the victors was comparatively ſmall, for they had only 32 Europeans, and 239 Indians killed; and 57 Europeans, and 473 Indians wounded.

Such was the ſituation of affairs in the Eaſt-Indies, when major Monro was recalled; and Sir Robert Fletcher, an officer brought up in the company's ſervice, was appointed to command in his room. He took the field as ſoon as he arrived; and marched about 150 miles up the Ganges, when he attacked ſeveral of the enemy's forts, and made the garriſons priſoners of war.

In America great diſturbances aroſe on account of the ſtamp-act. The firſt intelligence that arrived there of ſuch a bill being in agitation threw an univerſal melancholy on the countenances of the people; but when it was known that the bill had paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent, they were fired with indignation, and nothing but confuſion took place throughout moſt of the provinces.

As ſoon as the news arrived at Boſton, the ſhips in the harbour hung out their colours half maſt high, in token of the deepeſt mourning; the bells were rung muffled: copies of the act were printed, with a death's head to it in the place where it is uſual to fix the ſtamps, and cried publickly about the ſtreets by the name of "The folly of England, and ruin of America." Eſſays ſoon followed, not only againſt the expediency, but even the equity of it, in ſeveral news-papers, one of which bore the ſignificant title of "The Conſtitutional Courant, containing matters intereſting to liberty, and no ways repugnant to loyalty, printed by Andrew Marvel, at the ſign of the Bribe Refuſed, on Conſtitution-Hill, North America." The head-piece to this paper was a ſnake cut in pieces, with the initial letters of the names of the ſeveral colonies, from New England to South Carolina, affixed to each piece, and above them the words "Join or Die." To theſe were added caricatures, paſquinades, puns, bon-mots, and ſuch ſayings, ſuited to the occaſion, as by being ſhort could be moſt eaſily circulated and retained, at the ſame time that, by being extremely expreſſive, they carried with them the weight of a great many arguments. The two chief articles urged in theſe news-paper eſſays were, firſt, that the perſon acting under this ſtatute had it in his power to bring an action, the cauſe of which had ariſen at one extremity of the North American colonies, and extended itſelf to the other, at almoſt 2000 miles diſtance, without the traders being entitled to recover damages, in caſe the judge certified that there was any probable cauſe for the proſecution. The ſecond was, the judge having an intereſt in giving a decree in favour of the party ſuing for the penalies of the act, on being allowed, by way of commiſſion, a very large ſhare in theſe penalties.

By the time the act itſelf, as printed at the king's printing-houſe, reached the colonies, the populace were every where exaſperated againſt it to ſuch a degree, as to ſhew it the moſt public marks of contempt. In ſeveral places it was burnt, together with the effigies of thoſe who were ſuppoſed to have voted for, or otherwiſe had any hand in favour of it. At the ſame time it was agreed, at the meetings of thoſe in higher rank, that thanks ſhould be given to general Conway and colonel Barré, two gentlemen whom they conſidered as the moſt ſtrenuous oppoſers of it in the Britiſh houſe of commons; that their ſpeeches againſt it, and their pictures, ſhould be requeſted. The pictures to be hung up in their places of meeting; and their ſpeeches to be inſerted in the books deſtined to record all their principal tranſactions.

When the news of this diſcontent arrived in England, ſeveral maſters of ſhips refuſed to take any ſtamps on board for the colonies; and it ſoon appeared that their precaution was well founded; for ſuch as ventured to take them had ſufficient cauſe to repent it at their arrival at their deſtined ports, where, to ſave their veſſels from fire, and their perſons from the gallows, they were moſt of them obliged to ſurrender their execrated cargoes into the hands of the enraged multitude, which they treated in the ſame ignominious manner they had done the act: the other veſſels were obliged to take ſhelter under ſuch of the king's ſhips as happened to be at hand to protect them.

Thoſe gentlemen who went from England with commiſſions to act as diſtributors of the ſtamps met with ſtill worſe treatment. Many of them were made to renounce, now and for ever, publicly and upon oath, all manner of concern in them: others thought it moſt prudent to return from whence they came, whilſt ſome, who were ſuſpected of obſtinately perſiſting in endeavouring to enſlave their country, as it was termed, or of having ſpoke too freely concerning the behaviour of the people on this occaſion, had their houſes burnt down, and their moſt valuable effects plundered or deſtroyed. Even thoſe who, without their ſolicitation or knowledge, had been named, or were obliged in virtue of the offices they already filled, to ſuperintend the diſtribution of the ſtamped paper, were treated in the ſame manner; and the populace having ſuſpected one of writing to England in diſreſpectful terms concerning their proceedings, ſurrounded his houſe, and, notwithſtanding the moſt earneſt intreaties, obliged him to deliver up the copies of his letters, and thereby turn evidence againſt himſelf. Even ſhips bringing ſtamped mercantile or cuſtom-houſe papers, merely in their own defence, from ſuch of the colonies as had thought proper to ſubmit to the ſtamp act, were forced to part with them to be ſtuck up in deriſion in coffee-houſes and taverns, and publicly committed to the flames.

Many of the better ſort now joined the populace in theſe tumults. One in particular ſet the act openly at defiance, by advertiſing under his hand, that thoſe whoſe buſineſs it was to enforce it, might ſave themſelves the trouble of calling upon him for that purpoſe; for that he was reſolved to pay no taxes but what was laid by his repreſentatives. The provincial aſſemblies themſelves declined giving the governors any advice concerning their behaviour on this critical occaſion, and, though they diſavowed theſe riotous proceedings, and bid rewards for apprehending the rioters, yet they could not be brought to condemn them further than decency required; and abſolutely refuſed, when exhorted to it by the governors, to make any compenſation to the injured parties; much leſs could they be brought to ſtrengthen the hands of the executive power ſo far as to prevent any future commotions; which as levelled entirely at the ſtamp act, and as having no particular leaders, whoſe ignorance and brutality might be attended with worſe conſequences than what they wiſhed to avoid, they did not think proper to conſider as objects of military reſtraint. This behaviour of the general aſſemblies was openly approved, if not encouraged, by aſſemblies of the freeholders and principal inhabitants of ſome places, who directed their repreſentatives not to agree to any ſteps for the protection of ſtamped papers, or ſtamp officers; though they owned there had been already ſome tumults and diſorders relating to them; and likewiſe cautioned them againſt all unconſtitutional draughts on the public treaſury.

The general aſſemblies went ſtill further. Inſtead of barely conniving at the people's aſſerting their independence by tumultuous acts, they proceeded to avow it themſelves, and, at the ſame time, conſidering that unanimity is the chief ſource of ſtrength, they eſtabliſhed committees to correſpond with each other concerning the general affairs of the whole, and even appointed deputies from theſe committees to meet in a congreſs at New York. But ſuch harmony already prevailed in the ſentiments of the general aſſemblies of the ſeveral provinces, that the deputies, when met, had little more to do than to congratulate each other upon it, and put their hands to one general declaration of their rights, and the grievances they laboured under; and to one general petition expreſſive thereof, to the king, lords, and commons, of the mother country.

At length, thoſe inveſted with the ſubordinate executive powers began to join the legiſlative. The juſtices of the peace for the diſtrict of Weſtmoreland in Virginia gave public notice, under their hands, that they had declined acting in that capacity; becauſe, in conſequence of their judicial oath, they were liable to become inſtrumental in the deſtruction of their country's moſt eſſential rights and liberties. Their example was followed by the gentlemen of the law, who reſolved rather to give up their buſineſs than carry it on with ſtamped papers.

By the time the act took place, which was on the firſt of November, not a ſheet of ſtamped paper was to be had throughout the ſeveral colonies of New England, New York, New Jerſey, Penſylvania, Virginia, Maryland, or the two Carolinas, except a ſmall parcel, which the governor of New York, terrified by the threats of the enraged multitude, had ſurrendered into the hands of the corporation of that place, on condition of their not being deſtroyed; ſo that all buſineſs which could not be legally carried on without ſtamps was at once put to a ſtand, except that of news printing, which the printers ſtill continued, pleading in excuſe, that, if they did not, the populace would ſerve them as they had done the ſtamp-maſters themſelves. The courts of juſtice were cloſed, and the ports ſhut up. Even in thoſe colonies where ſtamps were to be had, the people of the beſt fortune ſubmitted to be aſked in church rather than take out licences for private marriages.

The conſequences of this ſtagnation ſoon began to be ſo ſeverely felt, that the inhabitants found it neceſſary to hit upon ſome expedient by which they might elude the act. Accordingly, one of them ſent a thin piece of bark to the printers at Boſton, on which he had written, " That it being neither paper, " parchment or vellum, he would be glad to know, " if iſtruments written on ſuch ſtuff might not be " valid, though not ſtamped, in which caſe he was " ready to ſupply, with good writing bark, all thoſe " whoſe conſciences were bound by the late act." At laſt the governors of ſome of the provinces, though bound by the act to ſwear to ſee it obſerved, under the ſevereſt penalties, imagining the total ſtoppage of all public buſineſs of ſuch bad conſequence to the community, as to render lawful the non-compliance with any injunctions laid on them, or even the breach of any oath taken by them in conſequence of injunctions, merely for the ſake of that community, thought proper to diſpenſe with the uſe of ſtamps; grounding their diſpenſation on the abſolute impoſſibility of procuring any; and, accordingly, granted certificates of that impoſſibility to all outward-bound veſſels, to protect them from the penalties of the act in other parts of his majeſty's dominions.

The lieutenant-governor of South-Carolina was one of thoſe who refuſed to acquieſce in the tranſacting of any public buſineſs without ſtamps; in conſequence of which the commons houſe of aſſembly took the following method with him. They preſented an addreſs to him, wherein they deſired to be informed, if the ſtamp act had been tranſmitted to him by the ſecretaries of ſtate, the lords of trade, or through any other authentic channel; and, on his anſwering that he had received it firſt from the attorney-general of the province, on that gentleman's arrival from England, and ſince from Mr. Boone the governor of the province, they replied, that neither of theſe ways of receiving any act was ſuch a notification thereof, as to oblige him to inforce the execution of it; as the governor, while out of the province, or the attorney-general, even while in it, could not, at leaſt with regard to this communication, be conſidered in any other light than private gentlemen. At the ſame time they put him in mind, that there were ſeveral inſtances of the province having ſuffered peculiar and very great hardſhips, and for no ſmall length of time, even from the accidental detention or miſcarriage of governmental informations, enough to prove, that certain forms were abſolutely neceſſary in all matters of government, eſpecially ſuch as related to the authenticity of new laws of ſuch immenſe conſequence. Theſe arguments, however, ſeemed to make little or no impreſſion on the governor or his council. The merchants, of all thoſe colonies which ventured openly to oppoſe the act, now entered into the moſt ſolemn engagements with each other, not only not to order any more goods from Great Britain, let the conſequences be what they would, and recall the orders they had already given, if not obeyed by the 1ſt of January 1766, but even not to diſpoſe of any Britiſh goods ſent them on commiſſion, that were not ſhipped before that day; or, if they conſented to any relaxation from theſe engagements, it was not to take place till the ſtamp act, and even the ſugar and paper money acts were repealed. The people of Philadelphia alſo reſolved, though not unanimouſly, that, till ſuch repeal, no lawyer ſhould put in ſuit a demand for money owing by a reſident in America to one in England; nor any perſon in America, however indebted in England, make any remittances there. Theſe reſolutions were adopted by the retailers, who unanimouſly agreed not to buy or ſell any Britiſh goods ſhipped contrary to them.

The only place that received any material benefit from theſe proceedings was Ireland, as what goods the colonies could not poſſibly do without they took from that country in exchange for their hemp-ſeed and flax-ſeed, in which they ſent yearly very large quantities. In the mean time they omitted no methods to free themſelves even from this dependence. A ſociety of arts, manufactures and commerce, on the plan of the London ſociety, was inſtituted at New York, and markets opened for the ſale of home-made goods; by which it ſoon appeared, that neither the natives, nor the manufacturers, whom the natives had for ſome time paſt been inviting from Great Britain by very large encouragements, had been idle. Linens, woolens, the coarſer but moſt uſeful kinds of iron ware, malt-ſpirits, paper-hangings, &c. were produced to the ſociety, and greatly approved; and when brought to market every body appeared deſirous of purchaſing them. At the ſame time, leſt the new woolen manufactures ſhould come ſhort of materials, moſt of the inhabitants came to a reſolution not to eat any lamb; and to extend the influence of their reſolution to thoſe who did not join them in it, not to deal with any butcher that ſhould kill or expoſe any lamb to ſale. In ſhort, the ſpirit of induſtry and frugality took place of the ſpirit of idleneſs and profuſeneſs. The moſt ſubſtantial and even faſhionable people were the firſt in ſetting the example to their countrymen, by contenting themſelves with home-ſpun or old cloaths, rather than make uſe of any thing Britiſh; and ſuch were the efforts of all ranks, and ſo prudent their meaſures, that many now began to be convinced of what they had, till then, thought impoſſible, that the colonies would ſoon be able to ſupply themſelves with every neceſſary of life *.

In conſequence of the diſtracted ſtate of America, his majeſty thought proper to aſſemble the parliament ſooner than had been intended. Accordingly, on the 17th of December † he went to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ The preſent general ſtate of tranquillity in Europe gave me hopes that it would not have been neceſſary to aſſemble my parliament ſooner than is uſual in times of peace: but as matters of importance have lately occurred in ſome of my colonies in America, which will demand the moſt ſerious attention of parliament, and as further informations are daily expected from different parts of that country, of which I ſhall order the fulleſt accounts to be prepared for your conſideration; I have thought fit to call you now together, in order that the opportunity may be thereby given, to iſſue the neceſſary writs on the many vacancies that have happened in the houſe of commons ſince the laſt ſeſſion, ſo that the parliament may be full, to proceed immediately, after the uſual receſs, on the conſideration of ſuch weighty matters as will then come before you.”

A. D. 1766. On the 14th of January his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and being ſeated on his throne addreſſed both houſes as follows:

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ When I met you laſt, I acquainted you, that matters of importance had happened in America, which would demand the moſt ſerious attention of parliament.

“ That no information which could ſerve to direct your deliberations in ſo intereſting a concern might be wanting, I have ordered all the papers that give any light into the origin, the progreſs, or the tendency of the diſturbances which have of late prevailed in ſome of the northern colonies, to be immediately laid before you.

“ No time has been loſt, on the firſt advice of theſe diſturbances, to iſſue orders to the governors of my provinces, and to the commanders of my forces in America, for the exertion of all the powers of government, in the ſuppreſſion of riots and tumults, and in the effectual ſupport of lawful authority.

“ Whatever remains to be done on this occaſion, I commit to your wiſdom; not doubting but your zeal for the honour of my crown, your attention to the juſt rights and authority of the Britiſh legiſlature, and your affection and concern for the welfare and proſperity of all my people, will guide you to ſuch ſound and prudent reſolutions, as may tend at once to preſerve thoſe conſtitutional rights over the colonies, and to reſtore to them that harmony and tranquillity, which have lately been interrupted by riots and diſorders of the moſt dangerous nature.

* During theſe tranſactions abroad the nation ſuffered an irreparable loſs in the death of his royal highneſs William duke of Cumberland (uncle to his majeſty) who paid the debt of nature, at his houſe in Upper Groſvenor-ſtreet, in the evening of the 31ſt of October, in the 45th year of his age. His royal highneſs was at court in the morning, dined with lord Albermarle, and drank tea with the princeſs of Brunſwick at St. James's, from whence he came to his own houſe in the evening to be preſent at a counſel to be held on affairs of ſtate. As ſoon as he entered the houſe he complained of a pain in the ſhoulder, and deſired to be laid on the couch, where, in about twenty minutes, he expired. On examining the body a coagulation of extravaſated blood was found in the right ventricle of the brain, which was the cauſe of his death; but all the noble parts were ſound, except the membrane between the lobes of the brain, which was oſſified.

This prince had been, from his moſt early youth, deſigned for the command of the army; and, while only a boy, he formed a company of noblemen and gentlemen's ſons, who, along with himſelf, were trained up in military exerciſes. Being properly qualified, he accepted of an enſign's commiſſion in the guards, and roſe from one ſtation to another, till at laſt he became the commander in chief. Ever attentive to the intereſts of his royal father's ſubjects, he freely expoſed his perſon in the moſt hazardous enterprizes during the wars in Germany and Flanders; and, at the battle of Dettingen, when only arrived to the rank of a colonel, he commanded his own regiment, and received a wound on the thigh while advancing upon the enemy. His prudence and valour in ſuppreſſing an unnatural rebellion are well known to the nation in general, ſo that nothing need be ſaid of it in this place. As a friend to merit in diſtreſs, he never neglected any opportunity of rewarding either officers or ſoldiers who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the ſervice of their country. During the interval that took place between the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle and the breaking out of the war in 1756, he conſtantly aſſiſted in the privy-council; and when ordered to take upon him the command of the allied army in Hanover, he chearfully obeyed, although he knew that the French forces were double his number. If his ſucceſs was not equal to his wiſhes, it was owing to the inferiority of his army; and when he thought proper to reſign all his public employments, he retired to a private ſtation, and ſpent the remainder of his life in giving proper encouragement to induſtry. Upon the whole, his highneſs was a wiſe counſellor, an able general, and indulgent maſter; and, what is ſtill more than any of theſe, he was a good man.

† On the twenty-ninth of this month, between three and four in the afternoon, prince Frederic William, his majeſty's youngeſt brother, departed this life in the ſixteenth year of his age, to the great grief of their majeſties and all the royal family.

“ If any alterations ſhould be wanting in the commercial œconomy of the plantations, which may tend to enlarge and ſecure the mutual and beneficial intercourſe of my kingdoms and colonies, they will deſerve your moſt ſerious conſideration. In effectuating purpoſes ſo worthy of your wiſdom and public ſpirit, you may depend upon my moſt hearty concurrence and ſupport. The preſent happy tranquillity ſubſiſting in Europe will enable you to purſue ſuch objects of your interior policy with a more uninterrupted attention.

“ Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

“ I have ordered the proper eſtimates for the current ſervice of the year to be laid before you. Such ſupplies as you may grant ſhall be duly applied with the utmoſt fidelity, and ſhall be diſpenſed with the ſtricteſt œconomy.

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ I earneſtly recommend to you to proceed in your deliberations with temper and unanimity. The time requires, and I doubt not but your own inclinations will lead you to thoſe ſalutary diſpoſitions. I have nothing at heart but the aſſertion of legal authority, the preſervation of the liberties of all my ſubjects, the equity and good order of my government, and the concord and proſperity of all parts of my dominions.”

Petitions were now preſented to parliament by the merchants of London, Briſtol, Lancaſter, Liverpool, Hull, Glaſgow, and, in ſhort, from moſt of the trading and manufacturing towns and boroughs in the kingdom, wherein they ſet forth the great decay of their trade, owing to the new laws and regulations made for America: the vaſt quantity of our manufactures, (beſides thoſe articles imported from abroad, which were purchaſed either with our own manufactures, or with the produce of our colonies) which the American trade formerly took off our hands; by all which many thouſand manufacturers, ſeamen, and labourers, had been employed, to the very great and increaſing benefit of the nation. That, in return for theſe exports, the petitioners had received from the colonies, rice, indigo, tobacco, naval ſtores, oil, whale-fins, furs, and lately pot-aſh, with other ſtaple commodities; beſides a large balance in remittances by bills of exchange and bullion, obtained by the coloniſts for articles of their produce, not required for the Britiſh market, and therefore exported to other places: that from the nature of this trade, conſiſting of Britiſh manufactures exported, and of the import of raw materials from America, many of them uſed in our manufactures, and all of them tending to leſſen our dependence on neighbouring ſtates, it muſt be deemed of the higheſt importance in the commercial ſyſtem of this nation: that this commerce ſo beneficial to the ſtate, and ſo neceſſary for the ſupport of multitudes, then lay under ſuch difficulties and diſcouragements, that nothing leſs than its utter ruin was apprehended, without the intermediate interpoſition of parliament: that the colonies were then indebted to the merchants of Great Britain, to the amount of ſeveral millions ſterling; and that, when preſſed for payment, they appeal to paſt experience in proof of their willingneſs; but declare it is not in their power at preſent to make good their engagements, alledging that the taxes and reſtrictions laid upon them, and the extenſion of the juriſdiction of the vice-admiralty courts eſtabliſhed by ſome late acts of parliament, particularly by an act of parliament paſſed in the fourth year of his preſent majeſty, for granting certain duties in the Britiſh colonies and plantations in America, and by an act paſſed in the fifth year of his majeſty, for granting and applying certain ſtamp-duties, &c. in the ſaid colonies, &c. with ſeveral regulations and reſtraints, which, if founded in acts of parliament for defined purpoſes, they repreſent to have been extended in ſuch a manner as to diſturb legal commerce and haraſs the fair trader, and to have ſo far interrupted the uſual and former moſt uſeful branches of their commerce, reſtrained the ſale of their produce, thrown the ſtate of the ſeveral provinces into confuſion, and brought on ſo great a number of actual bankruptcies, that the former opportunities and means of remittances and payments were utterly loſt and taken from them. That the petitioners were, by theſe unhappy events, reduced to the neceſſity of applying to the houſe, in order to ſecure themſelves and their families from impending ruin; to prevent a multitude of manufacturers from becoming a burden to the community, or elſe ſeeking their bread in other countries, to the irretrievable loſs of the kingdom: and to preſerve the ſtrength of this nation entire, its commerce flouriſhing, the revenues increaſing, our navigation, the bulwark of the kingdom, in a ſtate of growth and extenſion, and the colonies from inclination, duty and intereſt, firmly attached to the mother country.

Petitions from every part of the kingdom, replete with ſuch a number of intereſting facts, ſtated and atteſted by ſo many people, whoſe lives having been entirely devoted to trade, muſt naturally be eſteemed competent judges of a ſubject which they had ſo long and ſo cloſely attended to, could not fail of having great weight with the houſe, as had alſo a petition which arrived at this time from the agent for the iſland of Jamaica, ſetting forth the ill conſequences that had attended a ſtamp-tax which the aſſembly of that iſland had impoſed, and which was ſuffered to expire, it having been found unequal and burdenſome in a very high degree: and he gave it as his opinion, that the preſent law for a ſtamp-duty in the colonies would be attended with the ſame, if not greater inconveniencies. Petitions were likewiſe received from the agents for Virginia and Georgia, ſetting forth their inability to pay the ſtamp-duty.

The party, however, who had reſolved on the ſupport of the ſtamp-act at all events could not be prevailed on, either by the arguments, or the facts contained in the petitions, to remit the leaſt of their ardour. Such petitions they repreſented as the effect of miniſterial artifice, and obſerved, that ſuppoſing the diſtreſs of trade, for a due exertion of the authority of parliament, was as real and as great as it was repreſented, yet it were better to ſubmit to this temporary inconvenience, than, by a repeal of the act, to hazard the total loſs of the juſt ſuperiority of Great-Britain over her colonies.

Thoſe who contended for the repeal were divided in their opinion as to the right of taxation; the more numerous body, among whom were the miniſtry, inſiſted that the legiſlature of Great Britain had an undoubted right to tax the colonies, but acknowledged the inexpediency of the preſent tax, as ill adapted to the condition of the colonies, and built upon principles ruinous to the trade of Great Britain.

Thoſe who denied the right of taxation were not ſo numerous; but they conſiſted of ſome of the moſt diſtinguiſhed and popular characters in the kingdom.

Notwithſtanding this affair was attended to by the houſe with the moſt unwearied application, yet the nature of their enquiries, the number of petitions they received, and the multitude of papers and witneſſes they had to examine occaſioned a delay which could not be remedied; during this there were continual debates, and the oppoſition made the moſt ſtrenuous efforts for enforcing the ſtamp act, and by every means to prevent the repeal. In the courſe of this debate two queſtions aroſe, upon which the whole turned. The firſt was, whether the legiſlature of Great Britain had a right of taxation over the colonies, or not? The ſecond was confined to the expediency or inexpediency of the late laws.

The gentlemen who oppoſed the right of taxation produced many learned authorities from Locke, Selden, Harrington, and Puffendorf, ſhewing, "That the very foundation and ultimate point in view of all government is the good of ſociety." They likewiſe urged, that by going up to Magna Charta, and referring to the ſeveral writs upon record, iſſued out for the purpoſe of raiſing taxes for the crown, and for ſending repreſentatives to parliament, as well as from the bill of rights, it appears, throughout the whole hiſtory of our conſtitution, that no Britiſh ſubject can be taxed, but per communem conſenſum parliamenti, that is to ſay, of himſelf or his own repreſentative; and this is that firſt and general right, as Britiſh ſubjects, with which the firſt inhabitants of the colonies emigrated; for the right does not depend upon their charters: the charters were but the exterior modelling of the conſtitution of the colonies: but the great interior fundamental of their conſtitution is this general right of a Britiſh ſubject, which is the very firſt principle of liberty,---No man ſhall be taxed, but by himſelf or his repreſentative. That the counties palatine of Cheſter, Durham and Lancaſter were not taxed but in their own aſſemblies or parliaments; till at different periods in our hiſtory they were melted into our preſent form of parliamentary repreſentation. That the body of the clergy, till very late, taxed themſelves, and granted the king benevolences. That the marches of Wales had a right of taxing themſelves till they ſent members to parliament, and from this circumſtance has continued the ſtyle of the king's proclamations, and of our acts of parliament to this day, although unneceſſarily, to name eſpecially the principality of Wales, and the town of Monmouth and Berwick. That many people carry the idea of a parliament too far, in ſuppoſing it can do every thing; which is not true, and if it were, it is not right conſtitutionally: for then there might be an arbitrary power in a parliament as well as in any one man. There are many things a parliament cannot do. It cannot make itſelf executive, nor diſpoſe of offices that belong to the crown. It cannot take any man's property, even that of the meaneſt cottager, as in the caſe of incloſures, without his being heard. The lords cannot reject a money bill from the commons, nor the commons erect themſelves into a court of juſtice. The parliament could not tax the clergy, till ſuch time as they were repreſented in parliament. Nor can the parliament of England tax Ireland.

The charters of the colonies, which are derived from prerogatives, and are in fact only ſo many grants from the crown, are not the only right the colonies have to being repreſented before they are taxed. They, as Britiſh ſubjects, take up their rights and liberties from a higher origin than their charters only. They take them up from the ſame origin and fountain, from whence they flow to all Engliſhmen, from Magna Charta, and the natural right of the ſubject. By that rule of right, the charters of the colonies, like all other crown-grants, are to be reſtricted and interpreted, for the benefit, not the prejudice of the ſubjects. Had the firſt inhabitants of the colonies renounced all connection with their mother country, they might have renounced their original rights; but when they emigrated under the authority of the crown, and the national ſanction, they went out from hence, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, with all the firſt great privileges of Engliſhmen on their backs: but at the ſame time they were not, and could not be bound by penal laws of this country, from the ſeverity of which they fled, to climates remote from the heavy hand of power, and which they hoped to find more friendly to their principles of civil and religious liberty. It is upon this ground, that it has been univerſally received as law, that no acts of parliament made here, and particularly thoſe which enact any penalty, are binding upon the colonies, unleſs they are ſpecially named. The inhabitants of the colonies once removed from the domeſtic legiſlation of the mother country, are no more dependent upon it in the general ſyſtem, than the Iſle of Man is, or than, in the feudal ſyſtem of Europe, many ſubordinate principalities are dependent on the juriſdiction of the ſeigneur ſuzerain, or lord paramount; but owing only to a limited obedience. By what has been ſaid it is not meant to affect the caſe of any external duties laid upon their ports, or of any reſtrictions which by the act of navigation, or other acts are laid upon their commerce; for they are in the ſame caſe, as all other colonies belonging to the reſt of the maritime powers in Europe; who have ſhut up their colonies from all intercouſe with foreign countries, in the very firſt eſtabliſhment. What is ſpoken of are internal taxes, to be levied on the body of the people; and that, before they can be liable to theſe internal taxes, they muſt firſt be repreſented.

Several other arguments were made uſe of, and many inſtances brought from antient hiſtory of the conduct of ſome of the moſt famous republics, with reſpect to their colonies; and likewiſe of colonies which outgrew their mother countries, ſuch as Carthage, the northern emigrants, &c. Precedents were alſo quoted from what happened in the United Netherlands, and other places, which ſhould ſerve as a beacon, to warn us from purſuing ſuch meaſures, as brought about thoſe revolutions.

In anſwer to theſe arguments, thoſe on the other ſide obſerved, that it was neceſſary to clear away from the queſtion all that maſs of diſſertation and learning, diſplayed in arguments which have been brought from ſpeculative men, who have written upon the ſubject of government: that the refinements upon that ſubject, and arguments of natural lawyers, as Locke, Selden, Puffendorf, &c. are little to the purpoſe in a queſtion of conſtitutional law: that it is abſurd to apply records from the earlieſt times to our preſent conſtitution; becauſe the conſtitution is not the ſame; and it is impoſſible to tell what it was at ſome of the times that are quoted: that there are things even in Magna Charta which are not conſtitutional now, and that thoſe records are no proofs of our conſtitution as it now is: that the conſtitution of this country has always been in a moving ſtate, either gaining or loſing ſomething: that the repreſentation of the commons of Great Britain was not formed into any certain ſyſtem till Henry VII: that with regard to the modes of taxation, when we get beyond the reign of Edward I. or king John, we are loſt in obſcurity, the hiſtory of thoſe times being entirely uncertain: that as to the writs upon record, they were ſome of them iſſued according to law, and others not; and ſuch were thoſe concerning ſhip-money; calling aſſemblies to tax themſelves, or to compel benevolences: that other taxes were raiſed by eſcuage, fees for knight's ſervice, and other means ariſing from the feudal ſyſtem: that benevolences are contrary to law, and it is well known how people reſiſted the demands of the crown in the caſe of ſhip-money, and were proſecuted by the court: and that were any ſet of men to meet now, in order to lend the king money, it would be contrary to law, and a breach of the rights of parliament: that as to the privilege enjoyed by the marches of Wales of taxing themſelves, it was but of ſhort duration, only during the life of Edward I. after his deceaſe they were annexed to the crown, and became ſubject to taxes like the reſt of the dominions of England, and from thence came the unneceſſary cuſtom of naming Wales and the town of Monmouth in all proclamations and acts of parliament: that Henry VIII. was the firſt who iſſued writs for it to return two members to parliament: that the crown extended the right ad libitum; from whence the inequality of repreſentation, in our conſtitution of this day, ariſes: Henry VIII. iſſued a writ to Calais to ſend one burgeſs to parliament; and one of the counties palatine was taxed fifty years to ſubſidies, before it ſent members to parliament: that the clergy were at no time unrepreſented in parliament; for when they taxed themſelves in their aſſemblies it was done with the concurrence and conſent of parliament, who, upon their petition for that purpoſe permitted them to tax themſelves, the convocation ſitting at the ſame time with the parliament: they had their repreſentatives two biſhops and abbots, always ſitting in the houſe of lords, and in the other houſe, they had ever a right of voting ſingly for the election of members: therefore the argument founded on the caſe of the clergy is not of any force, becauſe they were at no time unrepreſented. So the reaſoning about the colonies of Great Britain drawn from the colonies of antiquity, is a meer uſeleſs diſplay of learning; for the colonies of the Tyrians in Africa, and of the Greeks in Aſia, were totally different from our ſyſtem: that no nation before ourſelves formed any regular ſyſtem of colonization, but the right of juriſdiction of the mother country over her colonies was, among the Romans, boundleſs and uncontrolable: that the ſtates of Holland were not colonies; but ſtates dependent on the houſe of Auſtria, in a feudal dependence: that nothing could be more different from our colonies, than that ſhock of men, as they have been termed, who came from the north and poured into Europe: they renounced all laws, all protection, all connection with their mother countries: they choſe their leaders and marched under their banners, to ſeek their fortunes and eſtabliſh new kingdoms upon the ruins of the Roman empire; whereas our colonies emigrated under the ſanction of the crown and parliament: were modelled gradually into their preſent forms, by charters, grants and ſtatutes; for they were never ſeparated from the mother country, or ſo emancipated, as to become ſui juris.

They farther obſerved, that there are ſeveral ſorts of colonies in Britiſh America: the charter colonies, the proprietary governments, and the king's colonies: that the firſt colonies were the charter colonies; ſuch as the Virginia company, and theſe companies had amongſt their directors, members of the privy council, and of both houſes of parliament; they were under the authority of the privy council, and had agents reſiding here reſponſible for their proceedings: that ſo much were they conſidered as belonging to the crown, and not to the king perſonally (a great difference, though attended to by few) that when the two houſes in the time of Charles I. were going to paſs a bill concerning the colonies, a meſſage was ſent to them by his majeſty, importing, that they were the king's colonies, and that the bill was unneceſſary; for that the privy council would take order about them: and accordingly the bill never received the royal aſſent.

They urged, that the commonwealth parliament, as ſoon as it was ſettled, were, very early, jealous of the colonies ſeparating themſelves from them; and paſſed a reſolution or act, to declare and eſtabliſh the authority of England over her colonies. But ſuppoſing there was no expreſs law, or reaſon founded upon any neceſſary inference from an expreſs law, yet the uſage alone would be ſufficient to ſupport that authority: for, continued they, have not the colonies, ever ſince their firſt eſtabliſhment, ſubmitted to the juriſdiction of the mother country? In all queſtions of property, the appeal of the colonies have been to the privy council here; and ſuch cauſes have been determined, not by the law of the colonies, but by the law of England: frequently have the colonies been obliged to refer to the juriſdiction here to ſettle the diſputes among their own governments. New Hampſhire and Connecticut have been in blood about their differences; which ſhews the abſolute neceſſity of one ſuperior deciſive juriſdiction to which all ſubordinate juriſdictions may apply. Nothing could be more fatal to the peace of the colonies at any time, than the parliament giving up its authority over them; for in ſuch a caſe there muſt be an entire diſſolution of government. It is eaſy to foreſee, conſidering how the colonies are compoſed, that there would be no end of feuds and factions among the ſeveral ſeparate governments to decide their mutual differences: and government being diſſolved, nothing remains but that the ſeveral colonies muſt either change their conſtitution, and take ſome new form of government, or fall under ſome foreign power. The ſeveral forms of their conſtitution are, at preſent, very various, having been produced, like all other governments, by accident and circumſtances. The forms of government in every colony were adapted from time to time according to the ſize of the colony, and ſo have been extended again from time to time, as the numbers of the inhabitants, and their commercial connections, outgrew the firſt model. At firſt ſome of the colonies had only one governor, aſſiſted by two or three council; after which more were added; courts of juſtice were next erected, and then aſſemblies were created. Some things were done by inſtructions from the ſecretaries of ſtate, others by order of the king and council, and ſome by commiſſion under the great ſeal. It is obſervable, in conſequence of theſe eſtabliſhments from time to time, and the dependency of theſe governments, upon the ſupreme legiſlature at home, that the lenity of each government in the colonies has been extreme towards the ſubject; but if all theſe governments, which are now independent of each other, ſhould become independent of the mother country, it is to be feared the inhabitants would ſoon find, to their coſt, how little they were aware of the conſequences. They would, in that caſe, ſoon feel the hand of power much heavier upon them in their own governments than they have yet done, or ever imagined. The conſtitution of the ſeveral colonies being made up of different principles, they muſt remain dependent upon the juriſdiction of the mother country, or they muſt be totally diſmembered from it. No one ever thought the contrary, till the trumpet of ſedition has been lately blown. Acts of parliament have been made, not only without a doubt of their legality, but with univerſal applauſe, the great object of which has been ultimately to fix the trade of the colonies, ſo as to centre in the boſom of that country, from whence they took their origin. The navigation act ſhut up their commerce with foreign countries. Their ports have been made ſubject to cuſtoms and regulations, which cramped and diminiſhed their trade, and duties have been laid, affecting even the inmoſt part of their commerce, and among others that of the poſt; yet all theſe have been ſubmitted to peaceably, and no one ever thought, till now, of this doctrine, that the colonies are not to be taxed, regulated, or bound by parliament. A few particular merchants then, as now, were diſpleaſed at reſtrictions which did not permit them to make the greateſt advantage of their commerce in their own private and peculiar branches: but though theſe few merchants might think themſelves loſers, in articles which they had no right to gain, as being prejudicial to the general national ſyſtem, yet upon the whole, the colonies were benefited, becauſe their reſtrictive laws, founded upon principles of the moſt ſolid policy, flung a great weight of naval force into the hands of the mother country, which was to protect the colonies, and without which union the colonies muſt have been entirely weak and defenceleſs; inſtead of which they became relatively, ſubordinately, and in proportion great, as the mother country advanced in ſuperiority over the reſt of the maritime powers in Europe; to which both mutually contributed, and of which both have reaped the benefit, equal to the natural and juſt relation in which they both ſtand reciprocally, of dependency on one ſide, and protection on the other.

They added, there can be no doubt but that the inhabitants of the colonies are as much repreſented in parliament as the greateſt part of the people of England, among nine millions of whom, there are eight who have no votes in electing members of parliament: every objection therefore to the dependency of the colonies upon parliament, which ariſes to it upon the ground of repreſentation, goes to the whole preſent conſtitution of Great Britain. A member of parliament choſen for any borough repreſents not only the conſtituents, and inhabitants of that particular place, but alſo the inhabitants of every other borough in Great Britain: he repreſents the city of London, and all other the commons of the land, and the inhabitants of all the colonies and dominions of Great Britain, and is in duty and conſcience bound to take care of their intereſts. As to the diſtinction of internal and external taxes, it is as falſe and groundleſs as any other that has been made. It is granted, that reſtrictions upon trade, and duties upon the ports, are legal, at the ſame time that the right of the parliament of Great Britain to lay internal taxes upon the colonies is denied. What real difference can there be in this diſtinction? A tax laid in any place, is like a pebble falling into, and making a circle in a lake, till one circle produces and gives motion to another, and the whole circumference is agitated from the centre; for nothing can be more clear, than that a tax of ten or twenty per cent. laid upon tobacco, either in the ports of Virginia or London, is a duty laid upon the inland plantations of Virginia an hundred miles from the ſea, wherever the tobacco grows. It was alſo urged, that protection is the ground that gives a right of taxation: that the obligation between the colonies and the mother country is natural and reciprocal, conſiſting of defence on the one ſide, and obedience on the other; and that common ſenſe tells, that they muſt be dependent in all points upon the mother country, or elſe not belong to it at all; that the queſtion is not, what was law? or what was the conſtitution? but the queſtion is, what is law now? and what is the conſtitution now? That if a matter of right has been generally exerciſed, and as generally held to be law, as has been proved in numberleſs inſtances, without its ever having been queſtioned before, it is now the conſtitution. It was alſo obſerved, that the colonies had gone very great lengths; and it was even inſiſted, that, by appointing deputies, from their ſeveral aſſemblies, to confer together, they had abſolutely forfeited their charters.

The debates being at an end, and the queſtion put, the power of the legiſlature of Great Britain over her colonies, in all caſes whatſoever, and without any diſtinction in regard to taxation, was confirmed and aſcertained, without a diviſion.

The grand committee who had paſſed the reſolutions, on which the foregoing queſtion was debated, had alſo paſſed another for the total repeal of the ſtamp act; and two bills were accordingly brought in to anſwer theſe purpoſes. By the reſolutions on which the former was founded, it was declared, that tumults and inſurrections of the moſt dangerous nature had been raiſed and carried on in ſeveral of the colonies, in open defiance of government, and in manifeſt violation of the laws and legiſlative authority of this kingdom. That theſe tumults and inſurrections had been encouraged and inflamed, by ſeveral votes and reſolutions which had paſſed in the aſſemblies of the ſaid colonies, derogatory to the honour of government, and deſtructive to their legal and conſtitutional dependency on the crown, parliament, &c. By the bill itſelf, all votes, reſolutions, or orders, which had been paſſed by any of the general aſſemblies in America, by which they aſſumed to themſelves the ſole and excluſive right of taxing his majeſty's ſubjects in the colonies, were annulled, and declared contrary to law, derogatory to the legiſlative authority of parliament, and inconſiſtent with their dependency upon the crown.

Far from being diſpirited, the oppoſition gained new vigour, and ſtill reſiſted the repeal in every part of its progreſs. So many inſtances of the inexpediency of the ſtamp duty had already occurred, that the queſtion was ſcarcely controvertible; therefore inſtead of entering into the merits of that part of the controverſy, they reſted their principal defence upon the reſolutions, on which the late bill for ſecuring the dependency of the colonies had been founded.

From thence they argued, that the total repeal of the ſtamp-act, while ſuch an outrageous reſiſtance continued, would for the future leſſen the authority of Great Britain, and make it appear even contemptible: that ſuch a ſubmiſſion of the ſupreme legiſlature would be in effect a ſurrender of their antient unalienable rights, to ſubordinate provincial aſſemblies, eſtabliſhed only by prerogative; which in itſelf had no ſuch power to beſtow; that a conceſſion of this nature carried with it ſuch an appearance of weakneſs and timidity in government, as might probably encourage freſh inſults, and leſſen the reſpect of his majeſty's ſubjects to the dignity of his crown, and the authority of the laws: that the power of taxation is one of the moſt eſſential branches of all authority; that it cannot be equitably or impartially exerciſed, if it is not extended to all the members of the ſtate, in proportion to their reſpective abilities; but if a part are ſuffered to be exempt from a due ſhare of thoſe burthens, which the public exigencies require to be impoſed upon the whole, ſuch a partiality ſo directly repugnant to the truſt repoſed by the people in every legiſlature, muſt be abſolutely deſtructive of that confidence, on which all government ſhould be founded.

The inability of the coloniſts to comply with the terms of the ſtamp-act was alſo denied, and, as an inſtance to the contrary, that of the debt, contracted by them in the laſt war, 1,755,000l. has been already diſcharged, and that in the courſe of three years only: and that the much greater part of their remaining incumbrances, amounting in the whole to 760,000l. will be diſcharged in two years more.

Many other arguments were made uſe of in order to ſhew the heavy burdens with which the mother country was loaded; the ability of the Americans; their exemption from all manner of taxation; and their peremptory and refractory refuſal to contribute in any degree to the public expences.

In anſwer to theſe arguments, it was obſerved by thoſe on the other ſide of the queſtion, that the three firſt objections bore no manner of weight, as every conſequence, they preſumed, was already guarded againſt, by the bill for ſecuring the dependence of the colonies; which had alſo ſufficiently provided for the honour and dignity of Great Britain, and its conſtitutional ſuperiority over them.

They ſaid, that the propriety of all the parts contributing to the expences of the whole is readily admitted: the fact alledged, of the heavy debt contracted by the Americans in the courſe of the war, ſufficiently ſhews they contributed largely to the public expence; as their being repaid a part of it ſince is alſo a convincing proof, that the parliament were of opinion, they had contributed beyond their abilities: that nothing could be more remote from fact than the aſſertion, that they paid no taxes. They even paid many which had been laid on them by act of parliament; as they then paid a great variety of port duties, impoſed previous to the ſtamp-act; which lay very heavy upon their trade, and tended much to inflame their minds againſt that law. That they paid many port duties impoſed by provincial authority; many exciſes; a land-tax in many provinces; a heavy poll-tax; beſides a faculty-tax upon all family eſtates and acquiſitions, amounting in ſome provinces to five or ſix ſhillings in the pound: ſo that the aſſertion of their not contributing to the public expence being falſe, every argument built upon ſo baſeleſs a foundation muſt, of courſe, fall to the ground.

It was further urged, that moſt of the provinces in North America are notoriouſly poor: that they were upwards of four millions in debt to the merchants of Great Britain; who being creditors to ſuch an amount, are, in reality, the proprietors of a great part of what the Americans ſeem to poſſeſs: that the ſuppreſſion of manufactures in that country, and obliging them to take every ſort which they uſe from Great Britain, comprizes all ſpecies of taxes in one, and makes them, in reality, the ſupporters of a great part of the public burthens: that their great diſtance from hence, and the difficulty of making us thoroughly acquainted with the minute circumſtances of every colony, renders us liable to great miſtakes, and conſequently to the hazard of great oppreſſion, whenever we attempt to levy internal taxes in that country: that our true policy is to acquieſce in the great commercial advantages we derive from the Americans, rather than to attempt a revenue from thence; which, by diſabling the people to make returns to our merchants, will put them under a neceſſity of ſetting up manufactures of their own: that by the former policy, America has been advantageous to us, and quiet in itſelf; but that the preſent ſtate of things ſhews, too evidently, the ill effects of a contrary mode of acting.

On the queſtion being put, notwithſtanding the vigour with which the oppoſition was ſupported, the bill paſſed by a majority of 108, and was carried up to the lords by above 200 members of the houſe of commons. The eclat, however, with which it was introduced did not prevent its meeting with a ſtrong oppoſition in the upper houſe, a proteſt was entered againſt it at the ſecond reading by thirty-three lords, and at the third by twenty-eight, notwithſtanding which it was carried by a majority of thirty-four; and on the eighteenth of March received the royal aſſent.

The American merchants made a moſt numerous appearance on this occaſion, to expreſs their joy and gratitude; the ſhips in the river diſplayed their colours; ſeveral houſes in the city were illuminated; and every proper method was taken to demonſtrate the juſt ſenſe that was entertained of his majeſty's goodneſs, and the wiſdom of parliament, in conciliating the minds of the people on this critical occaſion.

The national buſineſs being finiſhed, his majeſty, on the 16th of June, went to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ It is with the utmoſt ſatisfaction that I have obſerved the wiſdom and moderation which have uniformly guided you through the many important deliberations in which you have been engaged, during the courſe of this long and intereſting ſeſſion of parliament. I perſuade myſelf that the moſt ſalutary effects muſt be the natural reſult of deliberations conducted upon ſuch principles.

“ Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

“ I thank you for the ſupplies which you have ſo chearfully given for the ſeveral eſtabliſhments, and for the ſupport of public credit: and you may reſt aſſured, that no œconomy will be wanting, to render them effectual for the purpoſes for which they were granted.

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ The preſent general diſpoſition of all the powers of Europe ſeems to indicate a continuance of peace: and it is my earneſt deſire to preſerve the general tranquillity, by fulfilling, on my part, all the engagements I am under by treaties. And, on this foundation, I may reaſonably hope and expect the ſame ſtrict performance of thoſe engagements which other powers are under to my crown.

“ The many regulations which you have made for extending and promoting the trade and manufactures of Great Britain, and for ſettling the mutual intercourſe of my kingdoms and plantations, in ſuch a manner as to provide for the improvement of the colonies, on a plan of due ſubordination to the commercial intereſts of the mother country, are the ſtrongeſt proofs of your equitable and comprehenſive regard to the welfare of all my dominions; an object truly worthy of a Britiſh parliament.

“ It ſhall be my endeavour, that ſuch care be taken, as may tend to ſecure and improve the advantages which may be expected from ſuch wiſe and ſalutary proviſions.

“ I have nothing further to recommend to you, than that you will exert your beſt endeavours in your reſpective counties to enforce the execution of the laws, and to promote good manners and good order among my people; whoſe true and laſting happineſs ſhall be my conſtant care, and upon whoſe affections I ſhall always firmly rely.

“ I receive your condolance on the melancholy event of my brother's death, as a mark of your affection and loyalty.

“ I ſhall be careful that my conduct ſhall juſtify the confidence you ſo affectionately expreſs, in my applying properly ſuch ſupplies as you have judged neceſſary for the public ſervice.”

Soon after the riſing of the parliament his majeſty thought proper to make the following changes in the miniſtry: His grace the duke of Grafton was appointed firſt lord of the treaſury in the room of the marquis of Rockingham; the earl of Shelburne ſucceeded the duke of Richmond as ſecretary of ſtate; lord Camden was created lord high chancellor in the place of the earl of Northington, as was the honourable Charles Townſhend chancellor of the exchequer, in the room of the right honourable William Dowdeſwell; and the right honourable William Pitt, who ſome days before had been created viſcount Pynſent and earl of Chatham, was made lord privy-ſeal.

The exceeding high price of proviſions at this time cauſed the poor to riſe in ſeveral parts of the kingdom; when they deſtroyed the flour mills, ſeized on corn, and other neceſſaries of life, which they ſold at a moderate price, and delivered the money to the owners. In ſome places they were much more violent; for, inſtead of taking the above method of ſupplying their wants, they ripped open the ſacks, and ſcattered the corn about, ſeized butter, cheeſe, and bacon, in the ſhops, which they threw into the ſtreets, and behaved in the moſt outrageous manner to the proprietors of the goods they thus demoliſhed.

To prevent the dreadful conſequences that were likely to enſue on this account, a proclamation was publiſhed on the 11th of September for putting in execution the laws againſt foreſtalling, regrating and engroſſing of corn. And on the 23d of the ſame month two other proclamations were publiſhed; by the firſt of which an embargo was laid on all veſſels laden, or to be laden, with wheat or flour for exportation, till the 14th of November; and the other prohibited the diſtilling of ſpirits from wheat.

On the evening of the 1ſt of October her royal highneſs Caroline Matilda, youngeſt ſiſter to his majeſty, was married to the king of Denmark, at the chapel royal at St. James's, the duke of York being proxy for the Daniſh king. The next morning her majeſty ſet out from Carlton-houſe for Harwich, accompanied by his royal highneſs the duke of Glouceſter, the right honourable lady Mary Boothby, and count de Bothmar, her majeſty's vice-chamberlain. The next day her majeſty embarked with her whole retinue, and on the 18th landed at Altena, amidſt the acclamations of her new ſubjects.---Her marriage portion was 100,000l.

The parliament met on the 18th of November, when his majeſty repaired to the houſe, and opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The high price of wheat, and the defective produce of that grain laſt harveſt, together with the extraordinary demand for the ſame from foreign parts, have, principally, determined me to call you thus early together; that I might have the ſenſe of parliament, as ſoon as conveniently might be, on a matter ſo important, and particularly affecting the poorer ſort of my ſubjects.

"The urgency of the neceſſity called upon me, in the mean time, to exert my royal authority for the preſervation of the public ſafety againſt a growing calamity, which would not admit of delay. I have, therefore, by and with the advice of my privy council, laid an embargo on wheat and wheat flour going out of the kingdom, until the advice of parliament could be taken thereupon.

"If further proviſions of law be requiſite or expedient, with regard to the dearneſs of corn, ſo neceſſary to the ſuſtenance of the poorer ſort, they cannot eſcape the wiſdom of parliament, to which I recommend the due conſideration thereof.

"At the ſame time I muſt with concern take notice that, notwithſtanding my cares for my people, a ſpirit of the moſt daring inſurrection has, in divers parts, broke forth in violences of the moſt criminal nature.

"Neceſſary orders have been given for bringing ſuch dangerous offenders to condign puniſhment and ſpeedy juſtice; nor ſhall vigilance and vigour on my part be wanting to reſtore obedience and reverence to law and government.

"I have the ſatisfaction to inform you, that ſince I laſt met you I have concluded a treaty of commerce with my ſiſter the empreſs of Ruſſia, whereby that conſiderable branch of trade is fixed on a juſt and ſatisfactory footing.

"It is with pleaſure I alſo acquaint you, that the marriage between my good brother the king of Denmark, and my ſiſter the princeſs Caroline Matilda, has been ſolemnized, and the natural alliance between the two crowns happily ſtrengthened by an additional tie of ſo agreeable a nature.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have ordered the proper eſtimates for the current ſervice of the year to be laid before you. Such ſupplies as you may grant ſhall be duly applied, with the utmoſt fidelity and ſtricteſt regard to the object for which they were granted.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The general poſture of affairs in Europe affords no occaſion to lay any thing new before you on that head. My purpoſes are conſtant, and to maintain, on my part, the public tranquillity inviolate, and to ſupport the dignity of my crown and the rights of my ſubjects. The wiſdom and juſtice of the other great powers of Europe leave no room to apprehend any intentions of a contrary nature."

As the miniſtry had been recently changed, great oppoſition was made to every thing propoſed by adminiſtration. Nay, ſome of the diſcarded went ſo far as to attempt to palliate, and even excuſe, the rioters, who had made ſuch diſturbances in different parts of the kingdom. However, it was agreed upon, by a great majority in both houſes, that addreſſes of thanks ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, in anſwer to his ſpeech, which being done, they adjourned till after the holidays.

A. D. 1767. The firſt object that attracted the notice of parliament this ſeſſions was the ſtate of the Eaſt-India company, which was now become extremely rich, and actually exerciſed a ſovereign authority over their ſettlements. To all wiſe miniſters ſuch a circumſtance muſt have been very alarming; and therefore a committee was appointed to examine into the affair. The charter of the company was ordered to be produced, and that a perfect knowledge might be obtained of every thing relating to their tranſactions, they were obliged to deliver up to the houſe the originals of ſuch treaties as they had entered into with the princes in the Eaſt-Indies; and alſo an account of all the expences incurred by the government for the ſupport of the company.

This was a moſt mortifying affair for the proprietors of Eaſt-India ſtock; and what was ſtill worſe, all theſe papers were printed and publiſhed. The queſtion ſtated by adminiſtration was, "What right "had the Eaſt-India company to territorial juriſdic-"tion?"

By their charter they were even excluded from making any conqueſts; and yet it was certain that they had ſubdued ſeveral of the princes in India, and annexed their dominions to their own ſettlements. It was urged further, that ſuch powers veſted in a corporate body of merchants was inconſiſtent with the nature of government, derogatory to the dignity of the crown, and injurious to the generality of the ſubjects. That if the government was to ſupport them, then all thoſe acquiſitions of territory became the property of the crown, otherwiſe a ſyſtem would take place ſimilar to that in the feudal law, where regalities were eſtabliſhed, and the chief enjoyed a commutative juriſdiction with the ſovereign. That ſuch practices would contribute towards the promoting confuſion among all ranks of ſubjects, and might, in the end, lead us back to a ſtate of barbarity, equal to that in which our predeceſſors were five hundred years ago.

On the other hand, thoſe who contended for the rights of the company, argued in the following manner. They ſaid, that the words of the charter were general, and, therefore, the notion of acquiſitions was implied by inferences drawn from conſequences, without an aſſigned ſpecification. That by ſuch a chain of reaſoning, all the new ſettlements made in America, beyond thoſe that were ſpecified in the charters, might be claimed by the crown, although it was evident that they were private property. That people who went to ſettle in foreign parts, eſpecially among uncultivated ſavages, were obliged, for their own ſafety, to extend the bounds of their territories; and if the government is at ſome trifling expence in ſupporting them, it is no more than what they owe to the ſubjects in general. It was further urged, that if the crown had any claim on the company, the courts of law were open, where there was not the leaſt doubt but juſtice would be done to all parties; and as the houſe of commons was not a court of judicature, ſo it had no right to meddle with points of law, nor could it decide on any legal privileges. That if ever ſuch an event ſhould take place, as that of the commons aſſuming a power to judge in matters of law, it would prove fatal to the ſubjects in general, who would chuſe that their reſpective properties ſhould be intruſted in other hands.

The diſputes were carried on with great warmth by both parties, and the reſult was, that the company ſhould, during the ſpace of two years enſuing, pay a certain ſum to the government; and that no dividend of their ſtock ſhould be made without the conſent of a general court of proprietors.

On the 24th of June his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and, after ſigning ſuch bills as were ready, prorogued the parliament. [*]

With reſpect to public affairs on the continent of Europe, this year, an event took place little expected, and which ſurprized moſt people. It is well known that Italy, once the ſeat of learning, has been for many ages the mother and nurſe of ſuperſtition; and from thence originated all thoſe ridiculous ceremonies that debaſed the Chriſtian religion, and made it reſemble the groſſeſt paganiſm, for ſuch is the nominal worſhip performed in popiſh churches, that a ſtranger would conſider it in much the ſame light as the idolatry of the antient heathens.

For ſome time popery had been loſing ground in thoſe countries where it is by law eſtabliſhed, and encreaſing where it was prohibited, owing to the diſgrace into which the jeſuits had brought themſelves. That ſociety had been eſtabliſhed above two hundred years, and in that time had riſen to ſuch fame, that they became objects of jealouſy, and even reſentment to the other orders. It is true, they were become ſo affluent, that even princes might have looked upon them as dangerous rivals; but that was not the ſole cauſe of their ruin. It had been a conſtant practice with princes, and other great men, to make them their confeſſors; and it is well known, that he who acts the part of a confeſſor to a prince, may, with propriety, be conſidered as his prime miniſter. All ſecrets had been truſted with them, and as ſome of them were, at the ſame time confeſſors to thoſe in oppoſite intereſts, jealouſies took place; and the king of Portugal having been attacked in his carriage, in conſequence of a plan laid by theſe fathers, reſolved to baniſh them out of his dominions. This happened ſeveral years before the period we are now treating of, and Spain followed the example of Portugal, by baniſhing them out of all their dominions, whether in Europe or America.

It might reaſonably have been imagined that they would have found an aſylum in Italy, and it is true, the did ſo for ſome time; but during the former part of this year they were baniſhed from Naples and Parma, and all their eſtates confiſcated. Under various characters, ſuch as thoſe of tutors, clerks, ſurgeons, &c. many of them have ſettled in proteſtant countries: but it is to be hoped, that parents and guardians will take care to prevent youth from being ſeduced by them.

In Ruſſia, the empreſs had ſummoned all the learned men in her empire to aſſemble at Moſcow, in order to compile a code of laws, which was the more neceſſary, as many of the provinces conſiſted of ſubjects governed by different laws, and theſe frequently claſhing with each other contributed towards injuring claimants to private property, and retarded the regular courſe of diſtributive juſtice.

The attention of the people in Europe was, this year, particularly directed to Corſica, an iſland in the Mediterranean, almoſt adjoining to the iſland of Sardinia. It is extremely fertile and populous, and ſome centuries ago had been given by the pope to the republic of Piſa; but the Genoeſe took it, and for many years treated the inhabitants in the moſt arbitrary and cruel manner. The ſpirit of liberty, however, was not extinct, it wanted only the breath of a hero to kindle it; and ſuch a one was found in the perſon of the famous Paoli, a native of the iſland, but had travelled into other countries, where he had learned the art of war. The prudence and valour of that hero will be tranſmitted to the lateſt ages, but we ſhall ſee in the ſubſequent part of this work, that overpowered by numbers, he was obliged to abandon the iſland.

On the 24th of November his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he told the members that he had aſſembled them at ſo early a period, that they might have time to deliberate with ſteadineſs and judgment; and in particular he recommended to them the ſtate of the nation with reſpect to the price of proviſions.

A. D. 1768 [†]. The buſineſs of this ſeſſion (in the courſe of which 112 public and private bills received the royal aſſent) being brought to a concluſion, on the 10th of March his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and in a moſt gracious ſpeech returned thanks to the parliament for the many ſignal proofs they had given him of their affectionate attachment to his perſon, family, and government: and concluded with the following words:

"In the approaching election of repreſentatives, I doubt not but my people will give me freſh proofs of their attachment to the true intereſt of their country; which I ſhall ever receive as the moſt acceptable mark of their affection to me. The welfare of all my ſubjects is my firſt object. Nothing therefore has ever given me more real concern, than to ſee any of them, in any part of my dominions, attempting to looſen thoſe bonds of conſtitutional ſubordination, ſo eſſential to the welfare of the whole, but it is with much ſatisfaction that I now ſee them returning to a more juſt ſenſe of what their own intereſt, no leſs than their duty, indiſpenſably requires of them; and thereby giving me the proſpect of continuing to reign over an happy, becauſe a united people."

The parliament was then prorogued to the laſt day of the month; but on the 12th of April it was diſſolved by proclamation.

We have already obſerved that Mr. Wilkes had retired to France. By his long reſidence there, and not appearing to the indictments laid againſt him, he was declared an outlaw. Previous, however, to the general election he returned to England, and, to the great aſtoniſhment of the public, declared himſelf a candidate to repreſent the city of London in parliament; but loſt his election. He then ſet up for the county of Middleſex, and on the 28th of March was elected by a prodigious majority. On the 20th of the ſame month he ſurrendered himſelf to the court of King's-bench, and on the 27th was committed to the King's bench priſon. Some time after, his trial came on in that court, and being found guilty, the following ſentence was pronounced on him: "That for "the republication of the North-Briton, No. 45, he "ſhould pay a fine of 500l. and be impriſoned ten "calendar months: and for publiſhing the Eſſay on "Woman, that he ſhould likewiſe pay a fine of 500l. "and be impriſoned twelve calendar months, to be "computed from the expiration of the term of the "former impriſonment; and that he afterwards find "ſecurity for his good behaviour for ſeven years, "himſelf to be bound in the ſum of 1000l. and two "ſureties in 500l. each."

[*] On the twenty-ſeventh of September captain Wrotteſly arrived from Monaco with the melancholy news, that his royal highneſs Edward Auguſtus, duke of York and Albany, died at that place, on the 17th of the ſame month, about eleven in the morning. His royal highneſs's diſorder was a malignant fever, in which he lay fourteen days. The body was opened and embalmed; after which it was put on board his majeſty's ſhip, Montreal, to be brought to England; where it arrived on the firſt of November, and, on third, was interred in the royal vault in king Henry the VIIth's chapel.

[†] This year began with a very ſevere froſt, which greatly contributed to the calamity of the lower ſort of people, who were already much diſtreſſed from the exorbitant price of proviſions. On the 9th of January the river below bridge bore all the appearance of a general wreck, ſhips, boats and ſmall craft lying in a very confuſed manner, ſome on ſhore, and others ſunk or overſet by the ice. A fiſhing boat was diſcovered near Deptford creek jammed in by the ice, and all the people in it frozen to death; one of whom, a youth about ſeventeen, was found ſitting erect as if alive.

The general election was carried on with great heat, and violent conteſts enſued in many parts of the nation. Nor did the diſorders, which this occaſion gave riſe to, ſubſide with it. A general murmuring and diſſatiſfaction prevailed among the lower claſs of people, partly occaſioned by the high price of proviſions, and partly from other cauſes. The riotous aſſemblies of the weavers, coal-heavers, and ſailors, kept the capital and its environs in continual alarm. From ſome unknown cauſe, juſt at this time, when it was moſt wanted, the civil power ſeemed to loſe its force and energy, and too frequently give occaſion for the dangerous interpoſition of a military force in its ſupport: the unhappy effects of which are ſtill recent in the minds of the greater part of the preſent age.*

On the 10th of May† the members of the new parliament were ſworn in and took their ſeats in the houſe: and the following day the commons, having re-choſen Sir John Cuſt for their ſpeaker, preſented him to the lords commiſſioners for their approbation, who were pleaſed in his majeſty's name to approve their choice. After which the lord chancellor opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"In purſuance of the authority given us by his majeſty's commiſſion under the great ſeal, amongſt other things, to declare the cauſes of your preſent meeting, we are, by the king's command, to acquaint you, that his majeſty has not called you together at this unuſual ſeaſon of the year, in order to lay before you any matters of general buſineſs, but merely to give you an opportunity of diſpatching certain parliamentaay proceedings, which his majeſty's deſire of providing, at all events, for the welfare and ſecurity of his good ſubjects, makes him wiſh to ſee completed as ſoon as poſſible, and with that diſpatch which the public convenience, as well as your own, requires.

"His majeſty at the ſame time, has commanded us to aſſure you of his perfect confidence in this parliament; and that he has the ſtrongeſt reaſon to expect every thing from their advice and aſſiſtance, that loyalty, wiſdom, and zeal for the public good, can dictate or ſuggeſt."

A joint addreſs was preſented by the lords and commons to his majeſty, beſeeching him to exert his authority for quelling the diſorders and tumults which prevailed to ſo alarming a degree; at the ſame time aſſuring his majeſty that nothing ſhould be wanting on their parts which might enable him to maintain the public authority, and carry the laws into due execution; and ſoon after an end was put to this ſhort ſeſſion.

On the 11th of Auguſt the king of Denmark arrived at St. James's, to viſit his royal brother-in-law, our ſovereign. He was attended by moſt of his great officers of ſtate, and the utmoſt reſpect was paid to him by all ranks of people. But nothing leſs than the moſt unbounded diſſipation ſeemed to have taken place. His Daniſh majeſty gave orders for a maſquerade, which was one of the moſt magnificent ever ſeen in England; and while the preparations for it were going on, he viſited Cambridge, where he was elegantly entertained in the hall of Trinity College. From thence he proceeded to York, Leeds, and Mancheſter; and, on his return to London, coming through Oxford, he was met by the whole univerſity in proceſſion. When he came to the ſenate-houſe, the public orator complimented him in a moſt elegant Latin ſpeech, to which his majeſty replied in the ſame language. He was then preſented with a diploma, as doctor of the civil and canon laws, and walked in his honarary robes along with the doctors and regents. In the beginning of October, his majeſty left England; and, much about the ſame time, ſeveral changes took place in the Engliſh miniſtry; for certain it is, that the political ſtate of this country had, for ſeveral years, been of a very fluctuating nature.

The other affairs in England not being very intereſting,

* Of all the diſturbances that occaſioned public attention at this time, the moſt fatal was that which happened in St. George's Fields on the 10th of May, and which evinced the raſh violence exerciſed againſt the people on account of their attachment to Mr. Wilkes, then a priſoner in the King's Bench. The particulars of this remarkable affair were as follow:

The parliament being to aſſemble on that day, great numbers of people aſſembled about the priſon, in expectation that Mr. Wilkes would, on that account, obtain his liberty, and intending to conduct him to the houſe of commons. Finding themſelves diſappointed, they grew tumultuous, and a party of the third regiment of guards was ſent for. The riot was greatly increaſed by a paper, that had been ſtuck againſt the wall of the priſon, which was forcibly taken down by one of the juſtices for the Borough. The populace inſiſted on having this paper, which the juſtice not regarding, the tumult became exceeding violent; the drums beat to arms, and the riot act was read, during which great quantities of ſtones and bricks were thrown by the populace. William Allen, a young man, ſon of Mr. Allen, keeper of the Horſe-ſhoe inn in Blackman-ſtreet, Southwark, being purſued, along with others, was unfortunately ſingled out, followed by three ſoldiers, and ſhot dead. Theſe meaſures not having any tendency to diſperſe the mob, an additional number of the guards was ſent for, as alſo a party of horſe-grenadiers; but the people growing ſtill more numerous, they were fired upon by the ſoldiers, when five were killed on the ſpot, and about fifteen wounded. Among the latter were two women, one of whom afterwards died in St. Thomas's hoſpital.

The following day an inquiſition was taken by the coroner for Surry, on the above William Allen, when the jury gave their verdict, that Donald Maclaine was guilty of wilful murder, and Donald Maclaury and Alexander Murray (the laſt of whom was commanding officer) were aiding and abetting therein. This inqueſt was held at the houſe of Mr. Allen; and it appeared on examination that the deceaſed was only a ſpectator, and, on ſeeing ſome perſons run, he ran alſo, but was unhappily miſtaken, and followed by the ſoldiers into a cow-houſe, where he was ſhot. Maclaury and Murray were admitted to bail, but Maclaine was committed to priſon for the murder. He was afterwards tried at the Surry aſſizes at Guildford, and acquitted.---Two other inquiſitions were taken in the Borough on perſons killed by the ſoldiers in this riot; one on the body of Mary Jeffs, who having a baſket with oranges, was ſhot in removing them; the other, on one William Bridgman, who was ſhot on the top of a hay-cart, as he was looking at the fray at a diſtance; on both theſe inquiſitions the jury brought in their verdict, Chance Medley.

† On the 19th, after a long and painful illneſs, her royal highneſs the princeſs Louiſa Anne, daughter of her royal highneſs the princeſs dowager of Wales, and ſecond ſiſter to his preſent majeſty, paid the great debt of nature. On the 22d, after laying in ſtate that day, the royal corpſe was interred in Henry the VIIth's chapel.

tereſting, we ſhall now take notice of the moſt material tranſactions that happened, during the courſe of this year, on the continent.

In the month of Auguſt the French concluded a treaty with the republic of Genoa, of a very extraordinary nature, and ſuch as ought to have been oppoſed by all the maritime ſtates in Europe. The brave Corſicans ſtill continued to defend thoſe rights which the Genoeſe ſought to deprive them of; and the latter deſpairing of ever bringing them into ſubjection, agreed to give up that valuable iſland to the French king, upon condition of his ſending an army thither to ſubdue the people. It was really ſurpriſing that other nations ſhould have ſuffered ſuch a treaty to be put in execution; for if a war ſhould break out, the French would have an opportunity of ſending a ſwarm of privateers from Corſica, and to this iſland they could bring their prizes without being obliged to ſail to Marſeilles; ſo that the trade along the ſouth and weſt coaſt of Italy would be wholly their own.

In America great diſturbances happened on account of ſome duties having been laid on glaſs, ſalt, and other commodities imported from England. It was thought that the repeal of the ſtamp-act would have given ſome ſatisfaction to theſe people, but they ſtill inſiſted that it was their inherent privilege to tax themſelves.

At Boſton, the people met in a large body, and entered into ſeveral reſolutions not to import any goods of a ſuperfluous nature, but to attend to the ſtricteſt œconomy, both in dreſs and furniture. A ſubſcription was opened for the encouragement of their own manufactures, and the eſtabliſhment of new ones. This was done to elude the payment of the duties upon ſuch articles as ſhould be ſent from England; and, at the ſame time, an aſſociation of gentlemen from all the old colonies was formed, in order to propoſe the moſt likely means to be uſed in preventing Engliſh acts of parliament from being put in force there, or in any other of the American provinces, or the Weſt-Indies.

The freeholders, and, in general, all the inhabitants of Maſſachuſet's Bay, had placed the greateſt confidence in their repreſentatives, and there was a continual conteſt between them and their governor. The earl of Shelburne had ſent over a letter to the governor, complaining of theſe abuſes, and it was read in the open aſſembly of the repreſentatives. This occaſioned moſt violent debates; and ſome of the members went ſo far as to declare, that the governor had miſrepreſented their conduct to the miniſtry. They denied the charges in the letter, and wrote to the earl of Shelburne on the ſubject, vindicating themſelves, and throwing the whole blame on the governor. At the ſame time, the merchants of Boſton ordered their agent to repreſent to the lords of the treaſury, that unleſs theſe duties, which had occaſioned ſo much miſchief, were taken off, the trade of the province would be deſtroyed, as they ſeemed to them contrary to the ſpirit of the conſtitution, and inconſiſtent with their charter. Their repreſentations occaſioned the eſtabliſhment of a new officer, who was to act as ſecretary of ſtate for the colonies in America; and the firſt perſon made choice of was the earl of Hillſborough, at that time firſt lord of trade. The firſt thing done by his lordſhip, was to ſend circular letters to the governors of the provinces, informing them, that his majeſty was highly diſpleaſed at the conduct of the people, as it was apt to create confuſion, and throw every thing into the utmoſt diſorder. He ſaid, that their conduct in oppoſing the legiſlative power of Great Britain was little better than an act of open rebellion; for, by giving encouragement to ſuch practices, the government would be overturned, and no regard paid to the laws. He concluded by recommending to them to preſerve the public peace, by puniſhing all diſorders of an evil tendency; but as to mere oppoſition in words, or in ſcandalous libels, they were to treat them with contempt.

Governor Barnard had diſſolved the aſſembly of repreſentatives, and new ones being choſen, it was inſiſted on by him, that they ſhould make a public act to diſapprove of the conduct of the late aſſembly. This was going too far; becauſe, unleſs repreſentatives are left free to act according to the will and orders of their conſtituents, they do not deſerve the name. They deſired to ſee a copy of the governor's inſtructions, which was granted them, and, to their ſurprize, they found, that in caſe they refuſed to comply, they were to be diſſolved, and an account of their conduct ſent to England, in order to be laid before the next ſeſſions of parliament.

This ſet the whole nation in a flame; and when the bill was brought in to paſs a cenſure on the conduct of the laſt aſſembly, ninety-two voted againſt it, and no more than ſeventeen for it. The reſt of the colonies took the alarm, and followed their example; while combinations were formed almoſt every where not to take any goods from England, except ſuch as were abſolutely neceſſary.

The diſcontents among the people of Boſton now broke out into open violence: for a ſhip having landed a cargo of wine, and taken on board another of oil, without paying any regard to the new laws by which the new cuſtoms were to be regulated, the officers made a ſignal to the Romney man of war, who ſent her boats; and having cut down the maſts of the trading veſſel, hawled her along-ſide of the king's ſhip. This was ſo ſeverely reſented by the populace, that they roſe in great numbers, demoliſhed the houſes of the cuſtom-houſe officers, and laying hold of the commiſſioner's boat, dragged it on ſhore, and then ſet it on fire.

While theſe diſorders continued in the town, the governor diſſolved the aſſembly; but that had not the deſired effect, for the diſturbances increaſed every day, ſo that two regiments were ſent over from Ireland to ſupport the civil power. Their place of rendezvous was to be at Hallifax, in Nova-Scotia; and no ſooner had the people of Boſton received news that they were landed at that place, than they met, and choſe a preſident among themſelves, who was deputed to wait on the governor, to know for what reaſon, or with what view, his majeſty's forces were to be ſent among them. They deſired, at the ſame time, that a general aſſembly might be ſummoned to meet; but he refuſed to give them any ſatisfactory anſwer, and only told them, that it was their duty to break up their tumultuous meetings, and ſubmit quietly to the laws. He added, that as they ſeemed ignorant of the offence they had committed, he muſt freely tell them, that unleſs they ſubmitted to the government, he ſhould be obliged to treat them as rebels. From this time he refuſed to receive any meſſages from them; upon which they ſent a long detail of their grievances to London, in order to be laid before the miniſtry. In the mean time, the tranſports, with the two regiments, and a train of artillery, arrived from Halifax, and were quartered in the houſes of townſmen; but as the military laws did not extend to America, any farther than providing barracks for them, it was ordered by the governor that they ſhould have barrack proviſions, ſo as to be as little burthenſome to the people as poſſible. This part of the governor's conduct gave general ſatisfaction to ſuch of the people as were moderate in their ſentiments; but notwithſtanding, a great majority were ſtill diſcontented. They could not behold without jealouſy, an armed force quartered among them in time of peace; for, with reſpect to their late combinations, they conſidered them as efforts to maintain their freedom.

In the Eaſt-Indies, during the latter end of the laſt, and the beginning of this year, things began to aſſume a new form; and it was even feared that a revolution would take place much to the diſadvantage of the Engliſh Eaſt-India company, whoſe ſtock was now advanced to a ſurpriſing height. Hyder Ally, a perſon who had ſerved ſome time as a common ſoldier, having received ſome affront from his officers, left the army, and raiſed a choſen band of followers, with a view of driving the Engliſh out of all their ſettlements in that part of the world. Although brought up in the moſt humble ſtation, yet, like Tamerlane, or Caius Marius, he had all the qualities of a great general, which were only obſcured for want of a proper opportunity of diſplaying them to public view.

Such was the character of the man with whom the Engliſh had now to contend, and it muſt be acknowledged, that it required the greateſt ſkill to oppoſe him. He had conquered ſeveral provinces on the coaſt of Malabar, and, upon the whole, was conſidered as one of the moſt formidable princes in the eaſt. He was ſenſible, however, that the Eaſt-India company would be ſo powerfully ſupported, that policy muſt be added to force, otherwiſe he ſhould never be able to accompliſh his ſchemes. Accordingly, he brought over the Nizam of the Decan to his intereſt; and having raiſed a large body of forces, prepared to take the field. Colonel Smith, in the company's ſervice, was ſent to oppoſe this formidable alliance; and a moſt deſperate engagement enſued, in which Hyder Ally diſcovered all the courage and conduct of the braveſt general. He made his diſpoſitions with ſo much prudence, that it was no eaſy matter to attack him; ſo that colonel Smith, in order to avoid the force of his cannon, which galled the company's troops on the right, marched to a riſing ground on the left, and ſo turned his lines. The Aſiatic general rode from one place to another, to encourage his men; but at laſt they gave way, and the Engliſh continued purſuing them with great ſlaughter. All their cannon and ammunition fell into the hands of the Engliſh, beſides a vaſt quantity of treaſure; and the Nizam perceiving the danger he was in from his connections with Hyder Ally, made peace with the company. This, however, did not put an end to the war; for Hyder Ally finding himſelf deſerted by the Nizam, transferred the ſeat of war into a mountainous part of the country, where it was extremely difficult to attack him, as he was well acquainted with all the paſſages and defiles, and could defend himſelf even againſt ſuperiority of numbers.

During the latter part of this year, the war was carried on with great violence in Corſica: for although the French had landed there with a numerous army, the brave iſlanders diſputed the ground with them inch by inch. Paoli had ſome hopes of aſſiſtance from England, and, for that purpoſe, ſent notice of his diſtreſs to our miniſtry by one Mr. Boſwell, a young gentleman with whom he had become acquainted while on his travels: but no aſſiſtance being given him, he had nothing to depend on beſides the juſtice of his cauſe and the bravery of his countrymen. At firſt, the French obtained ſome very conſiderable advantages; but the Corſicans killed ſuch vaſt numbers of them in ſtraggling parties, that had they not been reinforced by freſh ſuccours continually ſent to them, the whole army that firſt landed would have been totally cut off. The Corſicans concealed themſelves in buſhes and caves near the roads where the enemy were to paſs, and galled them ſo much, that many of them deſerted, while ſuch as fell into the hands of the Corſicans as priſoners were inſtantly put to death. Some perſons may be apt to blame the conduct of the Corſicans on this occaſion, as inconſiſtent with the law of nations; but whoever does ſo, muſt be unacquainted with the peculiarity of their circumſtances. They had been ſo much oppreſſed by the Genoeſe, that they had, conſiſtent with the opinions of the beſt writers on natural law, aſſerted their own freedom; and when the republic of Genoa found that they could not again reduce them to a ſtate of ſubjection, they gave them up to the French, as if they had been a parcel of ſheep or oxen. The French, upon their landing in the iſland, commanded all the inhabitants to lay down their arms, and take an oath of allegiance to their ſovereign, otherwiſe they were to be treated as rebels. Thus theſe innocent people, knowing that no mercy was to be ſhewn to ſuch of themſelves as were taken priſoners, reſolved to treat the French in the ſame manner, and ſell their lives and liberty as dear as poſſible. Such was the ſtate of the Corſicans: and their putting the French priſoners to death was no more than an act of retaliation, which ſtands juſtified by Grotius, Budin, Locke, and Puffendorff.

Paoli, who ſtill hoped for aſſiſtance from England, as well as from ſome of the other European powers, called an aſſembly of the Corſican chiefs, and aſked their opinion concerning the moſt proper methods to be uſed in the proſecution of the war. He laid before them all the papers which the French had cauſed to be diſtributed throughout the iſland; but no ſooner did the chiefs perceive that they were looked upon as vaſſals to the crown of France, than they tore them into a thouſand pieces.

Although this campaign was but ſhort, yet ſo great was the loſs the French ſuſtained, that, notwithſtanding the new reinforcements which were daily ſent them, they were on the point of being totally routed. Adjoining to Corſica are ſame ſmall iſlands; and as the harbours of them were ſafe and commodious, ſo the Corſican privateers prevented, in a great meaſure, the enemy from receiving ſuch ſupplies as had been ſent them from France. This induced the French, in the month of November this year, to embark a conſiderable body of forces on board thirteen tranſports, in order to attack theſe ſmall iſlands.

Their firſt attack was made on the iſland of Pietra; but although they made good their landing, they were repulſed with great loſs by a few Corſicans, who, animated by the love of liberty, fought like lions. From thence the French proceeded to Iſola Boſſa, another iſland, where the Corſicans were driven from their poſts; but no ſooner had they recollected themſelves, and recovered from their firſt ſurprize, than they faced about, and not only recovered the poſts they had loſt, but drove the enemy, with great ſlaughter, back to their ſhips. Above 900 of the French were killed in this fruitleſs expedition, and their general began to deſpair of ever taking the iſland. But we muſt now return to Britain.

The Engliſh miniſtry were thrown into ſome confuſion by the death of Mr. Townſhend, chancellor of the exchequer, a gentleman of great natural parts, univerſal erudition, and a perfect knowledge of the conſtitution. Indeed, the miniſtry were far from being popular, and ſome parts of their conduct ſeemed to border on weakneſs; ſo that it was neceſſary that a perſon ſhould be made choice of, who would be able, by a firmneſs of temper, to add ſome luſtre to their fading characters. In conſequence of that reſolution, lord North was made chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Thomas Townſhend paymaſter of the forces, earl Gower preſident of the council, lord Weymouth one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, and Mr.

Rigby was appointed one of the vice-treaſurers of Ireland.

The parliament met on the 24th of November, when his majeſty went to the houſe, and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he expreſſed his wiſhes that the parliament would proſecute the conſideration of thoſe great commercial intereſts which had been entered upon before, but which the ſhortneſs of the laſt ſeſſion of the late parliament had prevented from being brought to a final concluſion. He obſerved, that it would have given him great ſatisfaction could he have aſſured them that all the other powers of Europe had been as careful as himſelf to avoid taking any ſtep that might endanger the general tranquillity: that he had received repeated aſſurances of their pacific diſpoſitions towards this country; which ſhould not, however, divert his conſtant reſolution, ſtedfaſtly to attend to the general intereſts of Europe. He then took notice of the conduct of the Americans, and obſerved, that the capital of one of the colonies was in an actual ſtate of diſobedience, having proceeded to meaſures ſubverſive of the conſtitution, and attended with circumſtances that manifeſted a diſpoſition to throw off their dependence on Great Britain; but that he did not doubt, with their aſſiſtance and concurrence, of being able to defeat the miſchievous deſigns of thoſe turbulent and ſeditious perſons, who, under falſe pretences, had too ſucceſsfully deluded numbers of his ſubjects in America; and whoſe practices, if ſuffered to prevail, could not fail to produce the moſt fatal conſequences to his colonies immediately, and in the end to all the dominions of his crown. He aſſured them, that the relief the laſt plentiful harveſt had afforded the poor, gave him the greateſt ſatisfaction, and exhorted them to conſider of ſuch meaſures as would prevent a return of the like calamity. And laſtly, he recommended a ſpirit of harmony among themſelves, as a conduct that would be attended with the moſt ſalutary conſequences both abroad and at home.

The only material thing the parliament did previous to their breaking up for the holidays was, to bring in a bill to prevent the exportation of corn for a limited time, which, after long debates in both houſes, paſſed into an act, to the great ſatisfaction of the poor in general.

A. D. 1769. The parliament having again aſſembled on the 19th of January, the firſt thing they took into conſideration was, the ſtate of public affairs in America. A petition was preſented, ſigned by Mr. Danforth, preſident of the council at Boſton, praying that the revenue acts might be repealed. The petition was penned in the moſt modeſt manner, with a promiſe, that if theſe acts were repealed, the people would make an ample compenſation, by taxing themſelves. Great debates aroſe in both houſes concerning the petition, thoſe of the antiminiſterial party making uſe of the ſame arguments which had been urged in the debate concerning the ſtamp-act.

The lords agreed to addreſs his majeſty on the American affairs; and their reſolution being adhered to by the commons, became the joint act of both. By theſe reſolutions it was declared, that all the acts made in the different colonies, which tended towards throwing off the ſovereignty of the Britiſh parliament, were illegal, unconſtitutional, and derogatory to the crown and dignity of his majeſty. It was farther reſolved, that the town of Boſton was in a ſtate of the utmoſt diſorder and confuſion, diſturbed by riots and tumults of a dangerous nature, in which the officers of the revenue had been obſtructed in the diſcharge of their duty, and their lives endangered: that neither the council of the province, nor the ordinary magiſtrates, had exerted their authority for ſuppreſſing theſe riots and tumults; and that the execution of the laws would be rendered abortive, without the aſſiſtance of a military force to ſupport the civil power, and protect the officers of the cuſtoms: that the reſolutions of the town meetings in Boſton were unconſtitutional, and calculated to excite ſedition and inſurrection againſt the government. It was alſo agreed to by both houſes, that all thoſe who had written circular letters to the other colonies, were guilty of a high indignity to the crown, and that they had committed a daring inſult on the legiſlative power of Great Britain. In the end, his majeſty was deſired to iſſue a ſpecial commiſſion, to enquire into the cauſes of theſe orders, according to the ſtatute 30th of Henry VIII. The debates on this occaſion, with reſpect to his majeſty granting writs of habeas corpus, to bring over the perſons concerned in the riots, to be tried in England by virtue of ſpecial commiſſions, was ſtrongly and learnedly oppoſed in both houſes. It was ſaid by thoſe who oppoſed the bill, that the laws already made for the preſervation of the Britiſh rights over the colonies, were ſo complete, that there was no reaſon for an amendment; that the miniſtry, having loſt all credit with the people, wanted to make the cauſe of the Americans their own, by eſtabliſhing their authority on the ruin of the colonies: that, with reſpect to bringing priſoners over from America, to be tried here for crimes ſuppoſed to have been committed there, was contrary to the ſpirit of the Engliſh conſtitution. A man charged with a crime in England is uſually tried in the county where it is ſaid to have been committed; for this reaſon, that thoſe who carry on the proſecution may have it in their power to produce proper evidence, and that the accuſed perſon may likewiſe be able to vindicate himſelf, if innocent. But if an American was brought over here to be tried, it would be next to impoſſible for him to produce one ſingle witneſs, although he might be entirely innocent. If an American has committed any breach of the laws, let him be tried there, where juſtice can be done to both parties. It was farther urged, and repreſented as a ſtrange meaſure on this occaſion, to drag out of obſcurity an obſolete law, which was a diſhonour to the ſtatute-books: that it was made during the reign of a tyrant, to ſerve the moſt arbitrary purpoſes, becauſe our conſtitution of government had not then arrived at a ſtate of perfection: that when the above act was made, we had not one colony in America, for it had then only been recently diſcovered; and that it would be much to the honour of the legiſlative power, to expunge from the records all ſuch iniquitous ſtatutes as that already mentioned: that it was the duty of all thoſe in power to promote the intereſts of the people, both at home and abroad; but if the above meaſure was carried into execution, it would increaſe the ſeditions complained of in the colonies, and, conſequently, injure the trade of the mother country. They concluded by calling upon the miniſtry to produce the perſon who had adviſed his majeſty to put the above act in force.

Such were the arguments made uſe of by thoſe who oppoſed adminiſtration, and certainly they were very rational, and conſiſtent with the ſpirit of our moſt excellent conſtitution. The miniſtry were ſo ſenſible of the error they had committed, that they became weak and languid in their anſwers. They referred back to the repeal of the ſtamp-act, and imputed all the troubles which had happened in America to the ill-judged lenity ſhewn on that occaſion: that nothing but the vigorous uſe of coercive authority could ever reduce them to obedience, and convince them of the neceſſity of their dependence on the mother country: that unleſs this meaſure was adopted, the moſt flagrant acts of treaſon and rebellion, with all other public crimes, might be committed with impunity: that ſuch crimes had been already committed, and being attended with ſeveral circumſtances of an aggravating nature, the perpetrators were not objects of compaſſion: that, with reſpect to there being no colonies in America when the act of Henry VIII. was made, it did not in the leaſt apply to the argument in hand, for the act was made for the trial of all his majeſty's ſubjects who ſhould happen to commit crimes in any part of the world. For example; ſuppoſing a ſhip being at anchor near an iſland not belonging to Britain, and two perſons going on ſhore, fight, and one of them is killed; then, by the above act, a ſpecial commiſſion is granted by the king for the trial of the offender, in whatever country he pleaſes. And, in proof of this doctrine, they mentioned an inſtance of a man of war lying at anchor in the Baltic in 1720; and a quarrel happening between the lieutenant and the ſurgeon, they went on ſhore, fought, and the former was killed. Upon the ſhip's arrival in England, a ſpecial commiſſion was granted for the trial of the ſurgeon, who being found guilty, was executed at Tyburn. They concluded by taking notice, that the revival of the act was not to promote puniſhment, but to preſerve peace; and that the coloniſts, ſeeing the vigorous meaſures which the government intended to purſue, might be brought back to a ſenſe of their duty. Such were the hopes of adminiſtration at that time; but experience, as will appear in the ſequel, has convinced us, that they were wrong in their conjectures.

While the parliament were debating on the affairs of America, Mr. Wilkes publiſhed a letter, written by lord Barrington, ſecretary at war, to the juſtices of the county of Surry, to which he prefixed an introduction that gave great offence to the houſe of lords, who voted it "an inſolent, ſcandalous, and "ſeditious libel, tending to inflame and ſtir up the "minds of his majeſty's ſubjects to ſedition, and to a "total ſubverſion of all good order and legal government." The lords then complained to the commons, who confirmed the vote of the peers, expelled Mr. Wilkes their houſe, and ordered a new writ to be iſſued for the county of Middleſex: Mr. Wilkes was, however, unanimouſly re-choſen, and again expelled by the commons, who at the ſame time declared him incapable of being a member of that houſe.

On the 13th of April a new election for the county of Middleſex came on at Brentford. The candidates were, Mr. Wilkes, Mr. Luttrell, Mr. ſerjeant Whitaker, and Mr. Roach, when Mr. Wilkes had a majority of 847 votes: notwithſtanding which he was rejected by the houſe of commons, and Mr. Luttrell declared duly elected. No public meaſure, ſince the acceſſion of the preſent royal family, had excited ſo general an alarm, or cauſed ſo univerſal a diſcontent as the preſent, nor was ever oppoſed with more firmneſs, or debated with greater ability. At the ſame time a great number of maſterly writings were publiſhed, ſo that the affair was thoroughly diſcuſſed both within doors and without.

On the 9th of May his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he told them, that every part of their conduct gave him the greateſt ſatisfaction. He applauded them in the warmeſt manner for having attended with ſo much care to the intereſts of the people, and the ſuppreſſion of riots and tumults, which had been ſo frequent, not only in London, but in many parts of the country. He added, that he had done all he could to bring about a negotiation between the Turks and Ruſſians, to no purpoſe; but he hoped the calamities of war would not extend to any other parts of Europe. He thanked the commons for having ſo generouſly contributed towards ſupporting the dignity of government; and promiſed, that, in the whole of his conduct, he would attend to the moſt regular œconomy. Finally, he concluded, by recommending to them to promote peace among their neighbours, ſo that public juſtice might not be obſtructed, and a proper regard might be paid to the laws.

On the 24th of May the freeholders of Middleſex, who thought themſelves particularly injured by the deciſion of the houſe of commons againſt Mr. Wilkes, in favour of Mr. Luttrell, preſented a petition to the king; the ſubſtance of which was as follows:

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"We your majeſty's dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the freeholders of the county of Middleſex, beg leave, with all affectionate ſubmiſſion and humility, to throw ourſelves at your royal feet, and humbly to implore your paternal attention to thoſe grievances of which this county and the whole nation complain, and thoſe fearful apprehenſions with which the whole Britiſh empire is moſt juſtly alarmed.

"With great grief and ſorrow we have long beheld the endeavours of certain evil-minded perſons, who attempt to infuſe into your royal mind notions and opinions of the moſt dangerous and pernicious tendency, and who promote and council ſuch meaſures as cannot fail to deſtroy that harmony and confidence, which ſhould ever ſubſiſt between a juſt and virtuous prince, and a free and loyal people.

"For this diſaffected purpoſe, they have introduced into every part of the adminiſtration of our happy legal conſtitution, a certain unlimited and indefinite diſcretionary power; to prevent which is the ſole aim of all our laws, and was the ſole cauſe of all thoſe diſturbances and revolutions which formerly diſtracted this unhappy country; for our own anceſtors, by their own fatal experience, well knew, that in a ſtate where diſcretion begins, law, liberty and ſafety end. Under the pretence of this diſcretion, or, as it was formerly, and has been lately called, law of ſtate, we have ſeen, &c.

Then follow a long catalogue of grievances relative to infringements on the conſtitution, from the firſt proſecution of Mr. Wilkes, to his being expelled the houſe of commons as member for Middleſex: after which the petition concludes thus:

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"Such are the grievances and apprehenſions which have long diſcontented and diſturbed the greateſt and beſt part of your majeſty's loyal ſubjects. Unwilling, however, to interrupt your royal repoſe, though ready to lay down our lives and fortunes for your majeſty's ſervice, and for the conſtitution, as by law eſtabliſhed, we have waited patiently, expecting a conſtitutional remedy by the means of our own repreſentatives: but our legal and free choice having been repeatedly rejected, and the right of election now finally taken from us by the unprecedented ſeating of a candidate who was never choſen by the county, and who, even to become a candidate, was obliged fraudulently to vacate his ſeat in parliament, under the pretence of an inſignificant place, invited thereto by the prior declaration of a miniſter, that whoever oppoſed our choice, though but with four votes, ſhould be declared member for the county. We ſee ourſelves, by this laſt act, deprived even of the franchiſes of Engliſhmen, reduced to the moſt abject ſtate of ſlavery, and left without hopes or means of redreſs but from your majeſty or God.

"Deign then, moſt gracious ſovereign, to liſten to the prayer of the moſt faithful of your majeſty's ſubjects; and to baniſh from your royal favour, truſt, and confidence, for ever, thoſe evil and pernicious counſellors, who have endeavoured to alienate the affection of your majeſty's moſt ſincere and dutiful ſubjects, and whoſe ſuggeſtions tend to deprive your people of their deareſt and moſt eſſential rights, and who have traiterouſly dared to depart from the ſpirit and letter of thoſe laws which have ſecured the crown of theſe realms to the houſe of Brunſwic, in which we make our moſt earneſt prayers to God, that it may continue untarniſhed to the lateſt poſterity."

The city of London, and moſt of the counties in England followed the example of Middleſex, and preſented petitions and remonſtrances to the throne; but the only anſwer they all received was, that his majeſty would not do any thing without the conſent of his parliament.

This year the pope died at Rome in a very advanced age, and was ſucceeded by cardinal Ganganelli, who aſſumed the name of Clement XIV. He had been brought up, from his moſt early youth, for the church; and was an enemy to all combinations among princes, which tend to prolong civil diſturbances. He endeared himſelf to the people of Rome, by iſſuing orders for lowering the prices of proviſions; and he ſuppreſſed the cuſtom, ſo long in uſe with his predeceſſors, to oblige all foreign ambaſſadors to kiſs their toe.

A. D. 1770. The parliament met on the 9th of January, and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty with a ſpeech from the throne; in which not the leaſt notice was taken of the petitions and remonſtrances from the different counties relative to the Middleſex election. The chief things principally pointed out were, the diſtracted ſtate of America, and the diſtemper which had broke out among the horned cattle. The former was, in the ſtrongeſt terms, recommended to their ſerious attention, as a thing of the utmoſt importance to the dignity of government. The other was mentioned as a moſt dreadful calamity to the nation in general; and it was recommended to everyone to exert themſelves in endeavouring to put a ſtop to the infection, before it ſhould ſpread any farther.

This ſpeech was ſeverely handled by the public in general, who thought that nothing ſhould have been ſo much touched on as the petitions and remonſtrances. Ridicule was circulated with great freedom, eſpecially as the exiſtence of the diſtemper among the horned cattle was not believed to be of ſo univerſal a nature as had been inſinuated and repreſented.

Before any buſineſs of importance was undertaken, ſome very remarkable changes took place in the miniſtry. The ſeals were taken from Lord Camden, and the honourable Charles York was created chancellor in his room, but he died within three days afterwards; and then the chancery was put into commiſſion, the ſeals being delivered to baron Smythe, and the juſtices Bathurſt and Aſton. The marquis of Granby reſigned all his places, except the royal regiment of blues, and was ſucceeded as maſter of the ordnance by general Conway. The duke of Beaufort reſigned the place of maſter of the horſe to the queen; the earl of Huntingdon his place of groom of the ſtole; and the duke of Mancheſter, with the earl of Coventry, their places of lords of the bedchamber. Sir John Cuſt, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, reſigned at the ſame time, owing to his infirm ſtate of health; and Sir Fletcher Norton, a gentleman who had made a very diſtinguiſhed figure at the bar, was choſen in his ſtead. The duke of Grafton alſo reſigned the place of firſt lord of the treaſury, and was ſucceeded by lord North, who had been ſome time chancellor of the exchequer.

The firſt thing that came before the commons was an enquiry into the validity of the Middleſex election; but after warm debates it was held, by a conſiderable majority, that no court of law was to meddle with any of their rules and orders. This meaſure aſtoniſhed the whole nation, and many perſons began to look upon the houſe of commons as a ſtanding council for the crown. Nor was this important ſubject agitated with leſs heat in the houſe of lords. The earl of Chatham with lord Camden, and many other peers, oppoſed it with great ſtrength of argument, and produced proofs from many of our law books, and parliamentary journals, that no ſuch ſtep had ever been taken, not even in the moſt deſpotic reigns. But notwithſtanding the force of theſe arguments, miniſterial intereſt prevailed, and the proceedings of the houſe of commons, in the affair of the Middleſex election, were all juſt and equitable.

A motion was made to bring in a bill to diſqualify certain officers of the revenues from voting for members of parliament. It was ſaid by thoſe who ſupported the motion, that at the revolution the produce of the cuſtoms and exciſe were both extremely ſmall, nor was there at that time any probability that they would ever amount to the enormous ſum of ſix millions ſterling, as they then actually did. To this they attributed the inattention of the patriots of that age, who, if they had foreſeen the unconſtitutional weight that muſt have been thrown into the ſcale on the ſide of the crown, by the appointment of officers to collect ſo vaſt a revenue, they would undoubtedly have taken proper and effectual meaſures to prevent the dangerous influence which it muſt afford, in the election of repreſentatives for the people.

On the other ſide it was urged, that the bill was altogether unneceſſary, and in its own nature extremely cruel. That it was no leſs than the disfranchiſing a great number of men who had long enjoyed that privilege; and as the motion then ſtood, it might extend to all the officers under the crown. It was added, that no evidence had been ſo much as ſuggeſted of an undue influence uſed by the crown, and therefore the motion was rejected by a very great majority.

The popular party, having loſt this motion, deſired that all the papers, containing a liſt of the expences of government, ſhould be laid before them. It was ſaid in ſupport of the motion, that the civil-liſt revenue, if miſapplied, inſtead of maintaining the dignity of the crown, ſerved only to beſiege it with paraſites; and in the place of promoting arts and induſtry, to ſubvert the liberties of the people. That though the funds allotted for this purpoſe were fully adequate, not only to every neceſſary, but to every liberal expence, that was proper to ſupport the dignity of the regal character; yet neither the greatneſs of the fund, nor the confeſſed œconomy of the times, were ſufficient to prevent an enormous debt from being contracted, and the people from being applied to for more money, at a time when men in the kingdom were of opinion that too much had been granted already.

That neceſſary expences had been much more conſiderable in the latter reign than the preſent, becauſe the branches of the royal family were then grown up, and conſequently demanded larger allowances. The journies to the continent, however expedient, were frequent, and at all times expenſive; and none would pretend to ſay, that magnificence was not as well underſtood, and perhaps better ſupported, than at preſent; yet his late majeſty not only lived within the bounds of the civil-liſt, but a ſum of 175,000l. wholly ſaved from that revenue.

That it was neither intended nor wiſhed, to limit the crown to a ſalary inadequate to its real dignity and greatneſs; for if it ſhould appear that the money had been ſpent in promoting uſeful purpoſes, thoſe who made the motion will be the firſt to give their approbation. But if on the contrary, it ſhould appear that the money had been ſquandered away among time-ſerving wretches, who ſought to ruin their country, then thoſe who adviſed ſuch meaſures ſhould be called to a ſevere account.

To this it was anſwered by thoſe who ſtood up for the miniſtry, that if an application had been now made for an additional ſum to make good any deficiency in the civil-liſt eſtabliſhment, an enquiry into the cauſes of it would be natural and juſtifiable; and it would be but reaſonable, that the miniſtry, in ſuch a circumſtance, ſhould give the utmoſt ſatisfaction to the people; nay, that it was even their duty to do ſo, and ſhew the reaſons why the proviſion already made was not ſufficient; but till ſuch a requiſition was made, it would be improper and very diſreſpectful to the crown, to ſcrutinize into the manner in which the money for the ſupport of the royal family had been expended. It was urged farther, that a certain ſum of money was allowed annually for the ſupport of the civil-liſt, and while the expences do not exceed that ſum, there can be no reaſon for making any enquiry. They concluded by taking notice, that as the civil liſt was the property of the crown, his majeſty had a right to diſpoſe of it in whatever manner he pleaſed. At laſt, the motion being put, it was rejected by a great majority.

This affair being ended, the next thing was, to take into conſideration the ſtate of the colonies in America. A petition had been preſented by the merchants trading to North America, ſetting forth the great hardſhips they laboured under in conſequence of an act, by which a duty had been laid on ſome trifling articles exported from Great Britain; and this had ſo much enraged the people, that they refuſed to purchaſe the goods, after they had been ſent there at a conſiderable expence. This affair being of a very ſerious nature, the houſe took it into conſideration, and repealed every part of it, except what related to tea, which was ſtill continued. The debates concerning this bill were managed by great force of argument on both ſides, for the popular party ſought a repeal of the whole, while the miniſtry inſiſted, that the Americans, inſtead of deſerving any ſuch indulgence, ought to have had more ſevere laws binding upon them.

While the greateſt part of the nation was agitated by reflecting on the conſequences that would reſult from theſe meaſures; while individuals were ſeeking to promote their private intereſts, and the government to eſtabliſh its authority, a bill was brought into the houſe of commons by one of the leading men in the oppoſition, for regulating the proceedings on controverted elections; a bill equally juſt and popular, and in which all the ſubjects of Great Britain were more or leſs concerned. It will be proper to make the reader acquainted with the nature of this bill, that he may be the better able to judge of its utility, and how far ſuch a law was, in a manner, abſolutely neceſſary.

It had been the cuſtom formerly, in all conteſted elections, to refer the matter to a ſelect committee of the moſt learned and upright members in the houſe; and, in general, their opinion was ſeldom called in queſtion; but in time the committees had been enlarged, and all who came in having votes, a ſhameful partiality prevailed, which in the end induced thoſe, who thought themſelves injured, to apply for remedy at the bar of the houſe.

This method, however, was found to be very defective, and attended with many inconveniences, owing principally to the vaſt number of thoſe who were to try the cauſe in diſpute; and who, beſides being biaſſed by the ties of private friendſhip, were not bound by any oath to prevent ſuch influence from operating on their minds.

At the ſame time, the method of trying theſe cauſes at the bar became an obſtacle to many branches of public buſineſs, eſpecially in the laſt ſeſſions of a new parliament, when there was ſcarce time to attend to any thing elſe. It was at the ſame time very diſagreeable to the members themſelves, who were continually teazed with applications in favour of both candidates, that they would give their attendance, and although it was not ſaid that they were to vote contrary to truth and equity, yet their attendance was conſidered as equivalent to their approbation. To all this it may be added, that as the miniſtry have always a majority on their ſide to ſupport them in all their meaſures, ſo if they chuſe to ſtand up in defence of any one of the candidates, they can, by promiſes and threatenings, get a ſufficient number to vote him the ſitting member.

To remedy theſe defects this bill was brought in, and the plan of it was conſiſtent with the firſt principles of the conſtitution. When a petition was to be preſented, a day was to be fixed for hearing both parties, who were to attend with their witneſſes and council; and if one hundred members were not preſent, then they were to wait till ſuch time as ſo many were preſent; when the names of the whole, although they ſhould exceed that number, were to be put into ſix boxes or glaſſes, to be drawn alternately and read by the ſpeaker, till forty-nine are choſen; the ſitting member and the petitioner being allowed to chuſe one each. Liſts were then to be given to the ſitting member, the petitioner, councils, witneſſes, &c. who, with the clerk, were to withdraw, and ſtrike off one alternately till the number ſhould be reduced to thirteen; who, with the two named by the parties, were to make a committee to determine the affair in diſpute. Such was the nature of this new bill, and it muſt be acknowledged that nothing could be more juſt or equitable for the freedom of elections, and every meaſure uſed to prevent corruption and bribery muſt at all times be the life of the British conſtitution.

While the houſe of commons were engaged on this grand ſubject, the city of London met in their common-hall, and agreed upon another petition, addreſs and remonſtrance, for redreſs of grievances in the affair of the Middleſex election. In this addreſs it was expreſsly declared, that the houſe of commons had acted in the moſt unconſtitutional manner, and therefore they prayed that they might be diſſolved; that they might be left at liberty to make a free choice. In anſwer to this, his majeſty told them, that he had never done any thing but by the advice and conſent of his parliament, and therefore he could not comply with their requeſt.

Violent diſputes aroſe in parliament on this affair, and many opprobrious expreſſions were made uſe of on both ſides. It was ſaid that the citizens of London were the ſupport of the government on every occaſion; that it had been the cuſtom, time immemorial, to conſult them on the moſt important matters; to which the miniſtry anſwered, that no affront had been offered to the citizens of London, nor any thing denied them, except ſuch as was in its own nature improper to be granted.

Towards the cloſe of this ſeſſion of parliament ſeveral propoſals were made in the houſe of lords relative to the ſtate of affairs in America, which were chiefly ſupported by the duke of Richmond. Theſe were introduced by ſome ſevere ſtrictures on the conduct of adminiſtration. He ſaid, that the ſtate of America had been recommended from the throne in a ſpeech at the opening of the ſeſſion, and yet the ſeſſion was near ſpent without any thing being done, though the buſineſs was of the utmoſt importance. The miniſtry were now ſenſible that they had been too raſh in recommending the care of America before any ſettled plan had been laid down; and therefore, perplexed to the utmoſt, they ſaw no other method left, but that of adjourning the debate till a future day, well knowing that the parliament would be prorogued.

On the 19th of May his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he applauded both houſes for the zeal they had ſhewn in ſupporting the intereſt and honour of the nation. He aſſured them, that he ſhould, on all occaſions, ſeek the happineſs of his people; and that it ſhould be the ſole object of his care, to watch over their intereſts. He concluded, by recommending to them the preſervation of public peace, and the diſcountenancing of tumultuous meetings of the people, which, if encouraged, muſt end in general confuſion.

Soon after the riſing of the parliament, advices were received from America of a violent tumult that had happened at Boſton, occaſioned by a quarrel between the ſoldiers and the journeymen and apprentices belonging to the rope-makers, in which the former unfortunately fired among the latter, whereby ſome were killed, and others wounded. Different accounts of this tranſaction were ſent to England, but one from captain Preſton, who happened that day to be captain of the guard, ſeems to be the moſt authentic.

He obſerved, that it was matter of too great notoriety to need proofs, that the arrival of his majeſty's troops in Boſton was extremely obnoxious to its inhabitants. That the people ever uſed all means in their power to weaken the regiments, and to bring them into contempt, by promoting deſertions, and by groſly and falſly propagating untruths concerning them. That on the arrival of the 64th and 65th regiments, their ardour ſeemingly began to abate; but that the ſame ſpirit revived immediately on its being known that thoſe regiments were ordered for Halifax. That after their embarkation, one of their juſtices, from the ſeat of juſtice, declared, "That the ſoldiers muſt now take care of themſelves, nor truſt too much to their arms, for they were but an handful." That this alarming declaration was ſucceeded by ſeveral diſputes between the towns-people and ſoldiers of both regiments; and that on the 2d of March two ſoldiers of the 29th going through a rope-walk, belonging to one Gray, the rope-maker inſultingly aſked them, if they would empty a vault. That this had, unfortunately, the deſired effect, by provoking the ſoldiers, blows enſued, and both parties ſuffered greatly in the fray. That the hatred of the inhabitants towards the troops had now arrived to ſuch an height, that the 5th and 6th of March were privately agreed on for a general engagement; in conſequence of which, ſeveral of the militia came from the country, armed, to join their friends, threatening to deſtroy any who ſhould oppoſe them. That on the 5th, about 8 o'clock at night, two ſoldiers were attacked and beat. That about nine, ſome of the guard informed him (captain Preſton) that the inhabitants were aſſembling to attack the troops, that the bells were ringing as a ſignal, and not for fire, and that they intended to fire the beacon in order to bring in the diſtant people of the country. That, upon this intelligence, being captain of the day, he immediately repaired to the main guard, and in his way ſaw the people in great commotion. That, ſoon after, about an hundred paſſed him, and went towards the cuſtom houſe, where the king's money was lodged, ſurrounded the centinel poſted there, and with clubs and other weapons threatened to execute their vengeance on him. That he (captain Preſton) fearing their plundering the king's cheſt, ſent a non-commiſſioned officer and twelve men to protect both the centinel and the king's money, and followed himſelf to prevent diſorder. That the ſoldiers ruſhed through the people, and by charging their bayonets in a half circle, kept them at a diſtance. That the mob then increaſed greatly, and were very outrageous, ſtriking bludgeons againſt each other, and calling out, "Come out you raſcals, you bloody "backs, you lobſter ſcoundrels; fire if you dare; "fire and be damned; we know you dare not;" with much more ſuch opprobrious language. That they then advanced to the points of the bayonets, ſtruck ſome of them, and even the muzzles of the pieces, and ſeemed to be endeavouring to cloſe with the ſoldiers. That ſome well behaved perſons then aſked him (captain Preſton) if he intended to fire? That he anſwered, no; but while he was ſpeaking, a ſoldier, having received a ſevere blow with a ſtick, inſtantly fired. That he immediately reprimanded him, and while he was thus engaged received a moſt violent blow on his own arm. That a general attack was then made on the men by heavy clubs and ſnow balls; and ſome perſons from behind cried out, "Damn your "bloods, why don't you fire?" That inſtantly three or four of the ſoldiers fired, one after another, and directly after, three more in the ſame confuſion and hurry. That the mob then ran away, except three unhappy men who inſtantly expired, in which number was Mr. Gray, at whoſe rope walk the prior quarrel took place. That one more was ſince dead: three were dangerouſly, and four ſlightly wounded. That on his (captain Preſton's) aſking the ſoldiers why they fired without orders? they ſaid, they heard the word "Fire," and ſuppoſed it came from me.

Captain Preſton concludes his account in the following words: "On the examination before the juſtices "they have ſworn that I uſed the word Fire, and ſo "bitter and inveterate are the malcontents againſt the "officers and troops, that I am, though perfectly in"nocent, under moſt unhappy circumſtances, having "nothing in reaſon to expect but the loſs of life in a "very ignominious manner, without the interpoſition "of his majeſty's goodneſs."

This gentleman was, ſome time after, tried at Boſton, and honourably acquitted.

The attention of the people was now principally engaged in an affair of a very ſingular and ſuſpicious nature. About 4 o'clock in the morning of the 27th of July a moſt dreadful fire was diſcovered to have broke out in the great dock-yard at Portſmouth. It burnt with the moſt rapid fury, and communicating itſelf with the hemp-houſe and other offices, conſumed every thing before it. Whether this was an accident, or the work of ſome vile wretch and incendiary, has not yet been diſcovered, and perhaps never will. Some impoſtors, indeed, pretended to have been concerned in it, particularly one Dudley, who, ſince that time, has been tranſported for perjury, and the other, whoſe name was Britain, has been ſince executed for forgery. The moſt remarkable circumſtance attending this fatal affair was, the fire was diſcovered in five different places at once, which gave ſtrong ſuſpicions that more than one perſon muſt have been concerned; for accidental fires generally break out in one place only. Had this accident, or whatever it was, happened during the heat of the war, it might have proved fatal to the nation in general; for the whole loſs, amounting to 149,888 l. could not have been made good without great difficulty, till ſuch time as the parliament met. But even ſuppoſing one individual could have advanced it, yet the time neceſſary for replacing the ſtores might have given the enemy an opportunity of doing us the moſt irreparable injuries.

During the courſe of this year the wretched inhabitants of Corſica felt all the ſeverity of a French deſpotic government. Many of them ſtill refuſed to ſubmit, and ſuch of them as were taken were inſtantly put to death. Some of them were tranſported to France; but this was little more than ſhifting the ſcene; for as in Corſica they beheld the ruin of their country, ſo in France they ſaw a whole nation of people ruined. But here their ſufferings did not end; for ſuch as were brought to France, after a journey of 600 miles on foot from Marſeilles to Breſt, were put on board ſeveral veſſels, and ſent as ſlaves to the Weſt-Indies.

This year a war was likely to have broke out between Great Britain and Spain, the cauſe of which, with the previous particulars, were as follow:

In the year 1592 captain Davies, who commanded an Engliſh man of war, ſailed to the South Seas, where he diſcovered ſome iſlands, ſince called Falklands; but little notice was taken of them for more than a century, till commodore Anſon, in his voyage round the world, diſcovered the importance they would be of to us, if properly cultivated. Accordingly, ſoon after the late peace, when lord Anſon was at the head of the admiralty, he mentioned the affair in council, and it was propoſed to ſend out ſome frigates to viſit them. This ſcheme, however, was not ſo well conducted, but the Spaniards got notice of it before it could be carried into execution; and ſuch remonſtrances were made by their ambaſſador at our court, that it was again laid aſide.

It was again revived, and in 1764 commodore Byron was ſent out with a ſmall ſquadron to make diſcoveries, and, if poſſible, eſtabliſh a ſettlement on the coaſt of Patagonia. During that voyage, he took poſſeſſion of Falklands iſlands in the name of his Britannic majeſty, with all the forms uſed on ſuch occaſions.

Much about this time the French, ſtimulated by their loſſes during the war, undertook an expedition of a ſimilar nature, namely, to make diſcoveries in the South Seas; and the care of it was committed to one M. de Bougainville, colonel of a regiment of foot. This gentleman entered into this adventure with all that life and ſpirit ſo peculiar to his countrymen. Having fitted out a frigate of twenty guns, with a ſloop to carry proviſions, he took on board 100 ſeamen, and about 150 people, who choſe to try their fortune in that part of the world. The French ſhips ſet ſail from St. Malo, and arrived at the Canaries, where they were kindly received by the Spaniards, who gave them every ſort of aſſiſtance. From thence they proceeded to the river Plata, and took in freſh proviſions, the Spaniards ſtill continuing to treat them with every mark of reſpect. At length, they came to Falklands Iſlands, where they formed an eſtabliſhment, and built a ſmall fort.

Theſe French adventurers had formed the moſt ſanguine hopes from the diſcovery of theſe iſlands, but they did not anſwer their expectations; for it coſt them more money to ſupport their ſettlements than the profits ariſing from it could afford; ſo that they gave it up to the Spaniards in the moſt formal manner.

Theſe iſlands are ſituated in latitude 51 ſouth, and about 100 leagues on this ſide the ſtreights of Magellan. The ſettlement, which had been given up by the French to the Spaniards, was on one of the iſlands that lay to the weſt, and was called Port Solidad; and Port Egmont, belonging to the Engliſh, was one of the iſlands to the eaſtward. It is not certainly known, that theſe ſettlers knew of each other for ſome time, and certain it is, that in commodore Byron's account of them, he mentions nothing of any ſettlement but the Engliſh one at Port Egmont. However, in the year 1769, we had a frigate and a ſloop upon that ſtation, and captain Hunt, in the Tamar frigate, being on a cruiſe, fell in with a Spaniſh ſchooner belonging to Port Solidad, and according to his orders, commanded the Spaniſh captain to depart, becauſe theſe iſlands were the property of Great Britain. In two days afterwards, the captain came on board the Tamar frigate with a letter to captain Hunt, written by the governor of Port Solidad, telling him, that if he had been driven in there by ſtreſs of weather, he was ready to give him every aſſiſtance; but if he came there in violation of the faith of the moſt ſolemn treaties, he had far better depart immediately. Captain Hunt, not in the leaſt intimidated with theſe threatenings, aſſerted the right his Britannic majeſty had to theſe iſlands, and warned him to depart from them, giving him ſix months for that purpoſe. The Spaniſh officer entered a formal proteſt againſt captain Hunt, and declared, that if he offered any inſult to the ſettlement at Port Solidad, or removed from theſe iſlands, he ſhould conſider it as a breach of the peace, and tranſmit an account thereof to Spain. Soon after this affair, two Spaniſh frigates of conſiderable force arrived at Port Egmont, under pretence that they wanted freſh water; and the commander in chief ſent notice to captain Hunt, that he was aſtoniſhed to ſee the Engliſh flag hoiſted in an iſland that belonged to his maſter the king of Spain. He charged captain Hunt with violating the peace; declaring, at the ſame time, that he would ſend an account thereof to Spain, that his maſter might aſſert his right to thoſe iſlands which had been made over to him by treaty.

Captain Hunt ſtill continued to found his poſſeſſion on the claim of right, juſtified his conduct by the orders of his ſovereign, and again warned the Spaniards to depart from theſe iſlands. The frigates continued eight days at Port Egmont, and were ſupplied by our people with water: the captain and officers behaved with civility, but they declined going on ſhore, though they were ſeveral times invited. As theſe tranſactions ſeemed to indicate an approaching rupture, captain Hunt ſet ſail for England, and arriving at Plymouth on the 3d of June, ſent an expreſs to the lords of the admiralty. The Swift and Favourite ſloops of war, each bearing 16 guns, were left to take care of the ſettlement; but the Swift having ſailed as far as the ſtreights of Magellan, was overſet, and ſuch of the crew as could get into the boat undertook a voyage of three weeks, which brought them to Port Egmont, after experiencing an innumerable variety of hardſhips. Five Spaniſh frigates arrived at Port Egmont, and captain Farmer, not doubting but they came with hoſtile intentions, reſolved to be upon his guard. He accordingly hoiſted his flag, which the Spaniſh commodore ſeeing, fired two ſhots, and being aſked what were his reaſons for ſo doing, he ſaid they were only by way of ſignals.

In the mean time captain Farmer wrote to the Spaniſh commodore, that as he had received the refreſhments he wanted, he was obliged in the name, and by the authority of his maſter, to command him to depart, and totally evacuate all thoſe iſlands known by the name of Falklands. In anſwer to this letter, the commodore put captain Farmer in mind of his great power, and how eaſy it was for him to deſtroy their defenceleſs ſettlement. He begged that he and the other Engliſh officers would not force him to any extremities, but depart quietly from the place, as the iſlands belonged to his maſter the king of Spain. Next day he wrote again, both to captain Farmer and captain Maltby, telling them, that if they would depart peaceably, they ſhould have leave to take all they had along with them from the ſettlement, and what they could not take, he ſhould give them a receipt for, that the whole affair might be ſettled by their reſpective courts. But on the other hand, if they refuſed to comply, he would, contrary to his inclinations, be obliged to obey his orders, by attacking their ſettlements both by ſea and land, and that he would ſpread deſolation every where before him; for he had, under his command, a large body of marines, beſides a train of heavy artillery.

He concluded by aſſuring them, that if they did not, in fifteen minutes after the receipt of his letter, give him a plain and favourable anſwer, he would immediately commence hoſtilities, and at the ſame time deſired them to think of the dreadful conſequences which their obſtinacy would be productive of to the ſubjects of his Britannic majeſty.

To theſe, and all his other menaces, the Engliſh captains returned for anſwer, that words are not always conſidered as acts of hoſtilities; and that they could not believe that he would, in a time of profound peace, when the greateſt harmony ſubſiſted between the two nations, put his threats in execution: that they did not doubt, but he was thoroughly convinced, that the king of Great Britain, their maſter, was capable of demanding ſatisfaction throughout every part of the globe where any inſult was offered to his flag; and therefore they were, in conſequence of their orders, obliged to defend the place to the laſt extremity. Accordingly, the Spaniſh commodore ordered the frigates to row cloſe to the ſhore, directly oppoſite the Block-houſe, where there was only a ſmall battery; and at night captain Maltby brought fifty ſeamen, belonging to the Favourite, on ſhore, with two ſix pounders, ten ſwivels, and a quantity of ſmall arms and ammunition. Next morning, part of the Spaniſh troops and artillery landed about a mile to the northward of the Block-houſe; and when they had advanced about half a mile, the reſt of the boats, with the troops and artillery, put off from one of the Spaniſh frigates, and rowed right in for the cove, being covered by the fire from the frigates, whoſe ſhot went over the Block-houſe. The Engliſh ſeamen, who were then on ſhore, fired ſome ſmall ſhot, but ſeeing the utter impoſſibility of defending the ſettlement, and the Spaniards having broke through all the limits of peace, even to the actual commencement of hoſtilities, ſo that their conduct could neither be denied nor explained away, our officers, as they had judiciouſly led them to this open avowal of their conduct, and had, at the ſame time, ſupported the honour of their own country, as far as the means in their power would admit of, with the ſame propriety, preferred ſaving the valuable lives of their people; and leaving the injury to be redreſſed by thoſe in power, they thought it moſt prudent to hang out a flag of truce, in order to know what terms of capitulation the Spaniſh commodore would grant.

All the conditions which he would grant were, that the Engliſh ſhould immediately, or as ſhort as poſſible, ſo that it did not exceed 40 days, remove from the ſettlement, and what ſtores they left behind them ſhould be produced as ſoon as orders for that purpoſe arrived from Spain. This was one of the greateſt inſults, perhaps, that had ever been offered to the Britiſh flag; but the Engliſh, who had not ſtrength ſufficient to defend themſelves, were obliged to comply, and in September arrived at Portſmouth.

The navy of Great Britain was then in a very indifferent ſtate, and political debates ran ſo high, that people in general were diſſatisfied with the conduct of the miniſtry. Preſs warrants had been iſſued for raiſing ſeamen, but the legality of them was, in ſeveral places, called in queſtion. In the city of London, Mr. Croſby, the lord-mayor, refuſed to back the preſs warrants; Mr. alderman Wilkes diſcharged a man who had been impreſſed; and although the opinion of council was taken on this important ſubject, yet, among the more ſenſible and judicious, the practice itſelf was looked upon as inconſiſtent with the nature of the Britiſh conſtitution.

In the mean time, ſuch as were averſe to a war, or dreaded the conſequences of it, looked back with reſentment to the laſt peace, and to thoſe who had adviſed the making of it. All the arguments made uſe of in defence of it were treated with the utmoſt contempt, and the whole was conſidered as a meaſure which, in its conſequences, muſt for ever diſhonour the Britiſh nation. Indeed, many ſober perſons, whoſe minds were free from paſſion or prejudice, and who, judging of the diſputes between the rival nations only by the ſame equitable and diſintereſted principles which ſhould at all times take place between private perſons, had not, at that time, in general, diſapproved of the conditions of peace, could not now refrain from the utmoſt indignation, at beholding the flagrant inſult we had received from an enemy we had ſo lately in our power to chaſtiſe, and from thinking that thoſe who ſaid, that the fruits of one of the moſt glorious and ſucceſsful wars mentioned in hiſtory, had been bartered away for an inglorious and inſecure peace, had but too much reaſon on their ſide; and therefore there was no wonder that the people ſhould find fault with the meaſures of adminiſtration.

In this ſtate of anxiety, doubt, and expectation, all people longed, in the moſt eager manner, for the meeting of parliament. No change had taken place in adminiſtration during the receſs; and as lord North had ſucceſsfully weathered all the ſtorms of the winter, ſupported by a prodigious majority in both houſes, he ſeemed now to be as ſecurely fixed in his ſeat at the head of the treaſury, as the precarious circumſtances of the times would admit of. The ſtate of the different parties in oppoſition had not hitherto ſuffered any material change. The death of Mr. Grenville, which happened in the beginning of November, having left that party to which he belonged without a leader, ſome of the moſt ſanguine in oppoſition went over to the court. The party that adhered to the marquis of Rockingham, and who were called the Whig party, ſtill adhered to their formal principles: and ſuch as were attached to the earl of Chatham, earl Temple, and the earl of Shelburne, conſiſting of a mixture of whigs and tories, generally coincided with the Rockingham party.

The parliament met on the 13th of November, and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he told them, that the Spaniſh governor of Buenos Ayres had acted in ſuch a manner as was inconſiſtent with the honour of Great Britain, and demanded the utmoſt ſatisfaction: that, under theſe circumſtances, an immediate demand had been made for proper ſatisfaction, in conſequence of the injury received: that the neceſſary preparations had been made, without loſs of time, in order to be enabled to obtain juſtice, in caſe the requiſition to the court of Spain ſhould fail in procuring it. An aſſurance was given that theſe preparations ſhould not be diſcontinued, until proper reparation had been made; and that ſufficient proofs ſhould be given, that all other powers on the continent diſapproved of ſuch proceedings. He ſaid he had called them together ſo early, that they might be ready to aſſiſt him with the beſt of their advice, and provide for the honour and ſecurity of the nation. With reſpect to the colonies in America, it was obſerved, that many of the factious people had deſiſted from thoſe combinations into which they had inadvertently entered, and which had been attended with many fatal conſequences to their peaceable fellow ſubjects: that the people of Boſton, and, in general, the inhabitants of the province of Maſſachuſet's Bay, could not yet be brought into a proper ſtate of obedience, but continued in carrying on the ſame violent and unwarrantable practices as before. He added, that the eſtimates for the preſent year would naturally exceed the former; and that it would be neither conſulting the inclinations nor the intereſts of his people, if they ſhould decline any expence that ſhould ſeem neceſſary towards promoting the national honour: that as to foreign meaſures, no doubt was held, that there could be any other conteſt, than who ſhould appear moſt forward in ſupport of the common cauſe, in upholding the reputation, and promoting the proſperity of the kingdom. He concluded by telling them, that the crown had no intereſt ſeparate from that of the people; that they were all members of the ſame body, and, conſiſtent with the order of nature and the laws of ſociety, they muſt ſtand or fall together.

The addreſſes were the moſt ſpirited that had been preſented for ſome years; and the moſt unreſerved aſſurances were given, that every degree of requiſite ſupport ſhould be chearfully granted. The moſt unreſerved confidence was placed in his majeſty, that he would never be induced, by a miſtaken tenderneſs for the preſent eaſe of the people, to ſacrifice their more eſſential and laſting intereſts. The commons concluded by a declaration, that if any hopes had been conceived, or it ſhould have been any where ſurmiſed that there were any ſuch differences ſubſiſting among the people, as could, in the leaſt degree, abate the ardour of their affectionate attachment to his majeſty, or prevent their joining, as one man, in maintaining unſullied the luſtre of the crown, and preſerving undiminiſhed the rights of the people, they would, by their proceedings, convince the world how falſe and ſcandalous all ſuch ſurmiſes were; and make it manifeſt that, whenever they were called upon in the cauſe of their king and country, there would be but one heart and one voice among them.

Notwithſtanding theſe addreſſes were carried by a great majority, there aroſe conſiderable debates upon them. It was ſaid by thoſe in oppoſition, that as one inſult is always the forerunner of others, ſo the preſent outrage offered by Spain was a natural conſequence of our paſſive and ſhameful conduct with regard to Corſica: that the ſpeech was an oſtentatious diſplay of miniſterial conduct, and the addreſs an approbation of it: that before ſuch a public approbation was given, it was neceſſary to know what that conduct had been, which merited ſuch applauſes: that it was neceſſary to know what the Spaniards had done, and what previous information our miniſtry had received of their deſigns: that by our conduct for twelve months paſt, it ſeemed as if we had not an enemy in the world; and yet, by the ſpeech, it was evident that a war was apprehended: the bad ſtate of our navy, and the defenceleſs manner in which the valuable iſland of Jamaica was left, were much inſiſted on, and with great force of argument: that, independent of any private intelligence, the accounts publicly avowed to have been received on the third of June, that the Spaniards had warned our people to depart from their ſettlement on Falklands Iſlands, was, in itſelf, a ſufficient indication of their ill deſigns, and of what was naturally to follow; but between that and the 22d of September, when our people brought the account of the inſult on our flag, what had been done to put us in a ſtate of ſecurity at home, or enable us to protect our dominions abroad? Were the regiments completed, or was the navy manned and put in a proper condition? None of all theſe things were done, and yet we are to return thanks to the miniſtry, not for any thing, but only becauſe they have not done ſomething worſe than we are yet acquainted with.

It was farther inſiſted, that while the rights of the people were violated at home, it was abſurd to expect ſuch unanimity among them as was neceſſary to ſupport the honour of the nation againſt any foreign power. That part of the ſpeech which mentions the governor of Buenos Ayres, was moſt ſeverely cenſured, and even ridiculed, both without and within doors. It was ſaid, Why ſhould an officer, who acted only under command, be conſidered, inſtead of the king his maſter, as the principal in an injury offered to this great nation? The anſwer is evident; the ſame temporizing, mean and cowardly policy prevails, which beheld the ſeizure of Corſica, in defiance of faith and of treaties; and now hopes, under this ſubterfuge, to find ſome means of prolonging its exiſtence, though at the price of the national honour and dignity.

Upon the whole, it was aſſerted, in poſitive terms, that the conduct of our miniſtry had neither been honeſt in the deſign, nor able in the execution; they had loſt the confidence of the people, and yet imagined they would ſupport them: that they had threatened the colonies with unrelenting ſeverity, in purſuit of an unconſtitutional meaſure, and yet ſuppoſe that we ſhall ſuffer nothing from an alienation of their affection: that Ireland was ruled with a rod of iron, and yet they conſtantly declared that they were not making ſtrides towards arbitrary power. Laſtly, that, with reſpect to the deſigns of our enemies, they had been totally blind and improvident, and yet we were in danger.

In anſwer to this it was ſaid by thoſe who ſtood up in defence of the miniſtry, that all Europe, friends as well as enemies, were attentive to, and would found much of their opinion upon the iſſue of the preſent day: that the ſentiments contained in the addreſs would ſerve nearly as much as our military preparations, to intimidate Spain, by convincing them, that whatever differences in opinion, or even tranſient animoſities, might occaſionally ſubſiſt among us, yet we have but one heart and one hand againſt the common enemy: that an addreſs was a compliment to the throne, and not the approbation of a miniſter; and that if a miniſter had acted amiſs, there were other methods of enquiry and cenſure well known, and which would involve no other character; but that the preſent objections were meant as an invidious attack on the crown: that nothing could be more abſurd than the idea, that any private differences, diſcontents, or political ſquabbles among ourſelves, could operate in ſuch a manner upon the minds of the people, as to prevent their defending their own rights and intereſts, as well as the dignity of the crown, againſt any confederacy of our enemies: that no man would ſit ſtill, while his eſtate was ravaged, or his houſe burned, through his diſlike to the manner in which public affairs were conducted: that therefore, if any domeſtic quarrels ſtill exiſted, it would be time enough to adjuſt them when the common danger was removed: that the charge of alienating the colonies is ſo far from being well founded, that the reverſe is the fact; and, except a part of one inconſiderable province, they have been brought back to a ſenſe of their duty, by a ſpirit and prudence which do equal honour to adminiſtration. The charge of not arming ſooner, and of making it a crime that ſome of our Weſt-India iſlands were liable to danger, would, upon examination, it was ſaid, appear equally groundleſs: that the truth was, the nation could not have been armed ſooner; our fleets cannot be fitted out, except when our trade is at home, or juſt coming home, as ſailors are not to be had at any other time; and that it is well known, that the trade was not at home, nor near coming home, in the preſent inſtance. As the miniſtry, therefore, could not arm effectually, it was an act of the greateſt prudence not to excite a general alarm by attempting it, which would have been a ſignal to our enemies to have done the ſame, as they are not under the ſame diſadvantages, to have effected that, which we could only have attempted; whereas now we are upon an equal footing, if not before them.

As to the other charge, it is only to aſk, Whether there can be a poſſibility of undertaking to ſecure every part of the Britiſh dominions, in their whole extent, from every ſudden blow that might be given in caſe of a war; and if there is, what given number of troops would be required to anſwer ſuch an undertaking? It was ſaid, that our character for courage was too well, and too generally eſtabliſhed, to leave any room for our being concerned about it; and as war was never deſirable while peace could be preſerved with ſecurity and honour, therefore it was right to leave an opening, whereby the king of Spain might, if he choſe it, withdraw himſelf with honour, and, by diſavowing the act of his ſervant, avoid the alternative of a war, or of making diſagreeable conceſſions, and of acknowledging himſelf the author of a raſh and haſty meaſure.

The addreſs being carried and preſented, the duke of Richmond in the houſe of lords, and Mr. Dowdeſwell in that of the commons, both made motions, that all the papers which had been ſent to the miniſtry ſhould be produced, but this the miniſtry would by no means comply with. In defence of their conduct, they ſaid, that we were now engaged in a negotiation of the utmoſt importance with the kingdom of Spain, by which it was expected that matters would be brought to an accommodation; that the honour and happineſs of two great nations were now at ſtake, and that if the papers were produced, it would, in a great meaſure, contribute towards making all Europe acquainted with ſecrets which ought to be concealed till the event they related to had taken place.

That if it had been prudent on our own account to unlock the Engliſh cabinet to all Europe, yet it would have been very wrong to betray the ſecrets of the king of Spain; that they were now treating with us, and a rude publication of what was delivered in ſecrecy, muſt at once put an end to all amicable intercourſe; that the king of Spain had openly diſavowed of the conduct of his ſervant, and promiſed the moſt equitable ſatisfaction; that by acting with temper and prudence we might avoid the horrors of a long, bloody and expenſive war; that adminiſtration had not been negligent on this occaſion, for the ſame day the intelligence arrived, a meſſenger was diſpatched to our ambaſſador at Madrid to demand ſatisfaction; that diſputes had now ariſen between the two kingdoms, on account of the ignorance or inſolence of officers, while there was no intention of a quarrel between their reſpective governments; for in ſome inſtances our officers had not been always guarded in their conduct.

That therefore in the preſent inſtance, as well with regard to the honour as the intereſt of the nation, it was neceſſary to demand ſatisfaction; firſt, in a peaceable manner, for nothing was more reaſonable than to enquire whether we had a warrantable right to reſent before we commenced hoſtilities; otherwiſe it would be ſaid that we courted war. Secondly, if the Spaniards were not to be urged into juſtice by reaſon, then they muſt be compelled; and adminiſtration, though willing, if poſſible, to avoid the calamities of war, had prepared, at all events, for the worſt; ſo that the preparations for the war went hand in hand with the negotiation for peace. In behalf of the motion it was urged, that parliament can never have too ample a field for information; that the members are all counſellors of the crown; and to enable them to give proper council, it was neceſſary that every intelligence, with reſpect to what they were to give their advice upon, ſhould be laid before them; that they were now met to conſider the buſineſs of the kingdom, in a time of public danger; and that they had been told from the throne, that they would be applied to for advice, and although they were not, yet it was their duty to give it; that their advice and interference was now particularly neceſſary, when by an unparalleled ſucceſſion of weak and ſhameful meaſures, the nation was diſgraced, inſulted, and diſhonoured abroad and at home, weak, divided, and expoſed to every danger; that the pretence to negotiation was an indignity to the crown, and a diſhonour to the nation; that we had been forcibly robbed by a foreign power, and till what had been in this manner unjuſtly taken was returned, it was inconſiſtent with our honour to negotiate; that in fact, there is no ground or matter to negotiate upon; the Spaniards have driven our people from one of our ſettlements, and taken poſſeſſion of it, although they had no right to do ſo, and yet our miniſters enter into a treaty with them; that the very terms of the motions obviate all the objections that have been made to it, and which are only founded on the pretended ill conſequences that would attend the expoſing the papers, while this negotiation is going on.

Such were the principal points upon which this debate was carried on; but the queſtion being put, the motion was rejected by a great majority. Many people blamed the miniſtry for their conduct in this affair; for they thought, that as parliament alone could grant the neceſſary ſupplies, ſo they ought to have had the peruſal of all the papers relating to the controverſy; and it is an eſtabliſhed principle, that the man who acts from motives of integrity, need never be either afraid or aſhamed to have his conduct enquired into.

A. D. 1771. On the 22d of January the following declaration was delivered by prince de Maſſerano, ambaſſador extraordinary from his catholic majeſty, to our court:

“His Britannic majeſty having complained of the violence which was committed on the 10th of June 1770, at the iſland commonly called the Great Malouine, and by the Engliſh Falkland's Iſland, in obliging, by force, the commander and ſubjects of his Britannic majeſty, to evacuate the port by them called Egmont; a ſtep offenſive to the honour of his crown: the prince de Maſerano, ambaſſador extraordinary of his catholic majeſty, has received orders to declare, and declares, that his catholic majeſty, conſidering the deſire with which he is animated for peace, and for the maintenance of good harmony with his Britannic majeſty, and reflecting that this event might interrupt it, has ſeen with diſpleaſure this expedition tending to diſturb it, and in the perſuaſion in which he is, of the reciprocity of ſentiments of his Britannic majeſty, and of its being far from his intention to authoriſe any thing that might diſturb the good underſtanding between the two courts, his catholic majeſty does diſavow the ſaid violent enterprize; and in conſequence, the prince de Maſerano declares, that his catholic majeſty engages to give immediate orders, that all things ſhall be reſtored in the Great Malouine, at the port called Egmont, preciſely in the ſtate in which they were before the 10th of June 1770. For which purpoſe his catholic majeſty will give orders to one of his officers to deliver up to the officer authorized by his Britannic majeſty the Port and Fort called Egmont, with all the artillery, ſtores, and effects of his Britannic majeſty and his ſubjects, which were at that place

“ the day above mentioned, agreeable to the inventory which has been made of them.

“ The prince de Maſerano declares, at the ſame time, in the name of the king his maſter, that the engagement of his ſaid catholic majeſty, to reſtore to his Britannic majeſty the poſſeſſion of the Port and Fort called Egmont, cannot, nor ought, any wiſe, to affect the queſtion of the prior right of ſovereignty of the Malouine Iſlands, otherwiſe called Falkland's Iſlands.”

“ In witneſs whereof, &c.”

(L. S.) Signed le prince de Maſerano.

The earl of Rochfort ſignified the acceptance of this declaration in the following terms:

“ His catholic majeſty having authorized the prince de Maſerano, his ambaſſador extraordinary, to offer in his majeſty's name to the king of Great Britain, a ſatisfaction for the injury done to his Britannic majeſty, by diſpoſſeſſing him of the Port and Fort of Port Egmont; and the ſaid ambaſſador having this day ſigned a declaration, which he has juſt delivered to me, expreſſing therein that his catholic majeſty being deſirous to reſtore the good harmony and friendſhip which before ſubſiſted between the two crowns, does diſavow the expedition againſt Port Egmont, in which force has been uſed againſt his Britannic majeſty's poſſeſſions, commander, and ſubjects; and does alſo engage, that all things ſhall be immediately reſtored to the preciſe ſituation in which they ſtood before the 10th of June, 1770. And that his Catholic majeſty ſhall give orders, in conſequence, to one of his officers, to deliver up to the officer authorized by his Britannic majeſty, the Port and Fort of Port Egmont, as alſo all his Britannic majeſty's artillery, ſtores and effects, as well as thoſe of his ſubjects, according to the inventory which has been made of them. And the ſaid ambaſſador having moreover engaged, in his catholic majeſty's name, that what is contained in the ſaid declaration ſhall be carried into effect by his ſaid catholic majeſty; and that duplicates of his catholic majeſty's orders to his officers ſhall be delivered into the hands of one of his Britannic majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, within ſix weeks. His ſaid Britannic majeſty, in order to ſhew the ſame friendly diſpoſitions on his part, has authorized me to declare, that he will look upon the declaration of prince de Maſerano, together with the full performance of the ſaid engagement on the part of his catholic majeſty, as a ſatisfaction for the injury done to the crown of Great Britain. In witneſs whereof, &c.”

(L. S.) Signed Rochfort.

This tranſaction was immediately announced to both houſes of parliament, and copies thereof were laid before them. It was then moved, that all the papers relating to the convention ſhould be laid before the houſe, which was complied with, except in one inſtance, namely, that of keeping back ſuch papers as contained the Spaniſh claims to Falklands Iſlands. This occaſioned a warm debate, but the miniſtry ſcreened themſelves under pretence that all the offices had been ſearched, but no more papers could be found. It was, at the ſame time, charged upon the miniſtry, that the interference of France was a diſhonour to Great Britain; but the miniſtry denied the charge, by aſſerting, that France had never been employed to act as a mediator. It was then propoſed to preſent an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for ordering the papers to be laid before them, but this was objected to by the minority, who denied that all the papers had been laid before them. Warm debates enſued in both houſes; but the miniſterial party prevailed, and the addreſs was preſented without any amendment whatever.

About this time an affair happened which it was greatly feared would have been attended with the moſt alarming conſequences. The ſpeeches ſaid to have been made in the houſe of commons had for a conſiderable time been publiſhed by ſome bookſellers, who being cited before the houſe, refuſed to appear; upon which a proclamation was publiſhed with a reward for apprehending them. This produced the intended effect. J. Wheble, one of theſe perſons, was apprehended and taken before John Wilkes, eſq. the ſitting alderman at Guildhall: but he finding that the perſon who had apprehended Mr. Wheble had no accuſation againſt him, and only apprehended him on the authority of the proclamation; and at the ſame time Mr. Wheble declaring that the apprehender had forcibly detained him, and brought him there, the alderman immediately diſcharged him, and bound him over to proſecute his accuſer.

Mr. Miller, printer of a public paper, was likewiſe taken into cuſtody by a meſſenger from the houſe of commons; who, on his refuſing to go with him, took him by the arm, upon which a conſtable was ſent for, and Mr. Miller gave him charge of the meſſenger for aſſaulting him in his own houſe; whereupon he was carried to the manſion-houſe, and a hearing came on before the Lord-mayor and aldermen Wilkes and Oliver. In the mean time the ſerjeant at arms being informed of this tranſaction, came to demand the bodies of the meſſenger and of Mr. Miller; upon which the Lord-mayor aſked the meſſenger if he had applied to a magiſtrate to back the warrant, or to any peace officer of the city to aſſiſt him; and on his replying in the negative, his lordſhip declared, that no power had a right to ſeize a citizen of London, without an order from him or ſome other magiſtrate; and that he was of opinion, the ſeizing of Miller and the warrant were both illegal; he therefore declared Miller to be at liberty, and proceeded to examine witneſſes to prove the aſſault on the meſſenger; which being done, his lordſhip aſked the latter if he would give bail. This he at firſt refuſed to do; but his commitment being actually made out, he thought proper to comply, when himſelf was bound in forty pounds, and two ſureties in twenty pounds, for his appearance at the next ſeſſions at Guildhall.

After many and long debates, the houſe of commons having reſolved, “ That the proceedings of the “ Lord-mayor and Mr. Oliver was a breach of the “ privilege of that houſe,” committed them both to the tower, where they continued till the prorogation of parliament, which happened on the 8th of May, when his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne.

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ As the ſtate of public buſineſs no longer requires your attendance, I think it right, at this ſeaſon of the year, to put an end to the preſent ſeſſion of parliament.

“ The ſatisfaction I have obtained from his catholic majeſty for the injury I had received, together with the proofs which the courts of France and Spain have given me, by laying aſide their armaments, of their ſincere diſpoſition to preſerve the general tranquillity of Europe, have enabled me to reduce my force by ſea and land. The zeal with which you have exerted yourſelves upon the apprehenſion of a rupture with Spain, muſt convince the world of your affectionate attachment to me, and of your conſtant regard for the true intereſts of your country. On that ſupport I ſhall always rely for the defence of my honour, and for the ſecurity of the rights of my people.

“ With regard to the troubles which ſtill agitate ſome parts of the continent, my endeavours have never been wanting to bring them to an end; and in thoſe endeavours, you may be aſſured I ſhall perſevere.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"It was with real concern that I found myſelf called upon, by the ſituation of public affairs, to aſk of my faithful commons more than ordinary ſupplies for the ſervice of the current year; and I cannot ſufficiently thank you for the unanimity, chearfulneſs, and public ſpirit, with which they have been granted.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"While we acknowledge the goodneſs of divine providence in preſerving us from thoſe calamities with which ſome parts of Europe have been afflicted, let me exhort you to employ your beſt endeavours, in your ſeveral ſtations and countries, to render the national happineſs complete, by diſcouraging and ſuppreſſing all groundleſs ſuſpicions and domeſtic diſturbances. I have no other object, and I can have no other intereſt, than to reign in the hearts of a free and happy people: and it is my earneſt wiſh, that my ſubjects may not be prevented, by any miſtakes or animoſities amongſt themſelves, from enjoying, in the fulleſt extent, the bleſſings of a mild and legal government. The ſupport of our excellent conſtitution is our common duty and intereſt: by that ſtandard I would wiſh my people to try all public principles and profeſſions, and to look upon thoſe as the moſt dangerous enemies, who, under any pretence whatſoever, would perſuade them to violate thoſe laws, and undermine that authority, which the conſtitution has provided for the purpoſe of preſerving the general liberty and happineſs."

During the continuance of the lord-mayor and Mr. alderman Oliver in the Tower, they were addreſſed and thanked for their ſpirited conduct in maintaining the authority of the laws of their country, by every ward in London and by ſeveral towns and boroughs in England. Great preparations were made for conducting the two patriots from the Tower; but the parliament being prorogued one day ſooner than was expected, a few only of the aldermen, &c. could attend; the proceſſion was, however, magnificent, and they were conducted to the manſion-houſe amidſt thouſands of applauding ſpectators.

Having thus noticed the moſt material domeſtic tranſactions, let us now take a view of affairs on the continent, where the war, which had for ſome time ſubſiſted between the Turks and Ruſſians, was carried on with the moſt horrid devaſtations. The ſeat of war the preceding year [*] was on the Danube, and the Ruſſians were in general victors; but their conqueſts were not obtained without great loſs of men, as well by ſickneſs as the ſword. Beſides this, all the other caſualties that conſtantly attend the carrying on a war in a diſtant country were prodigious. The neighbouring provinces were ruined, ſo as to reſemble a deſert, and no ſubſiſtance could be procured, but at an enormous expence. Money was borrowed in other countries for the uſe of the Ruſſians, at the moſt exorbitant intereſt, and in ſome parts the merchants refuſed to advance any, ſo that it is impoſſible to deſcribe the hardſhips the Ruſſian army ſuffered. In March a moſt bloody battle was fought between them and the Turks, on the Walachian ſide of the Danube; and general Weiſman, having obtained a victory, croſſed the river, where the enemy had ſome ſmall parties; but the general drove them from their poſts, and deſtroyed their magazines.

The two grand objects the Ruſſians had in view at the opening of this campaign were the ſecuring ſuch conqueſts as they had made on the Danube, and at the ſame time to penetrate with one of their armies into Crim Tartary.

Crim Tartary, ſo famous among the antient Greeks by the name of Taurica Cherſoneſus, is a peninſula ſurrounded on all ſides by the Euxine or Black Sea, except where it joins Little Tartary by a ſmall iſthmus, not above ſix miles broad. In this iſthmus ſtood the antient city of Precop; but the Turks have changed the names of thoſe once celebrated places, which were formerly the ſeats of learning and arts. The whole peninſula is one of the moſt fertile ſpots in the world, abounding with many towns and cities; and the entrance, near where Precop ſtood, is fortified by ſtrong lines, with a trench forty-two feet deep, ſeventy-two broad, and from the bottom of the ditch to the creſt of the parapat was ſeventy feet. Strong towers had been erected at proper diſtances from each other, and ſtrong cannon were placed upon them.

Prince Dolgorucki was the Ruſſian general appointed to attack this place, and when he arrived before the lines, he found it defended by the chan Selim Guery in perſon, with an army of 50,000 Tartars, and 7000 Turks. But notwithſtanding the difference of numbers, the prince attacked the place on the 25th of June, two days after their arrival. The Tartar prince behaved with great bravery: for finding it impoſſible to rally his right wing, he went and charged bravely at the head of his left. All his efforts, however, were in vain; for in four hours his whole army was routed, and the lines forced in every place. The Turkiſh garriſon ſurrendered priſoners of war the next day; and their whole army, cannon, ammunition and baggage fell into the hands of the conquerors. From this circumſtance the reader will ſee, that no fortifications, however ſtrong, nor troops, however courageous, can hold out againſt cool, ſteady, regular diſcipline, which, although it may ſometimes be ſlow, yet in the end it bears down all oppoſition.

The Ruſſians, having made themſelves maſters of this important paſs, over-run the whole of the peninſula; the Turkiſh garriſon deſerted, and having deſtroyed the fortifications, embarked on board ſome ſhips that lay in the harbour, and ſet ſail for their own country. The governor of Arabat made ſome defence; but the place was taken by ſtorm, and the garriſon put to the ſword. From thence the prince continued his march to Caffa, the capital city of Crimea, which was immediately ſurrendered to him, and 1000 men, the remains of the garriſon, were made priſoners of war.

[*] This year alſo the Ruſſians were no leſs ſucceſsful by ſea than land. On the 7th of July, the whole fleet engaged that of the Turks, when the Ottomans were totally defeated. In this fight, which was very bloody and deſperate, admiral Spiritdorff engaged the Capitana of 100 guns, yard arm to yard arm, when the Turkiſh ſhip taking fire, the flames communicated to the Ruſſian ſhip: both unhappily blew up, and the crews, a few officers and men excepted, periſhed either in the exploſion or the waves.

The Turks now fled, in order to ſecure themſelves in the bay of Schiſma, where, a few nights after their fleet was fired by means of three fire-ſhips. A perſon, who was upon the ſpot, mentioning this action, ſays, "A fleet, conſiſting of 200 ſail, almoſt in one general blaze, preſented a picture of diſtreſs and horror, dreadfully ſublime; while the flames, with the utmoſt rapidity, were ſpreading deſtruction on all ſides, and ſhip blowing up, after ſhip, with every ſoul on board, that feared to truſt the waves to ſwim for ſhore: the Ruſſians kept pouring upon them ſuch ſhowers of cannon balls, ſhells, and ſmall ſhot, that not one of their many thouſand weeping friends on land, who ſaw their diſtreſs, dared venture to their relief. Nothing now remained but united ſhrieks and unavailing cries, which, joined to the martial muſic, and the loud triumphant ſhouts of victors, ſerved to ſwell alternately the various notes of joy and ſorrow, that compoſed the ſolemn dirge of their (the Turks) departing glory."

The loſs, on the part of the Ruſſians, was admiral Spiritdorff's ſhip, and between 7 and 800 men: on the ſide of the Turks, beſides the deſtruction of their whole fleet, above 9000 men periſhed.

The Turks quitted Schiſma in the greateſt conſternation, and haſting to Smyrna, murdered an incredible number of Greeks and other Chriſtians, whom they ſuppoſed to be well affected to the Ruſſians, ſparing neither age nor ſex.

The terror was now ſo great, that the Turks, without waiting for the arrival of the enemy, abandoned the important fortreſſes of Taman, Jenicola, and Kertſch, which commanded the ſtreights between the Black Sea and the town of Azoph, which now fell into the hands of the Ruſſians, without ſtriking a ſingle blow. The Tartars ſubmitted to the conquerors, who took them under their immediate protection; while their unfortunate leader retired to Conſtantinople, where he ſoon after died, not without ſtrong ſuſpicion that he had been put to death in a private manner.

During theſe tranſactions in the Crimea, the Turks, under the command of Mouſſon Oglou, croſſed the Danube in three diviſions, in order to attempt to relieve the fort of Torre, ſituated on the north of that river oppoſite to the antient city of Nicopolis. The Turkiſh army, however, did not ſucceed; but a detachment of them, under the command of a baſſaw, attacked the ſtrong fort of Guirgewo, in which was a Ruſſian garriſon, and in three days the governor agreed to capitulate, upon being allowed to march out with all the honours of war. As this place was very ſtrong, and had coſt the Ruſſians much trouble and loſs before they took it, ſo the conduct of the governor filled the minds of the army with indignation, and prince Repuin ordered all the officers to be put under arreſt.

On the 17th of Auguſt a detachment of the Turks came up with a body of Ruſſians, and the latter were, after a moſt obſtinate defence, put to flight; but they retreated in the moſt excellent order, taking along with them their wounded men. This was the only field action in which the Turks had hitherto reaped any advantage, and it was magnified at Conſtantinople as if it had been a complete victory.

The Turks had nothing ſo much at heart as that of eſtabliſhing winter quarters in Walachia, and with this view they continued croſſing the Danube in detached parties. But theſe motions could not eſcape the notice of a general ſo vigilant and penetrating as Romanzow, who no ſooner perceived their deſigns, than he made ſuch a number of maſterly diſpoſitions, as not only overthrew their ſchemes, but were conducted with ſuch ability, that every one of them took place at the inſtant of time, and was productive of the effect which was intended.

Inſtead, therefore, of waiting for the enemy, the Ruſſians boldly croſſed the Danube, and attacked them on their own ſide, a circumſtance they had not ſo much as imagined. Two great bodies of Turks, one entrenched at Tuleza, and the other at Maczin, were attacked at the ſame time by the Ruſſian generals Weiſman and Miboradowits, and the event was the ſame in both places. The entrenchments were ſtormed, the Turks totally routed, and the towns taken, in which were large magazines of arms and proviſions.

The night following, general Weiſman marched to attack the grand vizir's camp, which was ſtrongly fortified, at a place called Babadagh; and in it was the flower of the Turkiſh army, covered with a ſtrong train of artillery. Victory, however, was obtained by the Ruſſians as cheap as before; the Turks were routed with great ſlaughter, the entrenchments and artillery taken, with the caſtle of Babadagh; while the vizir and his ruined army fled thirty miles, to ſeek refuge in mount Hemnus.

A few days after this important event, general Eſſen attacked a large body of Turks, and totally routed them, after having killed 2000, and taken 4000 priſoners, beſides all their baggage, tents, artillery waggons, ammunition and proviſions. By theſe rapid ſucceſſes, the Turks were driven out of Walachia, while the Ruſſians remained maſters of that province. When the news arrived at Conſtantinople, the people became quite outrageous, and would have proceeded to great extremities, had they not been made to believe, that the loſs was owing to a mutiny which had taken place in the army.

During this year, the Ruſſian fleet in the Mediterranean did not perform any thing remarkable, and the ſevere check given the Greeks, had deterred the more ſober from engaging in the war. The fleet was greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions; and ſome of their ſhips having been ſent to the Italian ports, to purchaſe ſuch things as were wanting, they were refuſed admittance, under pretence that they were infected with the plague. But ſtill, under all theſe diſadvantages, and many others, the Ruſſians, by falling in with a pitiful cowardly enemy, ſtruck unſpeakable terror in the Levant, and made even the Grand Seignior tremble on his throne. A moſt ſevere blow was given to the trade of the Levant; and throughout all the iſlands of the Archipelago, the coaſts of Greece and Aſia, nothing was to be ſeen but ruin and deſolation: but notwithſtanding, the Ruſſians reaped but very few advantages, and the climate killed many more of their men than thoſe who fell by the ſword.

Whilſt war was thus carried on between thoſe rude and wide-extended empires, and appeared expoſed rather to exterminate than diminiſh the human race, the peſtilence, that other dreadful enemy to mankind, claimed a ſhare of the ſpoil, and ſeemed too impatient to wait for the gleanings of the ſword. When we conſider the havock made by this dreadful diſorder in the Turkiſh army, and that all the provinces near the Black Sea were more or leſs infected with it, it will appear little leſs than a miracle that the Ruſſian army ſhould have eſcaped the fatal contagion. But if their army was ſo fortunate as to eſcape, it was not ſo happy with the interior part of their empire. It firſt diſcovered itſelf in the imperial city of Moſcow; but as it was many hundreds of miles from the theatres of the war, and from the countries infected, it could not reaſonably be ſuppoſed that it had been communicated from thence. It raged during the ſummer under the appearance of a malignant fever, but in autumn it aſſumed its true form, and ſwept away many thouſands before it.

The cruel ravages of the diſorder were not, however, more ſhocking to humanity, than the effects it produced on the minds of the barbarous people. The ſeverity of government had been, in ſome meaſure, relaxed, and the moſt horrid licentiouſneſs took place. A wild enthuſiaſt pretended that he had a revelation from heaven, by which he was informed, that a certain image of a ſaint was endowed with efficacy ſufficient to cure thoſe who were infected, and to preſerve thoſe who were not. This drew innumerable crowds of people together, ſo that many thouſands were trampled to death, and the ſick dropped down dead in the midſt of ſuch as were healthy. Thus the contagion was communicated in ſuch a manner, that no attempts could reſtrain its progreſs; while the populace, aſſembling in ſuch numerous bodies, broke out into the moſt violent outrages.

The artful impoſtor, who contrived the fraud, had placed a cheſt before the image of the ſaint, to receive ſuch money as the people gave; but the archbiſhop of Moſcow, who ſeems to have been a prudent man, ordered the cheſt to be ſealed up, and both it and the image of the ſaint removed out of the church. This act, which deſerved the higheſt commendation, had a quite different effect on the ignorant and ſuperſtitious multitude, for they ran to the archbiſhop's houſe, and utterly demoliſhed it. The good prelate had eſcaped through a back door, to one of the monaſteries, where he hoped to be protected; but thither the enraged multitude followed him, and dragging the venerable old man into the ſtreets, put him to death in the moſt horrid and barbarous manner.

A body of troops having been ſent to quell the rioters, they refuſed to diſperſe; upon which the ſoldiers fired upon them, and many hundreds of them were killed. Many priſoners were taken, and being brought to their trials, were puniſhed according to the cuſtom of the country. The moſt remarkable circumſtance attending this tragical affair was the murder of the good old archbiſhop, for the Ruſſians regard their clergy in a more ſacred manner than any other nation in Europe; but who can ſet bounds to enthuſiaſm, when urged on by the violence of a peſtilential diſtemper?

During the courſe of this year, the great kingdom of Poland was deluged with blood, from the one extremity to the other: the confederates became more and more inveterate againſt each other, and yet the fertility of the ſoil furniſhed the means of ſubſiſtence.

Indeed, it may be juſtly ſaid, that the Ruſſian ambaſſador was the ſovereign of Poland: all orders were iſſued from him, though they were ſanctified with the name of the king. From this circumſtance we may ſee, what an unhappy thing it is to be under an ariſtocratical government, where the king is elected by a ſelect company of noblemen, who pay no regard to his power, and, in the mean time, make ſlaves of their own tenants. In ſhort, there cannot be a more perfect form of government than that where all the powers in the ſtate are put upon an equal balance.

In the mean time, the king of Poland, who had been raiſed to the throne from a private ſtation, ſupported himſelf under his misfortunes with the moſt heroic fortitude. Conſcious of the moral rectitude of his own heart, he did not even ſuſpect that his enemies had the leaſt intention to do him any injury; but he was miſtaken, as will appear from the following narrative.

About ten in the evening of the 3d of November, the king, having been on a viſit to a nobleman in the country, returned to his palace at Warſaw; but, juſt as his coach was turning the end of the ſtreet, it was beſet by ſeveral armed men on horſeback, the chief of whom was Koczinſki, an officer among the confederates. Theſe deſperadoes having fired their piſtols into the coach, dragged out the king, and carried him off between two horſemen. The domeſtics who attended the coach did all they could to reſcue the king, but in vain, for one was killed on the ſpot, and the reſt deſperately wounded.

The Ruſſian ſoldiers ran to arms, and found the coach covered with blood, but could learn no account of the king; upon which they ſallied forth, and alarmed the detached parties which were on the roads leading to the capital. The aſſaſſins had been joined by ſome of their accomplices at one of the gates, and, without ſtopping, rode off with the king till they came to the village of Willanow, about ſeven Engliſh miles diſtant from Warſaw. The Ruſſians continued purſuing; upon which Koczinſki, with four others, ſeparated from the reſt of his companions, carrying the king with him. When he had proceeded a few miles, he ſent his four companions to procure intelligence, whether any of the Ruſſian forces were advancing; and no ſooner were they all gone, than he fell at the king's feet, imploring his pardon, and, at the ſame time, offering to ſave his life. They then proceeded to a hut about a mile diſtant, from whence the king diſpatched a meſſenger to the Ruſſian general, who ſent proper perſons to attend him, and conduct him home. The king had received two wounds on his head, the one from a ſword, and the other from a ball; and his eſcaping with life may be conſidered as one of the moſt extraordinary incidents we meet with in hiſtory.

The aſſaſſin Koczinſki produced a paper, by which it appeared, that he and his confederates were bound by the moſt ſolemn oaths to deliver the king, dead or alive, to the confederacy at Czenſtochau; but, as he ſaid, his heart failed him, and he was ſeized with remorſe as ſoon as he ſaw the bleeding wounds of his ſovereign.

It is evident, that the manner in which the king was carried off was attended with much more difficulty than if they had killed him on the ſpot; but then it muſt be remembered, that no perſons in the world are more bewildered in their minds than thoſe who engage in unlawful ſchemes: they are bold and reſolute in words; but no ſooner have they liſted their hands, than all the dreadful conſequences preſent themſelves to their minds, and they are unable to proceed any farther.

During theſe tranſactions in Poland, the empreſs of Ruſſia, the emperor of Germany, and the ever enterprizing king of Pruſſia, were not idle; they reſolved to avail themſelves of ſuch circumſtances, and divide the unhappy kingdom, by each taking a part; but this greatly offended the Germans, who were afraid of having the Ruſſians too near them.

While Greece and Poland were overrun with armies, Germany, eſpecially towards the ſouth and eaſt, was ſuffering all thoſe calamities which ariſe from the ſcarcity of proviſions. This dearth was not artificial, but real; for in Bohemia the ſcarcity was ſo great, that a ſevere famine prevailed, and great numbers of people periſhed for want of food. Theſe diſtreſſes were much heightened by the ſeverity of the winter, for in many places the poor people ſtripped the thatch from off their houſes, in order to feed their cattle with it. Nor was the ſpring more favourable, for the vaſt quantities of ſnow which melted on th mountains, fell down in torrents on the level country, and ſwept away every thing before it; and the great rivers having burſt through their ancient boundaries, ſcenes of confuſion, terror and diſtreſs were ſpread on every ſide. The calamity continued to increaſe as the ſeaſon advanced; and, in ſummer, when the beſt weather is expected, nothing was to be ſeen but continual rains, ſo that the country ſeemed to reſemble the ocean, rather than land for the habitation of men.

The inundations of the Elbe were particularly dreadful; many parts of Lower Saxony, and the march of Brandenburgh were totally ruined. The inhabitants of the town of Hamburgh were truly diſtreſſed; the water entered one of the gates, and threatened immediate deſtruction; ſo that every perſon in the place was obliged to aſſiſt, in order to divert its courſe, and prevent its further progreſs. The great ſuburb towards the Elbe, where the gentry had their houſes and gardens, was ſo covered with water, that only the tops of the trees could be ſeen. The magiſtrates ordered a public faſt to be kept, to implore the divine mercy, and avert the threatened judgments.

At Prague, a riot having happened, in conſequence of the ſcarcity of proviſions, the governor told the people, that unleſs they diſperſed, he would order the troops to fire upon them: to which they anſwered, with great coolneſs and indifference, that they would look upon the execution of his threatenings as a favour, a ſudden death by a ſhot being much preferable to a ſlow one by famine. The governor had humanity and prudence enough to refrain from fulfilling his threats; and having tranſmitted an account of theſe tranſactions to the empreſs queen, ſhe burſt into tears, and immediately ſent them a comfortable relief.

On the 12th of February this year the king of Sweden died ſuddenly, and was ſucceeded by his ſon, the preſent king, then at Paris on his travels. The Senate of Sweden met, and having drawn up the common diploma, by which the prince was inveſted with the regal dignity, expreſſes were diſpatched to him at Paris, to notify the news in form, and deſire his majeſty would return to his own dominions. He did not, however, leave Paris till he had concluded a treaty with the French king, and then he ſet out, accompanied by his brother. At Berlin, he ſpent a few days in cloſe conference with his uncle, the king of Pruſſia; and then continued his journey to Stockholm, where he was received amidſt the acclamations of his ſubjects.

This year one of the moſt remarkable revolutions in the internal government of France took place, of any we find mentioned in hiſtory. That faithful, uncorrupted body of men, the parliament of Paris, had long defended the liberties of their fellow ſubjects; but integrity, and every other virtue, are little regarded by lawleſs power. The king having ſent for the members to the palace, ordered them to regiſter ſome iniquitous edicts; but they abſolutely refuſed, and returning to the parliament-houſe, entered into a bond to ſtand by each other in doing juſtice, although the conſequence ſhould be death.

A body of dragoons ſurrounded the parliament-houſe, and forced the clerks to regiſter the edicts; upon which the parliament proteſted againſt it, and deputed their firſt preſident to wait on the king. But all the anſwer they received from the haughty monarch was, that next day they ſhould be all ſent into baniſhment. This accordingly took place, and theſe venerable fathers and guardians of the laws were ſent to different villages at a great diſtance from their friends and families. Such was the fate of this noble and diſintereſted aſſembly, whoſe actions would have done honour to a Roman ſenate. This fall was not ſo glorious from the cauſe in which it was engaged, than from the circumſtances which attended it; for ſeveral of the other parliaments in the provinces reſigned their offices, in honour of that of Paris.

Having thus noticed the moſt material foreign tranſactions of this year, let us now return to affairs at home, where, during the receſs of parliament, an event took place, which ſurprized the whole nation, and made way for an act, the next ſeſſions, of a moſt extraordinary nature. The event alluded to was no other than the marriage of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland with Mrs. Horton, a widow lady, and daughter to lord Irnham, of the kingdom of Ireland. This ſtep of the duke's gave great offence at court, eſpecially as it had been openly acknowledged by the parties, and not concealed in the ſame manner as the marriage of the duke of Glouceſter with the counteſs dowager of Waldegrave.

A. D. 1772. The parliament met on the 21ſt of January[*], and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he expreſſed much ſatisfaction, that neither the foreign nor domeſtic ſtate of affairs required their more early attendance: that, now they were aſſembled, they would, no doubt, attend to the intereſts of the nation, and regulate its internal policy, as well as its foreign commerce. They were likewiſe informed that the king of Spain had given up Fort Egmont, and that we were on the beſt terms with that court. He concluded, with recommending to them, to keep the navy, on the moſt reſpectable footing, to be ready in caſe of any neceſſity for the future.

To this ſpeech addreſſes were preſented in the uſual form; after which the public buſineſs was opened, by making proper inquiries into the ſtate of the navy; and the miniſtry propoſed, that 25,000 men ſhould be voted for the ſervice of the current year.

In ſupport of this motion, it was urged, by the miniſtry, that the French had ſent a conſiderable fleet to the Eaſt-Indies; and that we were, on that account, obliged to ſupport a more conſiderable naval force there than before: that a large ſquadron was employed in the protection of our Weſt-India iſlands; for ſhould any miſunderſtanding ariſe between us and the Spaniards, thoſe valuable acquiſitions, if not properly taken care of, would fall into the hands of our enemies: that the war between the Ruſſians and Turks made it alſo neceſſary to employ a greater number of ſhips for the protection of our commerce in the Mediterranean and the Archipelago, than had been cuſtomary in times of general peace: that by keeping up a reputable body of ſeamen, we ſhould not be under the cruel neceſſity of granting preſs-warrants in caſe of the breaking out of a new war; and although the expence might be more than is common in times of peace, the advantages would amply repay it.

To theſe arguments it was anſwered, by thoſe in oppoſition, that the nation was already groaning under a load of taxes; and, inſtead of doing or propoſing any thing for paying off the national debt, here was a propoſal made to increaſe it in a time of profound peace: that, allowing the exigencies of the times required it, yet it did not appear, but that, on every future occaſion, the ſame pretence might be made, whether there was any real neceſſity for it or not.

[*] On the 8th of February, abont ſix o'clock in the morning, died, at Carlton-houſe, her royal highneſs the princeſs dowager of Wales, mother to his preſent majeſty. In the evening preceeding her death, the phyſician felt her pulſe, and told her it was more regular than it had been for ſome time: her highneſs anſwered, "Yes: and I think I ſhall have a good night's reſt." She them embraced the king, and he obſerved nothing particular in her, except that ſhe ſeemed to teſtify greater warmth and affection than uſual. His majeſty afterwards retired to an anti-chamber with the phyſician, who told him, that her highneſs would not out-live the morning, which induced his majeſty to ſtay there all night. He did not ſee his royal mother any more till ſhe was dead, for ſhe remained very quiet all the night, nor did ſhe give any tokens of death till a few minutes before ſhe expired, when ſhe laid her hand upon her heart, and went off without a groan. As ſoon as his majeſty was informed of her departure, he came and took her by the hand, kiſſed it, and burſt into tears: a ſhort time after which he retired to St. James's.

Her royal highneſs was the youngeſt daughter of Frederick II. Duke of Saxe-Gotha; born on the 30th of November 1719. She was married at St. James's on the 27th of April 1736, to Frederick, late prince of Wales; by whom ſhe had iſſue as follow:

Augusta, born July 31, 1737, O. S. married to the hereditary prince of Brunſwick.

George, born May 24, 1738, O. S. now king of Great Britain.

Edward duke of York, born March 14, 1739; died September 7, 1767, at Monaco in Italy.

Elizabeth, born December, 30, 1740; died September 4, 1759.

William Henry, Duke of Glouceſter, born November 14, 1743.

Henry Frederick, Duke of Cumberland, born October 27, 1745.

Louiſa, born March 8, 1748. Dead.

Frederick, born May 13, 1750; died December 29, 1765.

Caroline Matilda, born July 11, (after the death of her father) 1751; married October 2, 1766, to Chriſtian VII. king of Denmark. Dead.

Her royal highneſs had, by an act of parliament of the 10th of George II. a revenue of 50,000l. per annum for life, in caſe ſhe ſurvived the prince, which was to be paid quarterly, and the firſt payment took place five days after his deceaſe; 40,000l. of that annuity was to be paid out of the revenues of the Poſt-office, and the other 10,000l. out of the hereditary duties of exciſe, exempt from all fees, taxes or charges whatever.

On the 15th the corpſe of her royal highneſs was interred with the uſual ſolemnities in Henry the VIIth's chapel in Weſtminſter-abbey.

Two of our greateſt naval commanders ſtrongly oppoſed the motion, and condemned the then preſent arrangement of the fleet. They obſerved, that the force already in the Eaſt-Indies was either too great, or too little: that if the appearances of a permanent peace, as held out in the ſpeech, were to be relied on, it was too great, and, in caſe of war, it was inſufficient: that the ſame objections lay to the arrangement at Jamaica, where the ſquadron conſiſted only of about four ſhips, and was altogether unable to protect it, ſuppoſing any danger of an attack. Many ſevere ſarcaſms were levelled at the miniſtry for the futility of their conduct, becauſe they accompanied a ſpeech which breathed nothing but ſentiments of peace, with all the actual preparations for war. At laſt, the queſtion having been put, the motion was carried as uſual, and the miniſtry reigned triumphant,

The next buſineſs that came before the houſe was a petition for leave to bring in a bill to excuſe ſome of the clergy from ſubſcribing to the 39 articles of religion. It was urged in favour of the motion, that they could not ſubſcribe to doctrines of human invention, but only to the ſacred ſcriptures; and that it was their right to explain them according to what they eſteemed their genuine ſenſe and meaning. On the other hand, it was urged againſt the motion, that to grant ſuch an indulgence would be to open a door for all ſorts of licentiouſneſs: for, under a pretence that ſuch and ſuch tenets were the pure dictates of conſcience, the fundamental doctrines of our religion would be ſubverted, and blaſphemy taught in our churches: that moſt of thoſe who had aſſociated at the Feathers Tavern upon this ſiniſter buſineſs had been formerly diſſenters, but had left their original profeſſion, in order to enjoy ſome of the ſpoils of the church, and that they had brought their Arian and Socinian notions along with them: that if their conſciences were ſo very tender, they might throw up their livings, and return to their conventicles, where they would be at liberty to diſſeminate what notions they pleaſed: that, by doing ſo, they would give a convincing proof of their diſintereſtedneſs; but nothing could be more reaſonable, than for a church eſtabliſhed by law to beſtow her honours upon thoſe who ſubſcribed to her doctrines, and conformed to her diſcipline. Upon the whole, the motion was rejected by a great majority, and not without ſome ſevere ſtrictures on the conduct of thoſe by whom it had been promoted.

But of all the buſineſs tranſacted during this ſeſſions, none was conſidered as of ſuch importance, or made greater noiſe, than that of a meſſage ſent by his majeſty to the houſe of lords. In this meſſage it was obſerved, that his majeſty being deſirous, from paternal affection to his own family, an anxious concern for the future welfare of his people, and the honour and dignity of his crown, that the right of approving all marriages in the royal family, as a matter of public concern, had always belonged to the princes of this realm; he therefore recommended to both houſes to take it into their ſerious conſideration, whether it may not be wiſe and expedient to ſupply the defects of the laws now in being, and, by ſome new proviſion, more effectually guard the deſcendants of his late majeſty, except ſuch as were already married to foreign princes, from marrying without the approbation of his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors, firſt had and obtained.

In conſequence of this meſſage, a bill was brought into the houſe of lords, which fully anſwered all the purpoſes intended. This bill was oppoſed, with great ſtrength of argument, by ſome of the moſt reſpectable peers in the nation. All the judges were ſent for to give their opinion, which was, that the marriages of the intermediate branches of the royal family muſt be approved of by the king, but how far that power extended over collateral branches, they could not ſay. At laſt the motion was carried, though not till fourteen lords entered a proteſt againſt it, as being inconſiſtent with the law of nature.

In the houſe of commons, the bill met with a much ſtronger repulſe; and thoſe in oppoſition boldly declared, that it had been brought in at a time when moſt of the gentlemen of the law, whoſe opinions would have been of great ſervice, were gone on the circuits. But, notwithſtanding all the ſtrength of argument, it paſſed, and ſoon after received the royal aſſent. All that we ſhall ſay concerning this bill ſhall be reduced to a few words. By thoſe who promoted it, it was ſaid, that, abſtracting from all principles of natural right, it was neceſſary that municipal inſtitutions ſhould take place, eſpecially where the public ſafety was concerned: that, during the diſtractions between the houſes of York and Lancaſter, ſome branches of the royal family had married in the moſt imprudent manner with the daughters and widows of ſubjects, which was attended with ſuch a train of evils, that the whole nation was deluged in blood: that, properly ſpeaking, no attempt had been made to ſet aſide natural rights, any further than was abſolutely neceſſary to preſerve the public peace, which was much preferable to the ſtate of individuals.

On the other hand, it was urged, that all mankind, in the act of marriage are, by nature, free: that no marriage can ever be a real, legal one, where the conſent of the parties has not firſt been obtained: that no political laws can ſet aſide natural rights: that if choice alone can conſtitute a real marriage, then nothing can authorize the moſt dignified perſon in the univerſe to lay a reſtraint on any perſon whatever. It was urged further, that ſuch an unlimited power given to the ſovereign was, in all reſpects, inconſiſtent with the conſtitution, nor was there one precedent in hiſtory to give countenance to it: that, had it been inherent as a principle in our conſtitution, it muſt have long ſince become the ſubject matter of many of our ſtatutes: that, on the contrary, till the preſent time, this prerogative was unheard-of in Engliſh juriſprudence: that there was no remedy in law appertaining to ſuch pretended right in the crown, nor any court of law in which a proſecution could be carried on for ſuch pretended offences; and as, therefore, there could be no right without a remedy, it was evident this prerogative could have no real exiſtence: that the act which regulated other marriages, expreſsly excepted the royal family; and it is well known, that the common law, until that period, left all men to their natural liberty.

Such were the arguments made uſe of in this debate, at the cloſe of which the queſtion being put, it was carried by a great majority, and (as we have already obſerved) afterwards received the royal aſſent.

This matter being adjuſted, the attention of the parliament was directed to the affairs of the Eaſt-India company, which at this time were in a very perplexed ſituation. On the 30th of March, the deputy-chairman of the company moved the houſe for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of the ſervants belonging to the company in India. The grand object in view was, to reſtrain the governor's council; and, indeed, all the ſervants belonging to the company from carrying on any ſort of trade, and to give the directors of the company a ſovereign power over their own ſervants.

It was urged, in ſupport of the motion, that the bad ſtate of Affairs in India was owing to the ſmall power the court of directors had over their ſervants, as they could not puniſh them in any other manner than by diſmiſſing them. That nothing was more inconſiſtent with true policy, than to ſuffer governors of provinces, at a great diſtance, to become traders and merchants; and that the court of Bengal was not able to adminiſter juſtice to all the other ſettlements.

In anſwer to this it was ſaid, that it was an unparliamentary thing to propoſe bringing in a bill to redreſs a grievance without producing ſufficient proof that the grievance exiſted.. That the houſe ought firſt to enter into an enquiry concerning our preſent ſituation of affairs in India, and the cauſes that led to it; that it was to be feared the enquiry would ſhew, that the evils lay too deep to be remedied by the propoſed bill; that it would be almoſt impoſſible to prevent the company's ſervants from trading either directly or indirectly; and that the ſending out ſome gentlemen learned in the laws as judges was very inadequate to the purpoſe of adminiſtering juſtice to the people, in ſuch a vaſt extended tract of land; and that the matter was premature, becauſe we had not yet determined by what code of laws the people were to be governed.

The motion, however, was carried, and this led to an enquiry into the ſtate of affairs in India. All the papers belonging to the company were ordered to be laid before a ſelect committee of the houſe, and from the peruſal of them, many important diſcoveries were made. Indeed, it was found, that the mode of government in India was, in every reſpect, arbitrary, unconſtitutional, and no way fit for preſerving the rights of the people, or adminiſtering juſtice to individuals. The committee, finding the buſineſs encreaſing faſt, and the ſeaſon far advanced, deſired leave to continue ſitting during the receſs of parliament, or, at leaſt, till ſuch time as they could go through with the intended enquiry.

In the mean time, the ill temper which had unaccountably taken place between the two houſes the preceding ſeſſion, ſtill continued during the preſent; and, except in tranſmitting of bills from the one to the other, there was no more communication between them, than if they had been the jealous councils of two rival ſtates.

In this ſtate of affairs, the lords having ſent a bill to the commons by a maſter in chancery, and a clerk aſſiſtant, the whole houſe conſidered it as an indignity, and would not accept the meſſage till they had examined the journals, to know if there were any precedents of ſendings bills in that manner. In the courſe of a haſty and paſſionate debate, which enſued upon that occaſion, ſeveral gentlemen mentioned, that, on the firſt day of the preſent ſeſſions, they had been rudely turned out of the houſe of lords, even before the ſpeaker could get out of the door. A motion was then made to appoint a committee to ſearch for precedents, of the manner of bills being ſent from the lords, and alſo of the improper behaviour of the lords to the commons. Exceptions, however, were taken to the word improper, as if it had carried an appearance of prejudging the caſe; and, after a warm debate, the word was left out.

The report of the committee was, that the lords had behaved in a very improper manner, and that the bill, which ſtill lay on the table, ſhould be ſent back. This was oppoſed by adminiſtration, who ſaid it would lay a foundation for a quarrel, which might not be eaſily accommodated; and accordingly the motion was over-ruled.

A motion was then made for a conference with the lords, but over-ruled in the ſame manner as the other; and, after long debates, and ſeveral propoſed amendments, the matter ended in a meſſage to the lords, wherein the impropriety of the meſſengers was the only complaint ſtated, which, it was hoped, would not be drawn into a precedent. This produced an anſwer, that the bill had been ordered in the uſual manner, and that the matter of complaint was occaſioned by the illneſs of one of the perſons who ſhould have preſented it; that a good correſpondence was wiſhed for, and that it was not meant to introduce any precedent contrary to eſtabliſhed uſage.

On the 9th of June his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he took notice of the laudable conduct of his parliament, that had conducted the affairs of the public with ſuch ſpirit and prudence. He thanked them for the care they had taken of his family in making the act relating to the royal family; and informed them of the pacific diſpoſition of thoſe perſons with whom we had any concern. That there was great reaſon to believe, that the public tranquillity would not be diſturbed. The commons were thanked in the moſt cordial manner for the ſupplies they had granted; and great joy was expreſſed that there were ſtill ſome hopes that the national debt would be reduced. He concluded with telling them, that he doubted not but they would carry to their reſpective countries the ſame principles and the ſame zeal for the public good they had already manifeſted; and that they would cultivate a ſpirit of harmony and confidence among all ranks of the people; to convince them, that without a due reverence for the laws, neither their civil nor religious rights could be enjoyed in comfort or ſecurity; and to aſſure them that their intereſts were conſidered as inſeparably connected with thoſe of the crown; and that his majeſty is, and ever was perſuaded, that the proſperity and glory of his reign muſt depend on his poſſeſſing the affections, and maintaining the happineſs of his people.

Having thus mentioned the moſt material domeſtic tranſactions of this year, we ſhall now conſider the ſtate of affairs on the continent; where, the firſt thing that engages our attention is, the revolution that took place in the government of Sweden, which is of ſo remarkable a nature, as to deſerve a minute relation.

It is acknowledged, by moſt of thoſe who have written of Sweden, that no nation in general ever enjoyed more liberty. Though governed by kings, theſe kings were originally elected by the people, and their power circumſcribed within very narrow limits. The ſenate, in a manner, exerciſed the whole executive power; and the general diets, were compoſed of repreſentatives from the nobility, clergy, burgeſſes, and peaſants. Here we find a happy mixture of power, and ſuch as had not been known in any other European nation theſe many years; for all ranks of people were repreſented in their diets or parliaments. It was not, however, without its defects; for the power of the diet being great, ſuch as compoſed it often played the tyrant over their dependents or tenants, which made the people wiſh for a change of government.

About the time of the reformation, the popiſh clergy in Sweden had become ſo odious to the people, that they embraced the doctrines of Luther, and the proteſtant religion was eſtabliſhed among them. From that time forward, Sweden began to emerge from obſcurity; and ſeveral worthy princes having, for about a century, conducted the affairs of government, it became at laſt a flouriſhing nation. But good princes are not of continual ſucceſſion. Charles XI. was a bold, domineering tyrant, and joining cunning to the natural cruelty of his diſpoſition, he ſoon aboliſhed the power of the ſenate by aſſuming it to himſelf, while the ſtates were forced, by a military power, to give up all pretence to legiſlation. By the ſame, or ſimilar methods, he greatly enlarged the dominions of Sweden, by new conqueſts; and, at his death in 1696, left it one of the moſt powerful kingdoms in Europe. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Charles XII. who inherited the intrepidity, obſtinacy, harſhneſs, and violence of his father, without any of his diſſimulation. He carried deſpotiſm to a ſtill greater height; for he threw by all the forms of law, and decided peremptorily in every thing, without admitting of any diſcuſſion. The events of this prince's life are too well known to be recited here, only that his invincible obſtinacy and implacable diſpoſition brought on his ruin, after a life ſpent in heroic adventures, and abſurd purſuits, which ſeemed to border on madneſs. He found his nation, when he aſcended the throne, at the higheſt pitch of glory; but he left it reduced to miſery.

His ſiſter received the crown from the ſtates and the ſenate, to be held by her in the ſame manner as in ancient times; ſo that from the bleſſings of a mild government, the nation began to aſſume a new form; and to recover from the miſeries into which it had been plunged. In this manner things were conducted with great prudence, till the death of the late king; and his preſent majeſty, when he aſcended the throne, made ſuch proteſtations of his doing nothing without their advice and conſent, that thoſe perſons who are well acquainted with the heart of man, and the common occurrences of life, would have imagined that he intended to deceive.

But notwithſtanding all the plauſible pretences and the ſtrenuous endeavours of the court party, no relaxation could be obtained in the articles which reſtricts the regal power, although the coronation had been delayed a conſiderable time for that purpoſe. The king was obliged to ſign all the articles in their original form, without any ſingle exception, and even to confirm them by oath. Indeed the articles were ſo numerons and ſo reſtrictive, that ſcarce any prince could have been brought to comply with them; but this king had ſo repeatedly profeſſed republican principles, that it might have been ſaid they were framed by himſelf.

Theſe affairs being ſettled, the coronation was conducted in the moſt magnificent manner, and every demonſtration of joy was diſplayed on that occaſion. He was next day waited on by the ſenate and the four orders of the diet, and the ſpeech made to them by the king was one of the moſt lively and animated that we meet with in hiſtory. There was, however, ſomething of ambiguity in it; for ſpeaking of the articles he had ſigned, he ſaid, "Unhappy is that king who wants the tie of oaths to ſecure himſelf on the throne, and who, not aſſured of the hearts of his ſubjects, is conſtrained to reign by the laws, when he cannot by the love of his people." Such was the manner in which this prince began his reign, and what were his views will appear afterwards.

The diet ſtill continued ſitting, when thoſe ſchemes that had been hatching began to reveal themſelves. As it was neceſſary the experiment ſhould be made at a conſiderable diſtance from the capital, in order that it might in ſome degree operate before the ſenate or diet ſhould receive information of it, and might thereby acquire a conſiderable degree of ſtrength, before their attempt to cruſh it could take place, it was reſolved that it ſhould break out where ſuch of the military were quartered as the court could confide in.

Scania, a province in the ſouth-weſt extremity of Sweden, and about 250 miles from Stockholm, was the place pitched upon; for as that province is only ſeparated from Denmark by the Sound, conſequently great numbers of the military are conſtantly quartered in it. It was agreed, that the king ſhould remain in Stockholm; that his brother, prince Charles, ſhould ſet out for Chriſtianſtadt, under pretence of meeting his mother, who had been on a viſit to the court of Berlin; and prince Frederick Adolphus went into the neighbouring province of Oſtragothia, which lies in the way from Stockholm, under pretence of drinking the mineral waters.

Every thing being now in as good order as poſſible, one Hellichins, a captain of foot, having brought over his company to join him, the magazines and arms were ſeized on, and then he cauſed a manifeſto to be publiſhed and diſtributed among the people to the following purport: That thoſe perſons who called themſelves the ſtates of Sweden had not only uſurped that power, but had likewiſe by their arbitrary proceedings brought the nation to a ſtate of ruin: that they had entered into foreign connections without the conſent of either the king or the people; and although the people were in a manner ſtarving, yet no corn had been brought into the country to relieve their preſſing neceſſities: that under pretence of promoting the good of the ſubjects, they had made the moſt oppreſſive taxes: that they had ſtripped the king of the regal power, and left him no more than an empty title; ſo that however willing he might be to redreſs their grievances, yet it was not in his power. For theſe reaſons, and for many others that might be mentioned, they renounced all allegiance to this pretended diet, and exhorted all faithful Swedes to join with them in ſuppreſſing an order that had brought ſuch evils upon the kingdom. They concluded, in the uſual ſtrain, with an appeal to heaven, of the rectitude of their motives and intentions; at the ſame time, begging for the divine bleſſing upon their undertakings.

From theſe particulars it will appear, that this manifeſto had been firſt fabricated in the king's cabinet; and that Hellichins, who publiſhed it, was no more than a tool for that purpoſe, and had previouſly been inſtructed to act his part. The whole garriſon of Chriſtianſtadt declared in favour of the manifeſto, and they were ſoon joined by great numbers of peaſants from different parts of the country.

Prince Charles, who was then at Carelſcroon, no ſooner heard of the revolt, than he aſſembled the forces in the neighbourhood, and took upon him the command of the garriſon, in which was a great magazine of arms and ammunition. He then cauſed a manifeſto to be publiſhed, of ſo myſterious a nature, that no perſon could well know what part he intended to act. He ſaid, he could not behold with indifference the flames of civil war breaking out in his dear native country; and therefore he was determined to ſuppreſs the inſurrection, and deſired that all thoſe who wiſhed well to their country would follow his ſtandard. Accordingly, having placed ſuch a garriſon in Carelſcroon as he could depend on, he put himſelf at the head of the remainder of the troops, and began his march to Chriſtianſtadt, with ſeveral pieces of cannon. His brother prince Frederick, taking the ſame advantage of the inſurrection, put himſelf at the head of the troops of Oſtragothia, before any news had reached Stockholm. In the mean time general Rudbeck, who happened to be then in Oſtragothia, ſet out for Stockholm, and having informed the ſenate of theſe proceedings, and ſhewn them prince Charles's manifeſto, there remained no doubt what were the real intentions of the court.

As the guards were firmly attached to the king, the ſenate did not chuſe to truſt them, nor did they conſult the king upon any thing. They ordered the burghers to put themſelves under arms, and take their ſtations in different parts of the city, under the command of count Halling; who was alſo conſidered as prime miniſter. All this time the king ſeemed perfectly eaſy; but when the ſenate ſent him an order to ſign for recalling his brother, he refuſed to do it; but the refuſal was not regarded, for they put both the king's ſeal and name to it.

Though the king ſeemed totally inactive with reſpect to theſe important tranſactions, yet it is evident that he was taking the moſt effectual meaſures to accompliſh the great deſign he had in view; to the ſucceſs of which nothing contributed ſo much as the ſecrecy and ſilence with which they were conducted. The ſenate had ſent for two regiments from Upland, and upon their arrival the king aſſembled the ſenate, demanding to know why they had ſent for troops without his conſent. Upon that they, in a manner, commanded him to ſhew ſome letters that had been ſent him by his brothers? but this he refuſed to comply with in the moſt poſitive manner. The altercation between him and the ſenators grew warm; and one of them proceeded ſo far as to attempt to ſeize his ſword, upon which he boldly drew it, and the ſenators were ſo much frightened, that he had an opportunity of getting out of the door, which he locked behind him, and put the key in his pocket.

Having thus cooped up the ſenators, he went to the guard room, where he aſſembled the officers, and made a long ſpeech to them, complaining of the miſeries the people groaned under, from the abuſe of power in the ſenators, and that this cruel tyranny became every day more and more intolerable.

He told them further, that he was determined to run all hazards to get rid of them, and aſked the officers whether they would not aſſiſt their king in ſhaking off ſo ignominious a yoke, and reſtore the nation to its antient liberty. To this propoſal the officers in general aſſented with great readineſs, as well as the ſoldiers; upon which the king aſked them, if they would take an oath of allegiance to him? which they as readily complied with.

Every thing being thus far conducted, the king, in conſequence of a previous conſultation with his friends, had a white linen handkerchief round his arm, as a ſignal; upon which many of the nobility and gentry flocked to him. He then put himſelf at the head of the guards, and ſeized on all the magazines, without ſo much as one perſon venturing to oppoſe him.

The whole garriſon of Stockholm, although commanded by baron Rudbeck, who hated the king, deſerted their leader, and followed the king's ſtandard. The old baron ran with his ſword drawn through the ſtreets, calling out to the people to take arms in defence of their liberties; but it was too late, for they imagined they might live as happily under one tyrant as under five hundred.

Thus, in a large nation, a revolution was brought about without bloodſhed, tumult, or the leaſt oppoſition; while the people flocked together in the ſame inoffenſive manner as if they had been going to ſee ſome holiday ſports. The king then repaired to the caſtle, where having aſſembled the foreign miniſters, he told them, that it was with the utmoſt reluctance he had been obliged to take ſuch a ſtep, as would ſurprize all Europe; but the ſafety of his own perſon, and the ſecurity of the ſtate, rendered it abſolutely neceſſary. He entreated them to inform their reſpective courts, that his motives, when made known, would juſtify them; and that this affair ſhould not make the leaſt alteration in his conduct with reſpect to the other European powers. The next morning all the magiſtrates took an oath to obey none but the king, and ſuch of the ſenators or deputies who refuſed to take it were committed to priſon, and told, that unleſs they complied within one month, they muſt for ever depart out of the kingdom.

The following day being appointed for aboliſhing the old form of government, and the eſtabliſhment of the new, the king ordered the ſtates to be aſſembled for that purpoſe. Previous to this, guards had been placed round the hall of the palace, ſo that there was not the leaſt doubt but his orders would be punctually obeyed. The king entered the hall in his regalia, and having made a long ſpeech, complained of the ſenate for having preſumed to act as if in a legiſlative capacity, without power from the diet. He ſaid, that the diet on the one hand, and the ſenate on the other, ſeemed to claim each a ſeparate power, while himſelf, though honoured with the title of king, enjoyed no more than the ſhadow of royalty. He concluded by telling them, that the ſenate had actually preſumed to receive ſubſidies from foreign powers, whoſe counſels governed Sweden; but that he would now aſſert the honour of his crown, and promote the intereſts of his loyal and peaceable ſubjects.

The king took a moſt ſolemn oath, by which he renounced all claims to arbitrary power; after which he cauſed the new form of government to be read. It conſiſted of fifty-ſeven articles, but they may be all comprized in the following: That the king ſhall, for the future, chuſe the ſenate, or, in other words, he ſhould appoint to that office ſuch as he approved of: that he ſhall aſſemble the ſtates when he pleaſes, and likewiſe, when he pleaſes, diſſolve their meeting, ſo as they have ſat at one time full three months: that the taxes ſhall be granted by the ſtates; but if not granted within three months after their meeting, then the old ones ſhall be levied. In caſe of any ſudden exigence, ſuch as the fear of invaſion, the king ſhall impoſe taxes till ſuch times as the ſtates can be called together: that when the ſtates are aſſembled, they are not to deliberate on any thing but what the king ſhall cauſe to be laid before them: that the king ſhall have full power to diſpoſe of the army and navy in whatever manner he pleaſes, and likewiſe to give away all places, either in the civil or military departments.

When all the articles were read, the king ſtood up, and aſked the ſtates, Whether they would give their oath to obſerve the form of government? As they knew that it was in vain to diſpute, they all conſented with one voice; after which they were immediately ſworn in the king's preſence, and the ſpeakers of each order ſigned a bond in name of the reſt.

The great work being thus finally accompliſhed, the king ſtood up, and told them, that it was neceſſary they ſhould return thanks to God for bringing about ſo happy an event, without the effuſion of human blood; and then taking a book out of his pocket, the whole aſſembly joined with him in ſinging Te Deum, according to the cuſtom of the Lutherans. They were then permitted to kiſs his hand; after which the king departed, and the ſtates ſeparated, without knowing whether they were ever to meet again.

Next day, all the old ſenators were diſmiſſed, and, in their room, fifteen noblemen were appointed, on whoſe attachment to him he could, with the moſt unſhaken confidence, rely.

This prince was too much of a politician not to ingratiate himſelf with the lower claſs of people; and as the diſtreſſes of the poor were then very great, in order to throw the greater odium on the ſenate, he cauſed 10,000 meaſures of meal to be diſtributed among them, each meaſure weighing twenty pounds; which, although far from being ſufficient to relieve all their wants, anſwered the end deſigned, namely, to endear himſelf the more to them. He alſo cauſed the forces to be kept in conſtant pay. But now every thing ſeemed totally changed; for, inſtead of enquiring into the conduct of the king, as had been cuſtomary on former occaſions, each order of the ſtates ſtrove who ſhould be the firſt to flatter him, and every thing he aſked was granted, without one diſſenting voice. The ſupplies were granted in the moſt laviſh manner; and a ſecret committee being choſen from each order of the ſtates, to aſſiſt the ſenate, the king diſmiſſed them, and they returned to their reſpective habitations with as much good humour as if he had been conferring with them on the moſt valuable privileges.

It may be conſidered as one of the extraordinary circumſtances of this extraordinary revolution, that not a drop of blood, either by legal or military execution, was ſhed in the progreſs, or in conſequence of it: a ſtriking inſtance, how much the manners of mankind have been ſoftened within a few ages; and, that whatever progreſs the meaner or buſier qualities of the mind may have made, the more terrible ones, which proceed from cruelty and ferocity, are, in a great meaſure, worn out. Indeed, too much cannot be ſaid of the extraordinary wiſdom and ſuperior abilities diſplayed by the king in the whole of his conduct. The profound diſſimulation with which he covered his deſigns, by putttng on the republican cloak, ſo as to elude the eyes of a whole nation, and to eſcape the vigilant attention of thoſe whom age and experience had rendered both cautious and ſuſpicious, cannot be paralleled in hiſtory, eſpecially when we conſider that it was performed by one ſo young. He never ſeemed irritated by any paſſion, but ſolidity regulated his judgment, and prudence directed his hands.

About the ſame time that the above remarkable revolution took place in Sweden, another of a very ſingular nature happened in Denmark: the particulars of which we ſhall give in the words of an intelligent gentleman who made the moſt minute enquiries concerning it, and wrote this narrative in the metropolis of Denmark. "I have, ſays he, made it my endeavour, ſince my arrival here, to gain the moſt authentic, and unprejudiced intelligence reſpecting the late celebrated and unhappy favourite count Struenſee, and the late extraordinary revolution which expelled a queen from her throne and kingdom, and brought the miniſters to the ſcaffold. Struenſee had not any noble blood in his veins, or, conſequently, any hereditary and preſcriptive title to the immediate guidance of affairs of ſtate. Fortune, and a train of peculiar circumſtances coinciding with his own talents and addreſs, ſeem to have drawn him from his native mediocrity of condition, and placed him in an elevated rank. He originally practiſed phyſic at Altena, on the Elbe, and afterwards attended the preſent king of Denmark, on his travels into England, in quality of phyſician. On his return, he advanced, by rapid ſtrides, in the royal favour; and ſeems to have eminently poſſeſſed the powers of pleaſing, ſince he became equally the favourite of both king and queen. He was inveſted with the order of St. Matilda, inſtituted in honour of her majeſty, created a count, and poſſeſſed unlimited miniſterial power; his conduct, in this ſudden and uncommon eminence, marks a bold and daring mind, perhaps I might add, an expanded and patriotic heart. Unawed by the precarious tenure of courtly greatneſs, and more peculiarly of his own, he began a general reform. The ſtate felt him through all her members; the finances, chancery, army, navy, nobles, peaſants, all were ſenſible of his influence. He not only dictated, but penned his replies to every important queſtion or diſpatch; and a petition, or a ſcheme of public import and utility, rarely waited two hours for an anſwer. At preſent, I am told, you may be two months without receiving any.

The civil judicature of this capital was then veſted in 30 magiſtrates. Struenſee ſent a meſſage to this tribunal, deſiring to know the annual ſalary or penſion annexed to each member; rather alarmed at this enquiry, they ſent an anſwer, in which they diminiſhed their emoluments near two thirds, and eſtimated them at 1500, inſtead of 4000 rix-dollars. The count then informed them, that his majeſty had no farther occaſion for their ſervices; but, in his royal munificence and liberality, was graciouſly pleaſed to continue to them the third part of their avowed incomes, as a proof of his ſatiſfaction of their conduct. He, at the ſame time, conſtituted another court compoſed only of ſix perſons of integrity, to whom the ſame power was delegated. He proceeded to purge the chancery and other bodies of the law. Then entering on the military department, he, at one ſtroke, broke all the horſe guards, and afterwards the regiment of Norwegian foot-guards, the fineſt corps in the ſervice, and who were not diſbanded without a ſhort, but very dangerous ſedition. Still perſevering in this ſalutary, but moſt critical and perilous atchievement, he ultimately began to attempt a diminution of the nobles, and to ſet the farmers and peaſants at perfect liberty; no wonder that he fell a victim to ſuch meaſures; and that all parties joined in his deſtruction. Theſe were his real crimes, and not that he was too acceptable to the queen, which only formed a pretext. It was the miniſter, and not the man, who had become obnoxious. I do not pretend, in the latter capacity, either to excuſe or condemn him; but, as a politician, I rank him with the Clarendons and Mores, whom tyranny, or public buſineſs and want of virtue have brought, in almoſt every age, to an untimely and ignominious exit, but to whoſe memory impartial poſterity have done ample juſtice. Yet I muſt avow, that though I cannot think Struenſee made a bad uſe, yet he certainly made a violent and imprudent one of his extenſive power. He ſeems, if one may judge by his actions, to have been intoxicated with royal favour, and ſuch accumulated honours, and not to have adverted ſufficiently to the examples which hiſtory furniſhes of Wolſeys in former days, and of Choiſeuls in modern times, who moſt ſtrikingly evince the ſlippery foundation of political grandeur. When he was even preſſed, only a ſhort time before his ſeizure, to withdraw from court and paſs the Belts, with the moſt ample ſecurity for his annual remitment of forty, fifty, or even an hundred thouſand dollars, an unhappy faſcination detained him, in defiance of every warning, and reſerved him for the priſon and the block. The queen-dowager and prince Frederic were only the feeble inſtruments to produce this cataſtrophe, as being, by their rank, immediately about the perſon of the ſovereign, though common report has talked loudly of the former's intrigue, and attributed it to her imaginary abilities. The only mark of capacity or addreſs they exhibited, was in preſerving a ſecrecy which deluded Struenſee and the queen Matilda, till the time of their being arreſted. I have been aſſured, that on the laſt levee-day preceding this event, the count was habited with uncommon magnifience, and never received greater homage, or court ſervility from the crowd, than when on the verge of ruin. On the night fixed for his ſeizure, there was a ball paré in the palace. The queen, after dancing as uſual one country dance with the king, gave her hand to Struenſee during the reſt of the evening. She retired about two in the morning, and was followed by him and count Brandt. The moment was now come; the queen dowager, and her ſon prince Frederic haſtened to the king's private chamber, where he was already in bed. They kneeled down beſide him, and implored him, with tears and expoſtulations, to ſave himſelf and Denmark from impending deſtruction, by arreſting thoſe whom they called the authors of it. It is ſaid the king was not eaſily induced to ſign the order, but did it with reluctance and heſitation. At length their entreaties prevailed, and he affixed his ſign manual to the paper. Colonel Koller Banner inſtantly repaired to Struenſee's apartment, which, as well as Brandt's, was in the palace: they were both ſeized at nearly the ſame inſtant, and as all defence was vain, hurried away immediately to the citadel. When count Struenſee ſtepped out of the coach, he ſaid, with a ſmile, to the commandant, "I believe you are not a little ſurprized at ſeeing me brought here as a priſoner." "No, and pleaſe your excellence, replied the old officer bluntly, I am not at all ſurprized, but, on the contrary, have long expected you." It was five o'clock in the morning when count Rantzaw came to the door of her majeſty's anti-chamber, and knocked for admittance. One of the women about the queen's perſon was ordered to wake her, and give her information that ſhe was arreſted: they then put her into one of the king's coaches, drove her down to Elſineur, and ſhut her up in the caſtle of Cronenburgh. Mean while they dreaded an inſurrection in Copenhagen; every military precaution was taken to prevent it; the moſt infamous and ſilly reports were circulated among the populace, to render the ſtate priſoners odious: that they had put poiſon into the king's coffee to deſtroy him; that they intended to declare him incapable of governing; to ſend the dowager-queen Juliana out of the kingdom, as well as her ſon prince Frederic; and to proclaim Matilda regent. To confirm theſe extraordinary and contradictory reports, the king himſelf, and his brother, appeared in a ſtate coach, and paraded through the ſtreets of the city, to ſhew himſelf unhurt, and as if eſcaped from the moſt horrid conſpiracy. During theſe tranſactions, Struenſee and Brandt were detained in the moſt rigorous impriſonment. They loaded the former with very heavy chains about his arms and legs, and he was at the ſame time fixed to the wall by an iron bar. I have ſeen the room, and can aſſure you it is not above 10 or 12 feet ſquare, with a little bed in it, and a miſerable iron ſtove; yet here, in this abode of miſery, did he, though chained, compleat, with a pencil, an account of his life and conduct as miniſter, which is penned, as I have been aſſured, with uncommon genius.

A tribunal was appointed for the trial of the queen and the two counts, and a council aſſigned for each, to preſerve an appearance of juſtice and equity. The reſult of this was, the latter were ſentenced to loſe their heads, and the queen to baniſhment."

The two counts were executed on the 28th of April in a field without the eaſtern gate of the city. A ſcaffold was erected nine yards in height and eight yards ſquare, whither both the priſoners were carried in hackney coaches; in the firſt of which went the attorney general, and ſome attendants. Brandt appeared firſt on the ſcaffold; he had on a gold laced hat, a green ſuit of cloaths, with gold binding, and boots. He ſpoke for ſome little time to Doctor Hee the clergyman; after which the ſentence was read and executed; and his head was ſeveral times expoſed to the view of an immenſe crowd of ſpectators. Next appeared Struenſee on the ſcaffold, accompanied by Dr. Munter, having his hat in his hand, and dreſſed in a blue ſuperfine ſuit: he converſed for a ſhort time with Dr. Munter; and then his ſentence was executed in the ſame manner as the foregoing; after which their bodies were carried to the uſual place of execution, to be there expoſed to the populace.

The crimes they were charged with were theſe: Struenſee was accuſed of having embezzled from the king's coffers a large ſum, amounting to 125,000l. ſterling; of having iſſued many orders from the cabinet without the king's knowledge; of having been guilty of criminal converſation with the queen; of having ſecreted from the king ſeveral letters ſent to his majeſty, &c.---Count Brandt was accuſed of having been privy to Struenſee's criminal converſation, and all his other crimes, without divulging them, and having laid violent hands on the king's majeſty, &c."

From the fate of theſe two noblemen may be ſeen the precariouſneſs of favouritiſm; and that thoſe who riſe rapidly generally fall with equivalent velocity.

> "He that in court ſecure will keep himſelf
> "Muſt not be great, for then he's envy'd at;
> "The ſhrub is ſafe, when as the cedar ſhakes;
> "For where the king doth love above compare,
> "Of others they as much more envy'd are."

> SHAKESPEARE.

The queen, after having her two children taken from her, was permitted, by the interceſſion of her royal brother the king of Great Britain, to retire to Zell, in his majeſty's German electorate dominions, where ſhe languiſhed for ſome time, and then died with grief.

No other material tranſactions than thoſe already mentioned happened abroad during the courſe of this year: we ſhall therefore now return, and proceed to a view of affairs at home.

The parliament met on the 26th of November; and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he informed the members, that his reaſon for calling them ſo ſoon was, to take into their conſideration ſome things of the utmoſt importance. He told them, that he had been informed, from the moſt undoubted authority, that the Eaſt-India Company was in a moſt diſtreſſed condition; and that, as many of his good ſubjects had their fortunes depending on the credit of that company, therefore its ſecurity was now become a national concern. He deſired them to take it into their immediate conſideration, and, if poſſible, lay down ſome rational plan, by which the intereſt and honour of the company might be reſtored, and every thing ſettled on the moſt permanent footing. He took notice, that he had the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from the powers on the continent, that the peace of Europe would not be any farther diſturbed than ſo far as the war was carried on between the Turks and Ruſſians. He concluded by recommending to them the moſt prudent methods that could be made uſe of, in order to reduce the price of proviſions, as the diſtreſſes of the poor were not imaginary, but real; and that nothing would give him greater pleaſure, than to hear that thoſe diſtreſſes were alleviated.

As ſoon as the commons returned to their own houſe, Mr. Fitzpatrick, brother to the earl of Oſſory, moved that a royal addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, and introduced the motion with the following remarks. He ſaid, that the affairs of the Eaſt-India company were in the moſt alarming and ruinous condition; that the immediate interpoſition of parliament was become highly indiſpenſable to their preſervation: that in 1769, the company had agreed with the government to pay the ſum of 4,000l. at every time when their dividend amounted to twelve per cent. and ſo on in proportion, till it fell to ſix, when that payment was to ceaſe: that this being the caſe, and the preſent diſtreſſed ſtate of the company ſo notorious, it would be neceſſary to make ſome proviſion adequate to the deficiency: that, ſo far from the company's being able to make a dividend of either twelve or ſix per cent. at the end of the next half year, it would be an act of the higheſt fraud in the directors to divide a ſingle ſhilling. Some of the members oppoſed the addreſs; but the vote being put, it was carried in the affirmative by a very great majority, and preſented accordingly.

The firſt thing of importance which came under the conſideration of the houſe of commons, was the preſent ſtate of the navy, and this occaſioned very warm debates. The objections made by thoſe in oppoſition were to the following import. They ſaid, that the number of ſeamen was too great to be kept up in time of profound peace; and that we were at peace with all our neighbours was declared in the ſpeech from the throne. It was further urged, that that the miniſtry had not given in an account in what manner the ſupplies granted laſt year had been uſed, ſo that the houſe was left quite in the dark.

The miniſtry, on the other hand, had but little to ſay; only that they urged the neceſſity of keeping our navy on the moſt reſpectable footing; and ſet forth, that our fleet in the Eaſt-Indies was now much greater than formerly. Thoſe in oppoſition ſaid, that when the public granted money, they had a right to enquire in what manner it was to be laid out, that the utmoſt ſatisfaction ought to be given thoſe who contributed towards ſupporting the dignity of government: that ſome of thoſe employed in the building of ſhips for the royal navy had added to them ſome very extraordinary decorations, which, although wholly unneceſſary, had been attended with great expence. It was added that the ſlow payment of the navy bills was a great hardſhip to thoſe who advanced money on the credit of them; that ſuch an abuſe ought to be redreſſed before any farther ſupplies were granted: that it was very ſurpriſing, that, after the declaration from the throne, that we were in the moſt profound ſtate of peace, as many men ſhould be aſked for as if we were at war with the moſt formidable power in Europe.

Upon the whole, the arguments were carried on with great heat by thoſe in oppoſition; and certainly nothing could be more reaſonable than to lay before the people a ſtate of the public affairs, that they might be ſatisfied whether their money had been laid out in promoting the purpoſes for which it was given. It was aſked, If a naval force muſt be kept up in the Eaſt-Indies, what end it was to anſwer? Had we any enemy to oppoſe in that part of the world; and if ſo, who was that enemy? What armament had been ſent into thoſe ſeas to diſturb our ſettlement, or haraſs our trade? It was farther aſked, in an ironical manner, Whether the Chineſe had fitted out a fleet, whether we had any pirates to contend with, and whether the ghoſt of the famous Angria had made its appearance on the theatre of this world? If no anſwer could be made to theſe queſtions, if no reaſon could be aſſigned for keeping up ſuch a ſtrong naval force, then the motion ought to be rejected, and no money granted for that purpoſe, ſeeing there was no reaſon for it, unleſs it was to burthen the people with unneceſſary taxes. But, notwithſtanding the force of theſe arguments, no ſooner was the queſtion put, than it was carried for the miniſtry by a great majority, and the ſupplies were granted.

This buſineſs being finiſhed, a motion was made to enquire into the nature of thoſe cauſes which occaſioned the dearth of all ſorts of proviſions, but nothing was done that could be of any real ſervice to the public. Several regulations, indeed, were made with reſpect to bread, and ſome reſtrictions laid upon the bakers; but, unleſs the rents of landed eſtates and farms can be lowered, by the retrenchment of different ſpecies of luxury, the legiſlature itſelf will never be able to remedy the evils complained of. To redreſs any grievances, nothing can be more proper, nothing more ſalutary, than to begin with the effects, and trace them up to the original cauſes from whence they ſpring. In vain does the legiſlative power lay the inferior order of tradeſmen under ſome ſort of reſtrictions, when, at the ſame time, it is well known, that unleſs the cauſes are removed, the effects muſt remain in the ſame ſtate as before. Moſt of thoſe who compoſe our houſes of parliament are landholders; and if they know that the rents of their farms are double to what they were twenty years ago, conſequently, the prices of all ſorts of proviſions muſt riſe in proportion.

A ſecret committee having been appointed to enquire into the ſtate of the Eaſt-India company's affairs, it was found, by their report, that the affairs of the company were both perplexed, and very much diſtreſſed. It was therefore propoſed, that ſuperviſors ſhould be ſent out to the Eaſt-Indies, to make a proper enquiry how far the officers and ſervants belonging to the company had abuſed the truſt repoſed in them, and to have power to grant redreſs to all thoſe who thought themſelves in the leaſt injured. Some of the members whoſe fortunes lay in the Eaſt-India ſtock, made ſtrong objections to this bill, while thoſe who ſupported it retorted upon them, by declaring, that nothing but oppreſſion had been carried on in that part of the world; and as the company had, either directly or indirectly, encouraged ſuch practices, it was now high time to call them to an account for their conduct, and prevent them, for the future, from acting in ſuch a manner as could ſerve no other end beſides that of diſgracing themſelves, and bringing a real diſhonour upon the nation. At laſt the motion was carried in the uſual manner; and ſuperviſors were appointed, with plenary powers to make a proper enquiry into all the abuſes complained of, and to rectify them as far as lay in their power.

A motion was next made to enquire into the ſtate of the army; and particularly, whether it was neceſſary that we ſhould, in times of peace, keep up ſuch a ſtrong military force as ſeemed of no other uſe but to impoveriſh the nation, and to be ready at all times to ſupport the arbitrary dictates of a miniſter. It was ſaid by thoſe who promoted the motion, that the national militia was at all times able to preſerve us from our enemies at home; and as for ſuch ſettlements as we had broad, a very ſmall force was ſufficient, eſpecially as we were not engaged in a war with any of the powers on the continent. In anſwer to this, the miniſtry ſaid, that all other European nations kept up ſtanding armies, and therefore it was, in a manner, neceſſary that we ſhould do the ſame, otherwiſe, if a war was to break out, we ſhould be utterly unprepared, and, conſequently, we ſhould be expoſed to many unforeſeen dangers. In this affair the miniſtry carried their point, the motion being objected to by a great majority.

A. D. 1773. The firſt buſineſs the parliament entered on after the holidays was, to take into conſideration the acts relating to penalties inflicted on thoſe who infringed the laws reſpecting the preſervation of the game. As this ſubject is of great importance to the inhabitants of a free country, it was diſcuſſed both upon natural and municipal principles. It is certain that every thing which ſeems to have an exiſtence upon natural principles, will at all times attract the notice of the public; and ſuch as may, probably, have no concern in the diſpute, will, notwithſtanding, intereſt themſelves in it. Thus a wild beaſt in the fields has been, time immemorial, conſidered as the property of the public; and if either its fleſh or ſkin were of any value, then the perſon who took or killed it was to conſider it as his own. In proof of this, it may be added, that ſome of the Anglo-Saxon kings remitted the tax which the Welch uſed to pay, upon condition that they produced a certain number of wolves heads, by which means that deſtructive ſpecies of animals was eradicated out of the country.

It was urged, on the other hand, that whatever might be the privileges belonging to men in a ſtate of nature, they were all cancelled as ſoon as civil ſociety took place: that all municipal laws were made for the good of ſociety, and in the preamble to every act, reaſons were aſſigned for the conduct of the legiſlative power. One reaſon, indeed, was declared to be unanſwerable, and that was, that in a commercial nation, where every perſon is ſuppoſed to get his living by honeſt induſtry, the purſuit of game ought in general to be laid under the ſevereſt reſtrictions: that poaching, or killing of game, led the lower order of people away from their lawful employments; and while they were ſpending their time in taking a hare or a fox, their families were left to ſtarve: that although the laws made for the preſervation of the game might ſeem to interfere with private property, yet they were ſuch as would ſtand warranted by good ſenſe and ſober reaſon. Nothing, however, was done on this ſubject. The miniſtry promoted the bill, in order to acquire ſome ſhare of popularity; and the patriots oppoſed it, merely for the ſake of oppoſition.

Some diſorders having happened in the Weſt-Indies, a committee was appointed to make a proper enquiry into the cauſes, and to report to the houſe, whether the things complained of originated from the arbitrary proceedings of the governors, or the refractory conduct of the people. The miniſtry did all they could to ſupport this enquiry, but, after the committee had examined a great number of witneſſes, no ſatisfactory account could be obtained, and things ſtood on the ſame footing as before.

A motion was now made, that the houſe ſhould reſolve itſelf into a committee, to enquire into the propriety of foreigners being connected in our trade to any parts of the world, excluſive of Europe. This motion took its riſe from the following cauſe, namely, the power granted to the lords of the admiralty to ſtop all ſhips which are not wholly the property of Britiſh ſubjects. It was proved, by the evidence of ſeveral witneſſes, that ſome ſhips had been detained at Graveſend a whole month, for no other reaſon, but becauſe part of the cargoes belonged to foreign merchants. The reſult of all this was, that leave was given to bring in a bill to remedy the evil, which having paſſed both houſes received the royal aſſent.

It is a maxim in the law of nature, that juſtice ſhould be freely adminiſtered at the expence of the whole community, becauſe it is ſuppoſed to be done for the preſervation of the whole; and it will often happen, eſpecially in large communities, that an innocent perſon may be accuſed of crimes, thrown into a priſon, and brought to a public trial. It is true, he may, from a variety of circumſtances, be able to prove his own innocence; yet, when the jury has acquitted him, he cannot be diſcharged, in many parts of England, till ſuch times as he has paid certain fees to the gaoler. Long, indeed, had this practice been a diſgrace to the nation, till, about fifty years ago, the city of London, at the inſtance of baron Thompſon, their recorder, ſet the example of diſcharging every priſoner without fees as ſoon as he was acquitted by the jury. The noble generoſity of the citizens of London was not, however, adopted by thoſe who lived in more diſtant counties. No proviſion was made to defray the expences of diſcharging felons from priſon; ſo that inſtances were produced of ſome poor men lying a whole year in gaol, becauſe they could not pay their fees. To remedy an evil of ſo glaring a nature, a bill was brought in to oblige every county to make good all the deficiencies incurred to the gaolers by keeping the priſoners. To the honour of the preſent age, let it be here remembered, that a bill, formed by the heart of charity, and ſupported by benevolence, paſſed with the almoſt unanimous conſent of the houſe. In conſequence of this humane reſolution, the priſoner who is now acquitted muſt be diſcharged without paying his fees. The verdict of the jury ſhall make him as free as if he had never been in priſon; he may go from the bar to his own family without being called in queſtion, or detained for any fees whatever; his impriſonment being conſidered as a great puniſhment, after his innocence has been proved.

The parliamentary buſineſs being finiſhed, on the 1ſt of July his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and after ſigning ſuch bills as were ready, prorogued the parliament.

A ſhort time before the cloſe of the ſeſſions, his majeſty made an excurſion to Portſmouth, in order to inſpect the ſtate of the dock-yard, forts, &c. at that place; as alſo to review the fleet aſſembled at Spithead for that purpoſe. The particulars of this royal excurſion were as follow:

Early in the morning of the 22d of June his majeſty ſet out from Kew, and arrived at Portſmouth between ten and eleven o'clock the ſame morning, where he was received by a royal ſalute of twenty-one guns. On his majeſty's entering the Land Port Gate, he was ſaluted by a triple diſcharge of 232 pieces of cannon mounted on the ramparts of Portſmouth, at Blockhouſe fort, and at South-ſea Caſtle. His majeſty then proceeded through the town to the Dock-yard, and arrived at the commiſſioner's houſe a little before eleven o'clock. The artificers and workmen belonging to the yard, being all aſſembled at the houſe, gave three cheers as his majeſty entered, and then immediately diſperſed, and returned to their ſeveral employments.

After his majeſty had taken ſome refreſhment, he went to the governor's houſe in the town, attended by a great number of the nobility, and there held a public levee, at which a great number of the officers of the navy and army were preſent, as alſo many gentlemen of the country, who, on this occaſion, came to pay their duty to his majeſty. The mayor, recorder, aldermen and burgeſſes of the town of Portſmouth, alſo waited on his majeſty with a dutiful and loyal addreſs. They were all graciouſly received, and had the honour to kiſs the king's hand; after which his majeſty was pleaſed to confer the honour of knighthood on John Carter, eſq. the mayor.

When the levee was over, his majeſty returned to the dock-yard, and about two o'clock embarked in a barge (in which the royal ſtandard was immediately hoiſted) attended by the earl of Sandwich, firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty, and ſeveral others of the nobility. He then proceeded to Spithead, attended by the barge of the board of admiralty, with the flag of their office, the three admirals of the ſquadron (which conſiſted of twenty ſhips of the line, two frigates and three ſloops with their flags) and all the captains of the fleet with their pendants in their barges.

As ſoon as his majeſty arrived at Spithead, he went on board the Barfleur of 90 guns, where he was received by the board of admiralty, the captain being at the head of the accommodation ladder, and the ſide manned by the lieutenants of the ſhips. When his majeſty paſſed the guard of marines on the quarter-deck, the flag of the lord high admiral, which was then flying, was ſtruck, and the royal ſtandard hoiſted at the main-top-maſt head, and the union flag at the mizen-top maſt head: on the ſight of which all the ſhips, except the Barfleur, ſaluted with 21 guns each. The ſhip being cleared the ſame as for action, and the officers and men at their reſpective quarters, his majeſty (after the nobility and the flag officers had paid their duty to him on the quarter deck) walked fore and aft on the lower gun deck, and took a circumſpect view of the whole.

At half an hour after three o'clock his majeſty ſat down to a table of thirty covers, at which many of the nobility and perſons of diſtinction, as well as officers of the navy and army of the rank of colonel and upwards, were admitted to the honour of dining. After dinner, the queen's health being drank, the whole fleet ſaluted with twenty-one guns; and, on his majeſty's retiring from table, his health was likewiſe drank with the ſame ſalute.

At ſix o'clock his majeſty left the Barfleur, and went on board the Auguſta yacht, where he was received by the board of admiralty. The royal ſtandard, with the lord high admiral's flag and the union flag were immediately hoiſted, as they had been on board the Barfleur; and his majeſty ſailed into the harbour. The ſhips at Spithead ſaluted in the ſame manner as when his majeſty came out, and the admirals and captains attended him to the harbour's mouth; after which they returned to their reſpective ſhips. His majeſty landed at the dock about eight o'clock, and returned to the commiſſioner's houſe, where he reſided during the whole time of his ſtay at Portſmouth.

The next morning (Wedneſday June 23) about eight o'clock his majeſty began to view the dock-yard, the ſhips building and repairing, and the reſpective magazines. At eleven he went in his barge, and proceeded up the harbour to view the ſhips lying in ordinary; three of which his majeſty went on board of, viz. the Britannia, a firſt rate, of 100 guns; the Royal William, a ſecond rate, of 84 guns; and the Defiance, a third rate of 64 guns. At half an hour after two his majeſty went off to Spithead to dine on board the Barfleur, attended by the commiſſioners of the admiralty, the flag officers and captains in their barges as before. At ſix o'clock his majeſty went from the Barfleur on board the Auguſta Yacht, and ſailed towards St. Helen's till near eight, and then ſtood in for the harbour; but, it falling calm, his majeſty left the yatcht, and was rowed to the dock in his barge, where he arrived at half an hour after nine, the ſhips and fortifications ſaluting, and the flag officers and captains attending him to the mouth of the harbour, as they had done the day before.

Thurſday June 24. At ſix o'clock in the morning his majeſty went to the gun-wharf, where he was received by the maſter-general of the Ordnance, the lieutenant-general and principal officers of that department, and minutely viewed the magazines, artillery and ſtores. At ſeven his majeſty returned to the dock-yard, and viewed ſuch parts of the yard, magazines, and works carrying on, as he had not ſeen before. At ten his majeſty went on board the Venus, a frigate of 36 guns, lying in ordinary, and from thence he went to Weovil, where he viewed the brewery, cooperage and magazines, and then returned to the dock. At two o'clock his majeſty went off to Spithead, in the ſame ſtate as on the preceding days, to dine on board the Barfleur. At half after five he went on board the Auguſta Yacht, attended as before, and, having ſailed through part of the line of ſhips, ſtood into the harbour, and landed at the dock at half after ſeven, the flag officers and captains attending his majeſty in their barges to the mouth of the harbour, and the fortifications ſaluting as on the former days.—His majeſty this day conferred the honour of knighthood on vice-admiral Pye, and likewiſe promoted him to the rank of admiral of the blue. He alſo conferred the honour of knighthood on Richard Spry, rear admiral of the white; captain Knight of the Ocean, Captain Edward Vernon, of the Barfleur, and Captain Richard Bickerton, of the Auguſta yacht.

Friday, June 25. Between five and ſix in the morning his majeſty went from the dock-yard to view the new works and fortifications of Portſmouth, beginning from the fartheſt part of the common round to the ſaluting platform. At ſeven his majeſty returned to the dock, and embarked on board the Auguſta yacht for Spithead, from whence he proceeded as far as Sandown Bay, where the ſtandard was ſaluted by the caſtle. About five o'clock his majeſty returned to Spithead, and after ſailing along the line of ſhips he ſtood towards the harbour, and came to an anchor within half a mile of South-Sea Caſtle, where his majeſty was attended by the admiral, the rear-admiral, and all the captains and lieutenants of the fleet at Spithead, who had ſeverally the honour of kiſſing his majeſty's hand. While the yacht was at anchor, the ramparts of the town being lined with land forces and marines, fired a feu de joy at ten o'clock, by a triple diſcharge of cannon and muſquetry all round the works; immediately after which the yacht weighed, proceeded into the harbour, and landed his majeſty at the dock at half paſt ten o'clock.

In all the proceſſions above-mentioned to Spithead and back again, the ſhores, both on the Portſmouth and Goſport ſides, were lined with an incredible number of people, who expreſſed their loyalty, by ſaluting his majeſty with guns, acclamations, and other demonſtrations of joy: and the houſes were illuminated every evening during his majeſty's ſtay.

The king was pleaſed to expreſs the higheſt approbation of the good order and diſcipline of his fleet, the excellent condition of the dock-yard, arſenals and garriſon, and the regularity with which every thing was conducted; and ſhewed the utmoſt ſatisfaction of the demonſtration of loyalty and affection with which he was received by all ranks of people.

His majeſty ſet out from the commiſſioner's houſe at Portſmouth about 7 o'clock on the Saturday morning, and arrived at Kew in perfect health about two o'clock in the afternoon.

Previous to his majeſty's departure from Portſmouth, he was pleaſed to order the following ſums to be diſtributed, viz.

To the artificers, workmen and labourers of the dock-yard, victualling office, and gun-wharf, 1500l.

To the companies of the Barfleur and Auguſta yacht, and the crew of his majeſty's barge, 350l.

To the poor of Portſmouth, Portſea and Goſport, 250l.

He was alſo pleaſed to make ſome other ſmall gratuities, and to releaſe the priſoners confined in Portſmouth jail.

With reſpect to the ſtate of affairs on the continent, particularly in Poland, and near the Danube, nothing deciſive happened during the whole of this year. Many different engagements happened, indeed, between the Turks and Ruſſians; but both parties continued ſtill in ſuch an uncertain ſtate, that they were obliged to act on the defenſive. Some propoſals indeed were made by each party, towards bringing about a peace, but nothing was done, for the Ruſſians were high in their demands, and the Turks were too proud to comply. The king of Pruſſia, that great politician and general, to whom even reſt is painful, propoſed, that the wretched kingdom of Poland ſhould be divided into three parts, in the following manner. That vaſt, extenſive tract of land, reaching from the Boriſthenes to Muſcovy, was to be ceded to the empreſs of Ruſſia; the emperor of Germany was to have the ſouthern parts of Great Poland from Warſaw to Cracovia, and from thence to the confines of Hungary. All that part of Poland which reaches from Warſaw along the Oder and Viſtula to Dantzick, and afterwards along the coaſt of the Baltic Sea, were to be given to the king of Pruſſia. Thus a nation, one of the moſt fertile in Europe, after being torn in pieces by inteſtine diviſions, was to become the property of three mighty ſovereigns who had no right to it beſides that of lawleſs power. The great object the artful king of Pruſſia had in view, was to ſieze the opulent town of Dantzick, in order to open a trade to Peterſburgh through the Sound, and to all the other mercantile ſtates in Europe. This was one of the boldeſt ſtrokes that could have been ſtruck; but in all things the king of Pruſſia is ſuch a maſter in politics, as well as the art of war, that no enterprize ſeems too difficult for him to engage in; his ambition was at this time, as it ſtill is, unbounded, notwithſtanding his advanced years ſeem to threaten a decay of nature.

In Italy the pope put a final end to the order of Jeſuits. This order has produced a great number of very eminent men, and has contribued more to the revival of learning, and to the advancement of knowledge in the church of Rome, than all the monaſtic orders put together; while at the ſame time their eagerneſs to intermeddle in political affairs was ſuppoſed to render them dangerous to ſtates, and their ſpeculative and metaphyſical opinions to religion and morality.

The pope's bull for the ſuppreſſion of this ſociety contains a great number of charges, which, in general, are looſe and voluminous, and rather comprehend a recapitulation of all the complaints that have been made againſt them from their firſt inſtitution, without regard to the proofs that were brought in their ſupport, or the deciſions that were paſſed upon them, than of direct accuſations. Thus are enumerated, early diſſentions among themſelves, and quarrels with other orders, as well as with the ſecular clergy, with the public ſchools, academies and univerſities, together with diſputes that aroſe upon the authority aſſumed or exerciſed by their general, and with the princes in whoſe countries they were received, with a long roll of ſuch general matters, without any particular obſervations on their nature, cauſes, or iſſue. An early appeal againſt them, not long after their inſtitution, by Philip II. of Spain, was with more propriety taken notice of; as were the appeals brought by ſeveral other ſovereigns ſince that time: and their late expulſion from France, Spain, Portugal, and Sicily, is among the number of their accuſations. They are particularly charged with an inſatiable avidity for temporal poſſeſſions, with diſturbing the peace of the church in Europe, Africa and America; of giving ſcandal in their miſſions, as well by quarrelling with other miſſionaries, and by invading their rights, as by the practice of idolatrous ceremonies in certain places, in contempt of thoſe approved by the church. Their doctrines are alſo attacked, and they are charged with giving uſes and applications to certain maxims, which are proſcribed as ſcandalous, and manifeſtly contrary to good morals; and of having adopted dangerous opinions, in matters of the greateſt moment and importance, with reſpect to the preſerving of the purity and integrity of the doctrines contained in the goſpel; and which are ſaid to be productive of the great evils and dangers to the church, as well as to ſome particular chriſtian ſtates.

After ſumming up theſe, and various other cauſes, for their diſſolution, particularly the preſervation of peace in the chriſtian republic, and their incapability in the preſent circumſtances of anſwering the purpoſe of their inſtitution, together with other motives reſerved in the breaſt of the ſovereign pontiff, all eccleſiaſtics, of whatever rank and dignity, and particularly thoſe who have been members of the ſociety, are forbidden, under ſentence of excommunication, to impugn, combat, or even to write or ſpeak about this ſuppreſſion, to enter into its reaſon or motives, or into any diſcuſſions about the inſtitute of the company, its form of government, or other circumſtances relating to it, without an expreſs permiſſion from the pontiff for that purpoſe.

In conſequence of this bull, on the 16th of Auguſt, ten biſhops went at night, attended by a detachment of Corſican ſoldiers, to all the colleges and houſes belonging to the Jeſuits in Rome, of which they took poſſeſſion, and having placed the neceſſary guards, the communities were aſſembled, and after the proper notices and forms were gone through, thoſe fathers delivered up their keys; and the locks of their archives being ſealed, and effects of all ſorts being ſecured, even to proviſions, they were allowed eight days to find new dwellings, and to quit the habit of the order. They at the ſame time gave up their ſchools, and reſigned all the functions of their miniſtry, of whatever ſort or nature. The bull extended to all countries whatever in which they were placed, and ſentence of excommunication was denounced againſt thoſe who ſhould harbour or conceal any of their effects.

Their general, father Ricis, was appointed to a biſhopric, and ſuch of the Jeſuits as were already in holy orders were allowed either to become ſecular clergymen, or to enter into other orders, having firſt ſerved the accuſtomed noviciate of that into which they were to enter; penſions were to be allowed out of their former poſſeſſions to thoſe who became ſecular clerks, and the biſhops, under whoſe juriſdiction they were totally to remain, had a diſcretionary power to admit ſuch of them as were remarkable for learning and purity of doctrine, to preach and to confeſs, from which they were totally reſtrained, without a written licence for that purpoſe. Thoſe who had through the laſt vows, or who, through age and infirmities, were unfit to enter into the world, were to be collected and placed in one or more of their antient houſes or colleges, where they were for ever reſtrained from preaching, confeſſion, and all the functions of their miniſtry, and only allowed to exiſt upon a trifling pittance for life; the biſhops being particularly charged to look to the ſtrict obſervance of theſe prohibitions. Such as were diſpoſed to dedicate their time to the inſtruction of youth were totally debarred from all ſhare in the government of thoſe colleges or ſchools in which they ſerved, and the ſtricteſt caution was preſcribed, that none ſhould be admitted to that ſervice, who did now ſhew themſelves averſe to all ſpirit of diſpute, and who were untainted with any doctrines that might occaſion or ſtir up frivolous and dangerous controverſies. The ſcholars and novices were returned to their reſpective homes, and thoſe who had only taken the firſt vows were diſcharged from them; and all the ſtatutes, rules, cuſtoms, decrees, and conſtitutions of the order, even though confirmed by oath, were totally annulled and abrogated.

Such was the final fate of this celebrated ſociety, which, with a very conſiderable ſtock of learning and abilities, had found means to render itſelf odious to all the nations and religions in the chriſtian world. The riches which were found in their houſes and colleges, whether in ſpecie, plate or jewels, were very inconſiderable, and greatly diſappointed the hopes of thoſe who expected to have found inexhauſtible treaſures in the ſearch. Whether the were able to evade the terrors of excommunication, and to elude the greater dangers, ariſing from they prying and rapacious eyes of covetouſneſs, by ſecreting their moſt valuable moveables, is ſtill a matter to be determined; though, with reſpect to any thing conſiderable, the probability is otherwiſe.

A. D. 1774. The parliament met on the 25th of January, and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty, who, in his ſpeech from the throne, recommended to them to take into their ſerious conſideration the ſtate of the colonies, who ſeemed to be attempting to throw off all ſubjection to the Britiſh government. He told them, that the moſt ſalutary laws had been treated with contempt, and publict acts of parliament had been deſpiſed, as if they had been the mandates of ſingle perſons: that the colonies were little better than in a ſtate of rebellion; and that, unleſs ſome vigorous meaſures were uſed to force them to obedience, all laws would be trampled under foot, and the regularity which took place among the different ranks of beings, would once more return to its original ſtate of confuſion. He concluded by recommending to them the ſtate of the gold coin, which had ſuffered much by the illicit practices of wicked perſons, and hoped they would put it on a ſolid foundation.

When the commons had returned to their own houſe, ſtrong debates enſued upon the words of the addreſs which ſhould be preſented to his majeſty. Thoſe in the intereſt of the court inſiſted, that an implicit acknowledgment ſhould be made, thanking his majeſty for his paternal care of the nation, and to promiſe that every reaſonable meaſure ſhould be complied with. On the other hand, it was urged by thoſe in oppoſition, that the colonies, ſo far from being in a ſtate of rebellion, were only contending for the enjoyment of thoſe rights and privileges which belong to all men in common as members of ſociety: that the mother country had no right to tax thoſe emigrants, unleſs a conſent to that meaſure was firſt had and obtained from their own repreſentatives: that the colonies were not regularly, nor in any ſenſe whatever repreſented in the Britiſh parliament; and therefore, till ſuch time as that legal repreſentation took place, no taxes could, in juſtice, be impoſed upon them. As to the affair of the gold coin, it was (ſaid they) a great hardſhip to the honeſt, induſtrious trading part of the nation; and that the miniſtry ought, before any thing of that nature had been propoſed, to have laid down ſome rational plan by which the public would have been indemnified. Such were the outlines of the arguments made uſe of by both parties; but the queſtion being put to the vote, it was carried by a great majority in favour of the court.

The grand object which the government had in view, was to reduce the colonies to a ſtate of obedience, and convince them of the neceſſity they were under of being ſubject to the mother-country; and therefore a bill was brought in of a very coercive nature. Three ſhips laden with tea, which had been ſent from England, were plundered by the people of Boſton, and their cargoes, conſiſting of 342 cheſts, thrown into the ſea. As this was an act which infringed on private property, it called aloud for the exertion of the regal power. Accordingly, an act paſſed to remove the cuſtoms from the town of Boſton, to quarter a military force upon the people, and to block up their harbour by ſeveral ſhips of war.

Many important affairs were diſcuſſed during this ſeſſion of parliament; and ſeveral uſeful acts were paſſed. Among theſe was one for the better regulation of the gold coin; and another relative to the naturalizing of foreigners. The freedom of this country is ſo great and uncircumſcribed, that many bad uſes had been made of it by deſigning perſons. To remedy an evil attended with ſo many deſtructive conſequences, a new law was eſtabliſhed, by which no foreigner naturalized ſhould enjoy the privileges of a Britiſh ſubject, unleſs he reſides in the country.

The parliamentary buſineſs being finiſhed, on the 22d of June his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and after ſigning ſuch bills [*] as were ready, cloſed the ſeſſion.

The attention of the miniſtry was at this time particularly engaged in providing for the ſafety of our fellow ſubjects in the Eaſt-Indies. It had long been complained of, that the ſervants of the company, at their principal ſettlements, had acted in a very oppreſſive and illegal manner, nor indeed had any code of laws been made for their ſecurity. The great diſtance from England rendered it difficult, and almoſt impoſſible, for any perſon to obtain redreſs. It was therefore reſolved in council, that four gentlemen learned in the laws, and of the moſt approved integrity, ſhould be ſent over to Aſia, where we have ſettlements, and act there as judges. They were to hold pleas of the crown, determine in real, mixed and perſonal actions, to give judgment in all caſes of equity, in every thing relating to the revenue, ſo that their power included all that is lodged in the courts of Weſtminſter-hall; but as the ſettlements are diſtant from each other, ſo the courts were not to be fixed, but to move from one place to another, that juſtice might be equally diſtributed to all ranks of people.

It is, perhaps, impoſſible to prevent abuſes, unleſs nature itſelf could be changed; but certainly the government could have done no more for the good of our ſubjects in India, than that of ſending out judges. It muſt ſerve to give ſome reſpect to the laws, and impreſs mens minds with a reverence for juſtice. The ſalaries of the judges being very large, they are placed above temptation to corrupt actions; and their authority extending over all ranks of perſons, the rich cannot have it in their power to oppreſs the poor.

The affairs on the continent this year bore a very different aſpect to the preceding. On the 21ſt of January the emperor Muſtapha the Third died at Conſtantinople, in the 58th year of his age, and 17th of his reign; and was ſucceeded by his brother Abdul-Hamet. Some commotions were made in favour of the young prince Selim, but they were eaſily ſuppreſſed, and the war upon the Danube was carried on with vigour; nor did the Ottoman miniſtry fail to encourage as much as poſſible the proceeeings of one Pugatſcheff, a Ruſſian, who for ſome time had acted in open rebellion againſt his country. The Turks, however, were defeated in various engagements; diſorder, mutiny, and deſertion prevailed among the troops; the grand vizir being abandoned by the greateſt part of his forces, was obliged to accede to the terms preſcribed by the enemy, who had ſurrounded him at Schumla. Theſe ill ſucceſſes threw the whole Ottoman empire into confuſion; and at length the Port thought proper to agree to, and ratify, articles of peace propoſed by the Ruſſians, the principal of which were theſe:

1. The independency of the Crimea.
2. The abſolute ceſſion to Ruſſia of Kilburn, Kerche,

[*] Among the bills ſigned this day was one which produced a univerſal diſcontent among the people. It was entitled, "An Act for the future government of Quebec." The principal clauſes that gave offence were two; by the firſt of which the Romiſh clergy were to have the exerciſe of their religion as eſtabliſhed by the firſt of Queen Elizabeth; and might enjoy and receive the accuſtomed dues and rights from perſons profeſſing the Romiſh religion. By the ſecond clauſe, all controverſies relative to property and civil rights were to be determined by the Canada laws then in being, or ſuch as might be afterwards enacted by the governor, lieutenant-governor, and legiſlative council.

Kerche, Jenichala, and all the diſtrict between the Bog and the Dinpier.

3. A free navigation in all the Turkiſh ſeas, including the paſſage through the Dardanelles, with all the privileges and immunities which are granted to the moſt favoured nations.

In return for theſe conceſſions, Ruſſia was to reſtore all ſhe had conquered, Aſaph and Tangarok excepted.

The grand Vizir died, as was ſuppoſed, of a broken heart, on his return to Conſtantinople; and public rejoicings were made at St. Peterſburgh for the uncommon ſucceſs of the Ruſſian arms.

The rebel, Pugatſcheff, was taken priſoner by the Ruſſian army, and ſoon after put to death.

Thus ended a war between the Turks and Ruſſians, in which many thouſands of lives were loſt, and a great number of places totally deſtroyed.

The diſturbances in America this year ſtill continued to increaſe. In conſequence of the Boſton Port bill, which had paſſed the laſt ſeſſion, the people of New England began to form themſelves into companies, practiſe the military arts, enter into ſolemn leagues and covenants, &c. Several other colonies followed the example, provincial aſſemblies were held, and a general congreſs eſtabliſhed, to which deputies from the ſeveral provinces were invited.

Excluſive of bickerings and animoſities between the Royaliſts and Provincials, and the martial parade of the latter, the only material tranſaction that tock place was, the ſeizure of Fort William and Mary, near Portſmouth in New Hampſhire, by the Provincial militia, in which they found 106 barrels of gunpowder, ſeveral cannons, ſhot, ſmall arms, &c.

On the 10th of May this year Lewis XV. the French king paid the debt of nature. He died at Verſailles of the ſmall-pox, in the 64th year of his age, and the 59th of his reign. He was ſucceeded by the preſent king, his grandſon, a young prince about 20 years of age, married to one of the ſiſters of the emperor of Germany *.

The death of the French king was followed by that of Pope Clement XIV. which happened on the 21ſt of September, not without ſome ſuſpicion of poiſon. He was ſucceeded by cardinal Braſchi, who was elected by the name of Pius VI. and is the preſent Pontiff.

During theſe occurrences abroad, the Engliſh parliament was diſſolved by proclamation, and the writs for calling a new one were made returnable on the 29th of November. Accordingly, on that day, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and being in his royal robes ſeated on the throne, commanded the attendance of the Commons in the houſe of peers; who being come, the king, by his chancellor, ſignified his pleaſure that they ſhould return and chuſe a ſpeaker, to be preſented next day for his majeſty's approbation. They returned accordingly, and unanimouſly choſe Sir Fletcher Norton.

The next day his majeſty went again in the uſual ſtate to the houſe of peers, and having approved of the Commons choice of a ſpeaker, opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It gives me much concern, that I am obliged, at the opening of this parliament, to inform you, that a moſt daring ſpirit of reſiſtance and diſobedience to the law ſtill unhappily prevails in the province of the Maſſachuſet's Bay, and has, in divers parts of it, broke forth in freſh violences of a very criminal nature. Theſe proceedings have been countenanced and encouraged in other of my colonies, and unwarrantable attempts have been made to obſtruct the commerce of this kingdom, by unlawful combinations. I have taken ſuch meaſures, and given ſuch orders, as I judged moſt proper and effectual for carrying into execution the laws which were paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion of the late parliament for the protection and ſecurity of the commerce of my ſubjects, and for the reſtoring and preſerving peace, order and good government, in the province of the Maſſachuſet's Bay; and you may depend upon my firm and ſtedfaſt reſolution to withſtand every attempt to weaken or impair the ſupreme authority of this legiſlature over all the dominions of my crown; the maintenance of which I conſider as eſſential to the dignity, the ſafety, and the welfare of the Britiſh empire; aſſuring myſelf, that, while I act upon theſe principles, I ſhall never fail to receive your aſſiſtance and ſupport.

"I have the greateſt ſatisfaction in being able to inform you, that a treaty of peace is concluded between Ruſſia and the Porte. By this happy event, the troubles which have ſo long prevailed in one part of Europe are compoſed, and the general tranquillity rendered complete. It ſhall be my conſtant aim and endeavour to prevent the breaking out of freſh diſturbances; and I cannot but flatter myſelf I ſhall ſucceed, as I continue to receive the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from other powers of their being equally diſpoſed to preſerve the peace.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

"I have ordered the proper eſtimates for the ſervice of the enſuing year to be laid before you; and I doubt not but that, in this Houſe of Commons, I ſhall meet with the ſame affectionate confidence, and the ſame proofs of zeal and attachment to my perſon and government, which I have always, during the courſe of my reign, received from my faithful Commons.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"Let me particularly recommend to you, at this time, to proceed with temper in your deliberations, and

* The late French king was born on the 15th of February, 1710, and in 1715 ſucceeded his great grandfather, his own father, grandfather, ſeveral uncles and brothers having all died of the ſmall-pox. As he was only five years of age when he was crowned, his uncle the duke of Orleans was, as firſt prince of the blood, appointed regent during his minority. But the king took the reins of government upon himſelf when he was little more than ſixteen years of age, having previouſly married the only daughter of the good Staniſlaus, once king of Poland, and afterwards duke of Lorrain. His great miniſter for ſome years was the cardinal Fleury, a man who had acquired all the knowledge of courts that could be obtained in a cloſe attendance to buſineſs above ſixty years; but when he died, the king reſolved to govern as much as poſſible without the aſſiſtance of favourites.

We have already ſeen that he carried on two bloody and expenſive wars againſt Britain; in one of which he was very ſucceſsful; but in the other, namely, the laſt, his nation, army and navy were, in a manner, totally ruined. In his perſon Lewis XV. was extremely handſome, and had a moſt engaging countenance. In attending on public buſineſs, he was very regular; but he has been blamed for too ſtrong an attachment to the army. This, however, ought to be conſidered as the reigning taſte of France, and not ſolely the foible of the ſovereign. The French have never yet, in the midſt of all their refinements, been able to diveſt themſelves of that barbarous notion which was ſo much cheriſhed in former times, to look upon no perſon as honourable, who was not a ſoldier. In his pleaſures he has been much cenſured; becauſe it generally happened that his miſtreſſes got the aſcendancy ſo far over him, as to occaſion ſeveral changes in the government, merely by their intrigues.

As great pains had been taken to give him a good education, he was even to the laſt a lover of learning and learned men. He had ſuch elevated notions of the neceſſity of a toleration in religious matters, that the power of the church of Rome fell into great contempt during his reign. Two reaſons, indeed, concurred towards preventing him from following his own inclinations in giving free liberty of conſcience to his proteſtant ſubjects. The firſt was, the inveterate prejudices of the vulgar nouriſhed by the clergy; and the ſecond, the wretched bigotry of his ſon the dauphin.

and with unanimity in your reſolutions. Let my people, in every part of my dominions, be taught, by your example, to have a due reverence for the laws, and a juſt ſenſe of the bleſſings of our excellent conſtitution. They may be aſſured that, on my part, I have nothing ſo much at heart as the real proſperity and laſting happineſs of all my ſubjects."

To this ſpeech both houſes preſented very loyal and affectionate addreſſes; to each of which his majeſty was pleaſed to return a moſt gracious anſwer.

As this was the firſt ſeſſion of a new parliament, the ſwearing in of the members and other trifling matters incident on ſuch occaſions, engaged their attention for ſome days. This being over, they proceeded to buſineſs, which was begun by the houſe reſolving itſelf into a committee of ſupply to his majeſty; when the following reſolutions were agreed to, viz.

That 16,000 ſeamen, including 4284 marines, ſhould be granted for the enſuing year.

That 17,547 effective men, including 1522 invalids, be employed for the land-ſervice for 1775. And that 1,627,689l. be granted to his majeſty for maintaining the ſaid men.

That 386,186l. be granted for maintaining the forces in the plantations, North-America, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, &c. And 11,473l. for the pay of Generals and General Staff-Officers.

That 122,221l. be granted for the Out-Penſioners of Chelſea Hoſpital.

That 28,059l. be granted for the office of ordnance for land-ſervice. And 32,748l. for the ſaid office, for ſervices performed, and not provided for.

The committee of ways and means levied the land-tax at 3s. in the pound. This occaſioned great debates in the houſe, but at length the queſtion being put, the houſe agreed with the committee, and a bill was ordered to be brought in accordingly.

On the 22d of December his majeſty went, in the uſual ſtate, to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent to the following bills:

An Act for laying a duty on malt, mum, cyder and perry, for the year 1775.

An Act to allow the importation of Indian corn, under certain reſtrictions.

And a naturalization bill.

After which his majeſty adjourned the parliament to the 19th of January.

A. D. 1775. The parliament met, purſuant to their adjournment, when lord North preſented to the houſe, by his majeſty's command, ſeveral bundles of American papers, the titles of which, being read by the clerk, appeared to be extracts of letters from the ſeveral governors of Boſton, New-York, New-Hampſhire, Rhode Iſland, Virginia, Pennſylvania, South-Carolina: the proceedings of the Continental and Provincial Congreſs, the firſt held at Philadelphia, and the latter at Cambridge near Boſton: inſtructions given at Provincial meetings of the ſeveral delegates appointed to aſſemble at the congreſs; copies of hand-bills; anonymous letters; reſolutions of different aſſemblies; proteſts of ſeveral diſtricts in the province of Georgia; meſſages between general Gage and the houſe of repreſentatives, with extracts of the ſeveral letters that paſſed between general Gage, lord Dartmouth, the ſecretary and board of admiralty, and the commander of the ſhips on the Boſton ſtation.

As ſoon as the clerk had finiſhed reading the titles of theſe papers, a motion was made that they ſhould lie on the table for inſpection, and that a future day ſhould be appointed for the whole houſe to go into a committee to conſider of the ſame; which, after ſome debates, was agreed to.

In the mean time petitions were preſented to the houſe from the merchants of London, Glaſgow, Briſtol, Liverpool, and other places, complaining of the great decay of trade, occaſioned by the unhappy differences between Great Britain and her colonies. Some of theſe petitions were referred to the committee appointed to take into conſideration the American papers; and others were referred to private committees appointed for the purpoſe.

The corporation of London alſo preſented an addreſs, remonſtrance and petition to the king; in which they complained of the meaſures that had been purſued, and were ſtill purſuing, againſt their fellow ſubjects in America; and earneſtly beſeeched his majeſty to diſcharge thoſe miniſters from his councils who had been the means of promoting them, as the firſt ſtep towards a full redreſs of the grievances ſo univerſally complained of by the people.

To this addreſs and petition his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following anſwer:

"It is with the utmoſt aſtoniſhment that I find any of my ſubjects capable of encouraging the rebellious diſpoſition which unhappily exiſts in ſome of my colonies in North America. Having entire confidence in the wiſdom of my parliament, the great council of the nation, I will ſteadily purſue thoſe meaſures which they have recommended for the ſupport of the conſtitutional rights of Great Britain, and the protection of the commercial intereſts of my kingdom."

While petitions were preſenting to the commons from the principal corporations in England, ſome papers, ſimilar to thoſe which the lower houſe had received, were laid before the lords, on which lord Chatham roſe, and after complaining much of the delay of adminiſtration in detaining the papers ſo long after their arrival, and alſo the error of their proceedings reſpecting America, his lordſhip made the following motion: "That an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, praying that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to ſend orders to general Gage to withdraw his troops from Boſton, as the beſt means of eſtabliſhing a laſting concord with America." Great debates aroſe on this motion; but the queſtion being at length put, it was rejected by a conſiderable majority.

A few days after this, the ſame patriotic nobleman brought in a bill for reconciling the preſent differences between Great Britain and America. This alſo met with great oppoſition; and the queſtion being put, it ſhared the ſame fate with the preceding motion.

The papers relative to America were now taken into conſideration in the Lower Houſe. Among them were two official letters from lord Dartmouth to general Gage, and the general's letter to his lordſhip. The former contained ſtrains of firmneſs and coercion, which it was plain, the general was not by any means able to realize with the force he had under his command. The language of the latter varied according to the different circumſtances and occaſions that preſented themſelves. Two matters were, however, very evident, that the rage and diſcontents were greatly augmented on account of the laſt American acts paſſed by the parliament; and that they were working up into a kind of phrenzy by the gradual augmentation of the troops, and by the works and defences raiſed on Boſton Neck. He drew, in ſome places, the moſt lamentable picture of the ſtate of that province, deſtitute at once of all legiſlative authority; of a council, of courts of juſtice, of magiſtracy; and repreſented the whole as one ſcene of anarchy and confuſion.

On the laſt day that the houſe went into a committee to examine the American papers, lord North began the buſineſs with a very accurate and detailed view of the whole maſs of information laid before the committee, diſcriminated in a very maſterly manner the diſpoſition of the reſpective colonies, marked the leading characters of each, pointed out thoſe whoſe moderation prevailed, whoſe violence and unconſtitutional views were concealed under the appearance of duty and ſubmiſſion, and particularly directed at ſuch as he thought were in a ſtate of actual rebellion. He next adverted to the acts employed to raiſe this ſeditious ſpirit on both ſides the water, entered minutely into a compariſon of the burthens borne by the people of both countries, ſtated the trade and commerce carried on between them, the advantages ariſing from that commerce, the moſt probable way of ſecuring them, and the very great diſparity there was between the ability and real ſupport which America afforded to this country; every perſon in Britain contributing at the rate of 25s. per head, whereas the American did not contribute 6d. He then proceeded to lay down, in the fulleſt and moſt unreſerved manner, the legiſlative ſupremacy of parliament; ſtated, in very forcible and diſtinct terms, the meaſures adopted by America to reſiſt it, and the almoſt univerſal confederacy of the colonies to at leaſt deny it. Here he laid his foot on the great barrier, which ſeparated, and for the preſent diſunited, both countries; and on this ground alone of reſiſtance and denial, he raiſed every argument leading to the motion he intended to make. This queſtion, he ſaid, lay within a narrow compaſs: it was ſimply whether we ſhould abandon this claim, and at once give up every advantage ariſing both from the ſovereignty and the commerce, or to inſure both? or whether we ſhould reſort to the meaſures indiſpenſably neceſſary on ſuch an occaſion? His lordſhip then pointed out the meaſures intended to be purſued. He ſaid he ſhould propoſe a temporary act, to put a ſtop to all the foreign trade of New England, and particularly to their fiſhery on the banks of Newfoundland, till they returned to their duty; at the ſame time declaring, that whenever they ſhould acknowledge the ſupreme authority of the Britiſh legiſlature, and pay obedience to the laws, their grievances ſhould be redreſſed. His lordſhip concluded by propoſing a conference with the houſe of lords, that a joint addreſs might be carried up to the throne, "To return thanks to his majeſty for communicating to the houſe the American papers, and that he would be pleaſed to take ſuch meaſures as might be ſuitable to his wiſdom for enforcing the laws againſt America; and promiſing to ſupport him, in a full and vigorous exertion of the ſame, with their lives and fortunes."—The meaſures intended to be taken were mentioned generally, and ſaid to be theſe: "That a fleet of fourteen frigates be ſent to join the ſhips at Boſton, by which all the ports of New England were to be blocked up; that 10,000 troops, including Preſton's regiment of light horſe, be ſent to Boſton, to keep the New Englanders in order; and that an addition of 2000 ſeamen more be aſked to man the fleet to Boſton, and to ſupply the naval eſtabliſhment at home."

Lord North's motion for the addreſs met with great oppoſition; but the queſtion being at length put, it was carried by a conſiderable majority.

When the reſolution of the committee for preſenting the addreſs was reported to the houſe, the ſpeaker was proceeding to put the queſtion to agree with the report; but was interrupted by lord John Cavendiſh, who moved that the conſideration of the American papers ſhould be re-committed. In his harangue on the ſubject he ſtated very clearly and juſtly our domeſtic ſituation, our ſtate with the colonies and with foreign powers. He called the attention of the houſe to the unequal balance of our loſs and our gain in the event; in which we might find our revenue deſtroyed, our trade annihilated, and our empire itſelf overturned. And if we ſucceeded in ſubduing America, we ſhould not gain any thing.

He was ſeconded by lord Irnham, who, after having in a long ſpeech agitated the queſtion on the ground propoſed by adminiſtration, in a conſtitutional as well as in a political light, concluded with aſſerting that it appeared, in both thoſe views, formidable and deſtructive; and that it became abſolutely neceſſary to retract the unconſtitutional and impolitic ſteps which adminiſtration had hitherto taken.

* Among thoſe who particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves on this occaſion, was, the Rt. Hon. John Wilkes, Eſq. lord-mayor of London. After ſome others had harangued on the ſubject, he aroſe, and addreſſing himſelf to the Speaker, delivered his ſentiments in the following words:

"Mr. Speaker,

"The buſineſs now before the Houſe reſpecting America is of as great importance as was ever debated in parliament. It comprehends almoſt every queſtion of policy and legiſlation. I do not mean to enter into ſo vaſt, ſo well trodden a field. I will confine myſelf to the buſineſs before us. The addreſs now reported from the Committee of the whole Houſe appears to me unfounded, raſh and ſanguinary, and moſt unjuſtly to draw the ſword againſt America; but before adminiſtration are ſuffered to plunge this nation into the horrors of a civil war; before they are permitted to force Engliſhmen to ſheathe their ſwords in the bowels of their fellow ſubjects, I hope this houſe will ſeriouſly weigh the original ground and cauſe of this unhappy diſpute, and in time reflect whether juſtice is on our ſide. The aſſumed right of taxation, without the conſent of the ſubject, is plainly the primary cauſe of the preſent quarrel. Have we, Sir, any right to tax the Americans? That is the queſtion. The fundamental laws of human nature, and the principles of the Engliſh conſtitution, are equally repugnant to the claim. The very idea of property excludes the right of another's taking any thing from me without my conſent, otherwiſe I cannot call it my own. What property have I in what another perſon can ſeize at his pleaſure? If we can tax the Americans without their conſent, they have no property, nothing which they can call their own; we might take all, The words "Liberty and Property" ſo dear to an Engliſhman, ſo pleaſing in our ears, would become mockery and inſult to an American. The laws of ſociety are profeſſedly calculated to ſecure the property of each individual, of every ſubject of the ſtate. The great principles of the conſtitution under which we live likewiſe clearly determine this point. All ſubſidies to the crown are grants from the commons, free gifts from the people. Their full conſent is always expreſſed in the grant. Much has been ſaid of the palatinate of Cheſter and the principality of Wales, and the period of their taxation; but, Sir, there is a more remarkable caſe in point, which alone would determine the queſtion. If gentlemen will ſearch the records in the Tower, they will find that the town of Calais in France, when it belonged to the imperial crown of theſe realms, was not taxed till it ſent repreſentatives to parliament. Two burgeſſes from Calais actually ſat and voted in this houſe. Then, and not till then, was Calais taxed. The writ out of chancery, and the return to it, in the reign of Edward VI. with the names of the burgeſſes, are ſtill extant. I faithfully gave them to the public from atteſted copies.

"But, Sir, it will be ſaid, is America then to enjoy the protection of Great Britain, and to contribute nothing towards the ſupport of that very ſtate which has ſo long given it protection and ſecurity, which has nurſed it up to its preſent greatneſs? The Americans themſelves have given the fulleſt anſwer to this objection, in a manner not to be controverted, by their conduct through a long ſeries of years, and by the moſt explicit declarations. Equally in words and actions, of the moſt unequivocal nature, they have demonſtrated their love, their ardour, their ſtrong filial piety, towards the Mother Country.

"They have always appeared ready, not only to contribute towards the expences of their government, but likewiſe to the wants and neceſſities of this ſtate, although, perhaps, they may not be overfond of all the proud expenſive trappings of royalty. In the two laſt wars they far exceeded the cold line of prudence. With the moſt liberal hearts they gave you almoſt their all, and they fought gallantly by your ſide, with equal valour, againſt our and their enemy, againſt the common enemy of mankind, the ambitious and faithleſs French, whom we now fear and flatter. Our Journals, Sir, will bear witneſs to the grateful ſenſe we had of the important ſervices of the Americans; and the great ſums we voted to be repaid them for what they expended in the ſpirited expeditions, which they carried through with equal courage and conduct, ſometimes without the leaſt knowledge or participation on our parts, will demonſtrate the warm affection of their hearts to this country. But, Sir, the whole was the gift of freemen, of fellow ſubjects, who feel that they are, and know that they have a right to be, as free as ourſelves. What is their language now, when juſtneſs and propriety of the noble lord's motion; when at length the queſtion being put, the numbers were,

An addreſs was then drawn up, and agreed to without a diviſion.

The next day the Commons ſent a meſſage to the Lords, deſiring a conference on the ſubject of the addreſs to his majeſty. In conſequence of this ſeveral of the lords attended, and after ſome debates, it was agreed that the addreſs ſhould be jointly preſented by both houſes to the king; which was accordingly done on the 9th of February. The anſwer his majeſty returned was as follows:

" My lords and gentlemen,

" I thank you for this very dutiful and loyal addreſs, and for the affectionate, ſolemn aſſurances you give me of your ſupport in maintaining the juſt rights of my crown, and of the two Houſes of Parliament; and you may depend on my taking the moſt ſpeedy and effectual meaſures for enforcing due obedience to the laws and authority of the ſupreme legiſlature.

" Whenever any of my colonies ſhall make a proper and dutiful application, I ſhall be ready to concur with you in affording them every juſt and reaſonable indulgence; and it is my ardent wiſh that this diſpoſition may have a happy effect on the temper and conduct of my ſubjects in America."

The day after the addreſs was preſented, lord North acquainted the Houſe that he had a meſſage from his majeſty, which he read in his place, and then delivered it in at the table. It was as follows:

G. R.

" His majeſty being determined, in conſequence of the Addreſs of both Houſes of Parliament, to take the moſt ſpeedy and effectual meaſures for ſupporting the juſt rights of the Crown and the two Houſes of Parliament, thinks proper to acquaint this houſe, that ſome addition to his forces by ſea and land will be neceſſary for that purpoſe; and does not doubt but his faithful Commons, on whoſe zeal and affection he entirely when you are planning their deſtruction, when you are declaring them rebels?

" In the late petition of the general congreſs to the king, they declare " they are ready and willing, as they have ever been, when conſtitutionally required, to demonſtrate their loyalty to his majeſty, by exerting their moſt ſtrenuous efforts in granting ſupplies and raiſing forces." This is the unanimous reſolution of a congreſs compoſed of deputies from the ſeveral colonies of New Hampſhire, Maſſachuſetts Bay, Rhode Iſland and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jerſey, Pennſylvania, the counties of Newcaſtle, Kent, and Suſſex on Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and the two Carolinas. I have heard, Sir, of a plan of accommodation, which, I believe, would reconcile all differences. But, alas! Sir, it does not come from any ſervant of the crown; it comes from the noble lord to whom this country has the moſt eſſential obligations, and is ſo much indebted for its late ſplendour and glory. It is, to aſſemble another congreſs in the ſpring, the parliament of Great Britain and the deputies of the ſeveral colonies to meet together, and to be jointly empowered to regulate the various quotas to be paid by each province to the general treaſury of the whole empire. I would, in addition to that plan, propoſe that a regulation ſimilar to what actually takes place with reſpect to Scotland, be adopted as to America. The proportion of each colony might be ſettled according to the land-tax in England, at one, two, or more ſhillings in the pound. I am not deep politician enough to know what the proportions ſhould be of each province, and they will vary greatly in half a century; but I ſpeak of their quota being always to be regulated according to the land-tax of this country. The very flouriſhing colonies of the Maſſachuſetts Bay, Virginia, and South Carolina, for inſtance, ſhould contribute more, the ſmaller and poorer colonies of New Hampſhire and New Jerſey leſs; but, Sir, I inſiſt not a ſingle ſhilling can be taken without their conſent; and, after this day's debate, ſhould the addreſs be carried, I greatly fear every idea of a reconciliation will be utterly impracticable.

The Americans, Sir, have of late, both within doors and without, been treated with the greateſt injuſtice, and even a wanton degree of cruelty. An honourable gentleman has juſt told us that they complain of the navigation act, and inſiſt on its repeal. We have authentic evidence to the contrary. In the reſolutions of the congreſs they repeatedly deſire to be put only on the footing they were at the cloſe of the late war, " as to the ſyſtem of ſtatutes and regulations;" nor among the various acts, of which they deſire the repeal, do they once mention either the navigation or declaratory acts. It is ſaid likewiſe, they wiſh to throw off the ſupremacy of this country. Many expreſs reſolutions, both of the general congreſs and the provincial congreſs, are the fulleſt evidence of the ſenſe which the Americans entertain of their obedience and duty to this country. They are too numerous to be quoted. Their full claim, as ſtated by themſelves, is ſo well worded, I beg to read it to the houſe from their petition to the king. " We aſk but for peace, liberty, and ſafety." Surely, Sir, no requeſt was ever more reaſonable, no claim better founded. " We wiſh not a diminution of the prerogative, nor do we ſolicit a grant of any new right in our favour. Your royal authority over us, and our connection with Great Britain, we ſhall always carefully and zealouſly endeavour to ſupport and maintain," while adminiſtration are endeavouring to tear aſunder thoſe ties, which have ſo long and happily bound us together.

" The addreſs, Sir, mentions the particular province of Maſſachuſetts Bay as in a ſtate of actual rebellion, and the other provinces are conſidered as aiding and abetting them. Much has been ſaid by ſome learned gentlemen to involve them in all the conſequences of a declared rebellion, and to encourage our officers and troops to act againſt them as againſt rebels. Whether their preſent ſtate is that of rebellion, or of a fit and proper reſiſtance to unlawful acts of power, to our attempts to rob them of their property and liberties, as they imagine, I do not determine. This I know, a ſucceſsful reſiſtance is a revolution, not a rebellion. Who can tell, Sir, whether, in conſequence of this very day's violent and mad addreſs to his majeſty, the ſcabbard may not be thrown away by them as well as by us; and ſhould ſucceſs attend them, whether in a few years the Americans may not celebrate the glorious æra of the revolution of 1775, as we do that of 1688? Succeſs crowned the generous efforts of our forefathers for freedom, elſe they had died on the ſcaffold as traitors and rebels, and the period of our hiſtory which does us the moſt honour would have been deemed a rebellion againſt lawful authority, not a reſiſtance authorized by all the laws of God and man, not the expulſion of a tyrant.

" The policy, Sir, of the meaſure I can no more comprehend than I can acknowledge the juſtice of it. Is your force adequate to the attempt? I am ſatisfied it is not. What are your armies, and how are they to be recruited? Do you recollect that the ſingle province of the Maſſachuſetts Bay has at this moment above 30,000 men, well trained and diſciplined, and can bring near 90,000 into the field? They will do it when they are fighting for their liberties. You will not be able to conquer and keep even that ſingle province. A noble lord propoſes only 10,000 of our troops to be there, including the four regiments now going from Ireland, and he acknowledges very truly that the army cannot enforce the late acts of parliament. Why then is it ſent? Boſton, indeed, you may lay in aſhes, or it may be made a ſtrong garriſon, but the province will be loſt to you. Boſton will be like Gibraltar. You will hold in the province of Maſſachuſett's Bay, as you do in Spain, a ſingle town, the whole country in the power and poſſeſſion of the enemy. Your fleets and armies may keep a few towns on the coaſt, for ſome time at leaſt, Boſton, New York, St. Auguſtine. The vaſt continent of America will be loſt to you. A few fortreſſes on the coaſt and ſome ſea ports only you will keep, all the back ſettlements will be independent of you, and will thrive in the rapid progreſſion of your violences and unjuſt exactions on the towns. The antient ſtory of the Carthaginian hide will be verified as to you. Where you tread it will be kept down, but it will riſe the more in all the other parts. Where your fleets and armies are ſtationed the poſſeſſion will be yours, but all the reſt will be loſt. I fear from this day in the great ſcale of empire you will decline, and the Americans will riſe to independence, to power, to all the greatneſs of the moſt renowned ſtates, for they build on the ſolid baſis of public liberty.

" Sir, this addreſs is founded in injuſtice and cruelty. It is equally contrary to the ſound maxims of true policy, and to the unerring rule of natural right. The Americans will defend their property and their liberties with the ſpirit of freemen, with the ſpirit I hope we ſhould. They will ſooner declare themſelves independent, and riſk every conſequence of ſuch a conteſt, than ſubmit to the yoke which adminiſtration is preparing for them. An addreſs of ſo ſanguinary a nature cannot fail of driving them to deſpair. They will ſee that you are preparing not only to draw the ſword, but to burn the ſcabbard. You are declaring them rebels. Every idea of a reconciliation will vaniſh. They will purſue the moſt vigorous meaſures in their own defence. The whole continent will be diſmembered from Great Britain, and the wide arch of the raiſed empire fall. But I hope the juſt vengeance of the people will overtake the authors of theſe pernicious counſels, and the loſs of the firſt province to the empire be ſpeedily followed by the loſs of the heads of thoſe miniſters who adviſed theſe wicked and fatal meaſures."

entirely relies, will enable him to make ſuch an augmentation to his forces, as on the preſent occaſion ſhall be thought proper."

This meſſage was referred to the conſideration of the Committee of Supply; after which the Houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee of the whole Houſe on the American papers, when a motion was made by lord North, "that the chairman be directed to move the Houſe, that leave be given to bring in a bill to reſtrain the trade and commerce of the provinces of Maſſachuſetts Bay, New Hampſhire, Connecticut, Providence, and Rhode-Iſland Colonies in North America, to Great Britain, Ireland and the Weſt Indies; and to prohibit ſuch provinces and colonies from carrying on any fiſhery on the banks of Newfoundland, or other parts therein mentioned, under certain conditions, and for a time to be limited."

This motion was productive of great debates, which continued for ſeveral hours; when the queſtion being put, it was carried by a very conſiderable majority; and a bill was ordered to be brought in purſuant thereto.

On the 22d of February the Right Honourable the Lord-mayor moved in the Houſe of Commons, that the proceedings of that houſe of the 17th of February, 1769, might be read; which being done, ſome other extracts which his lordſhip called for were likewiſe read. He then made a ſpeech upon what he called proceedings unjuſtifiable, illegal and unwarrantable; and moved, that the reſolution of the 17th of February, 1769, which declares, "That John Wilkes, eſq. having been this preſent ſeſſion of parliament expelled this houſe, was, and is incapable of being elected a member to ſerve in this preſent parliament," be expunged from the journals of this houſe, as ſubverſive of the rights of the whole body of electors of this kingdom. Mr. Serjeant Glyn ſeconded the motion, and then a general debate enſued. The arguments were warm, and to the point. The queſtion was repeatedly attempted to be put, but was as often prevented by new ſpeakers riſing. At length, after about eight hours debate, "the queſtion, the queſtion," was ſo far the prevailing call, that it was put, and the houſe divided, when the numbers were, 171 for the motion, and 239 againſt it.

Two days after this a petition was preſented to the Houſe of Commons from the Corporation of London againſt the bill now depending in the houſe for reſtraining the trade of New England, and the fiſheries of that colony on the banks of Newfoundland. This petition repreſented the bill as being unjuſt, cruel, partial, and oppreſſive; injurious to the trade of Great Britain, and tending to increaſe the wealth and ſtrength of her rivals and enemies.

The ſame corporation preſented another petition of the like nature to the Houſe of Lords; as did alſo the American merchants; and another to the king. But all theſe ſolicitations proved abortive; for the bill paſſed both houſes, and on the 30th of March received the royal aſſent.

On the 13th of April his majeſty again went to the Houſe of Peers, and, among other bills, gave the royal aſſent to "A bill to reſtrain the trade and commerce of the colonies of New Jerſey, Pennſylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina, to any part of Great Britain, Ireland, and the-Weſt-India iſlands."

After the paſſing of theſe acts the generals Burgoyne, Clinton and Howe, were ſent to take on them the command of the troops deſtined for endeavouring to bring the Americans to obedience; for which expedition they embarked on board the Cerberus man of war on the 21ſt of April.

The national buſineſs being now finiſhed, on the 26th of May his majeſty went to the Houſe of Peers, and after ſigning ſuch bills as were ready, prorogued the parliament.

During theſe tranſactions in England the Americans were not idle. Several ſkirmiſhes took place between them and the king's troops. General Gage, the commander of the Engliſh forces, being informed that a great quantity of military ſtores were in the poſſeſſion of the Provincial troops, at the town of Concord, ſent a detachment of troops, under the command of lieutenant colonel Smith, and major Pitcairn, ſupported by another body, commanded by lord Percy, in order to ſieze or deſtroy them. This ſervice was effectually performed, after ſome ſkirmiſhes; but on the 19th of April the troops were attacked at Lexington, on their return towards Boſton; ſeveral were killed and wounded on both ſides; the Provincials firing from behind ſtone walls, hedges, buſhes, &c.

The Provincials now inveſted the town of Boſton; and the people of New York, hearing of the action at Lexington, and the affair of Concord, roſe in a tumultuous manner, entered the town-houſe, ſeized many ſtands of arms, appropriated to their own uſe the cargoes of two ſhips laden with military ſtores for general Gage, and then marched to the aſſiſtance of the Boſtonians.

The Provincials not only continued to block up the town of Boſton, but began to raiſe batteries on the heights of the peninſula of Charles Town, in order to canonade his majeſty's troops. This brought on an action at Bunker's Hill; for on the 17th of June, a conſiderable body of troops, under the command of major general Howe, and brigadier general Pigot, were ſent to diſlodge the Provincials. This body of forces, with a proportional quantity of artillery, made good their landing near Bunker's Hill, under the protection of the ſhips of war, armed veſſels, floating batteries, &c. and being ſoon after reinforced by another detachment, a deſperate action commenced, in which the Britiſh troops were victorious, the provincial lines being forced, and themſelves compelled to retreat, leaving behind ſeveral pieces of cannon and other military ſtores. The loſs of the Provincials in killed and wounded was very great; of the Britiſh troops, according to the return of general Gage, 226 were killed, and 828 were wounded, ſome of the latter dying ſoon after; and more than a proportional number of officers were included in both liſts.

On the night of the 23d of Auguſt the cannon were ſeized upon, by order of the congreſs, though the Aſia man of war, which lay in the harbour, tried to prevent it by cannonading the town.

At the ſame time general Carleton was indefatigable, in putting the province of Canada into a proper ſtate of defence; and the earl of Dunmore, governor of Virginia, having thought proper to take refuge on board a ſhip of war, haraſſed the coaſt, and made frequent deſcents upon the laſt mentioned province; laying waſte the country, carrying off or ſpiking up a great number of cannons, deſtroying vaſt quantities of military ſtores belonging to the Provincials, &c. &c. But on the other ſide, Fort St. John ſurrendered to the Provincial forces on the 3d of November, and the garriſon became priſoners.

On the 18th of the ſame month the Regulars and Provincials had a hot engagement near Savannah, in Georgia, in which the latter were defeated; and on the 31ſt of December, the Provincial general Montgomery, who had for ſome time laid ſiege to the city of Quebec, attempted to take it by ſtorm. In this attempt, however, he was defeated and ſlain, with ſeveral of his officers, and about 60 private men, and 300 were taken priſoners.—But to return to affairs at home.

The parliament met on the 26th of October, and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty with a ſpeech from the throne.

A ſhort time before the opening of the ſeſſion, a petition from the general congreſs in America, ſigned by the heads of the reſpective colonies, was preſented to his majeſty, humbly ſoliciting that ſuch meaſures might be taken as were likely to eradicate the preſent diſturbances, and bring about a laſting and happy reconciliation.

The attention of the parliament, previous to the holidays, was engaged in adjuſting the neceſſary ſupplies for the enſuing year, and concerting the proper meaſures for raiſing them. Several uſeful acts were alſo framed, which having paſſed both houſes received the royal aſſent; after which the parliament was prorogued to the 25th of January.

A. D. 1776. The parliament met purſuant to their adjournment; on which day the following handbill was delivered to the members of both houſes:

“ To the parliament:---A ſuffering and afflicted people moſt humbly and ſolemnly beſeech and implore every member of parliament to put a ſpeedy ſtop to the further effuſion of the blood of our American brethren; that peace and tranquillity may be reſtored to the royal breaſt, and glory, commerce and felicity, to the whole empire.”

Nothing material paſſed in the lower houſe this ſeſſion; except the framing of ſome uſeful acts, ſeveral of which were of a public, and the reſt of a private nature.

In the courſe of the ſeſſion the attention of the Upper Aſſembly was engaged on the trial of the ducheſs of Kingſton, who was accuſed of bigamy, in having married the duke of Kingſton, while her firſt huſband, the Honourable Mr. Hervey (now earl of Briſtol) was living. The trial laſted five days, at the cloſe of which, the priſoner being called to the bar, was informed by the lord high-ſteward, that the lords had pronounced her to be Guilty. In conſequence of this ſhe claimed her privilege of peerage, which occaſioned the lords to adjourn to the Chamber of Parliament to debate on the matter. On their return the priſoner was again called to the bar, and the lord high-ſteward pronounced it to be the ſenſe of the houſe, “ that the ducheſs ſhould be allowed the privilege ſhe claimed.” By conſequence, as a peereſs, ſhe could endure no kind of corporal puniſhment, and was therefore diſcharged on paying her fees.

The parliamentary buſineſs being finiſhed, on the 23d of May his majeſty went to the Houſe of Peers, and after ſigning ſuch bills as were ready, cloſed the ſeſſion.

During theſe tranſactions in England, hoſtilities were carrying on with great vehemence in America. General Gage having been recalled, the command in chief of the army at Boſton devolved on general Howe, who ſoon after iſſued a proclamation, by which ſuch of the inhabitants as attempted to quit the town without licence were condemned to military execution, if detected and taken; and if they eſcaped, to be proceeded againſt as traitors, by the forfeiture of their effects. By another, ſuch as obtained permiſſion to quit the town were reſtrained, by ſevere penalties, from carrying more than a ſmall ſpecified ſum of money with them. He alſo enjoined the ſigning and entering into an aſſociation, by which the remaining inhabitants offered their perſons for the defence of the town, and ſuch of them, as he approved of, were to be armed, formed into companies, and inſtructed in military exerciſes and diſcipline, the remainder being obliged to pay their quotas in money towards the common defence.

General Howe now thought proper to evacuate the town of Boſton, which he effected on the 17th of March; and a ſhort time after he made good his landing, and capture of New York. In June, a battle was fought in Canada, between the regulars, under general Carleton, and the provincials, at a place called Three Rivers, when the latter were defeated, many of them being killed and wounded, and about 200 taken priſoners. In the ſame month an attempt was made on Charles Town, South Carolina, by Sir Peter Parker, at the head of a fleet of ſhips of war, and general Clinton, with a body of land forces, but it failed of ſucceſs; and on the 4th of July following, the congreſs declared the colonies independent.

On the 19th of September the following Declaration was publiſhed by lord Howe and general Howe, addreſſed to the Provincials:

By Richard Viſcount Howe, of the kingdom of Ireland, and William Howe, Eſq; General of his majeſty's forces in America, the king's commiſſioners for reſtoring peace to his Majeſty's Colonies and Plantations in North-America.

DECLARATION.

“ Although the Congreſs, whom the miſguided Americans ſuffer to direct their oppoſition to a re-eſtabliſhment of the conſtitutional government of their provinces, have diſavowed every purpoſe of reconciliation not conſonant with their extravagant, inadmiſſible claim of independency, the king's commiſſioners think fit to declare, that they are equally deſirous to confer with his majeſty's well-affected ſubjects upon the means of reſtoring the public tranquillity, and eſtabliſhing a permanent union with every colony as a part of the Britiſh empire; the king being moſt graciouſly diſpoſed to direct a reviſion of ſuch of his royal inſtructions as may be conſtrued to lay an improper reſtraint upon the freedom of legiſlation in any of his colonies, and to concur in the reviſal of all acts by which his ſubjects there may think themſelves aggrieved; it is recommended to the inhabitants at large to reflect ſeriouſly on their preſent condition, and to judge for themſelves, whether it be more conſiſtent with their honour and happineſs to offer up their lives as a ſacrifice to the unjuſt and precarious cauſe in which they are engaged, or return to their allegiance, accept the bleſſings of peace, and to be ſecured in a free enjoyment of their liberty and properties, upon the true principle of the conſtitution.

Given at New-York, HOWE.
Sept. 19, 1776. W. HOWE.

This declaration was far from having the wiſhed-for effect; the Provincials were adverſe to every mode offered by government, and inſtances occured daily of their determination, if poſſible, to preſerve themſelves independent.

On the 30th of September General Howe iſſued another proclamation, which was as follows:

“ Whereas there are many deſerters from his majeſty's ſervice, now in Arms in America, againſt their rightful ſovereign, and engaged with the declared enemies of Great Britain, in a moſt cruel and unnatural rebellion, to ſhake off all obedience to the conſtitutional authority of the ſtate; and whereas the heinouſneſs of their crime not admitting any palliative conſiderations, will neceſſarily exclude them from the ſmalleſt claim to mercy, if they ſhould fall into the hands of his majeſty's troops: the commander in chief being anxiouſly deſirous to warn them of their danger to withdraw them from their preſent deſperate and criminal ſituation, whereby they may eſcape the ignominious death of traitors to their king and country, hereby offers a full pardon to all deſerters, who ſhall ſurrender themſelves at the head quarters, or to any diviſion of the king's army, on or before the 31ſt day of October 1776.

Given at the Head Quarters, on York Iſland, the 30th day of September, 1776. W. Howe.

After this many ſkirmiſhes happened between the king's troops and the provincials; but nothing deciſive till the latter end of October, when the latter were defeated, in an action, which, from the place where it was fought, was termed the Battle of the White Plains.

In the diſpatches from general Howe, dated November 30, beſides an account of a variety of ſkirmiſhes, information was given of the taking of Fort Waſhington, and Fort Lee, by the Britiſh forces, together with a great variety of military ſtores, and many priſoners. In December Rhode Iſland was taken by general Clinton; about the ſame time lord Cornwallis took poſſeſſion of Eaſt Jerſey, and general Lee was taken priſoner, by a patrole of Britiſh dragoons, commanded by lieutenant colonel, (now lord) Harcourt[*].

The parliament met on the laſt day of October, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"Nothing could have afforded me ſo much ſatisfaction as to have been able to inform you, at the opening of this ſeſſion, that the troubles which have ſo long diſtracted my Colonies in North America were at an end; and that my unhappy people, recovered from their delusion, had delivered themſelves from the oppreſſion of their leaders, and returned to their duty: but ſo daring and deſperate is the ſpirit of thoſe leaders, whoſe object has always been dominion and power, that they have now openly renounced all allegiance to the crown, and all political connection with this country. They have rejected, with circumſtances of indignity and inſult, the means of conciliation held out to them under the authority of our commiſſion; and have preſumed to ſet up their rebellious confederacies for independent ſtates. If their treaſon be ſuffered to take root, much miſchief muſt grow from it, to the ſafety of my loyal colonies, to the commerce of my kingdom, and indeed to the preſent ſyſtem of all Europe. One great advantage, however, will be derived from the object of the rebels being openly avowed, and clearly underſtood; we ſhall have unanimity at home, founded in the general conviction of the juſtice and neceſſity of our meaſures.

"I am happy to inform you, that by the bleſſing of Divine Providence on the good conduct and valour of my officers and forces by ſea and land, and on the zeal and bravery of the auxiliary troops in my ſervice, Canada is recovered; and although, from unavoidable delays, the operations at New York could not begin before the month of Auguſt, the ſucceſs in that province has been ſo important, as to give the ſtrongeſt hopes of the moſt deciſive good conſequence: but notwithſtanding this fair proſpect, we muſt, at all events, prepare for another campaign.

"I continue to receive aſſurances of amity from the ſeveral Courts of Europe; and am uſing my utmoſt endeavours to conciliate unhappy differences between two neighbouring powers; and I ſtill hope that all miſunderſtandings may be removed, and Europe continue to enjoy the ineſtimable bleſſings of peace: I think, nevertheleſs, that in the preſent ſituation of affairs, it is expedient that we ſhould be in a reſpectable ſtate of defence at home.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I will order the eſtimates of the enſuing year to be laid before you. It is matter of real concern to me, that the important conſiderations which I have ſtated to you muſt neceſſarily be followed by great expence; I doubt not, however, but that my faithful commons will readily and chearfully grant me ſuch ſupplies, as the maintenance of the honour of my crown, the vindication of the juſt rights of parliament, and the public welfare, ſhall be found to require.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"In this arduous conteſt I can have no other object but to promote the true intereſts of all my ſubjects. No people ever enjoyed more happineſs, or lived under a milder government than thoſe now revolted provinces; the improvements in every art, of which they boaſt, declare it: their numbers, their wealth, their ſtrength by ſea and land, which they think ſufficient to enable them to make head againſt the whole power of the Mother Country, are irrefragable proofs of it. My deſire is to reſtore to them the bleſſings of law and liberty, equally enjoyed by every Britiſh ſubject, which they have fatally and deſperately exchanged for all the calamities of war, and the arbitrary tyranny of their chiefs."

Great debates aroſe in both houſes on the addreſſes to be preſented to his majeſty in anſwer to his ſpeech. The moſt important were in the houſe of lords; but they were at length adjuſted, as were thoſe in the lower houſe; and the addreſſes were accordingly preſented; to each of which his majeſty returned a moſt gracious anſwer.

The firſt buſineſs entered on was, the conſideration of the ſupplies, when a motion was made that 45,000 ſeamen, including 10,129 marines, be employed for the ſervice of the enſuing year. This motion produced ſome debates, but was at length carried by a great majority. At the ſame time a reſolution paſſed for allowing 4l. per man per month for the maintenance and wages of every ſeaman.

The committee of Ways and Means, after a motion made for the purpoſe, reſolved, that the land-tax for 1777 ſhould be 4s. in the pound.

On the 2d of November a proclamation was iſſued by his majeſty for a general faſt to be kept throughout England on the 13th of December following. It was alſo appointed to be held on the ſame day in Ireland; and on the 12th in Scotland.

Another proclamation was iſſued a few days after for recalling and prohibiting ſeamen from ſerving foreign princes and ſtates, and for granting rewards for diſcovering ſuch ſeamen as ſhould conceal themſelves, in a gratuity of Two Pounds for every able, and Thirty Shillings for every ordinary ſeaman, to be paid to any perſon who ſhould make ſuch diſcoveries, that ſuch men might be taken into his majeſty's ſervice, by any of his majeſty's ſea officers for raiſing men on or before the 31ſt day of December next.

[*] The following are the particulars of the manner in which General Lee was taken priſoner. Colonel Harcourt having penetrated the country upon a reconnoitring party with about twelve light dragoons, and chancing to meet a countryman on the road, entered upon examination of him, and found he was charged with a letter to General Waſhington, and that the wafer with which the letter was ſealed was ſtill wet; the ſignature being that of Mr. Lee, the colonel deſired the countryman to conduct him to that gentleman, which he complied with. The countryman was accordingly mounted behind one of the dragoons, and a party galloped to the houſe where Lee was: the guard fired upon the dragoons, by which one private man was killed, and a cornet wounded; a bullet paſſed through colonel Harcourt's helmet, but did not do him the leaſt injury. Lee was now ſummoned to ſurrender, which he complied with, delivered up his ſword, and in the moſt earneſt manner interceded for his life, deſiring to come in under the proclamation. This, of courſe, could not be complied with; and he was carried to the head-quarters, and lodged on board one of his majeſty's ſhips.-----He was afterwards exchanged for ſome of the king's officers, who had been taken priſoners by the provincials.

The money granted by the parliament (previous to the holidays) for defraying the expences of the navy, including the ordinary at 400,005l. and the building and repairing of ſhips, which was voted at 465,500l. amounted to no leſs than 3,205,505l. Excluſive of 4,000l. which was afterwards voted to Greenwich Hoſpital, and a million granted towards the cloſe of the ſeſſion, to be applied towards the diſcharge of the debt of the navy.

But if the naval expences were thus large, the ſupplies for the land ſervice were not leſs ſo, falling little ſhort of three millions, although the extraordinaries of the land-ſervice for the preceding year, which exceeded the amount of 1,200,000l. with ſome new contracts for additional German forces, and the heavy expences of half-pay and Chelſea, were not yet provided for.

The ſupplies being ſo far granted, and no public buſineſs of any moment in the way, an early and long receſs took place, the houſe adjourning on the 2d of December, to the 21ſt of January following.

This year terminated with an event which for ſome time occaſioned great confuſion, apprehenſion and ſuſpicion. On the 9th of December advice was received at the admiralty office by expreſs, that a fire broke out in the rope-houſe of his majeſty's yard at Portſmouth, about half an hour after four o'clock on Saturday afternoon, which burnt with great violence, and conſumed the ſame, except the outer walls; but by the timely aſſiſtance and vigorous efforts of the workmen of the yard, the ſeamen of his majeſty's ſhips, the marines quartered at Portſmouth, and the men belonging to the ordnance with their reſpective officers, it was happily prevented from extending to any other of the buildings in the yard, and was at length totally extinguiſhed. The chief loſs ſuſtained by this accident conſiſted chiefly of the rigging of two ſhips, the implements belonging to the rope-makers and rigging-houſe, a ſmall quantity of cordage, and ſome toppings of hemp.

The alarm occaſioned by this accident was greatly increaſed by another of the like nature that happened a ſhort time after at Briſtol, which deſtroyed a large range of warehouſes, beſides many private dwellings, and, had it not been for the quick diſcovery, and alacrity of the people in ſuppreſſing it, would have been productive of the moſt fatal conſequences.

How theſe accidents happened was for ſome time a myſtery; but at length it was diſcovered that they took place by the machinations of a wretched enthuſiaſt and incendiary, ſince well known by the appellation of John the Painter, but whoſe real name was James Aitken. When he was taken up and examined, he refuſed anſwering any queſtions, and otherwiſe behaved in a very daring and reſolute manner. However, there appearing ſufficient reaſon to ſuppoſe him the guilty perſon, he was committed to Wincheſter jail. At the next aſſizes he was brought to trial, and being found guilty, was ſoon after executed at Portſmouth *.

A. D. 1777. On the 21ſt of January the parliament met purſuant to adjournment, and immediately proceeded on the buſineſs of the nation. The firſt thing

---

* As the tranſactions of this man's life are of the moſt ſingular nature, as well as the crimes he committed, we think it neceſſary to preſerve an account of them, which we ſhall do in as brief a manner as the circumſtances will admit, from his firſt ſetting off in life to the time of his execution.

He was born in Edinburgh, and brought up to the buſineſs of a painter. As he poſſeſſed an extraordinary ſpirit for rambling, with a ſtrong propenſity to vice, he had paſſed, in the courſe of a few years, through an uncommon variety of thoſe ſcenes, which attend the moſt profligate and abandoned ſtate of a vagabond life. A kind of life, for which a manual occupation, however followed, affords the moſt perfect opportunity and cover.

Among his other exploits he had paſſed through ſeveral marching regiments of foot, from each of which he deſerted as ſoon as opportunity ſerved, after receiving the bounty money. In his various peregrinations through the different parts of England, he alternately committed highway robberies, burglaries, petty thefts, rapes; and worked at his trade, as occaſion invited, villainy prompted, or fear or neceſſity operated. Whether it proceeded from the apprehenſion of puniſhment, or that the original bent of his genius led him to new ſcenes of action, whatever was the operative motive, he ſhipped himſelf off for America, where he continued for two or three years. His being of a melancholy, ſolitary nature, which neither ſought for aſſociates in crimes, nor admitted of partners in pleaſure, as it contributed much to his preſervation for ſo long a time from the juſtice of thoſe laws which he was conſtantly breaking, ſerved equally to throw into utter darkneſs all thoſe parts of his life, which he did not himſelf think fitting or neceſſary to communicate. His tranſactions in America are accordingly unknown, any further, than that he traverſed, and worked at his trade in ſeveral of the colonies.

As his pilgrimage on that continent was in the beginning and during the progreſs of the troubles between England and her colonies, it may readily be imagined, that the violence of the language and ſentiments held in political matters, by that order of people with whom he lived and converſed, gave birth to that madneſs of enthuſiaſm in him, which afterwards became ſo dangerous. He accordingly returned to England with the moſt deadly antipathy to the government and nation, and ſoon after, if not originally, adopted the deſign of ſubverting, in his own ſingle perſon, that power, which he ſo much abhorred.

The ſcheme was as deteſtable as could be expected from the villainous character of the framer. It was to deſtroy the maratime force of this country, as well as its internal ſtrength and riches, by ſetting fire to the royal dock-yards, and burning the principal trading cities and towns, with their ſhipping of whatever ſort, ſo far as it could poſſibly be done. In the proſecution of this atrocious deſign, he traverſed the kingdom to diſcover the ſtate of the ſeveral docks, and the nature of the watch by which they were guarded, which he in general found to be as lax and inſufficient as he could have wiſhed. He alſo took wonderful pains in the conſtruction of fire-works, machines, and combuſtibles, for the purpoſe, but was ſtrangely unſucceſsful in all his attempts of this nature.

It was owing to this unaccountable failure in his machines, that the nation was ſaved from receiving ſome dreadful if not irretrievable ſhock. One of them, which extinguiſhed of its own accord, without any human interference, was found ſeveral weeks after it had been laid, in the center of a prodigious quantity, all of the moſt cumbuſtible ſubſtances, in the great hemp-houſe at Portſmouth. He, however, ſucceded in ſetting fire to the rope-houſe in that yard, and had an opportunity, for ſeveral miles in his flight towards London, to feaſt the malignity of his nature, in the contemplation of that dreadful conflagration which he had occaſioned, and which, from its prodigious appearance, he imagined had ſpread to all the magazines, buildings and docks. The fire was happily ſubdued, with no other loſs than that of the rope-houſe and its contents.

The incendiary ſtill purſued his deſign, but failed in his attempts upon the royal docks, and narrowly eſcaped being taken at Plymouth. The city of Briſtol was at this time greatly divided between the two numerous parties of Tories and Whigs, as they were called, the former of which eaſily ſupported, and the latter condemned in the ſtrongeſt terms, repreſenting it as an act highly indecent, unchriſtian, and impious, to exhibit any marks of triumph and rejoicing in the ſlaughter and deſtruction of their fellow-ſubjects.

In this ſtate of party and political diſunion among the inhabitants, John the Painter, in the month of January, 1777, attempted firſt to burn the ſhipping, and afterwards the city itſelf. A deep and narrow chaſm, which is nearly dry when the tide is out, fronts a great part of the quay in Briſtol, which is generally crowded with a prodigious number of veſſels, all lying ſo cloſe together, and ſo free from water at thoſe times, that the firſt thing which ſtrikes the attention of a ſtranger, is a ſurprize how they could be ſo lodged, and the ſecond, a conviction of the fatal and irremidiable conſequences both to the ſhipping and the city, which a fire muſt inevitably produce. The incendiary failing in his attempt to ſet two or three of thoſe veſſels on fire, found ſo ſtrict a watch kept afterwards, that he was obliged to change his mode of operation, and to ſecure the deſtruction of the ſhips by beginning with the houſes. After ſome failures in his attempts this way, in which, as in all others, the finding of his inaffective apparatus afforded full evidence of the atrocioуſneſs of the deſign, he at length ſucceeded ſo far as to ſet fire to ſome warehouſes in the vicinity of the quay, ſix or ſeven of which were conſumed.

The reign of the incendiary now grew ſhort. He was taken up ſoon after his departure from Briſtol, upon ſome ſuſpicious circumſtances, and behaved with great boldneſs, art, and an uncommon government in point of ſpeech, upon his ſeveral examinations, thing that engaged particular notice was, a bill brought into the lower houſe for granting commiſſions, or letters of marque and repriſal, as they are uſually called, to the owners or captains of private merchant ſhips, authoriſing them to take and make prize of all veſſels with their effects, belonging to any of the inhabitants of the thirteen ſpecified revolted American colonies. This bill paſſed the commons without the leaſt oppoſition; nor did it produce much debate among the Lords, with whom it only underwent the trifling alteration, of inſerting the words "letters of permiſſion," in the place of "letters of marque," the latter being thought only applicable to repriſals on a foreign enemy.

On the ſame day this bill paſſed the Lords, a motion was made in the Houſe of Commons, for leave to bring in a bill to enable his majeſty to ſecure and detain perſons charged with or ſuſpected of the crime of high treaſon committed in America, or on the high ſeas, or the crime of piracy. The bill being admitted was, after great debates, read the firſt time; and a motion being made for the ſecond reading, it was carried by a great majority.

This bill occaſioned much murmuring among the people, and during the ſhort time it was in agitation, the following petition againſt it was preſented to the commons from the city of London:

To the Honourable the Commons of Great Britain in parliament aſſembled:
The humble petition of the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen and Commons, of the city of London, in Common Council aſſembled, Sheweth,

"That your petitioners have ſeen a bill depending in this honourable houſe, to empower his majeſty to ſecure and detain perſons charged with, or ſuſpected of, the crime of High Treaſon committed in North America, or on the High Seas, or the crime of piracy.

"That if the ſaid bill ſhould paſs into a law, your petitioners are apprehenſive, it will create the greateſt uneaſineſs in the minds of many of his majeſty's good ſubjects, and tend to excite the moſt alarming diſturbances: All perſons being indiſcriminately liable upon the ground of ſuſpicion alone, without any oath made, and without convening the parties, or hearing what they can alledge in their own juſtification, to be committed to a remote priſon in any corner of the realm, there to remain without bail or mainprize.

"That your petitioners are deeply affected with what they conceive will be the dangerous conſequences of ſuch a law, as from little motives of reſentment, and various other inducements, there may be perſons competent to commit, who may be tempted to exerciſe that power in its utmoſt latitude and extent.

"That meaſures ſo violent and unconſtitutional, ſo ſubverſive of the ſacred and fundamental rights of the people, and ſubjecting them to the moſt cruel oppreſſion and bondage, will, in the judgement of your petitioners, be introductive of every ſpecies of miſchief and confuſion; and thereby precipitate the impending ruin of this country.

"Your petitioners therefore earneſtly beſeech this honourable houſe, That the ſaid bill may not paſs into a law, or at leaſt to take ſuch care, as in their wiſdom may ſeem meet, to prevent it from its being extended in its operations to any of his majeſty's ſubjects reſident in theſe kingdoms."

This petition, after being read, was ordered to lie on the table. At the very next meeting of the members, the bill petitioned againſt was read the third time, and, after ſome few debates, paſſed the houſe.

It met with more oppoſition in the upper than the lower houſe, till the queſtion was put for reading it the third time, when (among others who objected to it) lord Abingdon roſe, and declared himſelf totally againſt the bill, as repugnant to the law of nations, and to the dictates of humanity. His lordſhip particularly dwelt upon the word "ſuſpected," as a term of ſuch latitude, that it was liable to be conſtrued to the moſt unconſtitutional meanings, and the conſequences of the bill might prove fatal to the liberties of this country: he therefore could not give his conſent to paſſing the bill.

Notwithſtanding the arguments made uſe of by this nobleman, which were of the moſt nervous and forcible nature, on putting the queſtion again for paſſing it, it was carried without further debate; and on the 3d of March received the royal aſſent. Among others which received the royal ſignet at the ſame time was, the "Bill for enabling the lords of the admiralty to grant letters of marque to private ſhips of war, or merchant ſhips belonging to the American colonies, that are now in actual rebellion againſt Great Britain."

The next thing that materially engaged the attention of the commons was, the following meſſage from his majeſty, which was read to the houſe by lord North:

"G. REX.

"It gives his majeſty much concern to find himſelf obliged to acquaint the Houſe of Commons with the difficulties he labours under, by reaſon of debts incurred by the expences of his houſhold, and of the civil government, which being computed on the 5th of January laſt, do amount to more than 600,000l. His majeſty relies on the loyalty and affection of his faithful Commons, of which he has received ſo many ſignal proofs, for enabling him to diſcharge this debt; and that they will at the ſame time make ſome further proviſion for the better ſupport of his majeſty's houſhold, and of the honour and dignity of his crown.

G. R."

As ſoon as this meſſage was read, a motion was made for referring it to the Committee of Supply on that day ſe'nnight. One member in particular ſtrongly oppoſed this motion as unuſual, if not unprecedented, it having at all times been cuſtomary to take royal meſſages nations, refuſing peremptorily to anſwer any queſtions, which admitted even of a doubt in the remoteſt tendency, that the anſwer could by any conſtruction be wreſted to his own crimination; nor was he at all diſconcerted or embarraſſed by the appearance of, or the queſtions propoſed to him by, ſome of the lords, and other principal officers of the admiralty.

He was, however, with all his art and caution, circumvented by means of another painter, who being either an American, or having lived on that continent, found means thereby, and by pretending to ſympathize in his misfortunes, and to hold principles ſimilar to his own, to obtain his confidence in priſon; until at length, being inſtructed and aſſiſted for the purpoſe, he fulfilled his intent, by drawing from him the whole hiſtory of his crimes. Upon his trial at Wincheſter, notwithſtanding the ſhock which the appearance and evidence of his pretended friend muſt have given him, he behaved with the ſame boldneſs and addreſs which he had hitherto manifeſted; made a good defence, ſhrewd obſervations on the nature of the evidence, and the acknowledged baſeneſs of the witneſs, and received ſentence of death with the moſt perfect indifference. He ſent for one of the principal naval officers of Portſmouth, either going to, or at the place of execution, to whom he acknowledged his crime, and alſo gave ſome cautions with reſpect to the future preſervation of the royal yards from ſimilar dangers. -----This diſtinguiſhed criminal was tried at Wincheſter on the 6th of March, 1777, and from the heinouneſs of his crime (of which he was found guilty) was executed at the Dock-gate, Portſmouth, on the 10th of the ſame month.

meſſages into immediate conſideration. This produced a very warm debate, at the cloſe of which, however, the motion was carried.

On the day appointed for taking this matter into conſideration, the Houſe went into a Committee of Supply; and, after ſome debates, came to the following reſolutions:

Reſolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that the ſum of 618,240l. 9s. be granted to his majeſty to diſcharge the arrears and debts due and owing on account of the Civil Liſt on the 5th of January 1777.

Reſolved, that it is the opinion of this Committee, that the ſum of 100,000l. per annum be granted to his majeſty over and above the yearly ſum of 800,000l. granted by an act made in the firſt year of his reign.

When theſe reſolutions were reported from the Committee of Supply to the Whole Houſe, the firſt was agreed to without any oppoſition; but the ſecond produced debates that continued for ſeveral hours, at the cloſe of which, however, it was agreed to by a great majority.

In conſequence of theſe reſolutions a bill was immediately framed, which ſoon paſſed both houſes; and on the 7th of May received the royal aſſent*.

While this bill was in agitation, a motion was made by Sir James Lowther "that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty for an augmentation of the annual incomes of their royal highneſſes the dukes of Glouceſter and Cumberland." This motion was productive of many warm and learned debates; but at length, on the queſtion being put, it was rejected by a great majority.

No other material matter occurred during the remainder of this ſeſſion. The national buſineſs being, therefore, finiſhed, on the 6th of June his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and after ſigning ſuch bills as were ready, prorogued the parliament.

Having thus mentioned the moſt material domeſtic tranſactions of this year, let us now take a view of affairs in America, where the war was ſtill proſecuted with the utmoſt vigour.

In the beginning of this year ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened in the Jerſeys with various ſucceſs. On the 23d and 24th of March a great quantity of proviſions, ſtores, &c. with barracks and ſtorehouſes belonging to the Provincials, were deſtroyed by the king's troops, at Peck's Hill, upon the North River. The cruizers belonging to lord Howe and commodore Hotham's fleet continued to take many prizes. In Connecticut, on the 27th of April, the king's troops deſtroyed a great quantity of ſtores at Danbury.

General Burgoyne, with the northern army, proceeded to Ticonderago and Fort Independence, which he took poſſeſſion of on the 6th of July, and found in them great quantities of ſtores and proviſions, beſides what he deſtroyed at Skeneſborough. Soon after this he took poſſeſſion of Fort Edward, which the Provincials abandoned, and then proceeded to Saratoga, where they were ſtrongly poſted.

On the 11th of September the troops under the command of general Howe had an engagement with the provincials on the heights of Bradywine, in which many were killed and wounded on both ſides, and 400 provincials were taken priſoners. But though the latter were defeated, and the action at firſt ſeemed of an indeciſive nature, yet it occaſioned Philadelphia to fall into the hands of the Britiſh troops.

While general Howe was thus employed, an attack was made by the Provincials on Staten Iſland; but they were repulſed with ſome ſlaughter. And much about the ſame time general Clinton ſtormed and took Fort Clinton and Fort Montmogery.

On the 16th of October the Provincials, under the command of general Gates, having ſurrounded general Burgoyne's army at Saratoga, the latter thought proper to enter into articles of capitulation; by which himſelf and his troops, after laying down their arms, were to have a free paſſage to Great Britain. But the congreſs, under various ſpecious pretences, have not ratified the ſtipulation, but ſtill detain the men; and general Burgoyne is now in England only on his parole of honour.

Towards the cloſe of the year ſeveral forts were taken by the troops and ſhipping; and many ſkirmiſhes happened on the banks of the Delaware, in order to keep up the communication with the army at Philadelphia. The Provincials likewiſe evacuated their entrenchments at Red Bank.

Great diſturbances happened this year in the East-Indies, where lord Pigot, governor of Madraſs, was depoſed, put in confinement, and ſoon after died. His death was occaſioned either by the rigour of his impriſonment, his chagrin on account of ſuch a revolution, or ſome darker cauſe not hitherto developed. This affair hath not yet been inveſtigated, but there is great reaſon to think that it will be ſpeedily ſcrutinized by parliament.

On the 20th of November the parliament aſſembled, when his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It is a great ſatisfaction to me, that I have recourſe to the wiſdom and ſupport of my parliament, in this conjuncture, when the continuance of the rebellion in North America demands our moſt ſerious attention. The powers which you have entruſted me with for the ſuppreſſion of this revolt, have been faithfully exerted; and I have a juſt confidence, that the conduct and courage of my officers, and the ſpirit and intrepidity of my forces, both by ſea and land, will, under the bleſſing of Divine Providence, be attended with important ſucceſs; but as I am perſuaded that you will ſee the neceſſity of preparing for ſuch further operations as the contingencies of the war, and the obſtinacy of the rebels, may render expedient, I am, for that purpoſe, purſuing the proper meaſures for keeping my land forces complete to their preſent eſtabliſhment; and if I ſhould have occaſion to increaſe them, by contracting any new engagements, I rely on your zeal and public ſpirit to enable me to make them good.

"I receive repeated aſſurances from foreign powers of their pacific diſpoſitions: My own cannot be doubted. But at this time, when the armaments in the ports of France and Spain continue, I have thought it adviſeable to make a conſiderable augmentation to my naval force, as well to keep my kingdoms in a reſpectable ſtate of ſecurity, as to provide an adequate protection for the extenſive commerce of my ſubjects; and, as, on the one hand, I am determined that the peace of Europe ſhall not be diſturbed by me, ſo, on the other, I will always be a faithful guardian of the honour of the crown of Great Britain.

* Before the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons delivered this bill to his majeſty to receive the royal ſignet, he addreſſed him in a ſpeech, which being a matter of ſingularity, we ſhall preſerve an authentic copy of it. It was as follows:

"Moſt Gracious Sovereign,

"The bill, which it is now my duty to preſent to your majeſty is entitled, "An act for the better ſupport of his majeſty's houſhold, and of the honour and dignity of the crown of Great Britain:" to which your commons humbly beg your royal aſſent.

"By this bill, Sir, and the reſpectful circumſtances which preceded and accompanied it, your commons have given the fulleſt and cleareſt proof of their zeal and affection for your majeſty; for in a time of public diſtreſs, full of difficulty and danger, their conſtituents labouring under burthens almoſt too heavy to be borne, your faithful commons poſtponed all other buſineſs, and, with as much diſpatch as the nature of their proceedings would admit, have not only granted to your majeſty a large preſent ſupply, but alſo a very great additional revenue; great beyond example; great beyond your majeſty's higheſt expence.

"But all this, Sir, they have done in a well-grounded confidence, that you will apply wiſely what they have granted liberally; and feeling, what every good ſubject muſt feel with the greateſt ſatisfaction, that under the direction of your majeſty's wiſdom, the affluence and grandeur of the ſovereign will reflect dignity and honour upon his people."

" Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

" I have ordered the eſtimates for the enſuing year to be laid before you. The various ſervices which I have mentioned to you will unavoidably require large ſupplies; and nothing could relieve my mind from the concern which I feel for the heavy charge which they muſt bring on my faithful people; but the perfect conviction that they are neceſſary for the welfare and eſſential intereſts of my kingdoms.

" My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I will ſteadily purſue the meaſures in which we are engaged for the re-eſtabliſhment of that conſtitutional ſubordination, which, with the bleſſing of God, I will maintain through the ſeveral parts of my dominions; but I ſhall ever be watchful for an opportunity of putting a ſtop to the effuſion of the blood of my ſubjects, and the calamities which are inſeperable from a ſtate of war.——And I ſtill hope, that the deluded and unhappy multitude will return to their allegiance; and that the remembrance of what they once enjoyed, the regret for what they have loſt, and the feelings of what they now ſuffer under the arbitrary tyranny of their leaders, will re-kindle in their hearts a ſpirit of loyalty to their Sovereign, and of attachment to their mother country; and that they will enable me, with the concurrence and ſupport of my parliament, to accompliſh what I ſhall conſider as the greateſt glory of my reign, the reſtoration of peace, order, and confidence to my American Colonies."

As ſoon as his majeſty left the houſe a motion was made for preſenting an addreſs of thanks. This, after ſome debates, was agreed to, and an addreſs was accordingly drawn up; but it was warmly objected to by ſeveral of the members, particularly the earl of Chatham, who moved, that the following amendment might be made to it.

" That this houſe do moſt humbly adviſe and ſupplicate his majeſty to be pleaſed to cauſe the moſt ſpeedy and effectual meaſures to be taken for reſtoring peace in America; and that no time may be loſt in propoſing an immediate ceſſation of hoſtilities there, in order to the opening a treaty for the final ſettlement of the tranquillity of thoſe invaluable provinces, by a removal of the unhappy cauſes of this ruinous civil war, and by a juſt and adequate ſecurity againſt the return of the like calamities in times to come. And this houſe deſire to offer the moſt dutiful aſſurance to his majeſty, that they will, in due time, chearfully co-operate with the magnanimity and tender goodneſs of his majeſty, for the preſervation of his people, by ſuch explicit and moſt ſolemn declarations and proviſions of fundamental and irrevocable laws, as may be judged neceſſary for aſcertaining and fixing for ever the reſpective rights of Great Britain and her colonies."

The propoſed amendment produced very long and violent debates; at the cloſe of which, on the queſtion being put, the houſe divided, when the numbers were

Non-Contents,	28.

The addreſs propoſed by the lower houſe was alſo objected to, and was productive of very long debates; but it was at length carried by a conſiderable majority.

This matter being adjuſted, the houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee of ſupply, when a ſhort ſtate of the navy, both as to the number of ſhips and men employed, and where ſtationed, being given, a motion was made, That it is the reſolution of this committee, that 60,000 ſeamen be employed for the ſervice of the year 1778. This motion produced very long and intereſting debates, at the cloſe of which it was carried without a diviſion.

The ſupplies being granted, and ſeveral bills ready (among which was that for ſuſpending the Habeas Corpus) on the 10th of December his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and after ſigning the reſpective bills, adjourned the parliament.

A. D. 1778. On the 23d of January the parliament re-aſſembled, when, after the papers on the ſtate of the nation were delivered in, the earl of Abingdon gave notice in the houſe of lords of an intention to make an intereſting motion in the following ſhort ſpeech.

" Having a motion of very great conſequence and importance to make to this houſe, I think it neceſſary to appriſe your lordſhips of it.

I am greatly alarmed at the ſpirit that is gone abroad, and at the countenance given to that ſpirit, of raiſing, out of the medium of parliament, armies in Great Britain, by perſonal intereſt and private ſubſcriptions.

It is therefore my intention, in the courſe of a few days, to move, that a day be appointed for ſummoning the judges to attend this houſe, in order that their opinions may be taken upon this matter.

At preſent, I conceive it, my lords, to be not only repugnant to the principles of the conſtitution, but expreſsly againſt the letter of the law. Perhaps I am miſtaken; if I am, and this mode of arming the nation be right, I too will exert my intereſt for the purpoſe of raiſing a regiment; not, my lords, to go to America, to be hazarded, perhaps devoted, but to remain in England, to aſſiſt protecting our liberties.

If I am not miſtaken, I ſhall truſt, that theſe violent meaſures will be immediately ſuppreſſed".

After ſome converſation, relative to what day the judges ſhould be ſummoned for their opinion, Tueſday the 27th was agreed to.

This deſigned motion was corroborated in the lower houſe; for Sir Philip Jennings Clerke moved, that an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, requeſting he would be pleaſed to lay before the houſe an account of the troops raiſed, and intended to be raiſed ſince the late adjournment of parliament; together with the names of the officers appointed to command them; and the names of all the officers who are to ſerve in them, ſpecifying the corps to which they formerly belonged, the rank they held, and the length of time they had ſerved.

This produced a debate. The minority gentlemen conteſted the legality of raiſing ſoldiers except by act of parliament; and were but little pleaſed with the compliment paid the houſe by the application of the miniſtry for their ſanction of a meaſure ſo unconſtitutional, and which left them in ſome degree no other power but the negative one of not providing for them.

Lord Barrington ſaid, that very great offers had been made, but that no more than thoſe mentioned in the accounts he had given in would be accepted.

Colonel Barre moved that the words, " and on what terms they are to be raiſed," ſhould be part of Sir Philip Jennings Clerke's motion, which was agreed to without a diviſion.

On Jan. 27, after ſome unintereſting altercations which were carried on with heat, and decided in favour of adminiſtration,

Lord Abingdon roſe, and moved the houſe " to fix upon the day when the members ſhould be ſummoned to attend, and alſo the judges, to enquire whether the preſent mode of raiſing men by ſubſcription was legal or no ?"

The lord chancellor obſerved, that the judges were never convened, in their judicial capacity before the houſe, but for ſome valid cauſe aſſigned : his lordſhip had mentioned none; for, previous to this ſummons, it would be neceſſary to prove the orders that had been iſſued, whether or no government had materially interpoſed, and whether or no there was at this time above 20,000 men raiſed by the authority of parliament ; for it was only become criminal then, according to the act concerning mutiny and riot, for any one to levy troops for his majeſty's ſervice, when the eſtabliſhed number of 20,000 was exceeded.

Lord Camden ſaid, he did not mean to enquire into the legality of the conduct, but only recommended lord Abingdon to withdraw his motion, and deſire the houſe to fix on a day. It was then litigated, whether or no any ſingle lord had a right to ſummon the judges without the conſent of the majority of the houſe ? Some of the old members being referred to, it was determined, that a convention of the judges was always in conſequence of an act of the houſe, and by no means in the power of any individual member ſolely to effect.---Wedneſday, February the 4th, was fixed on for their lordſhips to attend.

On the ſecond of February the duke of Richmond made a motion concerning the forces of Great Britain and Ireland being inadequate to the defence of the reſpective countries; but this was negatived by a majority of 93 againſt 31.

On the 4th of February, after the ordinary buſineſs of the day was over, lord Abingdon roſe to propoſe his motion, which being ſingular in itſelf, and the arguments thence ariſing of a peculiar nature, we ſhall here inſert.

The motion, as ſtated by lord Abingdon, was, " That this houſe, taking into conſideration the legality of the preſent mode of benevolences, or of raiſing forces by ſubſcription, do look upon this practice as contrary to law, and the principles of the Conſtitution." His lordſhip obſerved, that the reaſons which induced him to the propoſition of this queſtion, were firſt, A conſcious inability to determine upon ſuch a ſubject; and ſecondly, The wiſh of acting on ſuch great authority as the majority of the judges certainly conſtituted.---He was ſorry he was precluded from that advantage by a previous determination : But corruption had pervaded every part of the conſtitution.

He then proceeded to enter into enquiry of the illegality of the meaſure reprobated by his motion. He firſt read the advertiſement from an evening paper conveying the terms which the new method of levying was conceived, and then remarked, that this additional power added to the royal prerogative, was big with the worſt conſequences to the liberties of the ſubject. To grant the king money for raiſing troops was ſupplying him with independent authority ; and where ſuch an increaſe of dominion might finally terminate it was not difficult to foretel.---It was repugnant to the expreſs terms of the Bill of Rights ; for it was there ſaid explicitly, that his majeſty could not, for his own particular privilege, raiſe, or keep up an army, without the concurrent approbation of the other powers of the legiſlature.---When the American war was, in previous debates, vehemently defended, the moſt valid argument urged in defence of it was, that the ſubjection of the colonies would keep the legiſlation in equilibrio, by precluding the king from thoſe extraordinary pecuniary acquiſitions which muſt neceſſarily fall to his ſhare, if America ſubſiſted in an alliance different from abſolute dependency.--- Miniſtry plainly demonſtrated that they adhered to no ſyſtem of principles, when they could diſtort the ſame argument at once as an indication and an objection of meaſures.---The preſent ſubject of litigation was to produce the ſame effect of reſtraining the prerogative ; yet, for ſome latent cauſes, that was not at preſent ſo deſirable an object. The preſent mode of ſupplying the neceſſities of the crown, though ſomewhat diſtinguiſhed in name, varied very little in fact from that extortion practiſed previous to the revolution, called benevolences. Here the ſubject was ſolicited for voluntary contributions ; and yet they were, to all intents and purpoſes, as much exacted as if they had been taken by open violence : Perſons were puniſhed for non-compliance ; yet no compulſion was pretended to. This was a grievance which our anceſtors refuſed to acquieſce in ; yet, in reality, we ourſelves felt the burden of it at preſent. There was no difference, in effect, between the old benevolences and the modern levies. The method of procuring them varied ; but the reſult of each was exactly the ſame. Independent of the conſtitutional cauſes that ſtigmatized ſubſcription recruits as illegal and dangerous, there were arguments deduced againſt them from the very places which offered them.--- Scotland, Mancheſter, and Liverpool, were foremoſt in their zeal, who, in time of yore, had diſplayed no ſuch enthuſiaſm of loyalty.

Lord Cardiff oppoſed the motion, from the conviction of arguments deduced from experience. It was a practice which had been obſerved frequently in the laſt war, to ſupply deficiencies by voluntary contributions, and then he did not read that ever its legality had been queſtioned. As for the reflections which had been affixed to particular countries and places, he thought they were diſingenuous and impotent. He himſelf had connections with Scotland, but did not think himſelf, therefore, leſs an Engliſhman : he was not aſhamed to acknowledge the affinity he bore to that country, for it reflected not even the moſt diſtant imputation on his loyalty. They had offended againſt their duty ; but did that imply a perpetual perſeverance in ſedition ? They had given the nobleſt teſtimonies of their attachment ; they had wiped out the ſtigma of traitors with their blood, and proved their allegiance with their ſwords.

Lord Effingham ſaid, it had been ſuggeſted by the noble Lord who ſpoke laſt, that there was authority drawn from paſt practice to ſanction the preſent method of recruiting ; but this did not appear to be the caſe. In the laſt war, in the year 1750, ten regiments had been raiſed without the interpoſition of Parliament ; but then there was at that time a ſtanding act of the houſes, called An Act of Credit, by which their ſanction was extended, in ſuch a predicament, to all the operations of the crown. He ſaid, that ſo far from the concurrence of parliament being unneceſſary on theſe occaſions, there was an act of parliament, made in the ſecond year of the firſt ſeſſion of Charles the Second, whereby it was expreſly declared, their coincidence was neceſſary to the exiſtence of ſuch a meaſure. The act was then ordered to be read. It appeared, that in the year after the reſtoration, king Charles, from the nature of his preceding circumſtances, having been in want of money, had recourſe to his parliament, who granted him an act for raiſing it, with theſe limitations, that the time of ſubſcribing ſhould be reſtrained to a certain period ; and that no Commoner ſhould in his bounty be permitted to exceed 200l. nor Peer 400l. Lord Effingham proceeded to obſerve, that theſe reſtrictions implied the power of impoſing ; and that the ſubſcriptions, though in ſome meaſure voluntarily conferred, had their origin and authority primarily from parliament.

Lord Suffolk ſaid, it was always found, that the royal prerogative varied with the times; being the executive part of the legiſlature, the authority he exerted was, in many inſtances, not ſubject to the ſlow deliberation of parliament; in great emergencies, greater liberties were taken; in times not quite ſo dangerous, the licence was leſs. Suppoſing, therefore, that the preciſe conſtitutionality of the point was not eaſily determined; yet the acknowledgment that there was peril in the times, gave ſuch a meaſure as the preſent ſufficient ſanction; and that the criſis was dangerous; that we were ſubject to apprehenſions from every quarter, were tenets every day inculcated in the houſe. In the laſt war, the ſame cuſtom prevailed.----In the year 45, it was alſo practiſed; and when the three celebrated rebels, Kilmarnock, Cromartie, and Balmerino, were tried, Lord Hardwicke took an opportunity, on this occaſion, to obviate a public clamour which had originated from the ſame kind of ſubſcriptions that now prevail; and his opinion, as ſolemnly pronounced, his lordſhip had now tranſcribed, and begged leave to read to the houſe.

The contents of the paper were to ſignify, that though ſeveral perſons had objected to the cuſtom of ſupplying his majeſty's levies by voluntary contributions, yet he would take upon him to affirm, that the practice was perfectly loyal and warrantable, and that ſuch notions were no leſs ſeditious than unwiſe. Being convinced from theſe circumſtances, in the firſt place, that there could not be a better diſplay of the Britiſh ſpirit than this unſolicited mode of aſſiſtance; and in the ſecond place, from the great authority he had quoted, that it was entirely legal, he oppoſed the preſent motion as it then ſtood, and propoſed an amendment to the following purport, that immediately after the words, "Reſolved, That it is the opinion of this houſe," ſhould follow, "That the contributions of his majeſty's ſubjects, for the purpoſe of raiſing troops, is not only perfectly conſtitutional, but alſo a conduct perfectly meritorious."

A prolix altercation took place concerning this amendment. It was contended, on the one hand, that the motion, thus altered, came more properly under the denomination of a diſtinct and ſeparate propoſition. On the other hand, it was argued, that, on ſeveral occaſions, the ſame practice had been obſerved.

Lord Denbigh called the attention of the houſe from this mere diſpute of order, by obſerving, that he had heard it affirmed, that the ſupplies which had been raiſed by ſubſcription in the laſt war had received the ſanction of parliament, and that thoſe attempted to be raiſed by the ſame means at preſent, had not that ſanction. He affirmed, that the very contrary to this was the truth; and he proved the truth of his aſſertion, by having recourſe to old Journals, whereby it appeared, than an act of credit had not been granted during the former period, though it was ſhewn to exiſt in the preſent.

Lord Mansfield ſaid he had been hindered from delivering his ſentiments ſooner, from the tumult which had ariſen. He objected to the original motion on every account---firſt, as to its formality; and ſecondly, as to its materials. A motion was made which reſted for its foundation on a mere news-paper advertiſement. When the motion was once drawn, where did the circumſtances appear from which it reſulted?---They were in an evening paper, at the time that the motion lay upon the table at the houſe of lords. To have made the grounds of this propoſition perfectly authentic, it ſhould have been explicitly ſhewn, what were the operations of this ſociety; what they had done; and what were their motives. If, therefore, there had been no more valid objection than mere form, he ſhould have thought himſelf authoriſed in giving it a negative; for cauſes not appearing legally, were cauſes not exiſting. There was a common privilege which the king enjoyed with many of his ſubjects; that is, the privilege of receiving a donation by perſonal gift, or by legacy. This ſubſcription was only a gift of money, and no one could argue againſt the common right of receiving. The only circumſtance that could beſtow the leaſt criminality on a donation was, the demonſtration that it was conferred for purpoſes not legal; an attempt to relieve the emergencies of the ſtate, could never be deemed a culpable end, and therefore the gift was in all reſpects authentically legal. It was a part of the royal prerogative which had been exerciſed on a thouſand occaſions. The aldermen of London, during the courſe of a long war, once raiſed 7000l. by this means, and received the thanks of the king, and the approbation of parliament, for their conduct. At the ſame period, the county of Middleſex alſo produced, by this means, between 3 and 4000l. for which Mr. Secretary Pitt ſent an epiſtle, couched in the higheſt terms of compliment and approbation.

His lordſhip next defined the riſe and nature of what were called benevolences, by ſaying, though they were ſo called, they were generally exerted by force, and that was, no doubt, contrary to law and the ſpirit of the conſtitution. He concluded a long and elaborate ſpeech, in which he ſhewed his uſual abilities, with an opinion of Lord Hardwicke's, when he paſſed ſentence on the rebel lords, which was, that though the pariſh officers, in the time of the rebellion, went from houſe to houſe to collect money for levying of troops and other exigencies, that the neceſſity of the times demanded and countenanced ſuch proceedings, and all opinions to the contrary were preſumptuous and abſurd.

Lord Camden, though he had ſpoken ſeveral times in the courſe of the debate, roſe with freſh vigour, in oppoſition to the great law authority who had juſt ſat down. He began, by wiſhing the noble lord who ſpoke laſt had come out earlier in the debate; that taking it up juſt then, was rather unexpectedly, when the nature of the amendment, and other matters ſeemed to occupy the diſcuſſions of their lordſhips. His lordſhip however followed the noble lord cloſely in all the doctrines he had laid down. As to the firſt objection, the propoſition not being a matter of fact, he ſaid, though it was impoſſible to give that kind of proof to it at preſent that courts of law might require, the truth of it was well known and eſtabliſhed, and he could not ſuppoſe any noble lord could ſeriouſly have a doubt about it on their minds.

He then defined the doctrine of raiſing levies without the conſent of parliament, on clear, preciſe, and conſtitutional grounds. He flatly denied any ſuch thing could be legally done; that ſuch a ſtep would give the king a power, that, in the end, may enable him to act without parliaments at all; for ſubjects that could thus grant monies towards enabling his majeſty to raiſe troops, under pretence of exigencies, may afterwards, and at times when no exigencies did exiſt, raiſe men, and then theſe troops may find a reſource for their further ſupport by the plunder of the nation.

As to caſes of actual rebellion in the kingdom, quoted by the noble law lord, they made a wide difference. The neceſſity of the times demanded a ſpeedy, nay, an unconſtitutional ſuccour; for my lords (ſays he) there was then no time for parliament's meeting, no time for deliberation, the rebels were in full march through the heart of the kingdom; and let me remind your lordſhips, embraced by thoſe now loyal towns of Mancheſter and Liverpool; if ſuccours therefore were not inſtantly obtained, the kingdom nor conſtitution could exiſt.

His lordſhip next defined the nature of prerogative, gave it its due extent, marked its bounds with great legal knowledge, and concluded a long, ſpirited ſpeech, with a ſuſpicion which he could not help having, that inſtead of many of the towns ſhewing their loyalty by their ſubſcriptions, the ſame principle of Toryiſm ſtill exiſted, and their laying themſelves at the foot of the throne was only varying the old meaſure.

Soon after this lord Suffolk withdrew his amendment, when after a ſhort debate, which was ſupported by his grace the duke of Richmond, lord Gower, lord Weymouth, duke of Grafton, lords Littelton, Warwick, Faulconbridge, and Radnor, the main queſtion, at about half an hour after eight o'clock, was called for, when there appeared, on a diviſion,

On February 6, the order of the day for the houſe to reſolve itſelf into a committee, to conſider of the ſtate of the nation was read, Lord Scarſdale in the chair. As ſoon as the committee was formed, the Duke of Richmond ſtated his reaſons for calling evidence to the bar. He ſaid, it would be impoſſible to decide upon the good or bad policy of the war carrying on in America, without an enquiry into the conſequences it had been productive of in reſpect to our trade, commerce, and finances. For this purpoſe, he had moved for the attendance of ſeveral eminent and intelligent merchants, acquainted with the general principles of trade and commerce, and well informed of the points on which they were to be examined. His grace then moved, that Mr. Wooldridge, an American merchant, be called in.

Mr. Wooldridge being ſworn, gave the following important facts in evidence:---He informed the committee, that 733 merchant and trading veſſels had been taken by the American privateers ſince the paſſing the prohibitory act; of which, after deducting for thoſe retaken and reſtored, there remained 559; the value of which, including the ſhips, their cargoes, &c. amounted, upon a very moderate calculation, to 1,800,633l. 10s. about 4000l. each. Of theſe ſhips 247 were ſhips trading to the Weſt-Indies and the iſland of Jamaica. The alderman then ſtated, that the average value of a ſhip and cargo to the Weſt-Indies, was 8000l. on her outward, and 10,000l. on her homeward voyage; and the average value of a ſhip and cargo to the Weſt-Indies, was 6000l. outward, and 8000l. homeward. He ſaid the number of privateers out of port within the ſame period, was 173; 34 of which had been taken by our ſhips of war and letters of marque; that the number of ſeamen aboard the whole of the privateers, having ſtruck an average, he preſumed to amount to about 13,000; and 2000 and odd carriage guns, excluſive of ſwivels and cohorns.---The number of priſoners taken aboard the 34 privateers, he ſaid, were about 3000. The inſurance to America, Africa, and the Weſt-Indies, was riſen from two to five per cent. and to the Streights, Portugal, and Spain, from one to three. The price of tar and turpentine, from 6 and 8 to 30s. per barrel. Sugar from 30s. to 3l. per cwt. Oil nearly in the ſame proportion; pearl and pot-aſhes, iron, and indigo conſiderable; tobacco from 7d. halfpenny to 2s. per lb.

He was aſked what documents he reſorted to in the account he gave of the number of captures of American privateers, and numbers of men? He replied from Lloyd's book, or the accounts entered in a book at Lloyd's Coffee-houſe, by the direction of the under writers; which he had every reaſon to believe was authentic. He further informed the committee, that the ſeamen's wages were riſen from 30s. a month, and under to 55s. per month; and freight very conſiderably; but not in ſo great a proportion. That the increaſed value of ſugars, &c. paid the merchants ſufficiently for the increaſed price of inſurance, but the weight fell upon the conſumer of the commodities imported and exported. The alderman gave his opinion, that the manufactories of this kingdom, eſpecially that of iron, were not increaſed in point of export ſince the war began; that the American war had been the cauſe of many bankruptcies; that when the prohibition act paſſed, there might be about two millions due to the merchants of Great-Britain from America; that in the ſix months allowed by the act for the continuance of an intercourſe between the two countries, the Americans had tranſmitted about five hundred thouſand pounds worth of goods in part of payment of their debts to their creditors at home; that thoſe 500,000 pounds worth of goods, were they now on hand, would be worth two millions, from the encreaſed price of the various articles; that at preſent there was due from America to the merchants of Great-Britain at leaſt one million five hundred thouſand pounds; that upon an average, the debt was not worth five ſhillings in the pound; that it was more or leſs valuable, according to the province in which the debtors reſided; that in North Carolina, and ſuch parts as had not been the ſeat of war, where the perſons of the inhabitants and their property had been deſtroyed by fire and ſword, the merchants thought their money tolerably ſafe, ſhould an intercourſe be again brought about between Great-Britain and America; but that in the province of New York and Pennſylvania, the debts due to Engliſh merchants were of little worth; that there were 72,000l. due in particular to the houſe in which he had lately been a partner; that to ſpeak for one, he would gladly ſell the debt for ten ſhillings in the pound.

Mr. Hake was the next witneſs examined; he confirmed the authenticity of Lloyd's book; ſaid, he believed it contained nothing but truth. The mode of making it up, he informed their lordſhips, was this: Perſons were employed, and a correſpondence kept open with every port in Great-Britain and Ireland, giving an account of every ſhip and veſſel that ſailed in and out. He was employed by the under-writers in this buſineſs, becauſe that they might know the ſtate and condition of every veſſel on which they under-wrote a policy.

Mr. Beeſton Long was next examined. He ſaid the debts due by the people of America amounted, he believed, according to the moſt exact calculation that could be made, to 1,800,000l.

William Creighton, Eſq. ſtated the loſſes ſuffered by the merchants, in conſequence of the captures made by the American privateers, to have amounted at leaſt to two millions in October laſt, and that by this time they could not be leſs than two millions two hundred thouſand pounds.

Gregory Olive, Eſq. was next examined. This gentleman's teſtimony went chiefly to prove the damage done the Newfoundland traders; fifty of whoſe ſhips he declared had been taken, of about the average value of 2000l. each, beſides a great many ſmall veſſels, of about two or three hundred pounds value, upon the Banks.

Upon his croſs examination, this gentleman declared, that the fiſhing trade on the coaſt of Africa was much improved of late, and that in conſequence of the Americans being deprived of the means of purſuing it, we ſent more fiſh to Bilboa and the foreign markets than ever, and that, if men and ſhips could be procured, it would turn out a very beneficial branch of commerce; but that the fiſhermen's price was increaſed from 8 to 14l. a voyage; and the ſeamen's wages from 35 to 70s. a month.

The next witneſs examined was John Shoolbred, Eſq. of Mark-lane, who declared himſelf an African merchant and an under-writer.---He ſtated, that the African trade had been materially injured in conſequence of the American war. That upwards of 200 ſail were generally engaged in that trade previous to the war, but that not above forty ſhips were now ſent out. That 15 of the ſhips and cargoes had been taken by the Americans. That the average value of the cargo of a ſhip to Africa, outwards, was about 7000l. and her homeward freight of ſlaves worth about 9200l. each ſlave being worth at leaſt 35l. That the value of the ſhips loſt was 140,000l. upon a very moderate calculation. That the firſt ſhip taken was in March, 1777; the Americans not having, before that time, any market to carry the cargo of African ſhips to; and that all the ſhips were taken near, and moſt of them in ſight of, Barbadoes, after having got over every natural riſque of the voyage.---Upon his croſs examination, Mr. Shoolbred allowed, that thoſe who carried on the African ſlave trade formerly had lately ſent ſhips to fiſh on the coaſt of Africa; that the whole trade there promiſed to turn out exceedingly advantageous, and that this trade was formerly enjoyed by the Americans.

Edward Payne, eſq. was the laſt witneſs examined, and corroborated what the others had ſaid.

Lord Sandwich was the principal croſs examinant, and took conſiderable pains to probe the authenticity of the liſts of ſhipping produced by alderman Wooldridge, and his reports of the number of merchant ſhips loſt, and the number of American privateers on the ſeas. His lordſhip urged the alderman to tell the houſe whether the ſhips loaded with proviſions, and cleared out from ports in Ireland, which had been ſo unfortunate as to fall into the hands of American privateers, and were by them carried into the ports of France and Spain, were included in the 559 ſtated to be taken, and valued at near two millions of money. As there was much time ſpent in obtaining an anſwer to this queſtion, from the noble lord and the alderman not properly conceiving each other's meaning, his lordſhip at length ſaid, he would ſpeak out; that what he meant to come at was, to know if the value of thoſe ſhips and cargoes which were fitted out in Ireland, and intentionally ſuffered to be made captures, or run into the ports of France, was included in the one million and a fraction? The alderman replied, that the merchants knew of no fraudulent or colluſive ſurrender; if they had, and could meet with the captains ſo acting, the underwriters certainly would have refuſed to pay the inſurance money, and the merchants would have had the captains hanged.

On Feb. 9, Mr. Hake, ſecretary to the merchants, attended, and preſented an account of ſhips and cargoes belonging to the Weſt-India, the Jamaica, and the African trade, taken by the Americans, and the number retaken, with the value of each, under ſeparate heads.

After ſome farther altercation, it was carried on a diviſion, that the witneſſes propoſed to be examined by Lord Sandwich ſhould be called in. They accordingly were called in and examined, when, upon a diviſion, the queſtion was loſt by a majority of 48.

During theſe debates among the lords, the minority members made ſeveral motions in the lower houſe, in order to have the papers relative to the army and navy, letters from the different commanders, and various other documents of information laid before them, but all the motions were either over-ruled or carried by a majority in favour of the miniſters.

The 2d of February was appointed for an enquiry into the ſtate of the nation in the Houſe of Commons, and this great day, which was to give the people an inſight into the ſituation of their affairs being arrived, a vaſt multitude aſſembled in the lobby and environs of the Houſe, but not being able to gain admiſſion by either intreaty or intereſt, they forced their way into the gallery in ſpite of the door-keepers. The Houſe conſidered the intruſion in a heinous light, and a motion was directly made for clearing the gallery. A partial clearing only took place; the gentlemen were deſired to withdraw, the ladies, through complaiſance, were ſuffered to remain: but governor Johnſtone obſerving, that if the motive for clearing the houſe was a ſuppoſed propriety, to keep the ſtate of the nation concealed from our enemies, he ſaw no reaſon to indulge the ladies ſo far, as to make them acquainted with the arcana of the ſtate, as he did not think them more capable of keeping ſecrets than the men; they were likewiſe ordered to leave the houſe.

After the excluſion of the auditors in the gallery, a motion was made, that an addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, requeſting that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to order the proper officers to lay before the houſe the accounts received from the admiral on the Jamaica ſtation, relative to the ſhipping under his command. The queſtion was carried without a diviſion.

Mr. Pulteney then took the chair: having gone into a committee of the whole houſe to take into conſideration the ſtate of the nation, Mr. Charles Fox, on whoſe motion the committee was formed, opened the debate. He took a retroſpective view of the American war: he followed it in all its ſtages; pointing out the events as well fortunate as unfortunate of each year; demonſtrated from them the incapacity of adminiſtration to conduct the war; their ignorance of men, meaſures, and the country of America; and all the errors and blunders into which this unpardonable ignorance had hurried them.

His ſpeech was maſterly, forcible, and expreſſive, and gave, in the courſe of near three hours which it laſted, the moſt ſtriking proofs of judgment, ſound reaſoning, and aſtoniſhing memory. He pointed out the defenceleſs ſtate of the Britiſh empire in Europe, from the abſence of the troops and navy; and to conclude his ſpeech, he moved, that as it would be impoſſible to compleat the propoſed levies time enough to replace the regiments that in the interim might be ſent away, the houſe, conſidering the ſtate to which ſuch a meaſure would reduce the nation, would not ſuffer any troops from Great Britain, Ireland, Minorca, or Gibraltar, to be ſent to America.

This important reſolution was not oppoſed by arguments, but by votes. The queſtion was called for, and upon a diviſion it was rejected. The numbers for the reſolution were 165; againſt it, 259.

On February 4th, the buſineſs of the new levies came on, which was oppoſed by ſome of the minority members, but the houſe having entered fully into the debate, continued ſitting till near twelve o'clock, when the queſtion was put for voting a ſum of money to be granted to his majeſty for the pay and maintenance of the new corps, and upon a diviſion the numbers were, Ayes, 223. Noes, 130.

On the 5th of February, Mr. Bamber Gaſcoyne was called upon by the Speaker to make his report from the committee of ſupply; this was oppoſed by ſome of the members, but after a ſhort debate the queſtion was put and carried without a diviſion.

On Feb. 6, the houſe was full to hear Mr. Burke's motion; and the hon. member began with an awful ſolemnity to prepare their minds, and incline them to adopt his ſentiments, and join him in his endeavours to make the houſe as ſenſible as he was, of the many barbarities which he ſaid had been committed during the war in America. He deſcribed the ſavage ungovernable rage of the Indians let looſe upon the unarmed, the aged, the infant, and the helpleſs female; he painted them rioting in murder, luſt and rapine; he drew, in the moſt moving terms, the ſufferings of the unhappy victims whom they devoted to death; a death which his pathetic eloquence made wear an aſpect horrid almoſt beyond conception. Raiſed by his own pictures to a high degree of indignation, he inveighed moſt bitterly on thoſe who, by ordering a treaty with the barbarians, may be juſtly deemed the authors of all the calamities which attended the inhuman meaſure. Adminiſtration, Lord Dunmore, and Gen. Burgoyne, were placed upon the carpet; and the ſhare they had in the barbarities complained of, held up to view. The whole ſpeech, though it laſted three hours, was no more than a preface to his motion. When he thought he had ſaid ſufficient for his purpoſe, he moved, that copies of the treaties entered into with the Indians, ſhould be laid before the houſe.

The motion was warmly oppoſed by adminiſtration, and as vigorouſly defended by the minority. The arguments of the latter differed but little from thoſe of Mr. Burke; they all ſhaped their's after his model; the difference lay only in the colouring and fancy.

The oppoſite ſide vindicated the Indians from the reflections thrown on them; inſtances of their humanity, and the ſtrict diſcipline they were forced to ſubmit to, were adduced, and which being contrary to their way of carrying on the war by ſurprize and in flying parties, was alledged as the identical cauſe which made them quit our camps and abandon us. The facts urged as proofs of the untameable and ungovernable rage of the Indians, it was ſaid, were by much exaggerated; owed a great deal of their horror to the fancy of the orator: and, ſuch as they were, ought to be deemed the acts of a few lawleſs banditti of their body, who equally diſclaimed obedience to our commanders and their own; and not to be attributed to the nation, who, to the knowledge of many members of the houſe, had often acted with a degree of humanity which might make even Chriſtians bluſh.

The freeing the negroes, by Lord Dunmore, was juſtified on the ground of neceſſity: it was impoſſible to raiſe men otherwiſe to recover our juſt rights; every private conſideration ſhould give way to promote the public good.

The debate was warm, intereſting, and laſted near ſeven hours. The queſtion being put, the motion was rejected by a majority of 86; the numbers for it 137, againſt it 223.

On Feb. 9, the houſe, in a committee of ſupply, voted 105,227l. to make good the extra expences of the gold coin.

During this month, February, ſeveral motions were made by the lords in oppoſition concerning American affairs, and the ſtate of the nation; but on repeated diviſions, the queſtions were carried in favour of adminiſtration.

The 17th of February was the day appointed for Lord North to prepare his celebrated conciliatory motion. The houſe never was more full of its own members. Almoſt all the peers of the minority, as well as a few of the majority, with ſome biſhops, were in the gallery. All were intent, and eager to ſee in what manner lord North would make a propoſition, ſo oppoſite to the tenor of every thing which he had adviſed or oppoſed, during the courſe of four years.

Lord North began by apologizing for the intended length of his ſpeech, but he ſaid it was neceſſary, from the quantity of matter he was obliged to go into, and from the perſpicuity and clearneſs which he intended to make uſe of, in giving ſatisfaction upon every part of the detail. He declared, that from the beginning he had been uniformly diſpoſed to peace. That the coercive acts which he had made were ſuch as appeared to be neceſſary at the time, though in the event they had produced effects which he never intended. That as ſoon as he found that they had not the effect which he intended, he propoſed a conciliatory propoſition before the ſword was drawn. That at that time he thought, and that he ſtill thinks, the terms of that propoſition would form the happieſt, moſt equitable, and moſt laſting bond of union between Great Britain and the Colonies. That by a variety of diſcuſſions, a propoſition, that was originally clear and ſimple in itſelf, was made to appear ſo obſcure, as to go damned to America; ſo that the congreſs conceived, or took occaſion to repreſent it as a ſcheme for ſowing diviſions, and introducing taxation among them in a worſe mode than the former; and accordingly rejected it.

His idea never had been to draw any conſiderable revenue either in that way, or any other, from America; that his idea was, that they ſhould contribute in a very low proportion to the expences of this country. That he had always known, that American taxation could never produce a beneficial revenue; that there were many ſorts of taxes that could not at all be laid on that country, and that few of them would prove worth the charge of collection; that the ſtamp act was the moſt judicious that could be choſen for that purpoſe, as it intereſted every man who had any dealing, or any property to defend or recover, in the collection of the tax and the execution of the law; but notwithſtanding the high rate at which that duty had been formerly eſtimated, he did not believe its produce would have been a very conſiderable object; and if the people had confederated, as they ſeemed in general diſpoſed to do, and in ſome places had actually done, to go on without the ſtamps, it would produce nothing at all, but would encreaſe the confuſions of the country, if any attempts were made to diſturb the tranſactions which were carried on without ſtamps. That accordingly he never had propoſed any tax on America; he found them already taxed, when he unfortunately (as he ſtill muſt ſay, whatever uſe has been, or might be made of the word) came into adminiſtration. That his principle of policy was to have had as little diſcuſſion on theſe ſubjects as poſſible, but to keep the affairs of America out of parliament; that accordingly, as he had not laid, ſo he did not think it adviſeable for him to repeal the tea-tax, nor did he ever think of any particular means for enforcing it.

That the act enabling the Eaſt India Company to ſend teas to America, on their own account, and with the drawback of the whole duty here, was a regulation which he thought not poſſible the Americans could complain of, ſince it was a relief inſtead of an oppreſſion, but that the ill-affected there, and perſons concerned in a contraband trade, endeavoured to repreſent it as a monopoly; that in ſome hand-bills that were ſcattered about at Boſton, it was even ſuppoſed that he had taken off the American 3d. per pound duty, and that even on that ſuppoſition, the diſaffected excited the people to a tumult, upon a principle totally diſtinct from all idea of taxation. That, therefore, as he never had meant taxation as his object in the laſt tea-act, ſo neither did he in his conciliatory propoſition; but in the latter conſidered it only as a means of union and good agreement between the two countries; that, therefore, in what he was going to propoſe, he was uniform and conſiſtent.

One of the bills he intended to move for was, to quiet America upon the ſubject of taxation, and to remove all fears, real or pretended, of parliament's ever attempting to tax them again; and to take away all exerciſe of the right itſelf in future, ſo far as regarded revenue; that as to the other particulars in controverſy, he obſerved that the Americans had deſired a repeal of all the acts paſſed ſince the year 1763; that this could not, however, be ſuppoſed to mean any more than thoſe acts which had, in ſome way or other, preſſed on them; for that ſome which had paſſed in 1769 were beneficial, and ſuch as they themſelves muſt conſider in that light, being the granting of bounties and premiums, or the relaxation of former ſtatutes that had been grievous to them. That as to the late acts, ſuch as the Maſſachuſett's Charter, the Fiſhery, and the Prohibitory Bills, as they were the effect of the quarrel, ſhould ceaſe; and that as to complaints of matters of a various nature, authority ſhould be given to ſettle them to the ſatisfaction of America.

That all theſe matters, conſiſting of a great variety, would be better left to the diſcuſſion of commiſſioners, than to be eſtabliſhed here by act of parliament, or by explicit powers given for each ſpecific purpoſe; for that the Americans, in the negotiation, would conſider every conceſſion made actually here, to be a part of the baſis of the treaty, and never to be receded from, and would accumulate new demands upon that; therefore, as every thing of that kind might be variouſly modified by agreement, he was for leaving the whole to commiſſioners.

That the commiſſioners formerly appointed had very large powers; but that as others ſeemed to conſider them as more limited than in reality they were, he ſhould take care now to be very explicit, and that he would give them full powers to treat, diſcuſs, and conclude upon every point whatever. That as ſome difficulties had ariſen about the powers given to the commiſſioners, of treating with the Congreſs by name, he would now remove that difficulty, by empowering and enabling the commiſſioners to treat with the Congreſs, as if it were a legal body, and would ſo far give it authenticity, as to ſuppoſe its acts and conceſſions would bind all America. That they ſhould have powers to treat with any of the Provincial Aſſemblies upon their preſent conſtitution, and with any individuals in their preſent civil capacities or military commands; with General Waſhington, or any other Officer. That they ſhould have a power, whenever they thought requiſite, to order a ſuſpenſion of arms. That they ſhould have a power to ſuſpend the operation of all laws. That they ſhould have a power of granting all ſorts of pardons, immunities, and rewards. That they ſhould have a power of reſtoring all the Colonies, or any of them, to the form of its antient Conſtitution, as it ſtood before the troubles; any of thoſe where the king nominated the governors, council judges, and other magiſtrates, the commiſſioners to nominate ſuch at their diſcretion, till the king's further pleaſure be known.

That as the powers of the former Commiſſioners had been objected to, ſo the Congreſs had raiſed a difficulty on pretence of their non-admiſſion of their title to be Independent States. That meaning peace ſincerely, he was reſolved that this difficulty ſhould not ſtand in the way of a negotiation, for that the Commiſſioners were to admit it upon entering into a treaty, but as a point to be given up on its amicable termination. As the Americans might claim their independence on the outſet, he would not inſiſt on their renouncing it till the treaty ſhould receive its final ratification by the king and parliament of Great Britain.

That the Commiſſioners ſhould be inſtructed to negotiate for ſome reaſonable and moderate contribution towards the common defence of the Empire, when re-united: but to take away all pretence for not terminating this unhappy difference, the contribution was not to be inſiſted on as a ſine qua non of the treaty: but that if the Americans ſhould refuſe ſo reaſonable and equitable a propoſition, they were not to complain, if hereaſter they were not to look for ſupport from that part of the Empire to whoſe expence they had refuſed to contribute; that it might be aſked if his ſentiments had always been ſuch with regard to taxation and peace, and why he had not made this propoſition at a more early period? To this he anſwered, His opinion had ever been, that the moment of victory was the proper time for offering terms of conceſſion. That the Houſe might remember, that at the beginning of the Seſſion he had declared, that ſuch were his ſentiments; he at that time thought, that the victories obtained by Sir William Howe had been more deciſive; and that he knew nothing of General Burgoyne's misfortune. That when the news of that misfortune had arrived, and that the victories obtained by Sir William Howe could not be ſo improved, as to hinder General Waſhington from appearing with ſome ſuperiority in the field; and that the king's troops were obliged to retire, and fortify themſelves in winter quarters; the firſt thing that occurred to him, as the nation was ſtill ſtrong and vigorous, as they could raiſe a number of men, and as the reſources were far from exhauſted, that their ſtrength ſhould be exerted to repair the loſſes, and to purſue the war with vigour to a happy termination; but when he reflected upon the uncertainty of events, which had hitherto ſo much diſappointed his expectation, and that in caſe of the utmoſt ſucceſs, the terms which he now propoſed muſt be ſubſtantially the ſame as he ſhould propoſe in the height of victory; he ſaw no reaſon to prevent the protracting the war, the effuſion of blood, and the immoderate expence, he would offer the ſame propoſitions now.

That he muſt confeſs himſelf extremely diſappointed in his expectations of the effect of our military force. He did not mean at that time to condemn, or even to call into queſtion, the conduct of any of our commanders, but he had been diſappointed. That Sir William Howe had not only been, in the late actions, and in the whole courſe of the campaign, in goodneſs of troops and in all manner of ſupplies, but in numbers too, much ſuperior to the American army which oppoſed them in the field. That General Burgoyne, who was at length overpowered by numbers, had been in numbers, until the affair at Bennington, near twice as ſtrong as the army under General Gates. That all theſe things had happened in a manner very contrary to his expectation. That, for his part, he never made a promiſe which he did not perform, or receive an information which he did not communicate; and that if the Houſe was deceived, they had deceived themſelves.

On the whole, his conceſſions were from reaſon and propriety, not from neceſſity; that we were in condition to carry on the war much longer. We might raiſe many more men ready to ſend, for the navy was never in greater ſtrength, the revenue very little ſunk, and that he could raiſe the ſupplies for the current year, as a little time would ſhew; that he ſubmitted the whole, with regard to the propriety of his paſt and preſent conduct, to the judgment of the Houſe.

Mr. Fox roſe next; he ſaid that he could not refuſe his aſſent to the propoſitions made by Lord North; that he was very glad to find that they were, in the main, ſo ample and ſatisfactory, and that he believed they would be ſupported by all thoſe with whom he had the honour to act. That they did not materially differ from thoſe which had been made by a friend of his [Mr. Burke] about three years ago; that the very ſame arguments which had been uſed by the minority, and very nearly in the ſame words, were uſed by the noble lord upon this occaſion. He was glad to find, that he had wholly relinquiſhed the right of taxation, as this was a fundamental; he was alſo glad to find, that he had declared his intention of giving the Commiſſioners power to reſtore the Charter of Maſſachuſett's Bay; for giving the ſame ſatisfaction which he (Lord North) propoſed, it would be neceſſary for parliament to give the ſame ſecurity, with regard to Charters, which it had given with regard to taxation; that the Americans were full as jealous of the rights of their Aſſemblies, as of taxation; and their chief objection to the latter was, its tendency to affect the former.

He then put it to the noble lord, why this propoſition had not come before adjournment? and aſked, whether it had not been forced on now by the news from Paris? He ſaid he had not much acceſs to good information, but what he was going to ſtate was more than common report, "That ten days ago a treaty of commerce had been concluded with America by the Court of Verſailles, the conditions of which were, that France was to ſupport America in her independence."

Mr. Adam argued, that they would not be accepted, and that the holding forth ſuch terms at this time would diſpirit the people, and would diſgrace our Government; that our allies would become lukewarm, and our enemies elated. He farther ſaid, that the ſyſtem now propoſed (if accepted on the part of America) would in the end be ruinous to this country, as the contributions from thence would certainly prove inadequate to the expence we ſhould be at in ſupporting and protecting them: beſides, we were giving to America ſuch important privileges, that theſe, together with the natural advantages of that country with reſpect to the high price of labour, and the quantity of land eaſily obtained and cultivated, muſt in a courſe of years draw multitudes of inhabitants from Great Britain and Ireland; and that the acts now propoſed were in fact eſtabliſhing high bounties for promoting emigration, to the diſgrace of the Legiſlature, and the deſtruction of this country. He therefore diſapproved totally of the noble Lord's propoſitions.

Mr. G. Grenville ſpoke for the propoſitions, becauſe he wiſhed for peace, but doubted of their efficacy. He charged miniſtry with having deceived him in point of information. He concluded by informing the houſe, that he had ſeen an extract of a letter from Dr. Franklyn, mentioning the treaty between America and the Court of Verſailles.

Mr. Burke then ſpoke, to draw an anſwer from the miniſter relative to that treaty, as did Sir George Saville.

This made Lord North declare, that he knew nothing of it but by common report, and that the miniſters of France had denied it ſome time ago: but his lordſhip's declarations did not amount to a poſitive denial of its exiſtence.

Mr. Baker concluded the debate by obſerving, that it was ſhameful, when we had an eſtabliſhment at Paris, and a repreſentative of his majeſty, our information from that quarter ſhould be ſo bad.—The queſtion was then put and agreed to.

On the 19th of February Lord North preſented to the houſe "A bill to enable his majeſty to appoint commiſſioners to treat, conſent, and agree on the means of quieting the diſorders now ſubſiſting in certain of the colonies, plantations, and provinces of America." And, "A bill for declaring the intention of the parliament of Great Britain, concerning the exerciſe of the right of impoſing taxes on the colonies, plantations, and provinces of America," which, after ſeveral days debates, and ſome amendments, were carried.

Another bill of a conciliatory nature was likewiſe paſſed, viz. "A bill to repeal the act for regulating the government of Maſſachuſett's Bay." But the apparent intent of theſe bills ſeemed, in ſome meaſure, defeated by the recent treaty of amity and commerce, entered into between the Americans and the court of France.

March the 6th being appointed for opening the budget, the houſe reſolved itſelf into a Committee of Ways and Means; and having taken into their conſideration ſeveral accounts which had been referred to them, Lord North roſe, and proceeded to an inveſtigation and detailed report of the public finances, the ſupplies neceſſary for the ſervice of the current year, the amount of the Ways and Means, and the balance to be raiſed, in order to make up the deficiency of the Ways and Means, in compariſon to the amount of the ſupplies.

The whole of the ſupplies his Lordſhip ſtated at -	13,230,348,	2	10
The Ways and Means amounted to -	7,294,786	0	6½
Deficiency	5,935,562	2	3½

In order to make up this balance, his lordſhip propoſed to raiſe a loan of ſix millions, in the following manner:

100l. 3 per cents. which he valued at	66	10	0
2½ per cents. annuity for 30 years, valued at 14 years purchaſe, -	35	0	0
A Lottery, conſiſting of 48,000 tickets each ſubſcriber of 1000l. to have 8 tickets, which he valued at a profit of - -	2	8	0
	103	18	0

This calculation his lordſhip deemed a very moderate one; declaring, that from the occaſional riſe of ſtocks, and other accidental circumſtances, he thought it highly probable to turn out worth 105l. and aſſigning as a reaſon for his taking it in the loweſt point of view poſſible, that in his opinion the ſubſcribers ought to have the turn of the ſcale in their favour. He further ſaid, that he would give them the option of converting the annuity for 30 years into an annuity for life, on or before the 22d of December next. The extraordinaries of the army, and the ſurplus of the ſinking fund, which are not made up, his lordſhip took at a probable average, which he made to appear was not likely to be exceeded. The Ways and Means adopted by his lordſhip, though oppoſed with warmth and ability, met with the uſual approbation of the committee; and the gallery, contrary to the general cuſtom on Budget days, was kept ſhut.

On March 9, the houſe reſumed itſelf into the Committee of Ways and Means, when Lord North got up, and propoſed his new taxes, viz.

1ſt. A tax of 6d. in the pound on all houſes through Great Britain, from the rent of 5l. to 50l. per annum, incluſive; and 1s. in the pound on houſes from the rent of 50l. a year and upwards; all to be paid by the tenants.

2d. A tax of 8l. 8s. per tun upon all claret imported into Great Britain; and 4l. 4s. a tun upon all port wines; being 2d. a bottle extra duty on the former, and 1d. a bottle on the latter.

Several Members deſired to know how the houſes were to be aſſeſſed; and, whether this tax would not ultimately fall on the landed property? His lordſhip informed them, in anſwer to the firſt, that the aſſeſſors of the window tax were to be the collectors; and as to the other queſtion, the tax was not intended as a land-tax, though it might indiſcriminately affect landlord as well as tenant.

Mr. Gilbert got up early in the debate, and ſaid he ſhould move that day, in the committee of the whole houſe, for leave to bring in a bill to raiſe a tax of one full fourth part of all places and offices under government, except thoſe of the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, the lord chancellor, the bench of judges, and all military ones held by the officers of the army and navy.

Sir George Yonge ſeconded the motion.

Sir Philip Jennings Clerke propoſed an amendment, which was, that one quarter's ſalary ſhould be given up for a year, or during the American war.

This motion was warmly oppoſed by lord North, Mr. Rigby, and ſome other placemen; but warmly ſupported by the minority and a majority of placemen:

The numbers for the motion were	106
Againſt it	82
Majority	18

Several neceſſary and uſeful clauſes were added to the lottery bill, the principal being, " To oblige every lottery office keeper to take out a licence, at the expence of 50l. and give ſecurity not to infringe any part of the act.

" That no perſon ſhall diſpoſe of any part of a ticket in any ſmaller ſhare or proportion than a ſixteenth, on 50l. penalty.

" And that any perſon ſelling any goods, wares, or other merchandize, or who ſhall offer any ſum or ſums of money, upon any chance or event whatſoever, relating to the drawing of any ticket, ſhall be liable a to penalty of 20l.

" To enable commiſſioners of his majeſty's treaſury to eſtabliſh an office---all ſhares to be ſtamped at that office---The original ticket from which ſuch ſhares are to be taken to be kept at that office, till a certain time after drawing---Books of entry to be regularly kept---Perſons carrying ſhares to be ſtamped to pay a ſmall ſum ſpecified in the act---Penalties for perſons not ſtamped, and a clauſe for puniſhing perſons who ſhall forge the ſtamp of any ticket.

On the 22d of March the French having laid an embargo on all ſhipping in their ports, and having previouſly fitted out a large fleet, it was thought neceſſary to call out the militia of England, and encamp them, in order oppoſe any deſigned invaſion; and on March 27 an order was iſſued for detaining in the ports of England all French ſhips.

On the 13th of April commiſſioners were appointed to go with conciliatory terms to America; and on the 16th of the ſame month a proper proviſion was made for the younger branches of the royal family.

His majeſty having taken a reſolution to review ſome of the principal dock yards, he accordingly repaired to Chatham and Sheerneſs, and having ſurveyed every thing worthy of obſervation at thoſe places, he, together with the queen, &c. viſited Portſmouth on the 2d of May, and after reviewing the fleet, returned to London on the 9th.

To the great regret of the nation in general, on the 12th of May that great ſtateſman, the Earl of Chatham departed this life, of whom might be ſaid, with veracity, (by altering a few of Mr. Pope's words,)

Stateſman, yet friend to truth, of ſoul ſincere,
In action faithful, and in honour clear;
Who broke no promiſe, ſerv'd no private end,
Who gain'd a title, but who loſt no friend;
Whoſe glorious plans Britannia's ſelf approv'd,
By her foes dreaded, by her friends belov'd.

On the 28th of May the royal aſſent was given to a bill for the relief of the Roman catholics, and about the ſame time an embargo was laid on all veſſels, in the ports of England.

On the 2d of June his majeſty went in ſtate to the houſe of peers, when having given his royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, particularly one for ſettling an annuity on the deſcendants of the late earl of Chatham, he prorogued the parliament.

On the 9th of June the great earl of Chatham was buried in Weſtminſter-abbey, at the public expence, the following words being inſcribed on a ſilver plate, placed upon the lid of his coffin:

" The moſt noble and puiſſant William Pitt, earl " of Chatham, viſcount Pitt of Burton Pynſent in the county of Somerſet, born 15th of " November 1708, died at Hayes in Kent, the " 11th of May, 1778.

Admiral Keppel having ſailed with a fleet, not ſufficient in point of force, for the purpoſe of attacking the French, returned to England for a reinforcement, which having obtained, he again put to ſea. On July the 27th the two grand fleets met, and came to an engagement off Uſhant; the particulars of which are contained in the following letter from admiral Keppel to Mr. Stephens.

Victory, at Sea, July 30, 1778.

SIR,

My letters of the 23d and 24th inſtant, by the Peggy and Union cutters, acquainted you, for their lordſhips information, that I was in purſuit, with the king's fleet under my command, of a numerous fleet of French ſhips of war.

From that time till the 27th, the winds conſtantly in the ſouth-weſt and north-weſt quarters, ſometimes blowing ſtrong, and the French fleet always to windward going off, I made uſe of every method to cloſe in with them that was poſſible, keeping the king's ſhips at the ſame time collected, as much as the nature of a purſuit would admit of, and which became neceſſary from the cautious manner the French proceeded in, and the diſinclination that appeared in them to allow of my bringing the king's ſhips cloſe up to a regular engagement: This left but little other chance of getting in with them, than by ſeizing the opportunity that offered the morning of the 27th, by the wind's admitting of the van of the king's fleet under my command, leading up with, and cloſing with their center and rear.

The French began firing upon the headmoſt of vice-admiral Sir Robert Harland's diviſion, and the ſhips with him, as they led up; which cannonaded the leading ſhips and the vice-admiral ſoon returned, as did every ſhip as they could cloſe up: the chaſe had occaſioned their being extended, nevertheleſs they were all ſoon in battle.

The fleets, being upon different tacks, paſſed each other very cloſe: the object of the French ſeemed to be the diſabling the king's ſhips in their maſts and ſails, in which they ſo far ſucceeded as to prevent many of the ſhips of my fleet being able to follow me when I wore to ſtand after the French fleet; this obliged me to wear again, to join thoſe ſhips, and thereby allowed of the French forming their fleet again, and ranging it in a line to leeward of the king's fleet towards the cloſe of the day, which I did not diſcourage, but allowed of their doing it without firing upon them, thinking they meant handſomely to try their force with us the next morning; but they had been ſo beaten in the day, that they took the advantage of the night to go off.

The wind and weather being ſuch that they could reach their own ſhores before there was any chance of the king's fleet getting up with them in the ſtate the ſhips were in, in their maſts, yards, and ſails, left me no choice of what was proper and adviſeable to do.

The ſpirited conduct of vice-admiral Sir Robert Harland, vice-admiral Sir Hugh Palliſer, and the captains of the fleet, ſupported by their officers and men, deſerves much commendation.

A liſt of the killed and wounded is herewith incloſed.

I ſent captain Faulkner, captain of the Victory, with this account to their lordſhips, and am, Sir,

Your moſt obedient and very humble Servant,

A. KEPPEL.

This engagement, however, was repreſented in ſuch a light by vice-admiral Sir Hugh Palliſer, that the nation was thrown into a great ferment. Admiral Keppel vindicated his character in parliament on the 2d of December; nevertheleſs Sir Hugh Palliſer exhibited his charges againſt him on the 17th of the ſame month at the admiralty. The bill for his trial on land received the royal aſſent on the 24th enſuing; his trial accordingly began on the 7th of January, 1779, and ended on the 1ſt of February, when he was unanimouſly acquitted with the greateſt honour, and the proſecution pronounced to be malicious.

On the acquittal of admiral Keppel the moſt general demonſtrations of joy took place, and the greateſt illuminations perhaps ever known enſued in moſt of the cities, towns, &c. throughout the kingdom. He likewiſe received the united thanks of the houſe of lords, houſe of commons, the lord-mayor and common-council of the city of London (who preſented him with the freedom of the city in a box made of heart of oak, and richly ornamented with gold) and of many other cities, towns, corporations, &c.

But now to recur to American affairs.---By a letter from general Howe, dated Philadelphia, May 11, 1778, we are informed of that commander's intention to return to England, and to delegate the command of the Britiſh troops to general Clinton; we are likewiſe told of the ravages made by the Britiſh troops in the neighbourhood of Philadelphia, and of their having ſeized or deſtroyed great quantities of military ſtores, proviſions, veſſels, &c.

On the 18th of June, general Clinton (Sir William Howe having previouſly departed for England, purſuant to the inſtructions received from government) evacuated Philadelphia. He was attacked on his march by the provincials, whoſe principal object appeared to be the gaining poſſeſſion of the Britiſh baggage: but in this they were diſappointed, and every where repulſed, by means of the judicious manner in which general Clinton had diſpoſed his troops. This failure occaſioned a diſpute between the provincial generals, Waſhington and Lee, which hath ſince been amicably adjuſted.

The earl of Carliſle, Mr. Eden and governor Johnſtone, were ſent as commiſſioners from Great Britain, to treat of a pacification with America, but did not met with that ſucceſs that every true lover of both countries could wiſh. Perhaps the happy iſſue of this unhappy war was principally impeded by the arrival of a French fleet in America, under the command of the Count d'Eſtaing. This fleet, in concert with an army of provincials, attempted the reduction of Rhode-Iſland; but the Britiſh troops behaved ſo well on the land ſide, that the provincials were repulſed, and compelled to retreat; at the ſame time the French fleet meeting with a warmer reception than they expected, and finding that lord Howe, with his fleet, was approaching them, quitted their deſign upon Rhode-Iſland, and attempted to eſcape. Lord Howe, however, compelled them to engage; but the two fleets being ſeparated by a ſtorm, the French ſquadron, with great difficulty, got into Boſton in a very ſhattered condition.

About the ſame time the Britiſh forces ravaged ſome parts of the American coaſt, in order to deſtroy military ſtores, privateers, and other ſhipping, &c. the iſlands of St. Pierre and Miquelon were taken from the French, by admiral Montague's fleet. But The iſland of Dominica was captured by an armament of French and Americans from Martinico. Lord Howe being returned to England, the command of the grand Britiſh fleet devolved on admiral Byron, who, as ſoon as poſſible, proceeded in ſearch of the French fleet under the count d'Eſtaing.

Admiral Barrington, and a body of forces under general Grant, ſeized on the iſland of St. Lucie, one of the Antilles belonging to the French, on December 11. It was afterwards attempted to be retaken by count d'Eſtaing, but he was repulſed both by ſea and land with conſiderable loſs, and compelled to retire to Martinico, whither admiral Byron having joined admiral Barrington, the Britiſh fleet purſued and blocked him up in the harbour of that iſland.

Georgia ſurrendered to a detachment of Britiſh troops on January 4, 1779, and many inhabitants of that colony and of the Carolinas came in, and joined the royaliſts.

Among the domeſtic occurrences of 1778, and the commencment of 1779, we may enumerate the following:

The proviſion made for the younger branches of the royal family by parliament, April 16, 1778.--His majeſty went to the dock yards of Chatham and Sheerneſs on the 28th of the ſame month.---The royal viſit to Portſmouth May 2.--To Wincheſter September 29.---To Warley Common October 20.--And to Coxheath November 8.---The fire in king's college Oxford, which deſtroyed one wing of that building on December 18. The fire at Greenwich hoſpital which deſtroyed the whole of the ſouth-eaſt quarter, conſiſting of the chapel, &c. on January 2, 1779.---And the death of David Garrick, Eſq. the celebrated Engliſh Roſcius. This gentleman died on the 20th of January, 1779, and was buried with great ſtate in Weſtminſter Abbey on the firſt of February enſuing.

Mirror of manners; painter of the age;
Life of the drama, parent of the ſtage:
For till thy maſter-hand reform'd the clay,
Theatric genius rude in embrio lay.
Immortal GARRICK, fortune's favour'd ſon,
May future actors ſhine as thou haſt ſhone;
Shew human paſſions in their genuine light,
And nature bring conſpicuous to the ſight;
Bound the dramatic codes by moral laws,
And force the ſtage to echo virtue's cauſe;
Till youth improv'd, unbluſhing leave the play,
Pleas'd, tho' unſpoil'd, tho' uncorrupted, gay.

We ſhall conclude by taking a retroſpective view of the progreſs of letters during the preſent century, which has been juſtly termed The third Golden Age of Engliſh Literature; and in which the uſeful ſciences and polite arts have been brought to ſuch a degree of perfection, that perhaps human ingenuity muſt be exerted very greatly to make any additional refinements.

The third golden age of Engliſh literature, alluded to, began during the reign of queen Anne; many of the literati who had adorned the three former reigns ſtill ſurvived and flouriſhed; and theſe were reinforced by the addition of ſeveral others, who ſprung up, and preſently became the admiration of all Europe; ſuch as Pope, Addiſon, Prior, Swift, Congreve, Steele, Rowe, Bolingbroke, Shaftſbury, Arbuthnot, Savage, &c.

Moſt of the abovementioned noblemen and gentlemen adorned the reign of George I. and the miniſtry were not only the patrons of learning, but many of them were themſelves conſpicuous in the republic of letters.

The reign of George the ſecond was not inferior to the preceding: the courts of law were never ſo well ſupplied with able judges, the bench of biſhops was replete with divines poſſeſſing the greateſt abilities, and the learned and ingenious in every art and ſcience, and in all the branches of polite literature, were ſo numerous, that to particularize them would exceed the compaſs of our plan, and to mention only a few would be an affront to the many.

The reign of his preſent majeſty promiſes to be the fourth golden age of Engliſh literature; many who adorned the two preceding reigns ſtill ſhine in the republic of letters: beſides the various inſtitutions for the encouragement of learning which have been formerly founded, and are at preſent exceedingly improved, ſeveral others have received birth under the auſpices of his preſent majeſty.

As the Engliſh language hath happily blended the beauties, and rejected the defects of thoſe various languages of which it is compoſed, it is now generally deemed to be more manly, copious and energetic, and to the full as elegant and expreſſive as any language in Europe. This, added to the reputation of our writers in every branch of literature, hath rendered the ſtudy of the Engliſh language, and the peruſal of Engliſh authors, almoſt univerſal on the continent; even the French now ape us, as we formerly did them, and not only condeſcend to borrow many of our faſhions, but confeſs the ſuperiority of the Engliſh literati in moſt branches of erudition.

Indeed they now give up their three favourite topics, viz. Hiſtory, Voyage Writing, and Geography, and reſign the palm to us in the very points in which they had hitherto maintained an acknowledged ſuperiority. Robinſon's Hiſtory of the Emperor Charles V. hath lowered their hiſtorical reputation in our favour; the Accounts of the late Voyages to the South and North Seas, have wreſted the wreath from them in that ſpecies of writing, and placed it in the hands of Engliſhmen; and the admirable New and Complete Syſtem of Geography, by Charles Theodore Middleton, Eſq. hath ſunk their credit in the line of mixed mathematics, and evinced that the ſons of Britain, who can boldly penetrate into every part of the univerſe, and bravely face any dangers to explore unknown regions, are the beſt capable of deſcribing that WORLD they can ſo ably traverſe.

It is ſaid that his preſent majeſty, ſome time ſince, intended to inſtitute a new Order, to be called the Order of Merit, into which none but men of the moſt diſtinguiſhed abilities ſhould be admitted. But this deſign was laid aſide on account of the preſent unhappy troubles in America.

With a wiſh that theſe troubles may ſubſide, and that the above laudable intention may be reſumed, we ſhall conclude our work.

O ſtretch thy reign, fair Peace, from ſhore to ſhore,
Till diſcord ceaſe, and carnage be no more;
Till the clear'd mind, from prejudices free,
Shall bid the Mother and her Sons agree:
Britain once more the olive branch diſplay,
And fair America her laws obey.

A GENEALOGICAL ACCOUNT

OF THE DESCENT OF

GEORGE III. from EGBERT, the Firſt King of England.

EGBERT, of the Saxon race, firſt king of England, crowned A. D. 819; died 838; was ſucceeded by his ſon, Ethelwolf, crowned 838; died 857; whoſe eldeſt ſon, Ethelbald, was crowned 857; died, 859; who was ſucceeded by his three brothers, the youngeſt of whom was Alfred, crowned 872; died, 900; whoſe daughter, Elfrida, married Baldwin II. Count of Flanders, from whom deſcended, in a direct line, Matilda, of Brunſwick, who married William, Duke of Normandy, the Conqueror of England. After Alfred died, the crown deſcended to Edward the Elder, ſon of Ethelbald, before mentioned, who was crowned 900; died 925, and was ſucceeded by Athelſtan, his eldeſt ſon, who died without iſſue, and the crown deſcended to his brother, Edmund, in 941; whoſe ſiſter, Thyra, married Gormo III. king of Denmark, from whom deſcended Canute I. who was King of England 1017; Harold, King of England, 1035; and Canute II. or Hardicanute, who died 1039. From Canute I. deſcended William, Duke of Normandy, Conqueror of England. Edmund, ſon of Edward the Elder, died 943, whoſe ſon, Edgar, was crowned 959, and, dying 975, was ſucceeded, in 979, by his ſon, Ethelred II. whoſe daughter was mother of William the Conqueror; Ethelred II. died 1016, and was ſucceeded by his ſon, Edmund II. ſurnamed Ironſide, who dying in 1017, his ſon, Edward, was driven into exile, where he had two children, Edward Atheling, who died without iſſue, and Margaret, ſole heireſs to the crown of England, ſet aſide by the conqueſt, married Malcolm III. King of Scotland, whoſe daughter Maud, in 1101, was married to Henry I. ſon of William, Duke of Normandy, the Conqueror of England; which Henry ſucceeded his brother in England, 1100, and died in 1135; whoſe daughter Maud, was married to Henry V. Emperor of Germany, and, in 1154, her ſon, Henry II. was crowned King of England, and, dying in 1189, left two ſons, and a daughter named Matilda, or Maud, married to Henry the Lion, Duke of Brunſwick, from whom Erneſtus Auguſtus, Elector of Hanover, was lineally deſcended, who married the daughter of Elizabeth, daughter of James I. King of England, and the VIth of that name of Scotland, who was deſcended from Matilda, or Maud, daughter of Henry I. as before ſhewn. John, ſixth ſon of Henry II. was crowned 1193, died 1216; and was ſucceeded by his ſon, Henry III. 1216, who dying in 1272, was ſucceeded by his ſon, Edward I. 1272, who died 1307; was ſucceeded by Edward II. 1307, who died 1327, and his ſon, Edward III. ſucceeded him, in 1327, who dying in 1377, was ſucceeded by his grandſon, Richard II. Henry IV. ſucceeded, in 1399, whoſe ſon, Henry V. died in 1422, and his ſon, Henry VI. was depoſed in 1461. Edward IV. deſcended from the fifth ſon of Edward III. mounted the throne, and died 1482, whoſe daughter, Elizabeth, married Henry VII. deſcended from John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, fourth ſon of Edward III. by which marriage the families were again united; Henry VII. was crowned 1485, and, dying in 1509, left three children, a ſon and two daughters; the youngeſt daughter, Margaret, married James IV. King of Scotland, who was, in 1513, ſucceeded in that kingdom by his ſon James V. whoſe daughter, Mary, was mother of James VI. of Scotland, and the firſt of that name in England, whoſe daughter, Elizabeth, married Frederick, King of Bohemia; by whom ſhe had a daughter, named Sophia, that married Erneſtus, Elector of Hanover, and Biſhop of Oſnabrug; whoſe only daughter married Frederick, firſt King of Pruſſia; and Erneſtus, their eldeſt ſon, became King of England, on the death of Q. Anne, by the name of George I. born 1660, crowned 1714, and, dying 1727, left two children, the youngeſt a daughter, mother of the preſent King of Pruſſia, who died 1757; and a ſon, who ſucceeded as Elector of Hanover and King of England, by the name of George II. who died in October, 1760; whoſe eldeſt daughter, Anne, married the late Prince of Orange, and died 1759; his ſecond daughter, Amelia-Sophia-Eleanor, is ſtill living; his third daughter, Elizabeth-Caroline, died unmarried, 1758; his fourth daughter, Mary, married the Prince of Heſſe-Caſſel, in 1740, and died 1771; and his youngeſt daughter, Louiſa, married the King of Denmark, and was mother of the preſent King: ſhe died Dec. 8, 1751; his ſecond ſon, George-William, died 1718; his youngeſt ſon, William, Duke of Cumberland, died Nov. 2, 1765; and his eldeſt ſon, Frederick, Prince of Wales, who died March 20, 1751, married Auguſta, daughter of Frederick II. Prince of Saxe-Gotha, by whom he left nine children; the eldeſt daughter and firſt child, Auguſta, 1764, married the hereditary Prince of Brunſwick; the ſecond daughter, Elizabeth-Caroline, died 1759; the third daughter Louiſa-Anne, died 1768, both unmarried; and the forth daughter, and poſthumous child, married Chriſtian VII. the preſent King of Denmark, but was divorced, 1772, and died at Zell, May 11, 1775; the ſecond ſon, Edward-Auguſtus, Duke of York, died 1769; but the third ſon, William-Henry, Duke of Glouceſter, and the fourth ſon Henry-Frederick, Duke of Cumberland, are now living. Frederick-William, the youngeſt ſon, died Dec. 29, 1765, aged 16.
